THE Epistle to the Reader.

Enforinus, in his little book, written to Q Cerebellus of ones Birth day; having in hand the Explication of Times Intervals, thought good thus to Preface it. (a) Si
Origo Mundi in hominum notitiam venisset, inde exordium sumeremus. If the Origin of the World had been known unto Man, I would thence have taken my beginning. And a little after, speaking of this Time. Sive habuit initium, saies he, (b) Sive semper fuit, certo quot an- norum sit, non potest comprehendere. Whether time had a beginning, or whether it alwaies was, the certain number of years cannot be com-prehended. Therefore Ptolemæus, from Astronomical supputations, thus renounces this Epoch of the World, as a thing most remote from the knowledge of Man, (c) Τὰς μὲν ἡμετέρας αἰῶνας οὐ δύναται πᾶσι τοῖς ἀνθρώποις ἰσθῆναι, τὰ δὲ κατὰ μέτρας χρόνου διαβιβάσαντες, ἀποδείκνυσι οὐκ ἀληθῆς, καὶ ἐξ ἀναρρήτων ὑποθέσεων.

To find Observation upon the Passages of the whole World, or upon immeasurable times, I think much out of their way, th it desire to learn and know the truth: And Julius Firmius Maternus, from his discourse of Birth-dayes, that Geniture of the World, received from Esculapius and Anubius.
(d) Non fuit ista genitura Mundi, (saies he) Nec enim Mundus certum diem habuit ortus sui, nec aliquid interfuit eo tempore quo Mundus Divine mentis ac providi Numinis ratione formatus est: Nec eo usque, se intentio potius humanae fragilitatis extendere ut Originem Mundi facile possit ratione concipere, aut explicare. That was not the Birth day of the World: Nor, indeed, had the World any certain day of its beginning: Nor was there any thing in Being at that time, when the World was formed by the Wisdom of the Divine Understanding, and Provident Deity; Nor could the intention of Human frailty so far extend it self, that it could conceive or unfold, by an easie account, the Worlds Original.

Nor, truly, is it strange that Heathens, altogether ignorant of holy writ, should thus despair, of ever attaining the knowledge of the Worlds Rise; when as even amongst Christians, that most renowned Chronographer Dionysius Petavius, being about to declare his Opinion concerning the Creation of the World, and the number of years, from thence down to us, first made (c) this resolution before his discourse. Annorum ab orbe condito ad hoc tempora numerum neque certam rationem compertum esse, neque citra Divinam significationem posse comperiri. That the number of years from the beginning of the World, to these our days, can by no reasons be certainly concluded, nor any way found out, without Divine Revelation. From whose opinion Philastrius Brixianensis did very much dissent; denoting it heretic (f) to affirm the number of years, from the beginning of the World, uncertain; and that men knew not the spaces of Time. And Lactantius Firmianus, whose assertion in his Divine Institutions, is somewhat more bold. (g) Nos, quo Divina litera ad scientiam veritatis erudiunt, principium Mundi finemque cognovimus. We whom the Holy Scriptures do train up to the knowledge of Truth, know both the beginning and end of the World. For whatsoever may be done of things past, we are taught that the (h) Father hath reserved the knowledge of things future in his own power; Nor is there any Mortal to whom the whole continuance of time is known: whither that of the Son of Sirac is thought to tend. (i) Ἄπειρος ὁ χρόνος ὡς ὁ κύβητος, ὡς τὰ ὑπερσπάρτα, ὡς τὰ ἑσπερία. The Sands of the Sea, the Drops of Rain, and the Days of the World, who can number? Which Lyrannus thinking to have been spoken of time past, (when as others interpret it here, and in Chap. XVIII. 11. of the days of eternity) draws thence this erroneous conclusion, That the dayes from the beginning of the World were never by any man cast up certainly and precisely.

The first Christian Writer, (that I have had the view of) who attempted from Holy Writings to deduce the Age of the World, was Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch; who, (k) concerning this whole account, thus generally declares. Ὅτις χρόνος ὃς τὸ ἐν διακρίσει τῆς κατασκευῆς τοῦ κόσμου τὸ ἀνέστη. All times and years are made known to them who are willing to obey the truth. But concerning the exactness of this Calculation, he thus afterwards proceeds. Ἡμῶς τὸ ἀκριβὲς ἔτος ἀποδοῦναι ἀμύνεται τὸν ἱερωὴν τὸν ἀσπίδα, διὰ τὸ μὴ ἀναγνωρίζεσθαι τὰς ἐπεὶ ἑκάστης τῆς κατασκευῆς τοῦ κόσμου ἡμέρας. And haply we may not be able to give an exact account of every year, because in the Holy Scriptures there is no mention of the months and dayes current.

For when as the Scripture commonly takes notice only of the whole intire years, not regarding the dayes and months either deficient to the making up compleat years, or supernumerary to the intire, there might a doubt arise of the accuratenesse of that sum which shall arise from such years added together. But yet, granting this one thing, (and that most consonant to reason) That Holy Writers, consigning the years of the World, in their several places, with such diligence, had this in designe, That the series of the Years of the World, which could no other way be learned, might be discovered unto us; This (I say) being granted granted, we affirm that the Holy Ghost hath, as much as was necessary, provided against this doubt: when as he hath to the several terminations and turnings of the several Periods, (on which the series of time depends) adjoynd the very month and day. As for example, when the Israelites are said to go out of Egypt, the (l) fifteenth day of the first month: and Solomon to begin to build the Temple, in the 480 year after their (m) departure, on the second day of the (n) second month, the monthes and dayes which bound each termination of that Period, shew, that 11 monthes and 14 dayes are to be taken away; and not that the whole 480, but only 479 years, and sixteen dayes are to be taken for the space of that Period.

Tempus Astronomicum, a primo creationis puncto ad principium a Christiana exactum, quise dare nobis posse promittunt, favore mihi digni videntur magis quam laude, quia majus quid ingenio humano moluntur. Those who promise to give us an exact Astronomical Table of Time, from the first point of the Creation unto Christ, seem to me more worthy of encouragement than praise, in that they attempt a thing above human capacity, saies David Paræus, who, among the latest of our Writers, took upon him to number the years, even to Christs time, out of the Holy Scriptures. Therefore he saies, leaving the Astronomical, he betook himself to the Politick time of the Hebrews, Egyptians, and Persians, as to a ἄλλοτερος χρόνος; or, another Course.

But if I have any insight in this business, it is of no great concernment, what rule we make use of in measuring the course of time, so it be known and terminated with a certain number of dayes. And if any one could with D. Paræus, by some equal measure of years, define the distance between the foundation of the World, and Christs time; It were also most easie, without the help of any Astronomical Table, to set down how many Equinoctials in number happened, during that Interval. And the noted revolution of time in any Political year, from an Equinoctial to the same point again, what is it but a year natural and truly Astronomical?

But if any one, well seen in the knowledge, not onely of Sacred and exotick History, but of Astronomical Calculation, and the old Hebrew Kalender, shall apply himself to these studies, I judge it indeed difficult, but not impossible for such a one to attain, not onely the number of years, but even, of dayes from the Creation of the World. That, without doubt, by retrograde supputation, Basil, the great, teaches us we may attain to the first day of the World. (o) Ἄς ἂν χρόνος ἦτορ ἡ τὴν κατὰ τὸν κόσμον ἀνάστασιν ἐκείνην, ἡν καὶ ἐν τῷ περὶ τοῦ κόσμου ἀποκαταστάσεως ἐπιστολῇ ἡμεῖς τὴν ἀνάστασιν τοῦ κόσμου καὶ τὴν ἀνάστασιν τοῦ κόσμου. Thou mayst indeed learn in what very time the foundation of the World was laid, if returning from this time to former ages, thou endeavour studiously to find out the day of the Worlds Origin. For thus thou mayest find whence time time had its first motion. But in regard, in divers Ages and Nations, divers Epochs of time were used, and several forms of years: Here it's necessary that some common and known account should be observed, to which the diversity of the rest may most appositely be reduced. And to us there is no measure of time more known, and more accommodated to the common collation of times than the form of the Julian Years and Months, deduced from the middle of the night beginning the Kalends of January, of the first year of the common account from Christ; with those three Cycles, by which being joyned, every year is distinguished from all other years whatsoever. For example, the Roman Indiction 15 years, the Cycle of the Moon, or Golden Number 19, and the Cycle of the Sun (the Index of Sun-day, or our Lords Day) containing the Period of twenty eight years. Nor is there any thing more or better known than That at this day, the year (I do not say of the true Nativity of Christ, which is controverted amongst the Learned, but) of the common Christian era MDCL is noted with the Characters of 3 in the Roman indiction, 17 in the Lunar Cycle, and 7. in that of the Sun.

But for as much as our Christian Epoch falls many Ages after the beginning of the World, and the number of years before that backward, is not onely more troublefome; but (unless greater care be taken) more lyable to errour, Also it hath pleased our Modern Chronologers, to add to that generally received Hypothesis, (which asserted the Julian Years, with their three Cycles by a certain Mathematical prolepsis, to have run down to the very beginning of the World) an artificial Epoch, framed out of three Cycles multiplied in themselves; for the Solar Cycle being multiplied by the Lunar, or the number of 28, by 19, produces the great Paschal Cycle of 532 years, and that again multiplied by fifteen, the number of the indiction, there arises the Period of 7980 years, which was first (if I mistake not) observed by Robert Lotharing, Bishop of Hereford, in our Island of Britain, and 500 years after by Joseph Scaliger, fitted for Chronological uses, and called by the name of the Julian Period, because it contained a Cycle of so many Julian years. Now if the Series of the three minor Cycles be from this present year, extended backward unto precedent Times, the 4713 years before the beginning of our Christian Account, will be found to be that year into which the first year of the Indiction, the first of the Lunar Cycle, and the first of the Solar will fall. Having placed therefore the heads of this Period in the Kalends of January, in that proleptick year, the first of our Christian vulgar account, will be reckoned the 4714 of the Julian Period, which, being divided by 15. 19. 28. will present us with the 4 Roman indiction, the 2 Lunar Cycle, and the 10 Solar, which are the principal Characters of that year.

We find moreover that the year of our fore-fathers, and the years

years of the ancient Egyptians, and Hebrews were of the same quantity with the Julian, consisting of twelve equal months, every of them containing 30 days, (for it cannot be proved that the Hebrews did use Lunar Months, before the Babylonian Captivity) adjoining to the end of the twelfth month, the addition of five days, and every fourth year six. And I have observed by the continued succession of these years, as they are delivered in holy writ, That the end of the great Nebuchadnezzars, and the beginning of Evilmerodachs (his sons) reign, fell out in the 3441 year of the World, but by collation of Chaldean History, and the Astronomical Cannon, it fell out in the 85 year of Nabonassar, and, as by certain connexion, it must follow in the 562 year before the Christian account, and of the Julian Period, the 4152. and from thence I gathered the Creation of the World did fall out upon the 710 year of the Julian Period, by placing its beginning in Autumn: but for as much as the first day of the World began with the evening of the first day of the week, I have observed that the Sunday, which in the year 710 aforesaid, came nearest the Autumnal Equinox, by Astronomical Tables, (p) notwithstanding, the stay of the Sun, in the dayes of Jshus, and the going back of it in the dayes of Ezekiah happened upon the 23 day of the Julian October; from thence concluded, that from the evening preceding, that first day of the Julian year, both the first day of the Creation, and the first motion of time are to be deduced.

The difficulties of Chronologers, perplexed by that phenomenia, or love of contention, so termed by Basil, being at last over-passed. I incline to this opinion, that from the evening ushering in the first day of the World, to that midnight which began the first day of the Christian era, there was 4003 years, seventy dayes, and six temporarie howers; and that the true Nativity of our Saviour was full four years before the beginning of the vulgar Christian era, as is demonstrable by the time of Herods death. For according to our account, the building of Solomons Temple was finished in the 3000 year of the VWorld, and in the 4000 year of the VWorld, the dayes being (q) fulfilled, in which the Blessed Virgin, Mother of God, was to bring forth Christ himself, (of whom the Temple was a (r) Type) was manifest in the flesh, and made his first appearance unto man: from whence four years being added to the Christian era, and as many taken away from the years before it, instead of the Common and Vulgar, we shall obtain a true and natural Epoch of the Nativity of Christ.

But these things, (which I do onely point at for the present) God willing, shall be more fully hereafter confirmed in our Sacred Chronology, which I intend to put forth, together with a Treatise of the Primitive Years, and the Kalender of the ancient Hebrews: In the mean time I thought good to publish the Annals of the Old Testament, built upon the Foundation there laid, with a Chronicle of all Foreign Affairs, transacted in Asia and Egypt, before the beginning of the Olympiads, those things chiefly being reserved to a particular History of the Greeks and Romans, which are recorded to have past in Greece, (to which I joyn Rhodes and the Islands lying betwixt Asia and Europe) and the Western parts.

In representing the Sacred History, I have followed the translation of Junius and Tremellius, using their Hebraism's also, and their Contents of the Chapters. In expressing the Prophane, I have observed the words of their ancient Authours, or of their best Translator out of the Greek, and particularly James Dalechamp in Athenæus; although in noting the Chapters I observed the edition of Natalis Comes, and out of these I have my self collected the Histories, or being gathered by them, taken them out of Codomanes, Capellas Emmias, Pezelius, Eberus, Salianus, or some other Chronologer, which I had at hand; yet so, that the very Fountains themselves of the first Authours, (whose places I did most diligently mark) were alwayes before mine eyes: for being wholly intent upon the right ordering of times, I was not much concerned in the alteration of other words, which, if it had seemed considerable, had been very easie to have performed.

And whereas amongst a multitude of Historians, which were before Julius Cæsars time, the malice of time left only four remaining, Herodotus, Thucilides, Xenophon, and Polibius, (and him also lame and imperfect in the greatest part of him) these, notwithstanding, I esteemed the most Authentick for their Antiquity; and having by their authority corrected the frequent errors in Chronology of Diodorus Siculus; but in Affairs that related to Alexander the Great, (which they not so much as mentioned, I endeavoured not by Diodorus only, but by Curtius and Arianus also, to clear the light of those times, which were by others left dark and obscure.

The four first letters of the Alphabet I made use of, as indexes of the beginnings, progresses, and ending of the years of the World, A. signifying the Autumnal, or first Quarter. B. the Brumal or Winter Quarter. C. the Spring, and the Summer. D. other things, the Prudent Reader will of himself understand: to whom I with the enjoyment of these endeavours, and bid farewell. London, the 13 Kalend. of Jul. according to the Julian Period, in the 1650 year of the vulgar Christian æra, from the true Nativity of our Lord and Saviour, the 1654 year.

HIS

NARRATION, concerning PHILIP Prince Palatine, TO RHEBUS.

Have often heard Capino relate thus, When Dalburgius, the Bishop of the Vangions, Rudolphus Agricola, and my self were with Philip Prince Palatine Elector; not onely in common discourse, but also in serious debates about the Affairs of the Common-wealth; they would often bring notable examples, or from the Persian or Grecian or Roman Affairs: whereby the Prince was very much inflamed with the desire of knowledge in History: but said he observed, the distinction of Times, Nations, and Empires, was very requisite to that end. And therefore desired them, that out of all Antiquities, as far as they were known, from the Hebrew Fountains, Greek, and Latine Authours, they would in order dispose the several Monarchies, that so the Times of the World, and the Series of the most considerable mutations might be known. There were then no books extant in the German tongue, concerning ancient Empires. Nor had the Latines any thing of that nature, save Iustins confused Epitome, which also wanted the distinction of Times. Those learned men were then at leisure and delighted with the work. They therefore recite in order out of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latine Monuments, the several Monarchies, and insert all the most memorable transactions in their due place and order, with the distinctions of Nations,

About the Nations, and Times. This Ingenious Prince read these Works most earnestly, and declared his delight in them, and That the Series of Times, and the memory of the most remarkable Affairs were preserved by Divine Providence. For they shewed him, how that the History of the World was continued so, that Herodatus begins his Narrations, a little before the end of the Prophetic History. For even before the end of the Persian Monarchy, concerning which we have most clear Narrations in Daniel, Esdras, and Nehemia, some names of the Kings of Assyria and Egypt, are the same in the Prophets and Herodotus. Jeremias foretells destruction to Apries, which Herodotus describes. After Apries kills Jeremie, and then Amasis strangles the proud King after he had taken him. The Palatine Prince said he did acknowledge a Testimony of Divine presence, in the constitution of Empires, for that they could neither be attained nor retained by meer Humane power, and that they were therefore constituted, that they might be the Upholders of Human Society, conjoin many Nations, Restore Law, Justice, Peace, yea, they might teach men concerning God. And therefore did often repeat those words of Daniel, God changes, and confirms Empires. He said likewise, That by the mutations and punishments of Tyrants, the just judgement of the Almighty was most conspicuous; and that all Mankind was, by these Illustrious Examples, premonished to acknowledge God, and were given to understand that he wills and ordains justice, and is truly offended with those who transgress this his ordination. Such were the Speeches of that Prince, considering the Rises and Ruines of Empires.

THE ANNALS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, From the beginning of the World.

In the beginning God created Heaven and Earth, Gen. 1. v. 1. Which beginning of time, according to our Chronologie, fell upon the entrance of the night preceding the twenty third day of October, in the year of the Julian Calendar, 710.

4004. 710.

Upon the first day therefore of the world, or October 23. being our Sunday, God, together with the highest Heaven, created the Angels. Then having finished, as it were, the roof of this building, he fell in hand with the foundation of this wonderful Fabrick of the World; he fashioned this lowermost Globe, consisting of the Deep, and of the Earth; all the Quire of Angels singing together, and magnifying his name therefore. [Job. 38. v. 7.] And when the Earth was void and without forme, and darkness covered the face of the Deep, on the very middle of the first day, the light was created; which God severing from the darkness, called the one day, and the other night.

On the second day [October 24 being Monday] the firmament being finished, which was called Heaven, a separation was made of the waters above, and the waters here beneath enclosing the earth.

Upon the third day [October 25, Tuesday] these waters beneath running together into one place, the dry land appeared. This confluence of the waters, God made a Sea, sending out from thence the rivers, which were thither to return again [Eccles. 1. vers. 7.] and he caused the Earth to bud, and bring forth all kinds of herbs and plants, with seeds and fruits: Bur above all, he enriched the garden of Eden with plants; for among them grew the tree of Life, and the tree of Knowledge, of good and evil. [Gen. 2. vers. 8, 9.]

On the fourth day [October 26, which is our Wednesday] the Sun, the Moon, and the rest of the Stars were created.

On the fifth day [October 27, Thursday] Fish and flying Fowl were created, and endued with a blessing of encrease.

And upon the sixth day [October 28, which is our Friday] the living creatures of the earth took their creation, as well going, as creeping creatures. And last of all, man was made and created after the image of God, which consisted principally in the divine knowledge of the minds [Coloss. 3. vers. 10.] and in the naturall and proper sanctity of his will. [Ephes. 4. vers. 24.] And he forth-with, when all living creatures, by the Divine Power, were brought before him, as a Lord appointed over them, gave them their names, by which they should be called. Among all which, when he found none to help him like to himself, lest he should be destitute of a fit companion, God taking a rib out of his side, whilst he slept, fashioned it into a woman, and gave her to him for a wife, establishing, with all a law of marriage between them; then blessing them, he bade them wax and multiply, and gave them dominion over all living creatures, and for them all he provided a large proportion of food and sustenance to live upon. To conclude, fin being not yet entered upon the world, God beheld all that he had made, and, behold, it was exceeding good. And so was the evening, and so was the morning of the sixth day. [Gen. 1. vers. 31.]

Now upon the seventh day, [October 29, which is, with us Saturday], when God had finished valley of Sennar, [Gen. 11. v. 2.] where the people impiously laid their heads together, as we find in the book of wildome, [10. v. 5.] to hinder this disposition of them commanded by God, and began by Noah (as may be gathered out of [Gen. 1. v. 4, 6, 8, 9.] compared together, and went in hand to build the city and tower off Babylon, which purpose of theirs being frustrated by the confusion of languages, sent among divers companies and colonies, sitting of Babel, [c. 11. v. 9.] the dispersion of Nations followed; among others in that diversity of language, Captains and conductors, of which several companies; among others, the 13 sons of Jethan , the brothers of Phaleg , are recorded to have been, [Gen. 10. v. 26.] All which, certainly, at what time their Uncle Phaleg was born, were not come into the world, For certainly, that Heber was but 34 years old, when Phaleg was born unto him, though we should suppose that Jethan was born, when Heber was but 20 years of age, and yet still it appears, that, that eldest son of Jethan , must be six years younger than Phaleg , so that at least the younger crew of those 13 sons of Jethan , to wit, Jehobab and three other brothers of his mentioned next after him, and which left their names, upon those golden colonies, Sheba , [Psal. 72. v. 15. Ophir , 1 Reg. 9. v. 28. & Havilah , Gen. 2. v. 11.] could not fall some years after Rebu were born to Phaleg , be capable of such an employment, as to conduct colonies by reason of their tender age.

1771.	A.	The years of mans age were again cut shorter by one half, than erst they were. From hence to the taking of Babilon by Alexander the Great, are reckoned 1903 years: which calculation and number of years made according to Astronomical observations Porphyrius, as we find in Simplex , in his second book de Calc affirmeth to have been transmitted into Greece from Babylon, by Chaldeans , at Assurbani , whence it appears that the Babylonians gave themselves to the knowledge of Astronomy, even from the very days of Nimrod , from whom all that region took the name of the Land of Nimrod , [Mich. 5. v. 6.] Forasmuch as both Babylon it self was by his persuasion begun to be built, as Joseph. Antiq. 6. 5. reporteth, and for that there the royal seat of that kingdom was placed, as Adolf. 1816.	d.	That the Egyptian sovereignty & regal power over the subject, lasted full out 1663 years; is testified by Constantinus Manassis , which being reckoned backward from the time that Cambyses of Persia conquered Egypt, lead us up to this account, about which time Mysram the son of Cham carried his colony into Egypt, which from thence was called sometime the land of Mysram , sometime of Chama , [Psal. 105. 23, 27. 1910.	c.	And a nation out of Arabia bordering upon Egypt, called by the Egyptians Hief , and signified Shephers , brake into Egypt, and took Amphis , and possessed themselves wholly of the lower Egypt bordering upon the mediterranean sea, which Salatis their first K. held by the space of 19 years, as Ioseph , in his 1 book cont. Apionem reports out of Manetho , Beon their second King reigned 44 years, [Manetho.]	2630.	2084.

Now when Tharab had lived 70 years, there was born unto him the eldest of his three sons, [Gen. 11. v. 26.] and he, not Abram (who as we shall see anon, came not into the world till 66 years after) but Haras , father-in-law afterward of the third brother Nachor , for this man before ever his father Tharab left the of the Chaldeans, died, and left a daughter named Milcam , which was married to his uncle Nachor , [Gen. 11. v. 28, 29.]	2658.	2011.

The third Age of the World.

Abram, after his fathers decease, was called again by God, out of his own country, and from his kindred, and from his fathers house; with a further promise, and Evangelical covenant of blessing him, that is, in his blessed seed, our Lord Jesus Christ, all the nations of the earth, [Gen. 12. 1, 2, and Abi. 7. 4.] from which promise, and Abram's departure, which immediately followed, are to be deduced those 430 years which Abram and his posterity spent in foreign lands, [Ex. 12. 40. 1. and Gal. 3. 17.] placing the first and last day of this their pilgrimage and sojournings, upon the 15 of the month Ab, which this year falls upon the 4 day of May, being weneday, according to the Julian Calendar; by our account.

On this day therefore, Abram when he was 75 years old, following the call of God, took Sarai his wife, and Lot, his brother Haras son, with all the substance, which he had gotten, and souls which God had given him in Carran, and took his journey, and at length came into the land of Canaan; passing through it, till he came to a place called Sichen, to the oak of Moreah, [Gen. 12. 4, 5, 6.] of which mention is afterward made, [Gen. 35. 4. Iof. 24. v. 3, 26. and in Judges 9. 6.] where God promised Abram, that to his seed he would give that land, and he there built an Altar to the Lord, which had there appeared to him. Afterward removing from thence he went into the hill-country, called Luz, and in after times, known by the name of Bethel, toward the east, [Gen. 28. 19.] where again he built an altar, and called upon the name of the Lord; and from thence holding on his journey, he came into the fourth part of that country, which looketh towards Egypt, [Gen. 12. 7, 8, 9.]

Abram, compelled by a famine, from thence went down into Egypt, where Sarab his wife (who to elchew a danger, went there by the name of his sister) was taken into Pharaoh's house; but was not long after, with great gifts and presents, sent back unto him again untoucht; and, with a safe passage, were both permitted to depart out of Egypt, [Gen. 12. 10, 20.]

Then Abram, with Lot returned into Canaan, where when the country which they pitched upon, was not sufficient to feed both their herds of cattle, they parted; and Lot went into the country of Sodom; after whose departures, the promise both of the possession of that land of Canaan, and also of his numberless posterity was again renewed unto him; and then removing from the place between Bethel and Hai, where he had formerly built an Altar, he dwelt in the plain of Mamre, near unto Hebron, & there built an Altar unto the Lord, [Gen. 13.]

Then did Bera K. of Sodom, with the rest of the petty kings of Pentapolis rebel, & took off the yoke of Chedorlaomer K. of Elam, in the 13 year of their subjection unto him, [Gen. 14. 4.]

And in the fourteenth year (Chedorlaomer, with other confederate Princes, Amraphel of Shinar, Arise of Ellaur, and Tidal K. of the nations, joining their forces against those petty kings which had revolted from him, first destroyed the Raphians, the Zuzans, the Emizans and Chozans, who inhabited all that region, which afterward was possessed by the Amalekites, and after that putting to flight the Kings of Pentapolis in the valley of Siddim, carried away Lot prisoner with all the plunder of Sodom and Gomorrah; whereof, when tidings came to Abram, he armed his own servants to the number of 318. and with his confederates Huer, Elicol, and Mamre, overtaking Chedorlaomer and his army with the prey they had gotten at Dan, there they defeated and slew them, and pursued them to Hoba, lying on the left hand of Damascus; and thereby rescued Lot, and the rest of the prisoners out of the enemies hand, and brought them back again with all that they had lost. And when Abram returned from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and the other Kings, Melchisedech the K. of Salem met him, and blessed him, being himself a Priest of the highest God; and Abram upon the other side offered him the tithe of the spoile, which he had taken, yet kept he nothing thereof to himself, but restored to every man his own again; leaving what was not owned to his companies in that service, [Gen. 14.] And now God, finding Abram grieved for that he had Arphaxad the third from Noah, died 403 years after the birth of Salems, [Gen. 11. 33.] God making a covenant with Abram, when he was now 99 years old touching the seed of Isaac, who was to be born of Sarah that time twelve month, gave him the [c]erit Circumcision [changing both their names, Abram into Abraham, and Sara into Sarah] for a sure p[re]dict & testimony of his promise, promising also to favour Ishmael the eldest born, for the fathers sake, which promises; Abraham entertaining and embracing with a lively faith, & true obedience, caught himself, being now 99 years of age, and his son Ishmael then thirty years old, and all his household; so be circumcised, the self-same day travelling upon the way into his house, and feasts with them; who reiterating the promise of the birth of Isaac, in favour of Sarah declared, with all the judgment of God, intended upon the 5 cities; for their utter destruction; and Abraham learning what would become of Lot, and his family in Sodom, made intercession to God for the sparing of that place, [Gen. 18. and 19. v. 29.] Sodom therefore, and Gomorrah and Aadmah, and Seboim, for their horrible sins, punished by fire and brimstone, rained down upon them from heaven; [Gen. 19.] that they might be an example to all wicked lives in time to come, of the pains of that everlasting fire to be inflicted on them in that lake of fire and brimstone, which is the second death [2 Pet. 2. 6. Jud. 7. Ap. 19. 20. c. 20. 10. c. 21. 8.] The monument whereof remaineth unto this day; even the dead sea. The valley of Siddim, where these 5 cities stood in former times, which was full of brimstone and salt pits, being since grown into a vast lake; and from the brimstone therein this floating is called Lacus Asphaltitis, a lake of brimstone; [Gen. 11. 33. mare salum, the salt sea, [Gen. 14. 3. v. 30. Deut. 32. 17. c. 29. 23. Zeph. 2. 9. W. d. 1. 6. 7.] of which Solomon thus writeth, A great way off from Jerusalem, there lies a woful spectacle of a country to be seen, which that it was heretofore blazed from heaven, appears by the blackness of the earth-falling all to cinders. There were in that place heretofore seated two Cities, one called Sodom, the other Gomorrah, where if an apple grow, though it seeme to have a show of maturity and ripeness, yet it is not eatable at all, for the outward skin thereof, containeth nothing within it save a stinking steeme, mingled with ashes, and being never so lightly touched, sendeth forth a smoke, and the rest falls presently into a light dust or powder. Lot being bailed out of Sodom by the Angels, avoided the destruction, by flying to a little city, called Bala, which from thence was called Zoar; but his wife was turned into a pillar of salt; and Lot himself, fearing to continue at Zoar, left the plain country, and betook him to the Hill, as he was commanded, carrying his two daughters with him, [Gen. 19.] Abraham, going from the plain of Mamre, towards the fourth, that he might dwell at a place which was afterward called Beer Sheba, was entertained by Abimelech, K. of the Philistines, at Gerar, where Sarah, going once again under the name of his sister, was ret from him. But the K. being reprieved therefore, and punished by God, restored her unto him, and her husband, with large gifts and presents added thereto, and by his prayers Abimelech and all his house were healed of their infirmities; [Gen. 20.]	2094. b. 2096. d. 2107. c.	2094. b. 2096. d. 2107. c.

2108. c.	When Abraham was now 100, and Sarah 90 years of age, the fore-promised son Isaac was born unto them, [Gen. 17. 17. 21. c. 21. 1. 7. Rom. 4. 19.] nor long after it, that Moab and Ammon were born to Lot, who was both father, and grandfather to them, [Gen. 19. 36, 37, 38.] When Isaac was weaned, Abraham made a great feast, and Sarah spying Ishmael the son of Hagar the Egyptian jesting with, or rather mocking [as in Gen. 39. 14. that word is taken] may even persecuting [as the Apostle, Gal. 4. 29.] expounded it] her son Isaac; as challenging to himself, by way of eldership, the right of inheritance in his fathers estate, laid unto Abraham, Cast forth this handmaid with her son, for the son of this handmaid shall not be heir with my son Isaac, which though he took very grievously at the first, yet he did it; God having laid unto him, in Isaac shall thy seed be called, [Gen. 21. 8, 12. and Rom. 9. 7, 8. and Heb. 11. 17, 18.] where observe that Isaac is called his only begotten son, but among the Hebrews there is a difference of opinions; some holding that this was done in the 7 year after Isaacs weaning; others in the 12, but we choosing a shorter time of age, reckon that Ishmael was cast out with his mother, when he was 18 years old, [as St. Jerome, writing of the traditions of the Jews, upon Genesis.] so that from this declaration of the eldest seed, and persecution [as the Apostle termeth it] of Isaac, by Hagar's sedition, of them, reckon the 400 years; which the feed of Abraham was to be a stranger and sojourner, and afflicted in a foreign land, as God had foretold unto him [Gen. 15. 13. 21. 12. 16.] For that those 400 years were to be completed at the instant of the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt, appears [Gen. 15. 14. Ex. 12. 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.] compared each with other, though the ordinary gloss out of Anst. refers the beginning of the account, to the very birth of Isaac, as if the Scripture called the number of 405 by the name of 400 years, as in a round summe, or number.	2108. c.	2108. c.

Salah the fourth from Noah, died 403 years after the birth of Heber, [Gen. 11. v. 15.] Afsis reigned in Egypt by the space of 49 years two moneths: Manetho, By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up his son Isaac; considering with himself, that God was able by his power, to raise him again from the dead; whence also he did receive him, in a manner, [Heb. 11. v. 17, 19.] Now Josephus reports that at this time Isaac was 25 years old, [lib. 1. Antiq. 14. (al. 22.)] and that he was at that time of good years, may be gathered from this, that he was able to carry so much wood, as was to go to the burning and consuming of such a whole burnt offering, as himself was then intended by Abraham to have been made, [Gen. 22. v. 6.] Sarah being 127 years of age, died in Hebron, for whose burial Abraham bought the cave in the field of Macpelah, which was the first possession that he gat in the land of Canaan, of Ephron the Hittite, for a summe of money, [Gen. 23. v. 12, 19. 20. But as Abraham is registered to us for the father of the faithful, Rom. 4. v. 11, 12. So is Sarah for the mother of the faithful, 1 Pet. 3. 6. and she is the only woman whose full and entire age is mentioned in the Scripture. Abraham being careful to get a wife for his son Isaac, sent his chief servant, Eliezer of Damascus, [Gen. 15. v. 2.] (taking first an oath of him) to look out one for him: who going by the guidance of God into Mesopotamia, there obtained for him Rebekah the daughter of Bethuel, sister to Laban the Syrian, whom Isaac receiving for his wife, brought into the tent of his mother Sarah; and by the solace and content which he took in her, put off the dolor and grief which he conceived upon the death of his mother, who was departed this life three years before, [Gen. 24. v. 1. 6, 7. and he was forty years old when he married his wife Rebekah, Gen. 25. v. 20.] About this time began the reign of the Argivi in Peloponnesus, 1080 years before the first Olympiad, as Eusebius in his Chronicle reporteth, out of Ctesias. The first that there reigned was Inachus, who reigned 50 years; of whom Erasmus, in the proverb, Inacho antiquior, speaketh; unto to which also I refer that of the most learned Varro, in his 17 book of Humane Affaires, (cited by A. Gellius in his first book, Noctium Attic. c. 16. and of Macrobius lib. 1. Saturnal.) where he saith, To the beginning of Romulus are reckoned more than 1100 years: For from the beginning of Inachus his reign, according to the account of Censorinus, there mentioned, unto the Pallias, or solemn Festivals of Pale (the contrary Goddess among the Romans) mentioned by Varro, are reckoned 120 years. 2158. d. 2167. d. 2171. c.	When Rebekah had continued barren nineteen years after her marriage, Isaac in great devotion made prayer unto God in her behalf; and she thereupon conceived twins, [Gen. 25. v. 21.] When the twins strove in the womb, Rebekah asked counsell of God; by whom it was answered, that the hands of two differing and disagreeing Nations should proceed out of her in that birth, of which the one should be stronger than the other, and that the elder should serve the younger. But at the time of her travel, the first that came forth was rudely all over, and like to a flag garment, and his name was called Esau; then came forth the other, holding the former by the heels, whereupon he was called by the name of Jacob; and Isaac their father, at the time of their birth, was sixty years old; [Gen. 25. v. 22. Hebr. 12. v. 3.] Manetho writes, that Ithimosius King of Thebes, or the upper Egypt, besieged the Hickos or Shepherds shut up in a place called Auarim (containing 1000 acres of ground) with an army of four hundred and forty thousand men: but that finding no possibility of taking them, took thence with them, that they should leave Egypt, and go freely whither they would; and that they, with all their baggage and goods being in number no less than four hundred and forty thousand, passing through Egypt, went by the way of the wilderness into Syria, and that for dread they had of the Assyrians, who then possessed all Asia, they built themselves a City in the land of Judaea, as it is now called, big enough to receive so vast a multitude of inhabitants, and called it Hieropolyma, i. e. Jerusalem: so saies Manetho in Josephus lib. 1. contra Apionem Grammaticum, which Apion in his 4. book of Egyptian Affairs, callisthis King, Amosis, and proves out of the Annals of Ptolemaeus Mendisus an Egyptian Priest, that he was contemporary to Inachus afore-mentioned, King of the Argivi, as Talian the Assyrian (in his Orat. against the Greeks,) Justin Martyr, (in his Paravation or Exhortation to the Greeks,) Clemens Alexandrianus in his first book of his Stromata, and others do report; all which following Josephus and Iustus Tiberianus understand as meant of the Israelites, because they traded much in thence, [Gen. 46. v. 33-34 and 47. v. 3. and because they went out of Egypt into Canaan; and therefore conceive that Moses contemporary with Inachus, was the man that conducted them in that journey; whereas those things seem rather to refer to the Phenicians, whom Herodotus (in the beginning of his History, and in the 89 chapter of his seventh book) reporteth to have come from the Red Sea; and seated themselves in Palestine, for that the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt fell out many and many years after Inachus, the course of all Chronologie doth undoubtedly declare.	2158. d. 2167. d. 2171. c.	2158. d. 2167. d. 2171. c.

Theophis, al. Amsoph having driven out these shepherds, reigned in the lower Egypt by the space of twenty five years and four months. [Manetho.]

Abraham, when he was 175 years old, and one hundred years after his coming into Canaan, departed this life, and was buried by his two sons, Isaac and Ismael, in his cave at Macpelah, with Sarah his wife, [Gen. 25. v. 7-10.] He lived fifteen years after the birth of Isaac, with whom he is said also to have lived in tents, [Heb. 11. v. 9.]

Heber, the fifth from Noah, died 430 years after the birth of his son Isaac, [Gen. 11. v. 17.] This man lived the longest of any that was born after the flood; and out-lived his father himself; and from him Abraham came first to be named the Hebrew, [Gen. 14. v. 13.] and in after times, all the posterity of his Grandchild Isaac, were known by the same name, [Gen. 40. v. 15.] Where note that Canaan, was the land of the Hebrews, while the Canaanite was yet living in that land.

About this time, the promises formerly made unto Abraham, were, as it seemeth, fully performed to his son Isaac, such as were, I will multiply thy seed, as the stars of heaven; And, In thy seed, shall all the Nations of the earth be blessed, [Gen. 26. v. 4.]

Chbron reigned in Egypt 13 years, [Manetho.]

Elsau, being 40 years old, took two wives, of the land of the Hittites, Isidub the daughter of Beer, and Basmaham the daughter of Elon: which were very troublesome, and bitterly bent against Rebekah, [Gen. 26. v. 34-35.] compared with [Gen. 27. v. 46.] and with [Gen. 28. v. 8.]

At this time the Ogygian, Deluge began in the country of Attica 1020 years before the first Olympiad: as is reported out of Hellanicus, Cassius, Diodorus Siculus, and Alexander Polyhistor in his third book of his Chronographic, by Iulius Africanus; as we find it in Eusebius his book, de Prep. Evang. which yet Varro his accounts, makes to have been three hundred years before.

Amenophis reigned in Egypt 20 years, 7 months. [Manetho.]

Ismael, Abraham's son, at the age of 137 years, died, [Gen. 25. v. 17.]

Ammis, the sister of Amenophis, reigned in Egypt 21 years, 9 months. [Manetho.]

Enechus began to reign in Chaldea, two hundred twenty four years before the Ara- bians, [Iulius Africanus.] which seemeth to be the same with Belus of Babilon, or Jupiter Belus, worshipped afterwards by the Chaldeans as a god, [Ista. 46. vers. 1. Ter. 50. vers. 2. and 51. v. 41.]

Isaac now grown old and blind, in the 44th year before his death, sent Elsau his elder son, to take some venison for him, purposing to bless him at his return; but Isaac his younger son, by the subtle counsel of his mother, coming disguised in his clothes, and with labourer meat in his hand, stole away the blessing, unwitting to his father; and the blessing, though to go, God confirmed ever after. But Isaac seeing that for so doing his brother followed him with a deadly hatred, and being desirous to avoid his traps, willing also to take a wife of his own kindred, asking first his fathers blessing, he took his journey into Mesopotamia, to his uncle Laban. But in his journey, by the vision of a ladder, God confirmed to him, all the blessings formerly given to his father, and assured him of his grace and favour for the future, in remembrance whereof, Isaac let up a pillar, and changed the name of the place from Luz to Bethel, and there made a vow to God. And coming at length to Canaan, and continuing a months time with Laban, fell in love with Rachel his daughter, and covenanted to serve him seven years for her, [Gen. 27. v. 1. and 29. v. 20.] with [Hofea 2. v. 18.] now that this fell upon the 77 year of Isaac's age, will appear by that which will be said, upon the year of the World, 2259.

Elsau, seeing that Isaac had blessed Isaac, and sent him away into Mesopotamia, thereto take him a wife, and that he liked not the daughters of Canaan, to pacify his fathers mind, who was offended with him for marrying his first wife out of Canaan, took a second wife Mahalath, the daughter of Ismael, the son of Abraham, [Gen. 28. v. 6, 9.]

Elsau had been now a married man 37 years, and was 77 years old; whereas Isaac, who was as old as he, had all this while, lived a Bachelor; and being now mindful of his fathers command, he demanded Rachel his wife to be given to him; using this for a reason, that his days were now full, [Gen. 29. v. 21.] that is, that he was now of an age ripe for marriage, as Tremellius expoundeth it: though Tho. Lidy are would rather have it understood of, that infant month or period of time completed, wherein Laban, from the beginning, intended to make proof of Jacob's industry, and sufficiency in the managing of affairs committed to his charge, before he would bestow his daughter on him: which no doubt was mentioned at his first arrival there, seeing it was the only cause of his coming thither.

But by the fraud of Laban, instead of Rachel, Leah the elder daughter was put in bed unto him: nevertheless, at the end of the marriage week, [Judges 14. v. 12, 17.] Rachel also was espoused to him; upon covenant of serving seven years more for her; and Laban gave gave unto Leah, his maid-servant Zilpah for a hand-maid; and to Rachel he gave Bilhah, and when Leah was not so gracious in Isaac's eyes, as Rachel was: the one by Gods appointment, the other was made a mother of four children, successively in four years, [Gen. 29. 21, 22, &c.]

Of Leah was born unto Isaac, his eldest son Reuben, [Gen. 29. 32.] who for his incest committed with Bilhah his fathers concubine; lost afterwards, his right of the first born, [Gen. 35. 22. and 49. 34. and 1 Chron. 5. 1.]

Simon was borne.

Levi was born, v. 34.

Isaac was born v. 35. from whom the Jews took their name.

Rachel, afterward by the blessing of God, proving fruitful, bare Isaac unto him, at the end of his fourteen years service, and then asking leave of Laban to returne into his own country; he was held there six years more upon another bargain made between him, and his father in law Laban: for a certain part of his flock, [Gen. 30. 22, 23, 31. with 31. v. 41.] now that Isaac was 91 years old when Isaac was born, and consequently, 77 years of age, when he first began to serve Laban, appears by this, for that Isaac being 130 years of age, when he first stood before Pharaoh, which was when the seven years of plenty were passed, and two of the famine spent, [Gen. 45. 6. with 47. 9.] Isaac was then 39 years old, as being 30 years of age, what time he first came into Pharaoh's presence, immediately before the seven years of plenty began, [Gen. 41. 32, 46.]

Mephres reigned in Egypt, 12 years, 9 months, [Manetho.]

Isaac, perceiving the heart-burning of Laban, and his sons malice toward him, was warned of God to returne into his own country: which having communicated to his wives; while Laban was shearing his sheep, at the latter end of the spring (as will appear upon the 2974th year of the world) after his 20 years service, getting away unknown to Laban, with all his substance, wives, and family, passed over the river Euphrates, [Gen. 31. 13, 19, 21, 32, 41.] But whereas it is said that there were twelve sons born him in Mesopotamia, [Gen. 35. 22, 26.] Benjamin is not to be reckoned among them, who was certainly born afterward in the land of Canaan, not far from Bethlehem, [16. v. 18, 19.] in like manner, as the twelve Apostles are counted, though to make up that number, Isidus was wanting, [John 20. 24. 1 Cor. 15. 1.] of which matter, Augustine more at large, in his 117th Question upon Genesis.

Laban three daies after (for so many daies journey was Laban off from the place where Isaac kept his sheep) hearing that his son in law was gone, took some of his friends and kindred along with him, and pursued after him, seven daies journey, and at last overtook him in mount Gilead; which took time, from this their meeting there, for after many and divers expostulations which passed there between them, making all fair at last, for a testimony and monument of their covenant and agreement there made, Isaac erected a pillar, with a heap of stones: which Laban the Syrian, called Iegar Sahadutha: but Isaac the Hebrew called Galaad, (i.e.) the heap of a testimony, or witness between them two, [Gen. 31. 47, 48.]

Isaac being sent away in peace by Laban, but afflicted with the news of his brother Elsau's approach with a band of men, divided his company, into two bands, calls upon God: sends before him presents to his brother Elsau: and as well by a stroge wrestling with the Angel, as by the name of Isaac given him by God, grows into a sure trust of the help of God, [Gen. 32. with Hofea 12. 3, 4.]

Elsau, entreating his brother courteously; after much entreatie, accepts of his presents, offers himself with his company to conduct him on his way; and when Isaac would not, took his leave of him, and departed: Isaac then went on to Succoth: so then called by him, for there he built him a house, and cots for his sheep, from whence it was called Succoth. Afterward passing over Jordan, he came into Canaan, and pitched his tent in Salem, a city of the Sichemites; in a parcel of ground, which he had bought of the sons of Hamor the Sichemite, for an hundred peeces of silver: and there he built an altar, which he called by the name of El-Elohe-Israel; or of the mighty God, the God of Israel, [Gen. 33.] to wit, in the self same place, where Abraham heretofore had built his first altar: [Gen. 12. 6, 7.] and where Isaac well was, near unto mount Gersam: of which the woman of Samarita, speaking to our Saviour said, our Fathers worshipped in this mountain, [John 4. 5, 6, 19, 20.] for that that mountain was placed in the country of the Sichemites, appeareth, [Judges 9. 7.]

Mephramathos reigned in Egypt 25 years: 10 months, [Manetho.]

Isaac being 17 years of age, told his father of his brethren unthriftiness, and was fore-shewed by God that he should one day come to be the best man of all his fathers family; but fell thereby into so deadly a hatred and malice of his brethren, that first they conspired his death: and at length agreed to fall him away for a bond-slave into a far country: so drawing him out of the pit, whereto they had cast him they told him to the Ilmalath and the Midianith Merchants (both which nations sprang from their grandfather Abraham)

		ham) for 20 pieces of silver : and was by them carried away into Egypt, and there sold for a slave: to Potipher, captain of the Guard to Pharaoh, [Gen. 37. 23, 26.] Justin also, in his epitome of Tragus Pompeius saies, that he was very great with Pharaoh : For, saith he, he was most exquisite in expounding of prodigies or signs, and was the first that found out, and taught the art of the interpretation of dreams : neither was there any part of divine or humane rights, which seemed to be unknown to him : inasmuch, that he foretold a famine, many years before ; whereunto as Egypt had perished, unless the King by his advice, had caused corn to be laid up in store many years before it came.
2287.	c.	Joseph, upon occasion being cast there into prison, interpreted to two Officers of Pharaoh's Court, to each of them his dream, full two years before he was brought into Pharaoh's presence, [Gen. 40. with 41. 1.]	2997	1717.
2288.	b.	Joseph died at the age of 120 years, and was buried by his two sons, Esau and Jacob, [Gen. 35. 28, 29.]	2998	1716.
2289.	a.	Pharaoh, when he could not get his dreams, which he had dreamt, to be expounded by his own wife men ; hearing of Joseph's dexterity that way, sent for him ; being then 30 years old, who having opened to the King his dreams ; first that of the seven years plenty, then the seven years famine, added moreover, his advice, how to provide out of the store of the first seven years of plenty, against the famine of the other seven years of scarcity, which were to follow. Whereupon Pharaoh, by the general assent of all his Nobles, made him Governour of the whole Kingdom : giving him to wife Asenah the daughter of Potipher, Governour of the Oni or Heliopolitan in Egypt, [Gen. 41. 1, 46.] Justin also out of Tragus Pompeius saies, that he was very great with Pharaoh : For, saith he, he was most exquisite in expounding of prodigies or signs, and was the first that found out, and taught the art of the interpretation of dreams : neither was there any part of divine or humane rights, which seemed to be unknown to him : inasmuch, that he foretold a famine, many years before ; whereunto as Egypt had perished, unless the King by his advice, had caused corn to be laid up in store many years before it came.	2999	1715.
	c.	From the harvest of this year, being to be counted 7 years of plenty, wherein Joseph laid upon an infinite treasure of corn, and had born unto him of Asenah his wife, two sons, Manasses and Ephraim, [Gen. 41. 47, 53.]
2296.	c.	The seven years of the famine began from the harvest of this year, wherein the forecast, and widome of Joseph, did not only sustain Egypt, but was a help and relief to sundry other countries likewise, [Gen. 41. 54, 57.]	3006	1708.
2297.	d.	Joseph dispatched away ten of his sons into Egypt to buy corn, whom Joseph, seeming not to know them, caused to be taken for spies, and they being laid in hold, could not be discharged, till Simeon, the eldest and chief of them, who consented to tell him, was cast into prison, and left in pawne, that the rest should bring before him Benjamin, their youngest brother, borne of Rachel, Joseph's own mother : and now being dismissed, they carried away their corn, and with it the money, which they had paid for, being conveyed into their several facks, by the secret appointment of Joseph ; they tell their father Jacob, all that had happened to them : and withal, declare unto him, the necessity laid upon them, of carrying their youngest brother Benjamin into Egypt, perswading him by all means to let him go : but all in vain, [Gen. 42.]	3007	1707.
		And when they were all to go away, Joseph arrested them, for stealing his cup ; which he had caused privily to be conveyed into Benjamin's fack : which crime they endeavoured to put off by shewing how truly they meant, by bringing again the money which they found in their facks, when they came home, offering themselves to die, or to be his bond-slaves, if any such thing could be proved against them : But in the end, the cup being found with Benjamin, and they brought back to Joseph, they all yielded themselves to him for his bond-slaves : which when he refused, saying he would have none but him with whom the cup was found, Judah then humbly offered himself to serve him in Benjamin's stead, [Gen. 44.]
		Joseph hearing Judah to make this offer, discovered himself to his brethren, and seeing them all amazed at the remembrance of the sin, which they had formerly committed against him, comforted them, by shewing how that act of theirs was so wrought by the providence of God ; and then, out of the King's store, and by his command, furnished them all with carriages and provision for their journey, to go, and to return with all speed, bringing their father, and their own several families with them : which when they related to their father, he would not believe, until he saw the coaches, and other things answerable, all fitted for his transportation into Egypt, [Gen. 45.]
		Jacob, after sacrifices offered, being strengthened by God, with all his family, in the beginning of the third year of the famine, went down into Egypt, being then 130 years old, [Gen. 45. 6. c. 46. 1, 2, 7. c. 47. 9. Dent. 26. 6.]
		Joseph, letting Pharaoh know of the arrival of his kindred in Egypt, brought his father and five of his brethren unto his presence : and having communed with them, assigned them a fitting place in the land of Goshen ; where they were provided of all necessities by Joseph, [Gen. 47. 1, 12.]
		Mempham-

Year of the World.		The third Age of the World.	11	The Julian Period.	The year before Christ.
2299.	d.	Memphambris deceasing, Thamosis reigned in Egypt 9 years 8 monthes, [Menebris.]	3009	1705.
2300.	a.	Joseph heaped together, all the moneys which were to be found in Egypt and Canaan, for the corn which he had sold unto them, [Gen. 47. 1, 14.]	3010	1704.
2301.	b.	When the money of both these countries was spent, the Egyptians then sold all their flocks and herds of cattle unto Joseph for food to live upon that year, [Gen. 47. 15, 16, 17.]	3011	1703.
2302.	c.	At the end of this year, when their money and flock of cattle was all gone, the Egyptians then sold both their lands and liberties unto Joseph : who thereupon supplied them with corn to feed them, and also with seed, to sow their ground withal, in this seventh and last year of the famine, to receive it again the year following, when the barrenness of the earth was over; and to the end, that Pharaoh might have a full title and possession of the lands so bought, Joseph removed and transplanted them, every man from one side of the country to the other, and there assigned unto every man land to till and to manure, reserving nevertheless out of the profits, a fifth part to Pharaohs own use yearly, by a fundamental law of that kingdom : onely the chief Governours, and the Priests lands, came not into Pharaohs hands, because these living of the Kings allowance, had no need to sell their lands for food as others had.	3012	1702.
		Amemphis reigned in Egypt 30 years 10 monthes, [Menebris.]	3019	1695.
2309.	b.	Jacob drawing toward his end, adopted Ephraim and Manasses the sons of Joseph, and blessing them by instinct from God, let the younger before the elder, [Gen. 48. Hebr. 11, 21.] then calling his sons together, blessed them all; foretold what should befall them in their several generations, and uttered to them that memorable prophetic of the Messias; and taking order with them concerning his burial, dyed when he had lived 147 years : whereof he had spent 17 years in the land of Egypt, [Gen. 49. compared with 47. 25.]
2315.	c.	The body of Jacob being embalmed by the appointment of Joseph, was kept by the space of 40 dayes : lamentation was made over him by the Egyptians 70 dayes; and with Pharaohs leave, was conveyed into the land of Canaan by Joseph and his brethren, accompanied with a great traine of the principal men of Pharaohs court; where lamentation was again made over him 7 dayes, and was buried with his kindred in the cave at Macpelah, as himself had given order for it, [Gen. 50. 15, 22.]
2340.	b.	Orus reigned in Egypt 36 years 5 monthes, [Menebris.]	3050	1664.
2369.	c.	By faith Joseph on his death-bed spake of the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt ; and gave order that his bones might be carried with them, and that he departed this life in the 110 years of his age : having seen of his off-spring to the third generation, [Gen. 50. 22, 26. Hebr. 11, 22.] to wit, Shuteclach and Tachan, the sons of his son Ephraim, and Hadan or Haran, [Num. 26. 56.] the son of Shuteclach, and Maci the son of Manasse, and Gilead Manasse his grand-child. From whence it is, that the Greek Expolitors, speaking of the families of Jacob and Joseph, which were laid to count of 70 souls, [Gen. 46. 27. Dent. 10. 22.] adding thereunto these five which were borne unto Joseph in Egypt, upon 1 Chron. 7.] reckon them in all 75 persons : out of all which appears, that Joseph held on his rule and government of the state of Egypt, which lasted full 80 years, under several Pharaohs, as Eusebius in his Chronicle, hath rightly observed, and digested in this manner : Joseph, saith he, was made Governour of Egypt, in the 30 year of his age; when his father Jacob was 122 years old : which government he held 80 years, after whose deasse the Hebrews were held in bondage by the Egyptians 144 years : so the whole time which the Hebrews spent in Egypt, was 215 years : reckoned from the time, that Jacob and his sons went down into Egypt.	3079	1675.
		The books of Genesis end with the death of Joseph containing the storie of 269 years space, which book, that it was written by Moses himself, is the opinion of the Talmudists in their Baba-babra, lb. 1. and is so generally believed by all the Hebrews. The form whereof is delivered by Servius Sulpicius, in the first book of his Historia sacra; thus, In this tract of time lived Job : a man embracing the Law of nature, and the knowledge of the true God, and all right conscience, rich in justice, and the more noted, for that neither the enjoyment of those riches corrupted, nor the loss of them depraved him in his way. For when at first being spoiled of his goods by Satan, he was also bereft of his children, and at last tormented with grievous boches and sores in his body, he could yet never be drawn, thorough impatience, to sin in any sort : whereof having first received a testimonie from Gods own mouth, he was afterwards restored to his former health, and had cast into his bosome double, of what ever he possessed before.
2376.	c.	Acenches the son of Orus reigned in Egypt 12 years 1 month, [Menebris.]	3086	1628.
2385.	d.	Levi died in Egypt, aged 137 years, [Exod. 6. 16.] being grandfather by the mothers side to Moses and Aaron, and great grandfather by the Fathers. For when Levi had begotten Kohath in Canaan, who died at the age of 133 years; and a daughter called Jochebed in Egypt, Amram the son of Kohath took to wife Jochebed the daughter of Levi, his own Aunt, and of the marriage (expressly afterward forbidden) [Levit. 18. 12. and 20. 19.] had Moses and Aaron, and their sister Miriam, and having attained to the age of his grand-father, and withall his father in law, which was 137 years, dyed a little before the departure	3095	1619.

About the 18 day of the 6 month, (which in the year following and after, was reckoned the 12 month) was sent the first plague; of the waters turned into blood : and after 7 daies ended, [Ex.7.25.] about the 25 day, came the 2 plague of the frogs ; which was removed the day following: About the 27 was brought upon them the third plague of flies and lice,

About the 28 day, Moses threatened them with a fourth plague, of flies, and other vermin which came upon the 29 day, and were all taken away upon the 30:

[illegible]

About the fourth day, Moles foretelling them of a 7 plague, brought it on them upon the 5 day of the same month, which was of thunders and rains, and grievous hail, mixt with fire; with which their flax and barley was smitten, because the barley was then in the ear, and the flax boled, but their wheat and the rye were not hurt therewith, because they were not yett out of the ground, whence Nicolaus Fullerus, lib. 3. of his Miscellanea rightly observeth. c. 280. that this plague happened in the month Abib, and secondarily

About the seventh day Moses threatened them with an eighth plague, and accordingly sent it the day following, that was, of Locusts, to devour all; which plague he removed about the 9 day. [Exod. 10, 4, 1, 19.]

The month Abib, which hitherto was the 7 month, was from this time forward, made the 1st month of the whole year, [Ex. 12.2, with 13.4.] for a memorial of their departure out of the land of Egypt from the beginning of which month the epocha of the Jewish Calendar is from thence forward deduced, [Num. 9.1,2, with Ex. 40.17.] though the end of the former account, [cf.] on the middle of the month.

Upon the 10 day of his now fifth day of the month, (which was the 30 of April, according to the Julian Calendar, upon Thursday) was instituted the feast of the Passover, and sweet bread, to wit, the Paschal lamb, was slain, and kill'd the fourth day after, [Ex. 32: 18.]

to wit, the Paschal lamb, was eaten, and killed the fourth day after [Ex. 12, 10].

Moses now bringeth upon them the 9 plague, of 3 dayes darknes, which were such, that none of the Egyptians during that time, once removed out of the place where the darkness lay: so that the Egyptians were in the darknes, as the Ifracitiles were in the light. The Ifracitiles had ail that time, light abundantly in their dwellings, because the darkness was not in their dwellings, but in the land of Egypt.

[Ex. 10, 22, 23.]

[Ex. 10, 22, 23.] Upon the 14 day (which was Maz 4, upon munday with us,) which was the last time that he spake with Pharaoh, Moses foretold him of the 10 plague, which should come upon him; namely, the destruction of all the first-born of Egypt, which came to passe the night following; at midnight, and then turning him about in a great anger departed from him; [Ex. 10, 24, 29, c. 11, 1, 4, 8.] At the evening of this day was the Passover celebrated; [Exod. 12, 11, 12.]

The fourth Age of the World.

UPON the 15 day of the 1 month (our 5 of May, being tuesday) at midnight, the first-born of Egypt being all slain, Pharaoh and his servants, made haste to find away from the Israelites, with all their substance, & the spoils which they were gotten from the Egyptians; and they the fell fame day, wherein they were let go out of bondage, being the compleat terme of 430 years, from the hill pilgrimage of their ancestors; reckoning from Abrahams departure out of Carran, the day after the Passcower, took their journey, & marched away, being 600000 men, besides children, and came to Ramセス, [Ex. 12. 29. 30. 31. 32. 37. 151 f. Num. 33. 3.] From hence their severall encampings: are left down by Moses: which out of the Hebrew signification of words, Jerom expounded mildly, in his Treatise of their 42 encampings, written to Fabola, from whom I have thought good to make the first encamping at Ramセス. Thus then: —————

1. At Ramesses, where the Israelites were placed by Ioseph, [Gen. 47.11.] they all met who either dwelt mixt among the Egyptians [Exod. 3.2.] or who at that time were scattered all over Egypt to gather stubble, [Exod. 5.12.]

2. Was Succoth, where Moses first declared to them the Commandments of God, for the yearly keeping of Easter, and the hallowing of the first-born to him ; Ex. 13.

4. Was Pharaoh, between Migdol and the sea, over again disappointed. Here Pharaoh with his host overtook them, here Moles divided the waters with his rod, and they passed through the midst of the Erythraean, or red Sea, unto the desert of Etham, whom, when Pharaoh & his army would needs follow, they were all overwhelmed of of the waters coming together again, at the dawning of the day, whereby the Israelites were wholly quit and freed from the bondage of the Egyptians, whose carcases when they saw floating all the sea over, and cast upon the shore, [Exod. 14. 11.] they forthwith sang a song of praise and thanksgiving unto God, for their deliverance, [Exod. 5. 20.] Which in the [Apocaltyp., 15. 3.] is called the Song of Moses: and is of all others, any where to be found or mentioned, the first of that kind.

Now that this fell out, upon the 21 day of the first month, to wit, upon the last day of the feast of sweet bread (whereon a solemne assembly by Gods appointment was to be held) is the general opinion of the fewes, and most agreeable to truth.

From hence they marched three whole daies through the wildernesse of Etham, to wit, the 22, 23, 24. dayes of this month, being Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of our weeke, but found no water all the way, [Ex. 15. 22. Numb. 33. 8.]

5. Was at Marach; so called from the bitterness of the waters there found; whereupon the people which had gone without water three whole daies, beginning to murmur, Moses, by the throwing a piece of wood into them, made them sweet, and withal taught the people, in time to come, to put their trust in God. [Ex. v. 22, 26.]

6. Was at Elim; where were 12 fountains of water, and 70 palme trees : and at Elim, they encamped by the side of those fountains, [Ex. 15, 27. Numb. 33, 9.]

7. Was by the Red Sea, [Numb. 33. 10.]

And now we come to the Second month

8. Upon the 15 whereof, (our June 4. be of their 8 encamping : in the wilderness of Sin, which lieth between Elyma and Sinai, where, when for want of food, they had murmured against God, and their leaders, about the evening-tide, God sent them Quails, and the next morning, rained upon them Manna from heaven : and of that kind of bread, they lived afterward, by the space of 40 years, and even until they came to the borders of the Land of Promise. [Ex. 16. 1, 25.]

9. Wasat Dophka.

10. Was at Alush.

11. Was at Rephidim; where when the people murmured again for want of water, (from whence the place was afterwards called Meriba and Massa) Moses gave them water, by striking the hard rock with his rod, [Exod. 17. 1-7.] which rock followed them also throughout the wilderness, [Psalms 78. 16, 20. Psalms 105. 41. 1 Cor. 10. 4. Deut. 9. v. 21.]

The Amalekites, falling upon the reare of the Israelites, all spent and tired with their long journey in the wilderness as they were, slew some of the hindermost and feeblest of them, against whom Moses sent out Jehoshua, al, Josua, the son of Nun his servant, to fight with them, [Ex. 33. 11.] whose proper name, which was Hosea, Moses changed into Jehoshua, [Num. 13. 16.] or Iesui, [Nehem. 8. 17] Asa, 7. 45, and Heb. 4. 8.]

He therefore fighting with the Amalekites in Rephidim, whilst Moses was in prayer on the top of the hill, overthrow them: and the people by Gods Commandment were charged utterly to destroy and root out that whole nation: and for a memorial thereof, they there built an Altar, [Deut. 25, 17, 18, 19. Exod. 17, 8, 16.]

The Third month.

12. Encamping in the Desert of Sinai: where the Israelites encamped over again: in Horeb: from whence they removed not by the space of almost a whole year; for they removed from the wilderness of Sinai, upon the 2^d day of 2^d month, 2 year, after their coming out of the land of Egypt, [Numb. 10. 1, 12.]; and they came thither again, upon the 3^d month of the 1st year, after their coming out of Egypt: to wit, the 5th day of number with 3 month, [i. e.] upon the third day of the third month, as Ex. 31. 18. Ribera, l. b. 5. Templo, at large declareth; and that falls in, with 22 of our lune, happening upon a Monday.

When Moses went up into the mount, God there declared to him, that he would renew his covenant with the Israelites; That he would bind them to himself by a law; and that he would favour and love all those, who would observe and keep that law; which when they readily agreed unto, he gave them two daies space to prepare themselves for the reverend receiving of that Law. He forbade all save Moses and Aaron, to approach the mount: and afterward, in great majesty (they all looking on and trembling at the sight) God came down upon the Mount, (Ex. 19.)

God published his law, contained in the ten commandments, with a terrible voice, [Ex 20, Dent. 5.] which nevertheless did annul not the promise of Grace, made unto Abraham 430 years before. [Gal. 3. 37.]

The people being in this great fear, God gave them sundry other Lawes, [Ex. 20, 21, 22, 23, with Deut. 4, 1, 3, 4,] all which were written in the book of the Covenant, Moses presented to the people: which done, rising early in the morning, he built an Altar at the foot of the mountain, and sent twelve of his brethren, as elders, to call to the tribes of Israel, and sent twelve young men of the first-born (as the Chaldee paraphrase hath it) whom the Lord had separated to himselfe, [Exod. 13, 3, Num. 3, 12, 8, 16, 17,] as ministers of those holy things, [Exod. 9, 32,] before the Levitical Priesthood was ordained; which offered sacrifices, first for sin; and then of thanksgiving to the Lord; and when Moses had read the book of the Covenant, containing the Commandments expressed in the [20th of Exod.] with the three chapters following, in the years of the people, then taking the blood of the calves and goats so offered, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, he sprinkled the book therewith, and all the people, or those 12 statues representing the 12 Tribes of Israel: and so perfected that solemn covenant between God and his people, [Exodus 24. 2, with Hebr. 9. 19, 20.]

Moses and Aaron, Naabab and Abihah, and 70 men of the Elders of Israel, went up into the mount, and there beheld the glory of God: and the rest returning, Moses with his servant Jethura, abode there still, and waited six daies, and upon the seventh day, God spake unto him, and there he continued 40 daies, and 40 nights, [Exod. 24. 9, 18.] (reckoning those six daies which he waited for the appearance of the Lord) eating no meat all that while, nor drinking water, [Deut. 9. 9.] where he also received Gods command, touching the frame of the Tabernacle, the Priests garments, their consecration, sacrifices, and other things comprised in [Exod. 25.] and in the six chapters following.

The Fourth month.

When those 40 daies and 40 nights were ended, God gave Moses the two Tables of the Law in stone, made by Gods own hand, and written with his own finger, [Exod. 31. 18. Deut. 9. 10, 11.] bidding him with all, quickly to get him down, for that the people had already made to themselves a molten calf, to worship it: Moses by prayer pacified God, and went down from the mount, and seeing the people keeping a festival in honour of their Idol, in the Camp, he brake the Tables of the Law, at the foot of the mount: for which the Jews keep a solemn fast unto this day, the 14 day of the 4 month, which hath led some men into this error, to think that the 40 daies of Moses his staying in the mount, are to be counted from the day immediately following the promulgation of the ten Commandments, omitting altogether the intermediate time, spent in writing, and reading the book of the Covenant, and composing the Covenant to made between God and his people, with solemn Rites, and all Ceremonies thereunto belonging, [Exod. 24.]

Moses, having burnt and defaced the Idols, put 3000 of the people to death, by the hands of the Levites, [Exod. 32. 20, 29. Deut. 9. 21. & 33. 9.]

The next day Moses returned again into the mount; and there again entreated the Lord for the people, [Ex. 32. 30, 31, 32.]

He commanded them to lay aside their gorgeous apparel, and to set up the Tent of the Congregation (which for that present supplied the room of the Tabernacle afterwards built by Bezaleel) without the Camp; and having drawn the people out of a deep sense of Gods wrath, to repent them of their sin, by his prayer obtained, that no longer the Angel, but God himself, should be their guide and leader in their way, [Exod. 33.]

God commanded Moses to frame new tables of stone, and the next day, to bring them with him into the mount: coming with them the next morning, and standing in the cleft of a rock, God passing by, shewed him a glimpse of his glory, [Ex. 34.]

Moses staying again 40 daies and 40 nights in the mount, without meat or drink, prayed there for the people, [Deut. 9. 18. & 10. 10.] God being appeased, renews his Covenant with the people, upon certain conditions; gives his Law anew, and bids Moses to commit them to writing: and he himself again, writes the ten Commandments in the tables which Moses brought unto him, [Ex. 34. 10, 28.]

The Sixth month.

Moses after 40 daies returns from the mount, with the tables in his hand; and covering his face with a vail, because it shone, he published the Law of God to the people, enjoyed the observance of the Sabbath; and commanded a free-will offering to be made toward the building of the Tabernacle according to Gods order, [Ex. 34. & 35.]

And to the end that this offering and contribution should be more orderly and effectually proceed, all were numbered from twelve years old and upward, and they were found to be six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty, every of which, according to the Law prescribed by God, [Exod. 30. 12, 13.] contributing half a shekel, the total summe amounted to one hundred talents of silver, and 1775 shekels, [Ex. 38. 25, 26.] whence it is gathered, that every talent among the Jews, amounted to 3000 shekels, or 50 pounds sterling: every pound containing 60 shekels, [Ex. 45. 12.] over and above which, 730 money, out of the voluntary offerings, was made up the sum of 29 talents of gold, and 730 shekels; and of brass, 70 talents, and 2400 shekels, [Exod. 38. 24, 29.] As for other materials requisite to this building of the Tabernacle, there came in more than enough: inasmuch that the people were commanded to bring in no more, [Ex. 36. 5, 6, 7.]

Bezaleel and Aholiab were appointed by God for the chief workmen therein, [Exod. 31. 2, 6, and 35. 35.]

In the first six months of this year, were the Tabernacle, the Arke of the Covenant, the Altar, the Table of shew bread, the Priests garments, the holy Oymments, the Candlestick, and other utensils, and vessels belonging to the sacrifices, finished in the desert at mount Sinai, and were brought unto Moses; [Exodus 36. with the three chapters following.]

Then

Then was Moses commanded by God, first that upon the first day of the second month he should set up the Tabernacle and furnish it with all things belonging thereto, [Exod. 4. 2, 8.] Secondly, that he should anoint them with holy oyl; and should consecrate Aaron and his sons for the Priesthood, [Exod. 9. 15.] which he also is said to have done; but not both of them at the same time: For upon the very day appointed, he erected the Tabernacle, with all things thereto belonging, [Exod. 40. 17, 33.] but the other part of the command he performed a while after, and at another time, prechized by God; [Levit. 8. 13.] for performance whereof, one day sufficed not, namely, for the consecration of the Priests and Altar both; but full seven daies were spent therein, [Exod. 29. 35, 36, 37.]

On the first day of the first month (answering to our 21st of April, being mercurij day) of the second year after their departure out of Egypt, the Tabernacle of the Covenant was set up, and filled with the glory of God, [Exod. 40. 3, 17, 34.] out of which God, at several times, uttered his will and commandments to Moses; which are comprised in the 7 first chapters of Leviticus. In the same 2 year, and 1st month, the Israelites, forewarned by God, celebrated the Passover at the evening of the fourteenth day, (which with us is 4. May, being tuesdaj:) Upon which day, some of the people complaining to Moses and Aaron that they could not keep the Passover with the rest of their brethren, upon the day appointed, because they were become unclean by touching a dead body; a law was made by God that all such persons should keep their Passover upon the 14. day of the second month, because they could not keep it upon the 1st day first appointed, [Numb. 9. 1, 4.]

On the first day of the second month (21st of May, Friday by the Julian Calendar) God commanded Moses to take the number of all the males of the children of Israel; except the Levites, from 20 years old to 60 by their Tribes: and to appoint the Levites for the service of the Tabernacle, and to give their attendance, for the setting of it up, for the taking of it down, and removing and carrying it from place to place, as occasion should require, [Numb. 1. 1, 2, c. 36. 64.]

The number of them came to 603550 [Numb. 10. 1, 46.] being just the same number which was taken 7 months before, when they were listed for a contribution to the building of the Tabernacle, [Exod. 38. 26.]

Moses, according to Gods command, [Exod. 29. 37. c. 30. 2, 3, 8, 40, & 49. 35.] anointed the Tabernacle and the Altar, with all things thereto belonging, with the holy oyl, and consecrated it unto the Lord. He consecrated also Aaron, and his four sons, with the same oyl, and with rites and ceremonies prescribed, for the execution of the Priestly Office; commanding them not to depart from the door of the Tabernacle in seven daies space, [Levit. 8.] for so many daies the work of the consecration of them, and of the Altar was in doing, [Exod. 29. 35, 36, 37. Levit. 8. 33.]

Then was set down and commanded the order of the Tribes in their march and encampments, [Numb. 2.]

The number of Levites from one month old and upward, was found to be 32300, [Numb. 3. 15, 35.] for, taking out thence their first born, to 3000, only: all which were assumed to the service of God, in lieu of the first born, of all the rest of the children of Israel. And because the number of the first-born of the children of Israel, exceeded the whole number of the Levites, (their first-born deducted) to the number of 273, therefore was there laid upon them for every of those supernumerary heads five shekels, by way of redemption, [Numb. 3. 39, 50.]

The Levites thus set apart, were, with all due solemnity, consecrated to God, and for his service; every man having his certain time appointed, when he should begin, and when he should end his attendance upon his ministrations, [Numb. 8. 5, 26.]

The Levites from 30 years old to 50. were found to be 2580, and their offices and services were parted among them, according to their families, [Numb. 4.] All leprosi and unclean persons were put out of the Camp. The laws for restoring of damages, and of jealousy were ordained, [Numb. 5.]

The vow, the consecration, and manner of the Nazarites was instituted, [Numb. 6.] Upon the 8 day next following the finishing of the consecration, Aaron offered sacrifices and oblations: first for himself, and then for all the people: all which being kindled and consumed by fire, talling from heaven upon them, bred a full belief in the people, that the Priestly office among them was ordained by God himself, [Levit. 9.]

When all the Tabernacle was now fully set up, and anointed all over, together with the utensils and things thereto belonging, and the Altar which had been 7 daies in consecrating, was now dedicated by Aaron his first oblation of sacrifices made upon it; (for the seven former daies were for expiation, or cleansing, and ordained for the hallowing of it, [Exod. 29. 36, 37.]

Then came the Heads of the Tribes which were numbered, and they brought six wagons covered over, and twelve oxen, and joyfully offered them before the Tabernacle: all which were assigned into the hands of the Levites, the sons of Geshon and Merari; as belonging to their office, and afterward others every day brought their several sacrifices, and things belonging to the ministry of the Tabernacle, and offered them towards the dedication of it, wherein twelve dayes were wholly spent, [Numb. 7. 1, 10, 11, and 84. 88.]

Wherefore upon this first day, Naasson, from whom David, and according to the flesh, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ himself came; made his offering for the Tribe of Juda: and then the rest, every one for his Tribe, and in that order as they were ranked in their encampings. [Numb. 7. 11, 12, 83.]

Nadab and Abihu, the two eldest sons of Aaron (which going with their father up into the Mount Sinai, had there seen the glory of God, Exod. 24. 1, 9, 10.) going into the Sanctuary, with strange or common fire (not with that fire which fell from heaven, Lev. 9. 24. and which was perpetually to be kept alive, and continued for the burning of the sacrifices and incense in times to come) were struck dead in the place by fire sent from heaven. [Levit. 10. 1, 9. Numb. 3. 2, 3, 4, 26, 60, 61.] And for them the Priests were forbid to make lamentation: Moreover for some particular mans neglect of duty, all the Priests were charged to forbear wine and strong drink, before they were to go into the Tabernacle. A law also was made, that what was left of the sacrifices should be eaten by the Priests: and Aarons excise therein was admitted by Moses, [Levit. 10. verse 6, 20.]

Upon that occasion was the Law made (about the tenth day, as it seemeth, of this month) that the high Priest alone; and he but once in every year, should enter into the Sanctuary; and that to be upon the day of expiation and general fast, which was to be kept upon the 10 day of the seventh month, [Levit. 16. 1, 34.]

On the 14 of this month, (June 3, Thursday) at Even, the Passover was to be celebrated by those, who that day-month before were in their uncleanness, [Numb. 9.]

The blasphemous perjury, by Gods command was carried out of the Camp, and finished. [Levit. 24. 10, 11, 12, 13.]

All the laws contained in the seventeenth last chapters of Leviticus, seeme to have been made in this month.

God commanded two silver trumpets to be made, by which the Congregation was to be called together; and thence time of their removing, and marching, and sacrificing, signified to the people, [Numb. 10. 1, 28.]

Jethro, who was also called Hobab, brought his daughter Zipporah, with her two sons, Gylthon and Eliezer, which were left with him, to his son in law Moses, and he delivered them to him: and having congratulated him, and the whole people of Israels deliverance out of that Egyptian bondage; he openly declared, both by word and deed, his faith and devotion toward the true God. And by his advice, Moses imparted the government of the people to some others, and ordained Magistrates for the deciding of lesser causes, [Exod. 18. with Deut. 50. 9, 18. and Numb. 10. 29.]

The 19 day of this month, seemeth to have been the last that the 12 Heads of the Tribes made their oblations in, for the dedication of the Altar; on which Ahira made his offering for the Tribe of Nephtalim, [Numb. 7. 78, 88.]

On the 20 day of the second month (being the ninth of our June, falling on a Monday)

God commanded the Israelites to remove their camp, and to go forward in their journey, to take possession of the land which he had promised to give them, [Numb. 10. 11, 12. Deut. 1. 6, 7.] whither Moses would have had Jethro to have gone along with him: But he refused, and thence returned to his own home, [Numb. 9. 29, 30. with Exod. 18. 27.]

The cloud, which covered the Tabernacle being lifted up, they cast themselves into four squadrons, or battalions, and marched from Sinai; where they had staid, by the space almost of one whole year; and after 3 dayes continual journey, came to the wilderness of Paran, [Numb. 10. 12, 33.] where they rested them 23 dayes, without removing.

13. Their 13 remove, was to Kibroth Hattaavah, [Numb. 33. 16.] where they that murmured were struck with fire from heaven, (where that place, was called Tab. 1.) but were delivered at the intercession of Moses; yet fell again to murmuring, and provoked God, by their loathing of Manna, and desiring of flesh, [Numb. 11. 1, 10. Psalm 78. 19, 20, 21.]

Moses complained to God of the over-great burden of this government which lay upon him; and desired to be discharged of it: but God to ease him of the charge, gave him for assistants, the Court of the 70 Elders; of which number, Eldad and Medad, remaining in the Camp, prophesied, [Numb. 11. 10, 17, 24, 26.]

God gave the people Quails: not as in the year before, for one day, [Exod. 16. 12, 13.] but for the whole month together: but withal a most grievous plague among them. Whereupon, and from the burying place, or graves of them that lusted, that place was called, Kibroth-Hattaavah, [Numb. 11. 31, 34. Psalm 78. 26, 31. and Psalm 106. 15.]

14. The fourteenth remove, was to Hazaroth, [Numb. 11. 35, 36.]

Miriam and Aaron spake evil of Moses their brother; because he had married a woman of Ethiopia; to wit, Zipporah of Midian, which was a part of the Eastern Ethiopia, otherwise called Arabia: and made them equal in all points with him: But God main-main-maintained Moses above them, and struck Miriam with a leprosie: whereupon she was removed out of the Camp: But at the prayer of Moses, after seven dayes, she was healed, [Numb. 12. 15. Deut. 24. 9.]

15. Miriam, being cleansed, upon some day of the 4 month; as may be gathered out of what is said before, returned into the Camp: and upon her return, the Israelites removed: and,

15. Upon their 15 remove, they pitched in Ruthma, in the desert of Paran, [Numb. 12. 6, 33, 18.] near unto Kadesh-Barnea, [Numb. 13. 26.]

On the fifth month.

From the Wilderness of Paran, [Numb. 13. 3.] or Kadesh Barnea, [Numb. 32. 8. Deuter. 1. 19, 82. & 9. 23. Josh. 14. 7.] the people desiring it, and Moses liking well thereof, [Deut. 1. 23, 33.] But above all, God commanding it, [Numb. 13. 1, 2.] at the time when grapes first grew ripe; twelve spies, one for every Tribe, (of which Caleb the son of Jephunna, was for the Tribe of Judah) being then 40 years old, [Josh. 14. 7.] and Hothca the son of Nun, whom Moses had called by the name of Joshua, for the Tribe of Ephraim, were sent to discover, and spy out the land of Canaan: which entering into it by the desert of Sin, lying toward the south, went quite thorough it, to the very North parts thereof, even to Rechob, [Numb. 13. 21, 22. Deut. 1. 23.]

The sixth month.

The spies having spent 40 dayes in searching out the land, returned to Kadesh in the Wilderness of Paran: bringing with them one branch of a vine, with a cluster of grapes upon it, gathered in the valley of Elcho, which took its name from thence, with P. migranats and Figgs of the land, [Numb. 13. 23, 27. Deut. 1. 24, 25.] from which ripeness of the fruit at that season it appeareth, that this happened near before the 7 month, because a little before the feast of Tabernacles, (which was kept upon the 15 day of that month) the fruits of the barne and wine-press, were always gathered, [Exod. 23. 16. Leviticus 23. 39. Deut. 16. 13.] Ten of the twelve went to spy out the land, by speaking ill of the country, and the barrenness thereof, and withal magnifying the Cities for their strength, and the giantly stature of the men therein; dilated the people from marching any further toward it; whiles Caleb, did all he could, to persuade the people to go on, [Numb. 13. 28, 33, & 32. 9.]

The people being terrified with the relation made by the rest, would needs back again into Egypt; and were ready to stone Caleb and Joshua, for telling a contrary tale. And God threatening the people, with a sudden destruction, was bowed to spare them, by the prayers of Moses: Yet so, as withal he denounced to them, that all of them which were then twenty years old and upwards should die in the Wilderness, and never see the land which was promised unto them: ad that they should wander in that Wilderness forty years, [Numb. 14. 1, 35, & 26. 64, 65. & 32. 10, 13. Deut. 1. 26, 36. & 9. 23. Josh. 5. 6. Psalm 95. 8, 11. & 106. 24, 25, 26.] reckoning all in a round summe; for it is manifest, that their children entered that land, in the 39. year, by comparing [Numb. 32. 13. with Deut. 2. 14.]

The tenth, which had caused this mutiny among the people, God destroyed all by sudden deaths, [Numb. 14. 36, 37.] in remembrance whereof, the Jews to this day, keep a fast, upon the seventh day of the sixth month, called Elul.

God therefore bad them remove their camp, and return back into the desert toward the Red Sea. But they, contrary to this command, would needs go forward into the mountain, and were there vanquished by the Amalekites and Canaanites, and pursued, as farre as Hormah. Therefore they sat down and wept before the Lord; but he would not hear them, [Numb. 14. 40, 45. Deut. 1. 40, 45.]

Upon this calamity, and the continual dropping away of the Israelites, in the Wilderness, Moses composed the 90 Psalm, [Lord thou hast been our refuge, &c.] in which he doth shew, that the ordinary age of men, was reduced to 70 or 80 years at the utmost: theretofore,

The age of man, was now a third time, contracted, and cut short a third part of what it was before.

The Israelites continued in Kadesh many dayes, [Deut. 1. 46.] for whether it were for a day or two, or a month, or a year, so long as the cloud continued over the Tabernacle, the Camp all that while continued in the same place, and removed not, [Numb. 9. 21.] But that in some places the Camp continued many years, appeareth, for that in the space of 37 years, there are but 17 encampings mentioned; for leaving Kadesh, they returned into the Wilderness, as I said before, toward the Red Sea, and encamped about the Hill-County of Seir many dayes, [Deut. 2. 1. Judg. 11. 16.] Now the 17 encampings, belonging to this compassing of the Wilderness of Seir, mentioned in the 33 of Numb. were in this order:

The 5th encamping was at Rimmon Paraz. The 7 at Libna. The 18 at Rifa. The 19 at Kheilaia. The 20 at Mount Shepher. The 21 at Harada. The 22 at Makheleth. The 23 at Thahath. The 24 at Thara. The 25 at Methka. The 26 at Hilmudna. The 27 at Moseroth. The 28 at B-ne-taanan, or Beeroth Bene-taan: (i. e.) Of the well of the fons of taanan, [Deut. 10. 6.] The 29 at Horagidgad, or Gudgoda, [Deut. 10. 7.]

The

The 30 at Iothatha, (i. e.) a place full of springs of water, [Dent. 10. 7.] The 31 was Hebrona. The 32 was Ezion-Gaber, which is near to Elocha, and joyning upon the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom, [1 Reg. 9. 26.]

Now to that long demourage of theirs in Kaddish, or the encampings next ensuing upon their removes from thence, all that seems to referre; which we finde delivered in the fifteenth, and four next ensuing chapters, of Numbers; as well that of the lawes there mentioned to have been made, as the Historical part thereof. As how he that gathered sticks on the Sabbath; (for though the sacrifices were omitted in the Wilderness, yet was still the use of the Sabbath entirely observed) was, by the Oracle from God, stoned to death, by all the people, c. 15. and how Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, raising a mutiny against Moles and Aaron, were swallowed alive into the earth, and 250. of their associates, whilst they offered incense perfired by fire, feur upon them from God. And how God commanded their censors to be taken and used, for the over-laying of the Altars, for a memorial to them to the children of Israel. And how the people murmuring against Moles and Aaron for the calamitie which had befallen their brethren, were stricken by God and perished, to the number of 14700. men, c. 16. And how twelve rods being brought by the twelve Princes, and laid in the Sanctuary: Aarons rod, onely budded, and brought forth almonds; and was laid up before the Ark, for a sign to those who should afterward be given to rebellion, [cap. 17.] All which things are thought to have been done in the later half of the second year, after their departure out of the land of Egypt. Moles committing to writing nothing, but what fell out in the two first years, and the last of their travel in the Wilderness; and passing by what else happened in those 37 years intervening, laying onely the matter of the 17 stages or encampings formerly mentioned. See Ambrosius upon Numb. cap. 1. Quest. 3.

The Scripture also sheweth that the time, which the Israelites spent in travelling from Kaddish Barnea, till they passed the vale, or brook Zerad, which was half a year after they removed from their 32 encamping; and another half year before they passed the River Jordan, took up the full time of 38 years. In which space of time, that generation of rebels against God was wholly spent, dead and buried, [Dent. 2. 14, 15, 16.]

Now for the 9 first years, which the Israelites spent in the Wilderness, Armais governed in Egypt, and Sethosis invaded the East: both which were brothers and kinsmen to Amenophis, (which was he that was drowned in the red Sea) as we have formerly noted, to the year of the world, 1494. Of whom thus, Sethosis being furnished with cavalry and shipping, made his brother Armais ruler, indeed, over all Egypt, and let him use all other Regall power and authority there: onely he forbade him to wear a Crown; and charged him in no wise to abridge the Queen which was the mother of his children: and that he should abstaine from all other concubines of the King. But he himself made war in Cyprus and Phoenicia, and against the Assyrians and the Medes. Some of which he subdued by power and force of arms, others he took in, thorough the sole dread and terror of his name: and now puffed up with this great success near home, he went on with the greater confidence to ravage and spoile all the Kingdoms and Countreys of the East. But some few years after he was gone, Armais whom he left in Egypt, casting off all fear of him, did all things contrary to what he was commanded by the King: For first, he misused the Queen, and lay continually with the Kings concubines; and at length, following the advice of his friends, used a Crown also, and plainly rebelled against his brother. Thus Manetho the Egyptian, adding withal, that Armais was Danans; and Sethosis was called both Egyptus, and that from him, the whole land was called Egypt: it is manifest, that both Tacitus comes to call him Rameses, and Herodotus, Sethosis; for so Tacitus says, That a King called Rhamis, having conquered all Libya, and Ethiopia, and the Medes and Persians, and Bactria, and Scythia, and all the lands which the Syrians and Armenians, and their borders the Cappadocians held, together with Bythopia, and Lycia, lying upon the Mediterranean Sea: and so far Tacitus of him, under the name of Rhamis. And for Sethosis, Herodotus in his second book, writes in this manner. Their Priests, saith he, speaking of the Egyptians, report; That he was the first, who with a Fleet of long Ships, going out of the Arabian gulf, brought all the nations bordering upon the Red Sea, into his subjection. Which done, he came back the same way; and having gathered a mighty Army, marched into the Continent (of Asia) and there subdued all the nations which stood in his way. Then passing out of Asia, crossed into Europe; and then conquered the Scythians, and Thracians: whither, and no further, saith he, it seemeth to me, that Egyptian Army came, because here, and no further off, are to be seen yet extant, the Altars and Monuments of his name and Victories. Of which Monuments to erected by Sethosis, he avetheth, that himselfe had seen some remaining in Palestine of Syria: as also two others in Ionia, one at Ephesus, as ye go into Phocæa, the other, on the way leading from Sardis to Smyrna. The like report makes Diodorus Siculus, of Sethosis lib. 2, but makes him far ancienter, than these times: and indeed the age attributed to his brother Danans proves, that he was contemporarie with Moles, as also Manetho makes makes him, an Diodorus himself in his 42 book, misseeth not much of the same mark, where he saith, That at what time all forrangers were returned, going out of Egypt, Danans and Cadmus, with their companies came into Greece, and Moles with his, went into Judea; as we may find in the Selections of Phisias, for the better understanding whereof, and in some (to fill up this void space of 37 years, omitted by Moles; it shall not be amiss here to insert, the sum of these forraign affaires, taken out of Eusebius his Tables, and are as follows.

2520. Egypt (which was formerly called Aria) was so called from Egyptus who was there made King, upon the expulsion of his brother, Danans: wherein our account varies two years onely from that of Eusebius, for 2522. Egyptus, who was also called, Rameffes, and Sesoftris, and Sesofis, after the terme of 9 years spent in several voyages and wars in forraign parts, (as Drador, Sic. in his first book testifieth), returned to Pelulium, Whereby Armais, who is also called Danans, when he had ruled over Egypt 9 years, fled for fear of his brother Rameffes, or Egyptus; and falling from the Kingdom which he had so gotten in Egypt, came into Greece, as Georgius Syncellus hath it, in the Greek Eusebius, published by Scaiger, page 26. 27. having first attempted to poison his brother Egyptus, at a banquet provided for him: but mislaid of his purpose, as both Herodotus lib. 2. cap. 127. and also Diodorus Siculus lib. 1. pag. 53. (in the Greek and Latin edition of him) testifies.

2530. Danans coming into Greece, there made himself Master of Argos; and made it abound with waters: Danans by his 50 daughters, destroyed the 50 sons of his brother Egyptus: save onely his son Lyceus, which reigned after him, to wit at Argos.

2533. Bufris the son of Neprunus, and Labra the daughter of Epaphus, exercised a tyranny in the parts joyning upon the river Nile, barbarously murdering all strangers, which passing that way fell into his hands; whence is that of Ovid, lib. 3. de Tristis, more cruel thou, than was Bufris art, and that of Virgil 3. Georg. who of Eunytus us hard heart, hath not heard? And alars, by the unworthy B. fir reard? unworthy indeed to be defended; but much more unworthy was he to have been commended by any man, which yet was his hap to be by Socrates the Orator, in his, *Bufris*is Encomium, and therein (as after him, also Eusebius did) he says, that he was the son of Libya, the daughter of Epaphus and Neprunus. Where observe, that this Rameffes, surnamed Myamut, (of whom I spake, in the year of the world 2427) is by Muthologus we have surnamed Neprunus, and was the man who commanded the new born infants of the Hebrs to be drowned; and that left behind him two sons, Amenophis, (i. e.) Belus of Egypt (the father of Egyptus and Danans) that oppressor of the Almighty God; and which with his hosts was overwhelmed in the Red-sea; and left Bufris his son, so infamous, for butchering of strangers, (a fitting offspring of such a father) to succeed him, wherunto you may add, if you please, out of A. Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 21. that the Poets were wont to call men, barbarous, cruel, and devoid of humanity, the sons of Neptune: as born of that mercelless element, the sea.

2543. In these times, Tacitus son of Hermes Trimegistes, lived, (saith Eusebius), with which agreeeth that which the Egyptians deliver, that Sethosis, learned his wisdom from this Hermes, as we find in Elian, lib. 12. Var. Hist. cap. 4.

2549. Cadmus and Phenis, going from Thibis in Egypt into Syria, erected a kingdom in Tyre and Sidon, Euseb. Chron.

2552. b. Now after the Israelites had compassed the hill-country of Seir and Edom, by the space of 37 years, from Kaddish-Barnea, to Ezion-Gaber, in Edom; going from the North to the South, even to the shore of the Red-Sea, God then commanded them to turne Northward, and march forth forward to the land of promise: and because the land of Edom lay in their way thitherward, he charged them, that they should not, in any wise, draw a sword upon them, abusing their brethren: telling them how great a providence and care he had used, in preserving themselves by the space of 40 years in the wilderness, [Dent. 2. 17.] putting such an imperfect number of 40. for an imperfect, of 39.

In the first month of the 40 year, after their departure out of Egypt; the Israelites coming into the wilderness of 1200, they there encamped.

33 Encamping was at Kaddish, Numb. 20. 1. with the 33. c. of the same, v. 36, 37, 38. and Exod. 12. 17. To wit in Kaddish of Tzius, in the very borders of Edom, c. 20. 14. 5. 1. towards Ezion-Gaber, and the Red-Sea, and not at Kaddish-Barnea, where they made their fifteenth encamping; and which lay near the border of Canaan, toward the Ioudæa, Numb. 34. 4. Test. 15. 3.

Here Miriam, al. Maria, died. [Numb. 30. 1.] 4 moneths before her brother Aaron, and 11 moneths before her brother Moses: in that she was the eldest of the three; and attained to the age of 130 years, apparently, Exod. 2. 4. 7. 1. to that she was a pretty big Maid, when Moses was born: as was noted before upon the year of the world, 1413. and the Jews to this very day, keep the memory of her decease, upon the tenth o. the first month.

The people again, for lack of water, murmur against Moses and Aaron: whom when God commanded to call water out of the hard rocks, onely by speaking to it; Moses moved beat all their enemies, [Numb. 23, and 24. Dent. 32. 5. Josuah 24. 10.]

And by his advice it was, that the women of Moab, and Midian were set on work, to turn the Israelites away to Idolatry: and to make them fall a whoring with them, [Numb. 25. 1, 2, 3, 6. 31. 16. Dent. 4. 3. Pfal. 106. 28. Apocal. 2. 14.] Wherefore God commanded Moses, first to take all the ring-leaders of this disorder, and to hang them up before the sun: and then he gave order to the Judges, to put to death all such of them as had joined themselves to Baal-Peor; and laid off all, God sent a plague upon the people, whereof there died 23000 men in one day, [1 Cor. 10. 8.] which added to them which were hanged, and killed with the sword, amount in all to twenty four thousand, [Numb. 25. 4, 5, 9.]

Phineas the son of Eleazar, by killing Zimri, the son of Salu, chief of his fathers family, of the Tribe of Symeon; and Cosbi the daughter of Siro, a Prince of the Midianites, appeased the wrath of God, and so that plague ceased, [Numb. 25. Pfal. 106. 30.] And God therefore setting the High-Priesthood for ever upon the house of Phineas, commanded them also to make war forthwith upon the Midianites, [Numbers 32. 1, 2, 3, 17, 18.]

Moses and Eleazar, by Gods command, in the plain of Moab, near unto Jordan, over against Jericho, numbered the people from 20 years old, and upward; and found them to be 601730 men: besides the Levites; whose number, reckoning them, from one month old and upwards, came to 23000, and then Moses received Gods command for the parting of the land of Promise, among the Israelites, [Numb. 26. 1, 63.]

The daughters of Zelophehad, had their fathers land parted among them for want of issue male: and by this occasion was the law for succession in heritages drawn up, and made, [Numb. 27. 1, 11.]

God dignified to Moses, that he should die: and Josuah was therefore declared to be his successor; and Moses laid his hands upon him, and gave him instructions, [Numb. 27. 12, 23. Deuteronomie 34. 26, 27, 28.] And several laws were then made, [Deuteronomie 28. v. 29, 30.]

Twelve thousand of the Israelites, under the leading of Phineas, vanquished the Midianites, and slew all the males among them with their five Princes, and among them Sar the father of Cosbi, all which were under him. Josuah son of Sion, the Amorite, whilst he lived, and Balan the wizard, who when he should have returned into his own Country of Metopam, a [Numbers 24. 25.] It struck among the Midianites, [Numbers 31. 1, 8. Josuah 13. 21, 22.] And of the females only the virgins were saved alive, [Numb. 31. 9, 54.]

The lands which belonged to Sihon, and Og were divided and given to the tribes of Rubens and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasses, by Moses, [Numb. 32. Dent. 3. 13, 20. and c. 29. 8. Jos. 13. 8, 12, and 22. 4.] all from the river Arnon, to mount Hermo (which is also called: hemir, and Syron, and Sion) and joyneth upon Anti-Lebanon, [Dent. 3. 8, 9. Dent. 4. 48. Jos. 12. 1. Jos. 13. 9, 11.]

When the Israelites were now going into the land of Canaan, God commanded them to root out the Canaanites and their Idols, [Numb. 33. 50, 56.] and that they should divide the land, westward of Jordan, among the nine remaining tribes, and the other half tribe of Manasses, [Numb. 34.] and concerning the 48 Cities of the Levites, and six Cities of Refuge, [Numb. 35.] of which there were three appointed then by Moses himself, on the east of Jordan, [Dent. 4. 41, 42, 43.]

Upon the 5 day of 11 month (Fib. 20. falling upon our Saturday) in the 40 year after their departure out of Egypt, in the plain of Moab, Moses made a speech to the children of Israel: set down in the 1, 2, 3, c. of Dent. and to the 40 v. of the 4 c. and afterward continued his speaking to them; to the 27 c. of the same.

Moses, with the Elders of Israel, commanded the people, that in their passage over Jordan, they should set up great stones, whitened over with chalk or plaster, and the ten Commandments to be written on them, and the forme of blessing upon the mount Gerizim, and of cursing in mount Ebal, [Dent. 27.] exhorting them to observe the Law of God, by setting before their eyes, what benefits would ensue thereof; and detaching them from the breach of that law, by assuring them of what miseries would overtake them: if they forsook the Law, [Dent. 28.]

Moses, by Gods command, renews the Covenant, made by God with them, and their children in mount Horeb: and again perswades them, to keep that Covenant, by all the blessings and curses, which would undoubtedly follow the keepers or breakers of it, [Dent. 29.] yet with a promise of pardon and deliverance, if at any time, having broken it, they should repent them of their sin: and tells them further, that God had therefore thus declared his will unto them, to the end, that none hereafter offending, should pretend ignorance, like the offended, [Dent. 30.]

Moses having written this law, delivered it to the Priests, the sons of Levi, and the Elders of the people to be kept: The same day also he wrote his song, and taught the same to the children of Israel to be sung, and having finished the book of this law, he took order to have it laied up, in the side of the Ark, [Dent. 31.] But that most excellent song of his, is contained in [Dent. 32.]

Moses,

Moses, drawing now near to his end, blessed every tribe in particular, by way of prophecy, (having only the Tribe of Symeon: which his last Will and Testament is contained in [Dent. 33.])

In the twelfth month of this year, Moses, going up out of the plain of Moab, into mount Nebo, which was a part of the country of the Abrahams, from the top thereof, lying over against Jericho, he beheld the land of Promise, all over, and then dyed, [Numb. 27. 12, 13. Dent. 3. 23, 29. Dent. 32. 49, 50. Dent. 34. 15.] being then, 120 years old, [Dent. 31. 8, 30. 4. 7.] Of all which time, he spent a full third part, wanting only one month; in his government of the people of Israel: as is not amiss observed by Josephus in the later end of his 4 book of antiquities: as departing this life in the last month of the year, and first day of that month, which by the Macedons is called Dysmnus, and by the Hebrews Adar: which better suiteth, with the account of Historians shortly after following, than with the tradition of the Jews of later time: who saith that he died upon the seventh day of the month Adar, as in Sedar Olam rabba, c. 10. in Mishnah book of the death of Moses, in the proeme of Maymonidas to the book, called Mishnah, and in the Calendars of the Jews of this time appeareth: who still celebrate the memorial of his death, by a solemn fast upon this day.

The body of Moses, God translated out of the place where he died, into a valley of the land of Moab, over against Beth Peor, and there buried it: nor doth any man know the place where he laied it, unto this day, [Dent. 34. 6.] But that this valley was in the land of Sihon King of the Amorites, which the Israelites won from him, appeareth our [Dent. 34. 46.] and that Beth Peor, was assigned to the Rubenites, out of [Jos. 13. 20, 21.] and therefore, whereas here Moses is said to have been buried in the land of Moab; as likewise [Dent. 29. 1.] the Covenant is said to have been renewed in the land of Moab, it is to be understood of the land which formerly did belong to them: but was lately taken from them by Sihon King of the Amorites, as I shewed before out of [Numb. 21. 26.] and was now possessed by the Israelites.

Michael the Arch-Angel, as we read in the Epistle of Jude; disputed with the Devil about the body of Moses: which the Devil would faine have brought to light; that he might thereby have ministered an occasion of Idolatry to the people of Israel, as Chrysostome in his 1. Homilie upon Deuteronomie, Quæst. 43. and Procopius Gassari, upon Deuteronomie, and others say: though we no where find that the Jewes ever gave themselves to this Antichristian i. e. This worshipping of Reliques: But this contention of Michael with the Devil about the body of Moses, went about heretofore in a certain Apocryphal, entitled, visi Arabum Movsetis: i. e. of the Assumption of Moses, as we read in Origen de 1. 2. lib. 3. cap. 2. and in Gelatinus Cypriensis in the Acts of the Council of Nice, part. 1. c. 20. Like unto which, I somewhat is also found in Talmud of Rabbi Nathan.

The Israelites mourned for Moses in the land of Moab, 30 dayes, [Dent. 34. 8.] to wit, all the whole 12 month.

And here ends the Pentateuch, or the five books of Moses, containing the history of 2552 years and a half, from the beginning of the world; and the book of Josua begins with the 41 year after the departure of the Children of Israel out of Egypt.

The First Month.

Josuah being confirmed in his Government by God, sent forthwith spies from Shittim to the City of Jericho: which being harboured by Rahab in an Inn, and privily sent away when search was made for them, lay three dayes close in the mountain, and then returned to him, [Jos. 2.]

Josuah commanded the people, besides their manna, which as yet ceased not, to take other provant and victuals along with them, as being three dayes after to passe over Jordan, [Jos. 1. 10, 11.]

The next mornings, they removed from Shittim and came to the river Jordan, and there encamped that night, [Jos. 3. 1.]

The third day after, warning was given them, as it should seeme, to provide victuals: the people also were commanded to sanctifie and prepare themselves to passe over Jordan the morrow after, [Jos. 3. 2, 5.]

Upon the 10 day of the first month, April 30. being on a Friday, to wit, the same day that the Paschal lamb was to be chosen out of the flock, the Israelites, by the leading of Josua, a type of Jesus Christ, went up out of the river Jordan, into the promised land of Canaan, a type of that heavenly country: they passed through the river on twelve dry foot, the waters being for that present divided, and that at a season, when they usually over-flowed the banks, for a memorial of which miraculous passage, Josua set up twelve stones in the very channel of Jordan; and taking twelve other stones from out of the middle thereof set them up in the place where they next encamped, at Gilgal, [Jos. 3. 3 and 4.]

The day following (as it seemes) Josuah renewed the use of Circumcision in Gilgal, which had been omitted 40 years, and there the people moved them and abode, untill they were whole again, [Jos. 5. 2, 9.]

E

Upon

Upon the fourteenth day of the first month (the fourth of May, being our Tuesday) in the evening, the Israelites celebrated their first Passover in the land of Canaan, [Josh 5. 26.]

Ten days after the Passover (May 5. being Wednesday) they ate of the fruit of the Land of Canaan, unleavened bread, and parched corn; and manna ceased, the very day after they began to live of the fruits of the land; and the children of Israel after that, saw manna no more, but lived that year of the fruits of the land of Canaan, [Josh 5. 11, 12.]

Our Lord Jesus, Captain of his Fathers Host, appearing to Joshua, the typical Jesus, before Jerico, with a drawn sword in his hands, promised there to defend his people, [Josh 5. 13, 14, 15.]

Jerico, the Ark of God having been carried round about it, was taken the seventh day, the walls thereof falling flat down, at the found of the Priests' trumpets: and was utterly destroyed, and all put to the sword, saving only Rahab, and her family, [Josh 6.] who marrying afterward to Salmon, of the Tribe of Judah, bare of him Boaz, [Mar 1. 5.]

The Israelites at their siege of Ay, being abandoned by God, for the sacrilege, committed by Achan, are smitten by their enemies: Achan's sin being discovered by the casting of lots, and he found guilty, was stoned to death, and together with his children and cattle, burnt with fire, [Josh 7.] and God being hereby pacified, Ay was taken by an ambushment; and utterly destroyed, and twelve thousand men slain in the taking of it, [Josh 8. 1, 29.]

In mount Ebal, according to the law made, there was an Altar erected, for sacrifices to be made thereon, and the ten Commandments engraven on it, the blessings and cursings were repeated in mount Ebal, and mount Gerizim, and the book of the Law read in the ears of all the people, [Josh 8. 30, 35.]

The kings of Canaan moved with this great success of the Israelites, bandy themselves together against them, save only the Gibeonites, who craftily found a way to save their own lives, by making a league with them: but were, nevertheless, afterward deputed to the servile offices of the house of God: [Josh 9.]

Adonizdec, King of Jerusalem, with the Kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Debir, hearing that Gibeon was fallen off from them, joined their forces together, and besieged it: But Joshua having raised the siege, pursued these five Kings, and had the killing of them, as far as Azekah, and Makeda, at which time, the sun stood still over Gibeon, and the moon over the valley of Ajalon, by the space almost of one whole day, and until the Israelites were fully avenged of their enemies, [Josh 10. 1, 14.] Whereupon Laurenceus Co.omanus observes two things: 1. That whereas Adonizdec was distant from Gibeon, scilicet only German miles toward the west, it is very likely that the moon was then past the full and well on in the wain. 2. That seeing both these great lights began and ended their standing still both together, the Astronomical account is no way confounded by this story, even as (saith he) in music, the harmony is not in any sort broken, nor the voices jar, if they all rest at the same time, and then begin again, every man in his part, unto the end of the lesson.

Joshua, following the chase, those five Kings hid themselves in a cave at Makeda, which cave, Joshua commanded to be rammed up with stones, and a guard to be set upon it, till the enemy being wholly routed, had broken themselves to their fenced Cities and when all the army was safely returned to Joshua at Makeda, then were the stones removed, and those five Kings taken out of the cave, and the captains of the Host, bid to put every man his foot upon their necks; and them to be hung up upon five gibbets, until the sun went down, and then to be thrown into the same cave again, and the mouth thereof stopped up with stones as before: [Josh 10. 16, 17.]

And thus ended that most bulle year of the world, 2553. in the first six months, whereof Moses himself took in and possessed all that land over Jordan, toward the east, and in the later, Joshua conquered the most part of all, that lay to the west of it: and in the midst of the year, manna ceasing, the people of Israel began to fix silt and live upon the profits of the land of Canaan.

From the Autumne of this year, wherein, after the falling of manna, they began to till the ground and sow it, is to be reckoned the first year, the quinquagesima, (i.e.) of their tillage, and the first of the sabbatical years hence to be taken, Ex 23. 10, 11, Lev 25. 2, 7, Deut 15. 1, 9, and Deut 31. 10.]

The five Kings thus destroyed, all the rest of the kings, combined together against the Israelites; and with them Joshua had a long war, [Josh 11. 1, 18.] which lasted full six years: as we shall see anon.

Joshua, now grown old, was commanded by God, to divide all the land on the west of Jordan, among the nine tribes remaining, and the other half tribe of Manasses, [Josh 13. 1, 7.] whereupon he first divided the land of Gilgal, (where the Tabernacle of God then was, and the Army then lay,) among the Tribes of Judah, and Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manasses, [Josh 14. 6, Josh 15. 16, 17.] at which time Caleb the son of Jephunna, 45 years after the time that he was sent to spy out the land by Moses, desired to have Hebron with the mountain countries of Judah, to be assigned to him for his part: undertaking to expulise the Anakims from thence, [Josh 14. 5, 10, 13.]

Yct

Yet would not Joshua permit (as Tremellius hath here very well observed) that Caleb with his own company should assault Hebron: but himself went with the whole Army to take it in; and having taken it then gave it unto Caleb; to wit, the land and villages thereunto adjoining: reserving the city itself, and suburbs thereof, for a city of refuge, and for the Priests use, [Josh 21. 11, 12, 13. 1 Chron 55. 56, 57.] For, that neither Hebron, nor Debir, though both lying within the land, and inheritance assigned to Caleb, were yet taken by the Israelites, nor the Anakims rooted out from thence, appeareth out of the [14 and 15 chap. of Joshua] so that all which is contained in the book of Joshua, from [verse 8. cap. 10. to the end of chap. 11. and in the first chapter of the book of Judges, from the ninth, to the fifteenth verse, seems wholly to be referred to this place, because of the continuity and coherence of the matter handled in each of them.

For when as the children of Juda and Joseph, being established in their possessions, according to their Tribes; a great part of the land of Canaan remained still in the hands of the Gergites; Joshua before he proceeded to any further apportioning of lands, going with the Host of Israel from Gilgal, took Makeda at the first assault: and to did he Libna in like manner; utterly destroying the Kings and people of either Kingdom, [Josh 10. 28, 29, 30.]

From thence he marched with his Army to Lachish: took it the second day after he came before it, and put all there likewise to the sword. And when Horam King of Gazer came to relieve it, Joshua met him, and destroyed him and his people, so that he left not a man of them alive: and then marching to Egion, took it the very day he came before it, and put all to the sword, [Josh 10. 31, 35.]

Afterward Joshua with all Israel, going up from Egion to Hebron; took it, and put to the sword the new king thereof; (for the old one was hanged six years before) with all the cities belonging, [Josh 10. 36, 37.] where Caleb also cast those three Gyants, the sons of Anak, so much renowned and talked of 45 years before, [Numb 13. 2, 23; 2] to wit, Sheshai, Achiman, and Talmai, [Josh 15. 14.]

Then Joshua with the Army, marching out of the fourth of Canaan, came before Debir, [Josh 10. 38.] which formerly was called, Kariath-Seppher; where, when Caleb had proclaimed, that whoever took it, should have his daughter to wife: it fell out that Othniel, cousin german to Caleb, and the son of Kenaz took it: and thereupon married his daughter Achah, and had with her in dowry, a piece of land with springs of water in it, [Josh 15. 15, 19 Judg 1. 11, 15.] and having taken the city, he put their new King also (for the other he had caused to be hanged with the rest, six years before) with all his citizens to the edge of the sword, [Josh 10. 39.]

To conclude, Joshua destroyed all the Hill-Country, and all the South parts, plaine and valley, and all their Kings, even from Kadeth-Barnea, as far as unto Gaza; and all the country of Goshen, (which was in the lor of the Tribe of Judah) as far as Gibeon. And all these Kings, and all their lands took Joshua at one time (i.e.) in one expedition or journey; for God himself all that while fought for Israel: and having thus done, then he with all the Host of Israel, came back to Gilgal, [Josh 10. 40, 43.]

The rest of the Kings, with whom Joshua had warred a long time, hearing what Joshua had done, resolved to set upon him with all their forces united in one: but Joshua coming suddenly upon them, and upwards, slew them and possessed all their land, [Josh 11. 1, 16.] from the mountain, which goeth up to Seir, which is the frontier of Edom, unto Baal-Gaddem, in the valley of Lebanon, which lyeth under the Hill of Hermon, [Josh 11. 47. Josh 12. 7.]

Then went Joshua and rooted out those Gyants, the Anakims with their cities; out of the Hill-Countries, out of Hebron: (this was done by the hands of the Tribes of Judah, [Judg 1. 10.] out of Debir, out of Anab, and generally out of all the mountains of Juda, and all Israel. And to having gotten the whole land into his hands, he divided it among the children of Israel for a possession, by shares or portions (as we shall see in the year following) according to their Tribes: and so the land rested from war, [Josh 11. 23, Josh 14. 15.]

The seventh year, reckoned from the first year wherein they began to till the ground in Canaan, was withal the first Sabbatical year which was kept among them. When by this typical Jesus they were brought into this place of rest, which was a true type and figure of that Sabbath and Rest which the true Jesus was to acquire, and bring the people of God into, [Heb 4. 9.] And from hence also the years of Jubile, or of every fifty years space, is to be reckoned, [Levit 25. 8, 13.]

Upon the 15 day of the seventh months, (our November the fifth, falling upon a Saturday) the Israelites kept the Feast of Tabernacles in booths made of boughs of trees, according to the Law, [Levit 23. 39, 40.] and much more solemnly than was afterward used in the times of the Judges or Kings, [Neh 8. 17.]

When God was now about to give the Israelites rest from all their enemies round about them, so that they might dwell there securely; it was requisite that a place also should be appointed, which himself should chuse, to place his name there, [Deut 12. 10, 11.] Wherefore coming together at Shilo, they there fixed the Tabernacle of the Congregation;

tion; after the whole land was subdued unto them.

[Josh. 18. 1.] Now Shilo (where the Tabernacle with the Ark of the Covenant continued by the space of 328. years) both by the signification of the name, and also by the situation of the place, seemeth to be the same with Salem: for, as \square signifies Peace, or Ref. [Gen. 34. 22. Nahum 1. 12.] so \square also doth \square [Dan. 4. 1.] where also the Messiah is thought to have been called Shilo, [Gen. 49. 10.] because not only himself was peaceable and quiet: but was also the Author of eternal rest and peace unto us; being as well as Melchisedech, King of Salem, (i. e. the King of peace, [Hebr. 7. 2.] which was Melchisedech's dwelling place, or palace, as Jerom in his 126. Epistle to Eulogius saith, was in his time to be seen in the city of Salem, near the place where John baptizeth, [Josh. 3. 23.] which, [Gen. 33. 18.] according to Jerom's own, and the Sepuagins exposition, was called Sichem, because feared as Shilo was, [Josh. 24. 25, 26. 1st Jos. 18. 1. Gen. 35. 4. Judg. 9. 6. compared with 21. 8, 19.] in the country of the Sichemites.

The land which remained, was divided among the other seven Tribes for their inheritance, and a book drawn up containing their several proportions, [Josh. 18. and 19. chapters.] and so after the seven Nations of the Canaanites were destroyed, the distribution of their lands among the Israelites followed, and was completely finished.

In the year after the Election of the Fathers, much about 450. [Acts 13. 17, 19, 20.] year from the birth of the promised seed Isaac, to this time, are reckoned, 452. years: and from the rejection of Ishmael, 447. but between both, we may count, 450. years.

d. Our of the land, as well on this, as on that side Jordan, were set apart, 48 Cities for the inheritance of the Levites: six whereof were made Cities of Refuge; and Sanctuaries were therein made, unto whom those who committed not wholly wilful murder, might flee for protection, [Josh. 20. and 21.] and so the Israelites now possessed the land promised to their fathers: God giving them rest and peace round about, according to all that he had promised to the fathers by an oath, [Josh. 21. 43, 44.] whereupon the companies of the Rubenites, Gadites, and half the Tribe of Manasse, which came over Jordan to help their brethren in this achievement; God having now fully tested them there, took their leave of Joshua, and returned to their possessions, which Moses had given them, on the other side Jordan, [Josh. 22. 4. with chap. 1. 14, 15, and Num. 32. 48, 22.]

But when in their return homeward, they were come unto Gilead at the passage of Jordan, in the borders of the land of Canaan, they had there built a great Altar: the other Tribes (supposing thereby that they intended a separation, and to revolt from them, they resolved to make war upon them; yet sending Phineas, the son of Eleazar, the High Priest, with ten other Princes of the people, to know the reason of their doings; and understanding, that the Altar was not built to offer sacrifice thereon, but only to testify the communion and fellowship which they had with the rest of the Tribes of Israel, they changed their purposes, and laid down their arms, [Josh. 22.]

2561. d. Joshua built the city of Timnah-Sera, in mount Ephraim, in which he dwelt many years, after that God had given Rest to Israel; and having lived 110. years (which was the age of Joseph, mentioned in the end of Genesis) he there died, and was buried, [Josh. 23. 1. Josh. 24. 29, 30.]

2591. d. When as in the times of Anarchie or mis-rule, which followed after the decease of Joshua and the Elders, who out-lived him, and who being young men, when they came out of Egypt, could well observe and remember the wonders which God had wrought for Israel: every man now doing what seemed him good in his own eyes, all those disorders were committed, which are reported in the five last chapters of the book of Judges; to wit, the Idolatry of Micah, and the children of Dan, and the war of the Benjamites, and the cause thereof. And there succeeded a generation of men which forgot God, and mingled themselves with the Canaanites by marriage, and worshipped their Idols. And God hereby provoked to wrath, gave them up into the hands of Cushan, King of Mesopotamia; which first calamity of theirs, held them eight years only, [Judg. 2. 7. and Judg. 3. 6, 7, 8.]

2609. d. In this year was kept the first Jubilee, in the land of Canaan.

2658. d. Was kept the second Jubilee.

2661. d. After the decease of Othniel, the Israelites, falling again to sin against God, were again by him given over into the hands of Eglon, King of Moab; who jynying with the Ammonites monites, and Amalekites, overthrew the Israelites, and took Jericho, and this second oppression of theirs continued, for the space of eighteen years, [Judg. 3. 12, 13, 14.]

2679. d. Tiden Ehud, the son of Gera, of the tribe of Benjamin (which was but a little before, almost wholly destroyed) was raised up by God for an avenger of his people: for feigning a message to Eglon, he ran him into the belly with his dagger, and left him dead in his own dining room, and then getting cunningly away, he gathered all Israel into a body, in Mount Ephraim, and slew ten thousand of the most valiant men of Moab, and the land had rest 40 years; after the former rest, and deliverance gotten them by Othniel, [Judg. 3. 15, 30.]

After him also Shamgar, the son of Anath, slew 600 Philistines with an Ox-goad; and he also avenged Israel, ib. v. ult.

2682. d. Belus the Assyrian reigned in Babylon, after the Arabians 55 years, saith Iul. Africanus.

2699. d. The Israelites, after the death of Ehud, returning to their old sinne, were given up by God into the hand of Jabink of Canaan: who reigned in Hazor, and had 500 chariots of Iron: and this third thraldom of theirs continued 20 years, [Judg. 4. 12, 13.]

2707. a. Was the 3 Jubile.

2737. d. Ninus the son of Belus founded the Empire of the Assyrians, which continued in Asia by the space of 520 years, as Herod. in his first book, cap. 95. affirmeth: whom Appian, Alexandr. in the beginning of his work followeth. But Dionysius Halicarnassus, a most diligent searcher into all such matters, in his first book of Antiquities, saith, that they had a very small part of Asia, under their command: yet Diodorus Siculus in his Bibliotheca, reports that Ninus, confederating with Arius King of Arabia, possessed all Asia, having India and Bactria, by the space of seventeen years, and that at length, he took in the Bactrians also with the King Zoroaster: of whom Justin also; out of Trogus Pompeius, thus writeth, lib. 1. Ninus, having conquered his next neighbors, syned their feres to his own, and thereby went on still the fronger to the conquest of the next, and very last victory was with Zoroaster King of Bactria, who is said to have been the first that found out the art magicke, and to have most diligently looked into the nature of the world, and motion of the stars: him Ninus slew, and presently after died himself. Julius Africanus and Eusebius say, that he reigned 52 years.

2752. d. The Israelites sinning again, are delivered into the hands of the Midianites, which fourth thraldom of theirs, lasted 7 years, [Judg. 6. 1.]

2759. d. Was the 4 Jubile.

The Israelites falling into this fourth thraldom, cryed unto God for help, and were relieved by a prophet. Then was Gideon of Manasse, son of Joash the Abiezrite stirred up by an Angel sent from God, to deliver them. And first by command from God, he overturned the Altar of Baal, and burnt his grove: whereupon, when Ishtae arose between him and the people, he was called Ierub-baal, and Ierub-beseth, [2. Sam. 11. 21.] He out of 32 thousand men, which came unto him, chose only (God so commanding) 300, but with them, and their trumpets, pitchers and torches in them, he so affrighted the Midianites, that he put to flight all their host; whom the Ephraimites afterwards pursuing, slew their Princes, Oreb and Zeeb. Gedeon then, having first pacified the Ephraimites, who complained that they were not called to the battle at first, passed the river Jordan, and defeated the remainder of the Midianitish armie: he chastised also the men of Succoth and Peniel, who had refused him victual in his journey, and slew two Kings of the Moabites, Zeba and Zalmunna. After which great victories attained, when the Israelites offered to settle the kingdom upon him, and his posterity, he refused it: but receiving their golden earings, he made thereof, an Ephod, whereof they took afterward an occasion to fall into Idolatry, and so the Midianites being vanquished, the land had rest 40 years, after the former rest restored to them by Deborah and Barak, [Judg. 4. 8, 28.]

2768. d. So soon as Gedeon was dead, the Israelites falling back to Idolatry, worshipped Baal-Berith for their god, [Judg. 58. 33.] and Abimelech the son of Gedeon, (begotten upon a woman of Sichem, his Concubine) purposing to get to himself the kingdom, which his father had refused, slew seventeen of his Brothers, all upon one stone, [Judg. 9. 11, 18, 24, 56.]

2919.	a.	Jeſſai the Ephraſhite in his old age, [1 Sam. 17. 12.] had his youngſon Ion David born at Bethlehem ; which was therefore afterward called The City of David , [1 Sam. 20. 6. and Luke 2. 4.] thirty years before he ſucceeded Saul in the Kingdom, [2 Sam. 5. 4. with 1 Sam. 16. 1.]	3629.	1085.
2941.	c.	God having now rejected Saul, and debarred his race and family from ſucceeding in the Kingdom, ſent Samuel, after his long mourning for Saul, to Bethlehem, there to anoint David to be King, ſeventy years before the rebellion of Abſalom, [1 Sam. 16. 1. with 2 Sam. 1. 7.] who being, A lovely keeper of a lovely flock , was called from keeping his father's ſheep, [1 Sam. 16. 13.] and preferred before his elder brethren ; and being anointed in their preference, [1 Sam. 16. 13.] incurred their envy, [chap. 17. 28.] no leſſe than Joſeph did of his brethren ; and at laſt, was taken over the Tribe of Judah, at the ſame day that Iſo-ph was made Ruler over all Egypt, [Gen. 41. 46.] Meane while, the ſame day that his anointing, the Spirit of God came upon him ; to wit, the Spirit of courage and wiſdom, [1 Sam. 18. 5. 13. 2 Sam. 5. 2.] In both which reſpects, even while Saul lived, he was made General over all Iſrael, [1 Sam. 18. 5. 13. and 2 Sam. 5. 2.] and whilſt he lived, he was made General over all Iſrael, [1 Sam. 18. 5. 13. and 2 Sam. 5. 2.] and whilſt he lived, he was made General over all Iſrael, [1 Sam. 18. 5. 13. and 2 Sam. 5. 2.] and whilſt he lived, he was made General over all Iſrael, [1 Sam. 18. 5. 13. and 2 Sam. 5. 2.]	3651.	1063.
2949.	c.	Whilſt David was at Ziklag, there repined to him, of the kindred of Saul, many valiant men of the Tribe of Benjamin, as alſo of the Tribe of Gad, ſundry principal ſouldiers, which came over Jordan to him : the firſt month, what time it overflowed all his banks, with divers other Captains and Commanders of the Tribes of Benjamin and Judah, [1 Chron. 12. 1. 15, 18.]
		King Achish purpoſing with his army of Philiftines to invade the Iſraelites ; took David along with him in that voyage, [1 Sam. 27. 1. 2.] and to him whilſt he was upon his march with his fix hundred men, reputed ſundry officers of the Tribe of Manafſes, and joyined with him, [1 Chron. 12. 19.] and the Philiftines were then encamped at Shunim : but the Iſraelites, in Gilboa, [1 Sam. 28. 4.]
		Saul ſeeing the Army of the Philiftines, fell into a fear, and fought counſell from the Lord : But receiving no answer from him, neither by dream, neither yet by Urim, nor by his Prophets : leaving him, he went to Endor by night, to conſult with a Witch there : where by a viſion of Samuel called by her, he received that dreadful doom, God ſhall deliver Iſrael, together with thy ſelf, into the hands of the Philiftines : and to morrow, thou and thy children ſhall be with me , [1 Sam. 28. 5. 6, 19. and 1 Chron. 10. 13. 14.]
		Whilſt David was away upon his march, the Amalekites took Ziklag ; plundered it, and burnt it : carrying away with them among the reſt, David's two Wives, Abinoam of Iſrael, and Abigail, the wife of Nabal, [1 Sam. 30.]
		Saul returning the ſame night from the Witch, the Iſraelites removed to the Fountain of Iſrael, and the Philiftines to Aphek : where the Princes of the Philiftines growing jealous of David, he and his company early the next morning left their army, and returned towards Ziklag ; and the Philiftines in this interim, marched up to Iſrael, to fight with the Iſraelites, [1 Sam. 28. 25. and 29. 1, 3, 10, 11.] whence it appears, that Saul and his ſons, were not ſlain the next day after his communication with the apparition of Samuel (for all that day David was in the army of the Philiftines) but ſome while after his departure from them.
		When David was upon his return to Ziklag, there came unto him ſeven Colonels of the Manafſſes, [1 Chron. 12. 6. 2.] where arriving the third day after, and finding the town plundered and ſet on fire, he left two hundred of his Company, which were ſent to the march, at the brook Bazar, and with the other four hundred he followed after the Amalekites, and overtaking them, flew them, from the twilight of the firſt day, to the evening of the next ; and having recovered all that was loſt, returned home with joy, [1 Sam. 30.]
		The Hoſt of Iſrael being wholly routed, the three ſons of Saul, Jonathan, Aminadab, and Melchithai, were there alſo ſlain ; Saul, and the Squire of his body fell upon their own ſwords. The day following, the Philiftines having taken off the head of Saul, hung up his armour in the temple of their Ido Altharoth ; and the bodies of him, and his three ſons, upon the walls of Bethlehem : But the men of Jabesh Gilead, remembring the favour which Saul at the entrance of his reign had done unto them, ſtole away their bodies from thence and burnt them ; and buried their bones under an oak at Jabesh, and kept a faſt for them ſeven dayes long, [1 Sam. 31. verſe 1. 1 Chron. 10.]

	Mephibotheth, the ſon of Jonathan, who was now ſlaine, when his nurſe, upon the rydings thereof, fled away with him, in a great fright and halter, fell out of her armes, and became lame of his feet ever after, [2 Sam. 4. 4.]
	David returning from the ſlaughter of the Amalekites, three dayes after heard of the defeat of the Army of the Iſraelites, by a boy of the Amalekites, who was in the fight : and brought Saul's Crown, and the Bracelet of his arme (both which he had taken off from Saul's body,) unto him, [2 Sam. 1. 1.] From which to late rydings, though brought with all ſpeed, coming unto David, it is gathered, that the defeat in Gilboa, happened ſome number of dayes after David's leaving the Army of the Philiftines. Nor may any man marvel, that the battel was ſo long after delayed, when we read, that the Syrians alſo long after that, encamping againſt the Iſraelites at the ſame place of Aphek, ſate there ſeven dayes, and upon the ſeventh, joyined battel with them, [1 Reg. 20. 26, 29.]
	David having pur to death the Amalekite who profeſſed that he had ſlain Saul, lamented the death of Saul and Jonathan, and of the people of God in a funeral Song, [2 Sam. 1.] And when the companies of the Iſraelites Army came daily flocking to him, [1 Chron. 12. 22.] asking counſell firſt of God, he went up to Hebron with thoſe which were about him and their families : where being anointed King by the men of his own Tribe, when he was now thirty years of age ; he reigned over Judah by the ſpace of ſeven years and fix months, [2 Sam. 2. 1, 3, 4, 11. and chap. 5. 4, 5.]
	Abner, who was formerly the chief of Saul's gendarmery, carrying Iſhbobeth Sauls ſon to Mahanaem, there made him King over the reſt of Iſrael, [2 Sam. 2. 8, 10.] to wit, quietly, and without any quarrel with the houſe of David : as alſo his fathers two years reign is meant of his reign free and uncumbered by the Philiftines ; as was laid before, [1 Sam. 13. 1.]
	David ſent meſſengers to the men of Jabesh Gilead, thanking them for the kindeſſe which they had ſhewed to their Lord and Maſter Saul ; and to let them know, that the kingdom of Juda was ſetled upon him, [2 Sam. 2. 3, 6, 7.] wherein the better to ſtrengthen himſelf, he contracted a ſiſtinity with Tolmai, King of Gethur, and married his daughter Maacah : which bare unto him, Abſalom and Thamar, [2 Sam. 3. 3. and 13. 1.]
2951.	c.	After the two years quiet reign of Iſhbobeth over Iſrael, there grew a long war between his partakers, and the partakers of David : Joab the ſon of Zervia, Davids ſifters ſon, beating up the one ſide, and Abner the other : and ſundry battels and ſkirmiſhes, paſſed between them ; yet ſo, as that Davids party waxed every day ſtronger and ſtronger, and the other weaker and weaker, [2 Sam. 2. 26. and chap. 3. 1.]	3661.	1053.
2952.	a.	Was the eighth Jubilee.
2956.	d.	Abner being uſed with ſome diſgrace by Iſhbobeth, revolted from him, and fell over to David ; and dealt with the chief Men and Heads of Iſrael, to tranſfer the whole kingdom unto David, and this, in the hearing of the Benjaminites, [1 Sam. 25. 44. 2 Sam. 3. 14, 15.]	3666.	1048.
		Michal Davids wife, whom her father Saul after David was fled, had given in marriage unto Phaltiel ; upon Davids demand, was ſent back to him by Iſhbobeth, [1 Sam. 25. 44. 2 Sam. 3. 14, 15.]
		Abner coming with a traine of twenty men unto David, was by him received and feaſted ; and returning from him in peace, was upon the way treacherouſly ſlaine by Joab ; and with great mourning and lamentation made over him by David, was buried at Hebron, [2 Sam. 3.]
		When all Iſrael was troubled at the death of Abner, Bahana and Recab, of the Tribe of Benjamin, murdered their Lord and Maſter Iſhbobeth, as he lay reſting himſelf on his bed in the heat of the day : and bringing his head to David, were for their pains by him put to death, [2 Sam. 4.]
		The Captains and Elders of all the Tribes coming to Hebron, made David now a third time, an anointed King over all Iſrael, [1 Chron. 12. from verſe 23. to the end of that chapter, with chap. 11. 1, 2, 3. and 2 Sam. 5. 1, 2, 3.]
2957.	a.	David with all Iſrael marched to Jeruſalem againſt the Jebuſites ; and there took the Fort of Sion, by the ſpecial ſervice of Joab ; and from thence, that was called The City of David , no leſſe than Bethlehem, where he was borne. And making Jeruſalem the ſeat of his kingdom, reigned there over all Iſrael, the ſpace of 33. years, [2 Sam. 5. 5, 6, 7, 9. 1 Chron. 11. 4, 5, 6, 7.]
		The Philiftines hearing that David was, by the general conſent of the tribes, made King over	3667.	1047.

overall Israel, led their army twice against him to the valley of the Raphans: and were twice beaten by him, [2 Sam. 5. 1 Chron. 14.] where when David, in the time of harvest, desired a draught of water, out of the well at Bethlehem; and three most valiant Captains of his army, to pleasure him, brake through the host of the enemy to fetch it, and brought it to him, to pleasure him, [2 Sam. 23. 13. 1 Chron. 11. 15.]

David built the City of Sion round about, as well the fortification, as the houses within, and Joab repaired the rest of the City, [2 Sam. 5. 9. 1 Chron. 11. 8.]

Hiram lent messengers to David, and cedar wood, and Carpenters and Masons, who built him his house, [2 Sam. 5. 11. 1 Chron. 14. 1.]

The Arke of the Covenant, which in the first Sabbatical year, was brought from Gilgal Shiloh, was this year, being also a fabbatical year, brought from Kirith-jarim (whither it was removed from Shiloh 70 years before) out of the house of Abinadab, thirty thousand choice men out of all Israel, attending on it, and singing the 68 Psalm, as may probably be collected out of the first verse thereof, because taken out of that form of prayer which was appointed by Moses, to be used and sung at every removal of the Arke, [Numb. 10. 35.] and was carried hilt to the house Obed-Edom; and after three months, removed into the City of David, or the fort of Sion, David himself rejoicing before it, and singing that of [Psalm. 132. 8.] which Solomon his son in the year of Jubile next following, when he brought the Arke into the Sanctum Sanctorum of the Temple, repeated, viz. Arise O Lord unto thy resting place, thou and the Arke of thy strength: with the rest there found, concerning the same Arke, [2 Sam. 6. 20. Behold we i.e. the men of Bethlem dwelling thereby] have heard it at Ephraim (our own Country) and found it in the fields of Jair, or the wood; i.e. in the hill of Kirith-jarim, for that signifies a City, bordering upon woods, and again, [2 Sam. 17. 14.] The Lord hath chosen Sion, for an habitation for himself; [saying, This is my rest for ever here will I dwell, for I have a delight therein: whence it is that the Arke is said There to have rested, [1 Chron. 6. 3.] being received into the new Tabernacle which David had prepared for it at Jerusalem, [2 Sam. 6. 17. 1 Chron. 16. 1. 2 Chron. 1. 4.]

For the Tabernacle of the Congregation built by Moses, with the brazen altar, whereon was offered the daily sacrifice, remained at Gibeon (which was likewise in the Tribe of Judah, and layed no longer in Shiloh, which was in the tribe of Ephraim) until the Temple of Solomon was built, [1 Chron. 6. 32, 48, 49. 1 Chron. 16. 39, 40. and 21. 29, 16. 2 Chron. 1. 3, 5, 6. 1 Reg. 3. 2, 4.]

And to the Arke, being removed out of the Tribe of Joseph, which Ephraim was a part, into the Tribe of Judah, Shilo from thence forth lay neglected, [1 Sam. 4. 6, 34, 4. Jer. 12. 14. and Jer. 26. 6.]

David now dwelling in his house of cedar, which he had built, and living in a full and perfect peace, imparted unto Nathan the Prophet, the purpose he had of building a house for God: but was answered from God, that this was a work which he did not, nor by him, because he was a man of blood, and trained up wholly in warlike affairs, but by his son Solomon a man of peace, which should be borne unto him, [2 Sam. 7. 1, 2, 11, 13. 1 Chron. 17. and 2. 2, 8, 9, 10. and 2. 24, 3, 6. and 2 Chron. 6. 8, 9. 1 Reg. 8. 18, 19.] Now the time which passed from hence forward, till the birth of Solomon, was all taken up, and spent in wars; wherein David subdued the Philistines, the Edomites, the Amalekites, the Moabites, the Ammonites, and the Syrians, [2 Sam. 8. 3. 1 Chron. 18.] and the bounds of Israel stretched not only from Shicor in Egypt to Hamath, [1 Chron. 13. 5.] but even from thence to the river Euphrates, and even to the borders of Syria Zoba, [2 Sam. 9. 3.] which was the utmost bound of all that land, which had been formerly promised to the seed of Abraham, [Gen. 15. 18. with Deut. 11. 24. and Jos. 1. 3, 4.] and never possessed by any of them, save only by David, and his son Solomon, [1 Reg. 4. 21, 24. 2 Chron. 9. 28.]

At this time Hadad-ezer, al. Hadar-ezer (for Had and Had are with the Hebrews easily taken one for the other) the son of Rehob, was King of Syria Zoba, and to him was joined Rezon the son of Eliod with his forces out of Syria of Damascus when he was ready to fight against David, nor far from the river Euphrates. But David having first routed Hadad-ezer's army, slew afterward two and twenty thousand of the Syrians of Damascus, and put garrisons upon all that country: but when Rezon saw that David prevailed, he fell off from Hadad-ezer, and commanded, himself in chief, over such forces as he had newly raised; and marching with them to Damascus let up there a kingdom for himself, and his own posterity, who we find, afterward proved very bitter enemies to Solomon, and the rest of the Kings of Israel, [2 Sam. 8. 5, 6. 1 Reg. 11. 23, 24, 25.] out of this battle fought by David near unto the river Euphrates, Nicolas Damascus, in Josephus, [lib. 7. Antiq. c. 6. al. 5.] maketh mention, where he calleth this Rezon Adad; and addeth, that he left this name to defend to his successors to the tenth generation, as Ptolemy did to his in Egypt.

After Naath King of the Ammonites, succeeded Hanun his son: who foolishly abused such messengers, as David or out of kindness had sent to comfort him over the death of his Father.

Against

Against him therefore Joab, sent by David, went and overthrew a huge army of the Ammonites, and Syrians, whom the Ammonites had in pay: and so returned with victory to Jerusalem, [2 Sam. 10. 1 Chron. 19.]

David passing over Jordan with his army, made a vast slaughter of the Syrians, led by Shobach, General of the army of Hadad-ezer, King of Syria Zoba: whereupon followed a peace between David and the petty Kings of Syria: so that they durst no more send aide to the Ammonites: but served him, [2 Sam. 10. 1 Chron. 19.]

At the end of this year, what time kings use to go forth to battle, Joab, going with the army against the Ammonites, besieged Rabbah, the head City of Ammon: whiles David took his ease at Jerusalem, [2 Sam. 11. 1. 1 Chron. 20. 1.] and there defiled, by adultery, Bathsheba the wife of Uriah the Hittite, who was then in the army, and in consequence thereof, procured the husband to be slain by the hand of the Ammonites, [2 Sam. 11.]

When the child for gotten in adultery, was born, David being convinced by Nathan the Prophet of his fault, repented him of his sin, and composed the 51 Psalm, for a memorial of it: yet the new born babe was taken away by death, [2 Sam. 12.]

Bathsheba, being now his wife, bare David a son, unto whom, as to one who should prove a man of peace, God gave the name of Solomon, [1 Chron. 22. 9.] and as to one beloved of God, the name of Jediah, [2 Sam. 12. 25.]

Ammon, David's eldest son, d. flowered his sister Thamar, [2 Sam. 13.]

Ammon two years after that incestuous rape of his, was slain by the setting on of his brother Absalom at the time of these-hearing, [2 Sam. 13. 25.] to wit, at the end of the spring, at the second mow of grain, which was wont to be mowed before corn harvest, a little after the middle of the first month: as Codomanus upon this place noteth, out of [Amos 7. 1. compared with Jos. 3. 15. and Jos. 4. 9. and Jos. 5. 10, 11, 12.]

But Absalom having done the deed, fled away to Geshur in Syria: where he continued 37 as with king Tolmay his grandfather by the mothers side, [1 Sam. 13. 37, 38. and 15. 8.]

Absalom, after three years exile, returned to Jerusalem: his father being then pacified towards him by the speech of the woman of Tekoa, let on work by Joab, [2 Sam. 13. 38. and 14. 1, 2, 3, 4.]

Absalom, having set Joab's barly on fire, a little before harvest this year (for the year following was a fabbatical year, wherein there was no harvest in Judaea) was by his means admitted to his fathers presence, whom he had not seen in two years after his return from exile, [2 Sam. 14. 28, 30, 31.]

This fabbatical year came between the burning of Joab's corn field, and the rebellion of Absalom against his father: in which this rebellion, having gotten chaos, and horses, and a guard of ruffians about him, insinuated himself into the favor of the people, and stole away their hearts from his father David, [2 Sam. 13. 1.]

Fourty years after the anointing of David by Samuel, Absalom, following the advice of his friend counselor Archiphiel, got himself into possession of his fathers kingdom, between Easter and Whitsonide; as Codomanus gathers out of Barzillai his furnishing of David (when he fled) with new fruits, and parched corn, [2 Sam. 17. 28.]

Against the practices of Absalom, and Archiphiel, David composed the 3, and 55 Psalms: Shimai also, of the Tribe of Benjamin, railed upon David, as he fled, [2 Sam. 16.]

Archiphiel seeing his counsel not followed by Absalom, went and hanged himself, [2 Sam. 17.]

Absalom, having lost twenty thousand men, fled, and a bough of a thick oak, catching hold of his long hair, he there hung between heaven and earth, and was thrust through and slain by Joab, [2 Sam. 18.]

After the victory thus gotten, David, by the men of Judah, and one half of the people of Israel, was brought home again; and the Israelites mutin, because they had not had a chief hand in that work, a new rebellion grew thence: which yet was soon over, by throwing the head of Sheba the son of Bichri, over the walls to Joab, by the inhabitants of Abel, [2 Sam. 19. 20.]

The harv of this year failing, there began a famine, which afflicted the land three years, for the blood of the Gibeonites, shed by Saul and his family, [2 Sam. 21. 1, 2.]

The famine still continuing, the Gibeonites, in the beginning of barley harvest, hung up two sons, and five grand-children of Sauls: whole bodies, Ripsa, Sauls concubine, watched, and kept from being devoured by ravenous birds or beasts, till water dropped upon them from heaven, [2 Sam. 21. 8, 9, 10.]

David casted the bone of Saul and Jonathan his son to be removed out of Jabell Gilead, together with the bones of the seven that were hanged, and to be buried at Zela, in the sepulchre of Kith the father of Saul, [2 Sam. 21. 12, 13, 14.]

Many battles were fought with the Philistines and their Giants; in one whereof, David being now old, and fainting in the fight, was like to have been slain by Ishi-benod

The eighth day of the seventh month, (to wit, 30 of our Octob. being Friday, was the first of the seven days of the dedication; the tenth day, (with us, Novemb. 1. upon a Saturday) was the last of expiation or atonement held, whereon (according to the Levitical law, [chap. 25. 9.]) the Jubile was proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet.

The fiftenth day, (our Novemb. 6. being Friday) was the feast of Tabernacles. The 22 (our Novemb. 13. being also Friday) was the last of the feast of Tabernacles; which was always very solemnly kept, [2 Chron. 7. 9. with Levit. 23. 36. and John 7. 37.] and at the day following, (Novemb. 14. being our Saturday) when the Sabbath was ended, the people departed home.

Solomon, in the thirteenth year after the temple was built, made an end also of building his own house, having spent full twenty years upon both of them: whereof seven and a half upon the Temple, and thirteen or twelve and a half upon his own, [1 Reg. 7. 1. and 9. 10. b. and 2 Chron. 8. 1.]

After all which, Solomon offered unto Hiram King of Tyre 20 cities of Galilee, or Cabul, joyning upon the tribe of Ather, (which himself had purchased) in requital of those many good offices which Hiram had done him, toward the building of the temple; which when Hiram refused, he built them all anew himself, and planted colonies of the Israelites in them, [1 Reg. 9. 10. and 2 Chron. 8. 1, 2.]

When Solomon had finished both houses, and the wall of Jerusalem round about, then he removed his wife, the daughter of Pharaoh, out of the city and house of David, into a house, which himself had built, and prepared for her, [1 Reg. 3. 1. and chap. 7. 8. and chap. 9. 24. and 2 Chron. 8. 11.] He new built also Gezer, which Pharaoh the father, having taken from the Cananites, had given to Solomon, lying within the precincts of the tribe of Ephraim, [1 Reg. 9. 15, 16, 17.]

Sebacks, which others call Solonchis (according to our Egyptian Chronology) began to reigns unto whom Jeroboam the son of Nebat fled, and continued with him till after Solomon was dead, [1 Reg. 11. 40. and chap. 12. 2.]

Solomon, having forsaken his lusts and vanities, to which he was too intemperately addicted toward his later days, having testified his deep repentance for it, in his book called The Preacher, and having made his peace with God, [2 Chron. 11. 17.] at last died; when he had reigned 40 years, [1 Reg. 11. 42. 2 Chron. 9. 30.]

Rehoboam the son of Solomon, when all Israel met at Sichem to make him King, by a harsh answer made unto them, alienated the hearts of ten tribes from him, who presently sending into Egypt for Jeroboam the son of Nebat, made him King over them, and under his conduct, they fell off both from the house of David (killing Adoram, whom Jeroboam had sent unto them) and also from the true worship of God, [1 Reg. 12.] In Rehoboam of which sad disaster, the Jews afterward, kept a solemn fast yearly, upon the memorial of which sad disaster, Rehoboam reigned over Judah and Benjamin fifteen years, [1 Reg. 14. 21. 2 Chron. 12. 1, 2.] and Jeroboam over Israel, (i.e.) over the other ten tribes, by the space of 22 years, [1 Reg. 14. 20.]

Rehoboam returning to Jerusalem, levying men to the number of one hundred, and fourscore thousand men, and purposed to make war upon the ten tribes: but being admonished from God by the prophet Semajah, he gave it off, [1 Reg. 12.] though there followed continual wars between the two kings all their days, [1 Reg. 14. 3.]

Jeroboam in the beginning of his reign, repaired Sichem, where he was chosen king by the people, and which had been destroyed by King Abimelech 258 years before, and there dwelt, till going afterward over Jordan, he there built Peniel, [1 Reg. 12. 25. and at last, built Tirza, and made that the seat of his kingdom, [ib. chap. 14. 17.] But fearing lest his new-gotten subjects should happily revolt from him again, he diverted their thoughts from looking any more after Jerusalem, by a new devised form and fashion of religion, setting up two golden calves, the one at Bethel, the other at Dan, for the brain-sick people, to run a whoring after them, [1 Reg. 12.]

JEROBOAM.

Jeroboam, the 15 day of the 8 month, (our Decemb. 6. Monday) at a feast of his own devising, somewhat resembling the feast of Tabernacles among the Jews, upon an idolatrous altar, which he had built, at Bethel, offered sacrifice to his calf, [1 Reg. 12. 32, 33.] At what time, a certain certain Prophet sent by God out of Iury, foretold what judgement one of King Davids linage, Iosias by name, should one day execute upon the Altar, and the Priests that served at it: which Prophecie he then and there confirmed, by signs and prodigies shewed upon that Altar then standing, and upon the King himself, [1 Reg. 13. 2. Reg. 23. 16, 17.] From which beginning of this Idolatrous worship, and publick manifestation of Gods judgement thereupon; we are to reckon the 390. years of the iniquity of Israel, (spoken of in Ezek. 4. 5.)

This Prophet being deceived by another Prophet of Bethel, who abused the name of God unto him: did contrary to the expresse commandment of God to himself delivered, eat meat at Bethel; and was therefore in his return homeward met with and slain by a Lion: whereof when tidings came to the Prophet which had deceived him, he took up the body, and honourably entered it, assisting his sons, that what had been foretold by that other Prophet, should undoubtedly come to pass, [1 Reg. 13. with 2 Reg. 23. 17, 18.]

Jeroboam persisting in his revolt, cast off the Priests that were of the lineage of Aaron and the Levites, and made Priests of the High places, mentaken from among the common people, [1 Reg. 13. 33, 34. 2 Chron. 11. 14, 15. and chap. 13. 9.] whereupon the Priests and Levites, leaving their possessions which they formerly had in those parts: retired into Iury, and were followed thither, by all such out of every Tribe, as let their minds upon the true worship of God; and came to Jerusalem, therto do worship and to sacrifice to the God of their forefathers, [2 Chron. 11. 13, 14, 16.]

The Priests and Levites, and other Israelites, who feared God, falling off from Jeroboam to Rehoboam, maintained the kingdom of Juda three years. For to long walked they in the waves of David and Solomon, [2 Chron. 11. 17.]

Rehoboam, being once settled in his kingdom, took the Law of the Lord, and all Israel and Juda with him, [2 Chron. 12.] For the Jews, who by their good example should have stirred up their brethren the Israelites to repentance, provoked the Lord with their own sins; wherein they offended beyond all that ever their forefathers had done. For they made also to themselves High places, and Images, and Groves, upon every high hill, and under every green tree, doing according to all the abominations of the Gentiles, which the Lord had therefore cast out before them, [1 Reg. 14. 23, 24.]

In the 5 year of Rehoboam, Sebak,

		Isak, King of Egypt, invited perhaps by Jeroboam, (who had formerly lived with him, as I noted before upon the year of the World, 3026.) led an Army of 120. Chariots, and 60000. Horse, with foot innumerable out of Egypt, of the Lubzans, Succerns, and Gultites, into the land of Judea; and having won all the rest of their fenced cities, came at last before Jerusalem: where the King and his Princes, being drawn to repentance, by the preaching of Semaia the Prophet, received a gracious promise of their deliverance indeed: but at a dear rate; for they were to give up to the Egyptians all the treasure of the Temple, and of the Kings house, and all the shields of gold which Salomon had made, instead whereof Rehoboam made them as many brass ones, [1 Reg. 14. v. 25. 2 Chron. 12. 2, 12.]

		Afa hired Benadad King of Syria to come and hinder the building of Rama, which he did; and Afa of the stones and timber which was provided for the building of Rama, built Geba and Mizpa. Also when Haman the Mizraean reproved him, for craving aid of the king of Syria, he cast him into prison, and at the same time, vexed some of his people, [2 Chron. 16.]			At the same time Benadad king of Syria, marched forth against the Cities of Israel, and destroyed Ijon, of the tribe of Asher, and Dan, of Dan, and Abeth-maacah of the tribe of Manasse, and all the coast of Gincereth, with all the land of Nephthali, which made Baasa give over his building of Rama, and resided at Tirza, [1 Reg. 16. 20, 21. 2 Chron. 16. 4, 5. with Esay 9. 1.] Now this Benadad was son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion, [1 Reg. 15. 8.] or of Rezon the first king of Syria, of Damalcus, from whom the name of Hadad, was derived to his posterity, in the kingdom, as Nicolaus Damascenus noteth, recorded by Josephus lib. 7. of his Antiquities, c. 6. al. 5. where, when the said Nicolaus tells us, That the third of that name seeking to wipe of the blot of the overthrow, received in his grandfather's dayes, marched into Judaea, and destroyed Samaria, Josephus understands it, of the invasion made upon Samaria, by Benhadad, in the time of Achab, see before in the year of the world, 2960, and hereafter in the year 3103.

3232. A.				Now after the end of those six months, he was murdered by Shallum the son of Jachish, in the sight of all the people, [2 Reg. 15. 10.] after whole death, followed those direful calamities which were foretold by Amos the Prophet, c. 7. 9. [The High places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel made a wilderness, when I shall arise with a sword against the house of Jeroboam.] Shallum the son of Jabel, reigned one month in the 39 year of Uzziah king of Judah, [2 Reg. 15. 13.] Menachem the son of Gad, going from Tizra to Samaria, slew Shallum, waited Tiplach with the borders thereof, and ripe up all the women that were great with child, [2 Reg. 15. 14, 16.] This Menachem, is by Sulpitius Severus in his 1 Book of his Historia Sacra , termed he Manes ; being the self-same name with Manes, or Manichaeus, that grand heretique, in after times: the name of either importing as much as Paracletus , or a Comforter .

		Prophet sent a gracious message, with a promise of deliverance to him, and destruction to his enemies: And for a sign of his deliverance (when the incredulous King, being bidden to ask what sign he would, would ask none) God made him a promise of a Virgin, that should bear Immanuel; who both in regard of his person, should be Immanuel, God and man; and also in regard of his office, whereby, as the only Mediatour of God and man, [1 Tim. 2. 5.] he should bring to passe, that God should be with us, [Esa. 8. 10.] gracious and propitious to us, and a very present help in trouble, [Psal. 46. 1, 2, 7. with Rom. 8. 31, 32.] which advertisement was most befitting the business then in hand, both in regard that all promises of God in Christ, are Yea and Amen, [2 Corin. 1. 20.] to be fulfilled generally in him, and for him: and besides, for that, the land of Judea, by a special privilege, was to be the land of this Immanuel, [Esa. 8. 8.] wherein, as pertaining to the flesh, he was to be born, not only of the Jews, but also of the very house of David; and that, according to the foretelling of Jacob, [Gen. 49. 10.] before the Scepter should depart from Juda, (i. e.) before Judea should wholly leave off to be a Commonwealth, ruled by a Kingly government; and therefore at that time, the destruction or abolishment of the house of David, or nation of the Jew, was not to be feared; which misery sixty five years after, betided the nation of the Ephraimites, as had been foretold them, by the Prophet Esa. [chap. 7. 8.] As for the utter and final destruction of those Kings who had then banded themselves against him, the Prophet was commanded to foretell it, by bringing forth Shear Jashub his son: and to tell him (after he had declared that great Mystery or Oracle of a God-bearing Virgin, by the motion of his finger, or some other gesture) that butter and honey he should eat, and be nourished thereby, until he came to such an age, as to know the good from the evil; for that before that time, both those Kings should be destroyed each out of his own land, [Esa. 7. 3, 15, 16.] And whereas it fell out at the same time, that Esa. his wife, a Prophetess, bare him another son: by Gods appointment, his name was called Mahershalal-hazbani, importing, that the
		Assyrian should make haste, and take away the spoils: and should plunder both Syrians and Israelites, before the child should be able plainly to pronounce, My father, or My mother. And so the sons of the Prophets were made to serve for signs and documents from God to the Israelites, [Esa. 8. 3, 4, 18.] After these prophecies uttered, Rezin and Pekah, jointly came up to besiege Jerusalem, wherein Achaz then was: but could not take it, as was told before-hand that they should not, [Esa. 7. 1, 7. 2 Reg. 16. 5.] But this wicked Achaz, was no sooner delivered out of this imminent danger, but he forsook God his Deliverer: For he forthwith walked in the ways of the Kings of Israel, and set up the Idolatrous worship of Baal; offered incense in the valley of Ben-Hinnon, and made his own son to passe thorough the fire, and offered sacrifice in the High places, and upon the Hills, and under every green tree, [2 Chron. 28. 2, 3, 4. 2 Reg. 16. 3, 4.] So when Achaz forsook God, God also forsook him: wherefore Rezin and Pekah, dividing their forces, overcame him, which both joined together, they could not do. For God gave him over both into the hands of the Syrians, who, having smitten him, carried away a great multitude of his people captive to Damascus; and also into the hands of the King of Israel, who made a great slaughter of his people, [2 Chron. 28. 5.] At the same time, Rezin subdued Elath, which King Azarias, or Uzias had recovered to Juda, and built it anew, and placed his Syrians therein to dwell, [2 Reg. 14. 22. 2 Chron. 26. 2, 2 Reg. 16. 2.] Moreover the Edomites invaded Juda, and carried from thence many Captives. The Philistines also whom King Uzias, whilst he trusted in God, had subdued, [2 Chron. 26. 6, 7.] now brake in upon the cities of Juda, in the low countries and south parts thereof, and dwelt therein; for God gave them over to the spoils, for Achaz his sin: and because he had drawn away Juda, to forsake the Lord, [2 Chron. 28. 17, 18, 19.] But Achaz took all the gold and silver, that was found in the Lords house, and in the Treasury of the Kings house, and sent it for a present to Tiglath-Pileser King of Assyria, desiring him to come and deliver him	3263. c.

Holca having composed all differences at home, began now quietly to reign in the later end of the 12 year of Achaz king of Juda.

Tiglath-pilezer, or Ninus the younger, when he had reigned 19 years, as hath been noted out of Castor, dyed; and after him succeeded Salmanaſſer, called Evemaſſar, in the Greek copie of Tobias, and this seemeth to be that Shalman, who is said to have laid waſt the house of Ar-bel, (famous afterward for the overthrow of Darius the Persian) in the day of bataille, to wit, the country of Arbela, in the land of Assyria: beneath Arpad; also against this Ho-lea, king of Israel, Salmanaſſer came up, and made him to serve him, and to pay him tribute, [2 Reg. 17. 3.]

thereof: as likewise he forwarned the Moabites of a great calamity to befall them within three years after, [Ezay 15. 1. and 16. 14.] of the fulfilling of which prophecies look what we shall hereafter say, upon the years 3280. and 3284.

Achaz dying, was buried in the city of David, [2 Reg. 16. 20.] but not among the Kings, [2 Chron. 28. 27.]

Ezechias, (his father being dead, and he now at his own disposing) toward the later end of the first year of his reign, in the first month. Abib, opened the doores of the Lords house, which his father had caused to be shut up, [2 Chron. 28. 24.] and commanded the Priests and Levites to sanctifie themselves, and then to cleanse the Temple, [2 Chron. 29. 3, 4.]

And they taking courage here-upon, upon the first day of the first month, (Apr. 21. upon the Sabbath-day) sanctified themselves. And then, according to the Kings command, came to cleanse the house of the Lord; and upon the eighth day of the same month, (28 Apr. being also upon the Sabbath-day) entering into the porch of the Temple, they sanctified the house of the Lord eight dayes; so that upon the sixteenth day of the first month (6 of our May, being Sunday) they finished that work, [2 Chron. 29. 15. 17.]

The next morning, King Ezechia, early in the morning, (May 6 being Monday) called together all the Rulers of the City, and went up into the house of the Lord; wherein, together with the people, by the ministry of the Priests and Levites, he offered many sacrifices upon the Altar of the Lord, with great joy and gladnesse, [2 Chron. 29. v. 20. 26.]

But because the Pascheover could not be kept at the same time when that meeting and the cleansing of the Temple was appointed, because the number of the Priests then sanctified was not sufficient, and the people was not gathered together from all parts to Jerusalem, according to the law, [Numb. 9. 10. 11.] therefore was the Pascheover appointed to be kept, in the second month, whereof notice being given to the people from Beerseba even to Dan; not onely the Jewes, but some also out of the Tribes of Asher, Manasses and Zabulon, (the rest of the Tribes laughing at such warning given) came together in Jerusalem:

lem: where the Idols-altars, and altars of incense being demolished first, and then thrown into the brook Kidron, they killed the Paschal lambs upon the 14. day of the second month (being on our third of June, falling upon a Sunday) then kept they the Feast of sweet-bred 7 days, offering their sacrifices of thanksgiving, and singing praises to the God of their fore-fathers: to which in further testimony of their thankfulness unto God, they added seven dayes more; all which they kept and celebrated with great glee and joy of heart, [2 Chron. 30. 23.]

And when they had finished all things, then all the Israelites, which were there present, about the end of the said second month, went forth throughout all the cities of Juda, and brake down the Images, & cut down the groves, and destroyed the High places and Altars, throughout the whole land of Juda and Benjamin, and even throughout Ephraim and Manasses, until they had finished the work they went about: which done, the Israelites returned every man to his own home, in their several countries [2 Chron. 31. 1.]

But Ezechia went further, and brake in pieces the very brazen Serpent, which Moses had set up, [Numb. 21. 9.] because unto those dayes the children of Israel had burnt incense to it; and in contempt thereof, by a diminutive terme, called it Necushtan, (i. e.) a little piece of brass. And in like manner taking order that the Priests and Levites should serve every of them, in his office, and by turn; he also provided them of victuals and maintenance, by letting on foot again the law of first-fruits and tithes, [2 Chron. 31.]

Whereupon, in the third month, every man brought in, who should bring fastest, their first fruits and tithes, and delivered them to the Priests, [2 Chron. 31. 5, 6, 7.]

In the seventh month, wherein the gathering of the fruits of the whole year was finished, [Exod. 23. 16.] the bringing in of the first fruits and tithes, was fully compleat and ended, [2 Chron. 31. 7.] and officers were appointed by Ezechia for the just distribution of them, [2 Chron. 31.]

For it was not for nothings, that the Assyrian messenger put them in mind of Egypt, saying, Now behold, you trust in the staff of this broken reed Egypt, on which if a man lean, it will go into his hand and pierce it; for even so is Pharaoh, to all such as trust upon him. [2 Reg. 18. 27.] for we finde the same similitude used by God of the Egyptians and Israelites, in Exod. 29. 6, 7. and likewise in Ezra. chap. 30. and chap. 31. many things, spoken against the vain hope which the Jews had of help from Egypt, and among the rest this also, Therefore saith he, shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame, and your trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion, for the Egyptians shall be in ruin, and to no purpose: therefore have I cryed concerning this, Their strength is to stay at home. [chap. 30. 3, 7.]

Sennacherib, returning out of Egypt into Palestine, besieged Lachish, and all his power with him; [2 Chron. 32. 9.] Ezekias sent unto him to Lachish, to buy his peace, and agreed with him for it, at a certain price; wherefore draining all his own treasure, whereof he had formerly been so proud; as also the treasury of the temple; he paid him 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold; but he having received the money, stood not to his word, but sent Tartan, who had now taken Azotus, and Rabliss, and Rablecha with a great army from Lachish to Jerusalem. [2 Reg. 18. 14, 17.]

These coming to Jerusalem, stood at the conduit of the upper pool, upon the high-way of the fullers field, and when they called out to speak with the king Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah; which was over the households, and Shebna the scribe, and Joach the son of Asaph, the Recorder, went fourth unto them. And when they would not deliver up the city, as was desired, Rableah then cried out, that Ezekias did all in vain rely upon God for help, and that he himself came not thither, but as he was sent from God; and having reviled the God of Israel and Ezekias, his servant with many reproachfull languages, he moved at last the people to mutiny and to fall over to his master the king of Assyria. And this they speak aloud, and in the Hebrew tongue; that the people which then stood upon the wall might hear and understand what they said; to frighten and perplex their minds, that in that tumult they might assault and take the city. [Ezra 36. 2 Reg. 18. from 2. 17. to the end of the chapter, 2 Chron. 32. 9, 18.]

Ezekias hearing thereof, rent his clothes, and putting on sackcloth, went into the house of the Lords, and withal, sent Eliakim and Shebna, and with them, the elders of the priests, clothed likewise in sackcloth unto Isaiah the prophet, to pray him that he would ask counsaile of God, in this sad case, and power forth his prayers unto him for help, and the prophet bade him be of good comfort; for that the king of Assyria, should hear a flying report, and thereupon should break up his siege, and get him gone into his own country, and there be slain with the sword; all which forth-with came to passe; [Ezra 37. 1. 17. 2 Reg. 19. 17.]

Rabshakeh, when he could not prevail, returned to Sennacherib, whom he found risen from before Lachish, and besieging Libna, [Ezra 37. 8. 2 Reg. 19. 8.]

Tirhaka king of Ethiopia, did not invade Egypt, and Syria, as Scaliger, without all ground, in his notes upon Eusebius, p. 72. and in his Illogical Canon, pag. 311. would have it; but rather, he sent forces to assist and help the Egyptians and Jews for the Scripture is clear, that he came forth to fight against Sennacherib, [Ezra 37. 9. 2 Reg. 19. 9.] This Tirhaka, Strabo lib. 1. and 15. calleth, Tarcon the Ethiopian; and further reporteth out of Megasthenes, a writer of the affairs of India, that he passed over into Europe; and went as far as Hercules his pillars.

Sennacherib therefore hearing a report of Tirhaka his approach, being ready to remove to Libna, sent his minatory and rayling letters unto Ezekias speaking therein of the God of Israel, as of the gods of the nations, the work of mens hands, which Ezekias opening and spreading before the Lord in his Temple, with many tears powdered forth, craved aide and deliverance from God, against the Assyrians, and received an answer from God by Isaiahs the prophet, that God would defend that city, and that the king of Assyria should not so much as come before it, but should return by the way he came; [Ezra 37. 9. 35. 2 Reg. 19. 9. 2 Chron. 32. 17, 19, 20.]

The very self same night after these things passed at Jerusalem, and a few dayes, after his victory achieved against the Ethiopians, which to have fallen out much about this time, some gather out of the 18 and 20 chapters of Isaiahs, God sent his Angel, and destroyed every man of valour, every commander, and chief man in the Assyrian army, and the next morning there were found one hundred fourscore and five thousand dead carcases lying on the ground: whereupon Sennacherib with shame, brak up, and returned into his own land, and rested him at Ninive; where it came to passe, that as he was at his devotions, before his god Nitroch, Adramelich and Shazerzer slew him with the sword; which done, they fled presently into the land of Ararat, or Armenia; and Efor-haddon his son reigned in his stead, [Ezra 37. 36, 37, 38. 2 Reg. 19. 35, 36, 37. 2 Chron. 32. 21.] All which had been fore-told by the prophet Isaiahs, [Ezra 38. and in chap. 31. 9. allo,] as he conceive,

In the first chap. of the book of Tobia, there are these things found which belong to this story: That Sennacherib, when he came fleeing out of Judea, for the very hatred which he bare to the Israelites, slew many of the Jewes, and that Tobia, or Tobia the elder, stole away the dead bodies, and bestowed burial on them; and that being thereof accused to the King of Ninive, he was faine to get him gone from thence, and to hide his head elsewhere for a certain time: and that he was plundered and spoiled of all his goods, having naught left him to trust unto, save onely Anne his wife, and Tobias his son. That after 45 dayes, or as the Greek copy hath it, before 55 dayes, Sennacherib was murdered by his sons; and that they fleeing away into the mountains of Ararat, Elarchaddon his son reigned in his stead, being wrong named in sundry copies; in some Achirdon, in some Sarchedon; and that the new King let Achicar, the son of Hananel Tobits brother, over all his fathers accounts and his own: in somuch, that he was not onely his Steward and keeper of his accounts; but was also cup-bearer, and privy fecal unto him, and was the second man after the King.

Ezekias had his son Manasse, by Hephziba, after the prolonging of his life 3 years, and 12 before his death.

When the Medes had hitherto now lived without a King, and Dejoces would not attend the judging of their causes and controversies any longer, and thereupon ensued nothing but spoiling and robberies in all places; the people finding the inconveniences of an Anarchie, or want of a King, whereof the least was not, that the Assyrian taking hold of this occasion, had possessed himself of many cities and places in Media; as I noted before upon the year of the World, 3283. they furnished all with one accord to Dejoces, 150. years before Cyrus began his reign: as Herodotus in his first book averreth; whom, giving off Ctesias in this point, both Dyonisius, Halicarnassus, and Appianus Alexandrinus, in the beginning of his Roman Histories, do follow. Though Dionisius Siculus, in his second book: whether thorough failer of memory, or false copying, hath here put Cyaxaris for Dejoces; who is said to have been elected King over the Medes, about the second year of the 17 olympiade, according to Herodotus: For tubduating 150. years from the beginning of Cyrus his reign, which as he supposes, falls in with the beginning of the 55 olympiade, and consequently with the middle of the year, 4154. of the Julian Period: it follows that the 1 year of Dejoces the first King of the Medes must be placed upon the 2 year of the 17 olympiade, and the middle of the 4004. year of the Julian Period; allowing the later end of the second year of the same olympiade, to have been taken up and spent in the transaction of the business itself, and election made of the new King; which first Epocha or point of the beginning of this new kingdom of the Medes to have been most rightly assigned and set down by Herodotus, the precise times of every Kings reign, compared with the Eclipse of the Sun, which betid in the reign of Cyaxares, here underneath, in the year of the World, 3403. to be spoken of, will manifestly declare.

The fifteenth Jubilee, which was the middle-most of all the rest, and the most joyfully kept, next to that of Solomons at the dedication of the Temple; both for the fresh memory of to great a deliverance, and also for the great prosperity of the place ensuing thereupon: So that many brought offerings and gifts to the Lord at Jerusalem; and rich presents to the King himself; for he was magnified after this among all nations; and prospered in whatever he undertook, [2 Chron. 32. 23, 27, 30.]

And God himself did to rule, and govern the people it self of Juda, after such their delivery, that (according to his own promise made) they took root downward, and brought forth fruit upward, [2 Chron. 32. 22. Ezra. 37. 31, 32.] Moreover the consideration of the Jubilee is necessary for the understanding of that sign of Gods mercy given the year before unto Ezekia: Thou shalt eat, saith God, this year, that which groweth of it self, and the second year, that which springeth of the same; and in the third year, low ye, and reape ye, and plant vineyards, and eat of the fruit thereof. [Ezra. 37. 30. 2 Reg. 19. 29.] for because the last years harvest was either gathered by the enemy which roved all the country over, (according to Gods threatenings, Levit. 27. 16. Dent. 28. 33. Jerem. 51. 7.) or by them spoiled and troden underfoot; necessary it was for the people to live that year upon that which grew of it self: and this year by reason of the Jubilee, it was not lawful either to sow or reape, which otherwise, no fabballary year intervening, might well have been done: seeing the Assyrian Army being destroyed by the Angel, there was nothing to hinder them. But the year following, when there was neither enemy to fright them, nor fabballary year to withhold them, they might fall securely to their husbandry as at other times.

Unto Mardocempadus, or Merodach Baladad, after he had reigned 12 years in Babylon, succeeded Arkianus in the 29 year of Nabonaser, and reigned 5 years [Ptol. in Reg. Can.]

Parion in the coast of Hellespont, near unto Lampacus, was built, Euseb. Chron. or rather re-edified by the Milesians and Erythreans, who sent thither a Colony at this time to plant it anew.

Dejoces King of the Medes in the first year of the 18 olympiade, which was this year, built built Ecbaran, as we read in Eusebius his Greek Chronicle; This City in [Exra 6. 2.] is called Acemetha: but by Ctesias in his Periæce, as Stephanus Byzantinus saies, was called Agbaran: a fuller description of which building is to be found [c. 1. of the book of Judith,] where it is said that it was built by Arphaxad King of Medes, and by Herodotus; and other writers it is attributed to Deiojes; whereby it appears, that one and the same name was called by both names; of which matter more will hereafter be said in the year of the world, 3448.

3299. Taracas the Ethiopian, called before in the year of the world 3294. Tihaka reigned in Egypt 18 years: [Africanus.]

3300. After Arkanianus, there was a vacance of a king for 2 years, [Ptol. Reg. Canon.]

3302. Belibus, al. Belithus, and Belclus, held the kingdom of Babylon, 3 years: Ibid.

3305. Apronadius reigned likewise there 6 years, Ibid.

3306. Ezechias was buried in the upper part of the sepulchers of the posterity of David, and all Juda, and the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, did him what honour possibly they could in his death, [2 Chron. 32. 33.] After whom came his son Manasses, and reigned 55 years, [2 Reg. 21. 1.] He again set up the High places, which his father Ezechias had pulled down: he built altars to all the host of heaven in the two courts of the house of the Lord: and made his lion passe the fire in the valley of the Son of Hinom: uttered Divinations and Sorceries and Soothsayings: and set up a molten Image in the house of the Lord: making Juda and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go astray, and do worse than all the Nation; whom God had driven out before the face of the Israelites, [2 Reg. 21. 2, 3, 4.] Chron. 33. 2, 9; and moreover shed much innocent blood; inasmuch that he filled Jerusalem therewith: besides his own sin committed, in making Juda to sin, and to do that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, [2 Reg. 21. 6, 16, and 24. 4.] In which shedding of innocent blood, the death of the Prophet Isaiah is principally remembered, whom he caused to be cut in two pieces with a wooden saw; as the Babylonish Talmud, in their Treatise Moed and Justin Martyr in his Colloquie with Tryphon, Jerome upon Isaiah [c. 20. and 57.] and others of our men, report, who expound that word וַיִּפְּצוּהוּ [Heb. 1. 37.] i. e. Were sawed in pieces, as meant of the Prophet Isaiah: For all which, God threatened that he would break out over Jerusalem, the line of Samaria, and the plumb of the house of Achab: and that he would wipe Jerusalem, as one wipeth so do, when he wipes a dish, and turneth it upside down, [2 Reg. 21. 13.]

3311. Rigibelus reigned over the Babylonians one year, [Ptol. Reg. Can.]

3312. Melissimordacus reigned there likewise 4 years, Ibid.

3316. There was a vacance of a king in Babilon 8 years, Ibid.
Deiojes enlarged the dominions of the Medes, as far as the river Halys, 128 years before the end of Aalyages his reign, as may be gathered out of Herodotus, lib. 1. c. 130.

In the 23 Olimpiade, Heroftraus Naucraticus a merchant of Egypt, coming to Paphos in the Island of Cyprus, is said to have bought there a lile image of Venus, of the bignesse of the palm of a mans hand, and of very ancient workmanship, and that by the power thereof, being miraculously delivered out of a main danger at sea, by virtue of that image, he consecrated the same at Naucratis in the Temple of Venus, with great solemnity; as we find in Athenæus, who was himself a town-born child of the same place, in his 15 book Deipnosophist. But if we will rather believe Strabo, lib. 17. there was no such town as Naucratis then built in Egypt: nor till afterward that it was built by the Milesians, in the time of Cyaxerxes king of Medes, and of Ptolemy king of Egypt, who lived at the same time with him.

3317. Troubles growing in Egypt; there was there a vacance of a king for 2 years, [Diod. Sic. lib. 1.]

3319. After which Egypt was ruled by an Aristocracie of twelve men, which governed that kingdom by Common Council and advice; which government, is by Herod. lib. 2. c. 147. and Diod. Sic. l. 1. said to have lasted 15 years; whereunto Tremellius is of opinion, that that burden of Egypt, spoken of by the Prophet Isaiah, [c. 19.] refers where [v. 5, 6.] speaking of the drying up of the river Nilus, this is also foretold, They shall want of their waters, to run into the sea, so that their river shall be dried up, and turning away their waters, they shall empty and dry up their channels fenced with banks: which out of Herodotus, Tremellius thus expounds, These 12 petty kings, by the labour of his miserable people, shall strive to over-rule the very works of nature, and shall turn away the waters of Nilus: even to lay the channels thereof dry, that they might finish their pond or loath of Marius with their Pyramids and Labrymbs only for their lust and pleasures sake. But Scaliger in his Canon, Isagog. understands it, that there should be there to great a drouth, that their river Nile, in the summer season, should not rise rise nor flow, nor water Egypt as it used to do; and refers this prophetic to the former times of Soi or Sabbacon.

3324. Andrys the son of Gyges, reigned in Lydia the space of 49 years: he took Pryene by force, and invaded Miletus, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 15.]

3327. In Sicily, the City Gela was built, and Phaelis in Pamphilia by two brothers, Antiphemus and Laciis, [Euseb. Chron.] who consulting the Oracle at Delphos concerning a place to plant in; were answered, that the one should faile westward, and the other eastward, as Stephanus Byzantinus in the word Gela, reports, out of Aristænetus his first Commentary of Phaelis. And Heropythus in his book of the Borders of the Colophonians, treating of the building of Phaelis, saith that Laciis, who transported a colony thither, gave unto one Cylabra, a shepherd, whom he met driving his flock to feed, the price of the ground whereon he built his city, in certain poudred provisions, which he required. But Philostephanus in his book entitled, Of the Cities of Asia, delivereth more fully, that Laciis, a man of Argos, one of them which went with Mopliis (the founder of the city Colophos) and whom some call Lindius, brother to Antiphemus the builder of Gela (which Lindius is also said to have been of Rhodes by Herodotus lib. 7. and by Thucydides lib. 6.) and that being left by Mopliis with certain other men, by the Oracle and bidding of Mantus, Mopliis his mother, for that the popes of his Ships were in a tempest split about the Chelidonian Isles, he could not arrive till late at night: and that there he bought the place of ground whereon he built his city, as Mantus had foretold, giving certain salt meats for unto Cylabra the owner of it, such as out of all their ship-provisions he most desired. [Athen. Deipnosoph. lib. 7.]

This year also was fulfilled the prophetic spoken by the mouth of the Prophet Efaiah, [chap. 7. 8.] in the beginning of the reign of Achaz, within sixty and five years Ephraim shall be broken in pieces, so that it shall be no more a people. For although the greatest part of them were carried away by Salmanassar 44 years before, and the kingdom utterly abolished, yet among them which were left, there was some shew of a government. But now they left off to be any more a people, by reason of the great multitude of foreigners which came to dwell there; in comparison of whom, the small remainder of the Ephraimites were counted as nothing; for, that they were not utterly extinct in their own country appears, out of the story of Jolias, [2 Chron. 34. 6, 7, 33. and chap. 35. 18, with 2 Reg. 23. 19, 20.] But there were ever now and anon, new colonies or companies sent out of Babel, Cuth, Hava, and Sepharuaim; which possessing Samaria by way of inheritance, dwelt in all the cities thereunto belonging, [2 Reg. 17. 24.] And that this was so done by Efarachaddon King of Assyria (who was also called, Assuapper the Great, and magnificent) is easie to be understood by the confession of the Cuthites, mentioned, [Exra 4. 2, 10.]

At which time also, as it should seem, and in the same expedition, whereby these things were done in the land of Israel; some of the chief Commanders of the Assyrian Army, made an irrode into Judæa, and there took Manasses the King, as he lay hid in a thicket, and binding him with chains of brass, carried him away captive into Babylon, [2 Chron. 33. 1.] which calamity to falling upon Judæa, some think to have been foretold, by the Prophet Isaiah, where he saith, within sixty five years Ephraim shall be so broken in pieces, that it shall be no more a people. And the head of Ephraim is Samaria, and the head of Samaria, is the son of Remaliah: And if you will not believe, you shall not be established, [chap. 7. 9.] (i.) as Jacobus Capellus hath noted in his Chron. you your selves also shall be broken in pieces. Where he addeth further, that the Jews also in Seder Olam Rabba, and the Talmudists, cited by Rabbi Kimchi, upon, [chap. 4. Ezekiel 12.] do deliver, That Manasses 23 of his reign, was carried away captive into Babylon; and that he repented him of his sin 33 years before his death: after which the Scripture witnesseth, that God again restored him to his liberty and kingdom, [2 Chron. 33. 12, 13.] For that his captivity lasted not long; may be gathered by this, that taking no notice thereof, it is recorded that he reigned 55 years in Jerusalem, [2 Reg. 21. 1. 2 Chron. 33. 1.]

The new inhabitants of Samaria, when as at their first coming thither, they served not the God of Israel, were troubled with Lions: whereof when the King of Assyria was informed, he took order that one of the Priests, which were brought from thence in the captivity should be remanded thither; and he coming thither, made his residence at Bethel, and there taught them how to worship God indeed: but all after the manner of Jeroboams appointment. But when together with the Calf which they found there, they worshipped also their old idols, they are said to have feared God, and not to have

		And unto him succeeded his son Josias, a child of 8 years old, and reigned 31 years [2 Reg. 22. 1, 2 Chron. 34. 1.]
3364.		Thoth of the Isle of Thera, wearied out with their seven years drouth, hired one Corobius, a trader in scarlet, of the City of Iteaus in the Isle of Crete, who had formerly been driven by a tempest into a place called Platea, an Isle of Lybia: and sent him a second time with some of their own country-men, to spic out that Isle: These leaving Corobius there with provision for certain months, returned with all speed, to let their country-men know what they had found: But not returning from thence to Platea, according to the time appointed, he tortured that a ship of Samos, wherein was Malter, one Coleus , coming out of Egypt, put in there, and left Corobius a years provision more for him and his company, and then putting to sea again; and being hurried with a strong wind, was let quite out beyond Hercules his Pillars into the main Ocean; and came unto Tarræus in Spain, Herod. l. 4. c. 151. 152.	4074.	640.
		The Theraens, out of their seven towne taken by lot, so many as should serve for that Colonie, sent them away to Platea, in two ships, under the command of one Battus, otherwise called Aristoteles, or Aristeus, [Herod. lib. 4. c. 151. 152.] Thales the son of Examius, was this year also born at Miletus in Ionia: in the 35 Olympiad: in the first year thereof: as Laertius reports out of Apollodorus his Chronicle.
		The Cimærians, being turned out of their dwellings by the Scythian Shepherds, called Nomades , passed out of Europe into Asia, and keeping on their way by the sea side, came at length to Sardes, where they took all the City save the Castle at what time Ardys the son of Gyges there reigned, [Her. l. 1. c. 15. & 130. and in his 4 book. c. 1. and 12.]
3366.		The Theraens, when they had dwelt in Platea now two years, leaving one of their company behind, failed all to Delphos to know of the Oracle there, what was the cause why things went no better with them than they did, since their coming into Lybia: and answer was made them, that they were not yet come to the City of Lybia, whither they were bid to go, wherefore returning again to Platea, and taking in him whom they had there left, they late them down in a place in the continent of Lybia, over against the Isle of Platea, called Aziristus; environed with most pleasant hills, and a river running under it on either side, [Herod. l. 4. c. 157.]	4076.	638.
		In that place near adjoining to the gardens of the Hesperides, and the greater Syrt, or quicksand, the earth happening to grow moist with a shower of rain of pitch, or sulphur, there presently grew up an herbe called Sylphius or Laler. (i.e.) Beniamin, as the Cyreneans say: which fell out seven years before the building of their city: [Theophrastus in his History of Plants, l. 6. Plin. in his Natur. Hist. lib. 19. c. 3.]
3369.		Phaerates king of the Medes, dyed at the siege of Ninive with a great part of his army. After whom came his son Cyaxares, who reigned 40 years: in the beginning of his reign he purposed to revenge his fathers death, and making first all Asia, as far as the river Halys, fast unto him, he began his war against the Assyrians: [Herod. lib. 1.]	4079.	635.
3370.		Josias, at the 16 year of his age, had a son called Eliakim of Zebudda the daughter of Pedaisa of Ruma: which was 25 years old, when he came afterward first to reign, [2 Reg. 23. 36.]
		Yet he, when he came to be sixteen years of age, and though then a father, yet but a child, began to seek after the God of his father David, [2 Chron. 34. 3.]
		Cyaxares overcame the Assyrians in battle, but when he went to besiege Ninive, a vast army of the Scythians fell upon him, to wit, those Scythians who having driven the Cimærians out of Europe, pursued their point, & departing from the lough of meotis, left the mountain Caucasus on their left hand, and entered Media, under the conduct of their king Madois the son of Prothotia, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 104. lib. 2. c. 1. and lib. 7. c. 20.] which was none other, than Indathyrus the Scythian, which breaking out of Scythia, went over the belly of all Asia, till he came into Egypt; as Strabo, in the entrance of his Geography, reports out of Megasthenes, and Arrianus in his book, of the affaires of Judea, being of the same name with that Indathyrus, against whom Darius the son of Hytaspes afterward made such an unlucky voyage, as we read of in Herod. l. 4. c. 76. 126. 127. Here then the Medes being overthrown in battle by the Scythians, lost the sovereignty of Asia; to which the Scythians held for 28 years after. [Herod. lib. 1. c. 104. and lib. 4. c. 1.] To which Tremellius and Junius refer that prophetic of Nahum, [c. 2. 5.] He (to wit, Cyaxares, besieging Ninive) shall reckon up his great men; but they shall fall in their perambulation: to wit, in the perambulation of the Scythians: whose coming at this time into Asia might well be termed a perambulation, or sodain passing through, rather than any settled government or kingdom in Asia; as those who in the space of 28 years over-ran, possessed, and lost Media, Assyria, and all Asia, They shall hasten in his wall, as if they would be his Protectors, (i.e.) They shall come hastily to Ninive, as if they had delivered it out of the hand of Cyaxares, and would deliver it.
3371.		In this year was born unto Josias, Shallum or Jehoachaz, by Hamital the daughter of Jeremias of Lybna, for him, being 23 years old, did the people (putting by his elder brothers) make king in his fathers room, [2 Reg. 23. 30, 31.] The name of Shallum, as it	4801.	633.

		it seemeth, being, for good lucks sake, changed into Jehoachaz, which otherwise had been the same with Shallum the son of Jabelh, who, having reigned not past one month, was murdered by Manabemus, [1 Reg. 15. 13, 14.] for of four sons which Josias had mentioned, [1 Chron. 3. 15.] it is manifest, out of [Jeremy 21. 1, 12, compared with 2 Reg. 23. 30, 31.] that this Shallum is last named; nor Johannes the first born, as some have imagined; for that Jehoachaz was not the first-born is easily gathered, because it is said, that he was anointed by the people, [2 Reg. 23. 30.] because the first born of kings, were not wont to be anointed, upon whom the kingdom by common right descended; and also, by his age of 23 years, of which he is said to have been, at the time of his anointing, detecting that when his brother Eliakim, was at three months end set in his place, he is said to have been 25 years old, whereby it is manifest, that he was elder than this Jehoachaz, and so Josephus, in his tenth book of Antiquities, cap. 6. al. 7. affirms.
3373.		Sadyattes the son of Ardys, reigned in Lydia 12 years, Herodot. lib. 1. cap. 16.	4083.	631.
		Thoth Scythians, having gotten all the upper Asia, went straight into Egypt, unto whom, when they were come as far as Syria Palestina, Plamitichus the king of Egypt came in person, and what by entreaty, what by gifts and presents, wrought to far with them, that they went no further that way. But when in their return they came to Alkanon, which is in Syria, the greatest part of the army passing a lough without hurt doing, some straglers coming in the rear, robbed the Temple of Venus Urania , whose posterity were ever after stricken with the Emmerods, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 105.] But this year, which was the second of the 37 Olympiads, those Scythians invaded Syria Palestina; as Eusebius in Chron. notes, as also that Sinope, was this year built; which being the chief city, in all the Kingdom of Pontus, was built by the Milesians, as Strabo in his 12. book. lib. 1. but by Macritus of the Isle of Coos, as Phlegon says, cited by Stephano de Tribibus, in Sinope. But sure enough it is, that the Cimærians, coming into Asia, when they fled from the Scythians, built Cherfontes, in the place, where Sinope a city of the Grecians now standeth, Herod. l. 4. c. 12.
		The men of Thera, in the 7 year after they were feared, and had dwelt in Aziristus, by the persecution of the Libyans, removed from thence, and went to a place called Itrusa , and there feared themselves, near to a fountain, which was called after Apollos name, [Herod. lib. 4. cap. 158.] and there Battus, having built a city, which was called Cyrene, in the second year of the 37 Olympiads, reigned 40 years, and after him his son Arcesilaus, 16 years, with those of the first plantation only; but afterward in the reign of Battus the second Arcesilaus his son, there went thither a great multitude of other Greek, stirred up thereto, by the oracle of Delphos, at what time Apyras reigned among the Egyptians, [Herod. lib. cap. 159.] which concurrence of the reign of this Egyptian King, sheweth, that what I have laid of the time, when the city of Cyrene was built, is much truer, than what others have variously written of it.
3374.		Josias in the 12 year of his reign, began to cleanse Juda and Jerusalem from that filth of Idolatry, wherein they had so long lain, and from the high places and groves, and altars of Baal, with the images which were openly placed on them, destroying their graven and molten images, and burning the bones of their priests upon their own altars, and then proceeding to their cities of Manasses, Ephraim and Symeon, as far as Nephthali, he threw down all the altars and groves, and graven or carved images; and all their statues, which stood without doors, did he demolish and deface, throughout all the land of Israel, [2 Chron. 34. 3, 7.]	4084.	630.
3375.		Jeremias, in the 13 year of king Josias, was called by God to his prophetic function; but refused to take it upon himself, being called thereto the second time, & strengthened with all by sundry promises, and signs belonging to the office and function of a prophet, he was bid to fore-warne the Jews, of the calamitic, which was to be brought upon that place, by the king of Babylon, [Jer. 1. 2. 17. with c. 28. 3.] to whom was also joined the prophet Zephany, and others, all who sought to move that rebellious people, to repentance, but could not, [Zeph. 1. 1. Jer. 25. 3, 4, 5.]
3378.		Prusias, or Prusa was built in Bithynia, [Euseb. Chron.]	4088.	629.
		Nabopolassar of Babylon, who was made General of the army by Saraco, al. Chinadannu king of Assyria and Chaldaea, and Atyages, who was made Governour of Media, by his father Cyaxares, entering now into affinity, by Atyages, his giving his daughter Amytis in marriage unto Nebucadnessar the son of Nabopolassar, joyned their forces together, and took the city of Nineve, and therein Saraco the King, (as we gather out of a fragment of Alexander Polyhistor (misunderstood by Georgius Symblicus, who cites it in Græc. Scalig. p. 38. 39.) And as we also find in the end of the book of Tobit, in the Greek copie, that Nabuchodonosor, al. Nabopolassar, and Assuerus, al. Atyages, called also Assuerus, [Dan. 9. 1.] whilst Tobit the younger was yet living, who when Salmanassar took Samaria, being together with his father, by Salmanassar carried away into Assyria, is said to have lived to the age, of 127 years, whereas 95 years passed, from the captivity of Israel, unto this time, and so, Josias yet reigning, (as Jerom also, in his commentaries upon the prophet Jonas affirms) Nineve was destroyed, and the prophecies both of Nahum and Elay, concerning the destruction of Ninive, were fulfilled, whereof as of a thing already already come to pass and done, there is a most elegant description in the 31^{ch.} of Ezekiel.

Saracus therefore being now dead, Nabopolassar took into his hands the kingdom of Chaldaea, as Polyhistor, expressly says; which he held by the space of 21 years, as Berosus, in his third book of the Affairs of Chaldaea; and Ptolomy, in Reg. Can. affirms.

Sadyattes king of Lydia, invaded the territory of the milesi-ans, with his army, and continued that war for six years space.

Josias in the 18 year of his reign, gave charge to Hilkiah the high priest, that with the money which had been collected, he should repair the house of the Lord, and he falling on his hands there-with, found the original book of the law, which was at the first laid up in the side of the Ark of the covenant, Dem. 31. 26. And which seemeth to have been missing ever since the beginning of Manasse's reign: and having found it, lent it by Shaphan the scribe, to the king. Josias, having heard the book read all over to him, asked counsellors thereupon of Huldah the prophetess; who foretold him that that kingdom should certainly be destroyed; yet not while he lived: 2 Reg. 22. 3. 20. 2 Chron. 34. 8, 25. And he caused the book of the Law to be read over before all the priests and prophets, caused that book of the Law to be read over before all the people, renewed the covenant, between God and the people; and again, 2 Reg. 23. 1. 2. 14. 2 Chron. 34. 29, 30. demolished the altar and high place, which were before the house of the Lord, and caused to be burnt the bones of the priests upon the altar, as had been expressly foretold it should come to pass: 2 Reg. 23. 10. And when he had taken away the altars which were in the cities of Samaria, and had slain all their priests, and had burnt their bones upon the altars, he then returned to Jerusalem, 2 Reg. 23. 15, 20. And from this solemn renewing of the covenant, and general reformation of religion, joynning therewith, that invariable decree of desolation, which was to endure for the sins of the people, is deduced the Epocha, or beginning both of the 30 years, spoken of in the first of the prophetic of Ezekiel, and also of the 40 years of the iniquity of Judah, c. 4. 6. of the same book.

prophets in the family 8 years of his reign, toward the end thereof, 14 day of the first month (Chor Mayā, being munday) in the presence of all Juda and Israel, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, kept the feast of the passover, with more solemnity, than ever had been done by any of the kings of Italo or Juda in former times; [2 Reg. 23, 21, 22, 23; Chir. 35, 1, 9.] to conclude, he took away all witches and sooth-sayers, all Images and Jung-heils gods, and all the abominations, which were found in the land of Juda, &c. in Jerusalem, that he might performe all the words which were written in the book that was found by Hilkia the priest, in the houle of the Lord; [2 Rg. 33, 24; with Den. 28, 90, 107]

Toward the later end of the 5 year of Nabopolassar, (which is the 127 from the Epoch of Nabonazsar), upon the 27 day of the month Athyr, of the Egyptians, drawing in on to the 28 thereof, the moon entered into an Eclipse at Babylon beginning 5 measure hours after midnight; Ptol. Syntax. p. 125, in the Greek edition, to wit, 22 of April, according to the Julian Calendar, falling on a Saturday, or the 27 of Athyr, drawing to an end which was Friday, for that is Ptolemy's meaning, when he saith, that it was from 22 of the month (i. e., from the 27 to the 28, being in all, fix measure hours after midnight) to the full-tine, when the 28 day was to begin.

Hamutula bare unto Josiah, after Shallum, or Jehoachaz, Mattania also, who was afterward called Sedechias, for he was 21 years old when he began to reign, [Jer. 21
2 Reg. 24. 17, 18.]

Xenophanes Colophonius, chief of the sect, of the Eleatic discipline in Philosophy, (i.e.) was begotten as Elms Empiricus saith, in his first book, contra Mathematicos, 12, or επιστην, as is more rightly related out of Apollodorus, cited by Clemens Alexand. Strommat. (i.e.) was born in the 40 Olympiade.

After Sadyattes, his son Halyattes, the younger reigned in Lydia 57 years, of which he spent the first 5 years in prosecuting the war which his father had commenced against the Persians.

Jehojakim son of Josias, had a son, by Nechushta, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem, called Jehojakim, also Jeconiah, who was 18 years old when he began to reign. [2 Reg. 28.8.]

Neco, the son of Psammichus, reigned in Egypt 16 years. [Herod. l. 2. § 9.] who in the first year of his reign, sent his army to the Red Sea, to the mouth of the Nile, to the gulf of Arabia, in which work he spent the lives of 120 thousand Egyptians. But giving that work off in the midst of it, he sent certain Phœnicians, to sail round about Africa, and they setting sail out of the gulf of Arabia, or the Red-sea, went into the southern sea; and compassing about the coast, came at length, into the straits of Gibraltar, and to returned into Egypt, in the third year after they set out. [Herod. l. 1. c. 158. and lib. 4. cap. 52.]

In the 12 year of the war between the Lydians and the Milesians, when the Lydian army had burnt the harvest of the Milesians, as commonly every year they did it happened, that the flame, driven by force of the winde, caught in the Temple of Minerva Ailejus, and burnt it to the ground, and when at the return of the Army, Halyattes, w fallen sick, and lay long of it; at length, he sent to consult the Oracle at Delphos, and had answered him, made him by the prophetic there, that until he had repaired the Temple, which his men had burnt, he should get no answer there. Tharabulius, understanding what answer was made at the Oracle, by Perander the son of Cypheulus, tyrant at Corinth, with whom he was very inward; took order that at the coming of Halyates his Ambassadors about that matter, all the Milesians should dispose themselves to all kind of officiating and merriment: whereupon Halyates supposing that there was no want of any thing, but rather great abundance of all provisions; made a peace & a league of friendship with them; and instead of one temple which was before, he built up two temples of Minerva at Aethlus: and having thereupon recovered his health, sent rich presents and offerings unto Delphos. [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 19. 20, 22, 23, 24. with Polyannus, lib. 6. Strabo.]

Was the 17. Iulid.

Anaximander Milefius, the son of Praxidemus, was born in Ionia. See hereafter in the year of the World, 3457.

Neco king of Egypt, by Gods command went against the king of Assyria, who at that time made war upon him, to besiege Carchemish upon the River Euphrates, [2 Reg. 23, 29, 2 Chron. 35, 20, 21, 22,] or, as Josephus barhi is: to fight against the Medes and Babylonians, who had overthrown the Empire of the Assyrians, [ib. to, Antiq. cap. 6.] And indeed that Carchemish, in the time of Sennacherib did belong to, and was possessed by, the Assyrians, appears in [Ezay 9], but that kingdom being ruined & it returned into the hands of the Babylonians: And as the king of Persia, having overcome Babylon and Assyria, [Ezra 6, 22.] was called king of the Assyrians; so here the king of Babylonia, having now gotten Assyria, was likewise called king of Assyria: besides that, Heaven authors also tell us, that Babylon was in former times part of Assyria, and the holy Scriptures teach us, that the kingdom of Chaldaea was founded by the king of Assyria, [Ezay 23, 13. See Num. 24, 22, Ezay 52, 4. Nehem. 9, 22.]

Iofias, unadvisedly engaging in this war was slain, (2 Reg. 32.29, 30, 2 Chron. 32.22, 23), in the valley of Megiddo, which belonged to the tribe of Manasse (1 Sam. 31.1, 1 Judg. 5.1, 7), to which that story of [Herald, p. 2], refers, where his faith, Σωτηρις πάλαι Νεκρός συλλαβήναι in Μαγδόλη, signifies: πάλαι πάλαι, Καὶ πάλαι πάλαι Σούρις, ἀφ' ὧν καλεῖται ὁ τόπος. (1) Necos falling upon the Syrians with an army of foot, overthrew them in Magdala, and after the fight took Cadytis a great city of Syria: where learned Scaliger noteth, that this Kadytis was Kaddel, mentioned in [Num. 20.16]; and conceives that Magdala and Megiddo, stood near together: but because Magdala was the more noted place of the two, therefore that fight was said to have been there: as the battel fought by Alexander against Darius at Gaugamela, is commonly said by Writers to have been fought at Arbela, because Gaugamela was an obscure place. But what will we say, if Magdala and Megiddo were all one? and mean the place from whence that other Mary took her surname of Magdalen; for certain it is that in [Mat. 15.39], where we read Magdalenā, the Syrian renders it Magdala; and the old Latine translation, Magdenā: a name not much varying from Magdolo,

The good King being thus taken out of the world, whose life only kept off the Babylonish captivity from that nation, [2 Reg. 22, 20.] a world of mileries growing on upon it, the late years Iudible was turned this year into lamentations: so that it grew almost into a common proverb, The Lamentation of Haddadimmon in the valley of Megiddo, [Zachai, 11.] For not only the whole people which was then living wonderfully bewailed the death of Iofias; but even in after-time, a publick mourning for him was voluntarily kept, as if it had been ordained by a law: the Prophet Jeremy almo in remembrance thereof, wrote his mourning Song of Threnes, or Lamentations, [2 Chron. 35, 24, 25.] wherein bewailing the calamities which were shortly to befall that people, as if he had then presently beheld them, in a most paffionate manner, and pointing as it were, with his finger, at the death of Iofias; as at the source and original of all ensuing miseries, he useth these words: The breath of our nostrils, she anointed of the Lord, is taken in their pits: of whom we said, under the shadow of his wings we shall live among the heathen, [Lament. 4, 20.] So that we may very justly question the first verse, or proeme of that book; which we find in the Greek and vulgar Latine translation: but contrary to Jeromes mind, prefixed before the Threnes or Lamentations of Jeremy; to wit, *And as came to pass after this, I Iofias was carried into captivity, and Jerusalem was laid waste, and the people were scattered abroad, and the Temple was destroyed, and the city was burned, and the people were mourning, and the people were weeping, and the people were crying, and the people were howling, and the people were beating their breasts, and the people were saying, which who have made, should have remembered that saying of the Wife-man, Adde nos to his words, that he blame thee not, and thou be found a liar, [Prov. 30, 6.] There was also a second Song of Lamentations for the miserable condition of the kingdom of the Jews, after the death of Iofias, compiled by the Prophet Ezechiel, and appointed to be sung, [Ezech. 1, 1, 14.]*

After the death of Jolia, the people, fearing lest the King of Egypt should invade the kingdom in the vacancy of a king, anointed his youngest son Shallum or Jehoachaz, to be their king : And he presently fell to doing of that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: even as his forefathers had done, [2 Reg. 23, 30, 31, 32. 2 Chron. 36, 1.] See before in the year of the World, 3371. Azzur removed Shallum from the throne.

fore in the year of the World, 3371. ¹
Neco at his return from his voyage into Assyria, removed Shallum from the throne, when he had reigned only 3 months, and made Eliakim his elder brother King in the room of his father Josias, changing his name into Jehoakim. [2 Reg. 23. 31, 32, 34. 2 Chron. 36. 2, 3, 4.] that thereby he might testify to the World, that he ascribed the victory by him gotten against the Assyrians to the Lord Jehovah only, as he formerly professed that it was he by whom he was sent against him, [2 Chron. 35. 21, 22.] and then imposing a tribute of one hundred talents of silver, and one talent of gold upon the land of Juda: he put Shallum or Jehoakim in fetters at Ribla, and carried him away with him prisoner into Egypt, where also he ended his dayes, [2 Reg. 23. 33, 34. 35. 2 Chron. 36. 3, 4. Exech. 19. 3, 4.] God's appointment to Shallum, the new Kings Pa-

The Prophet Jeremiah, going by Gods appointment to Shallum, the new Kings Palace, earnestly moved both him, and his Courtiers, and all the people, what with promises, what with threats from Almighty God, to a newness of life: foretelling them, that Shallum or Jehoiachim should be carried away captive into Egypt, laying, weep not for him that is departed (meaning Jolia) nor make lamentation for him; but weep for him that is to depart: (that is Shallum) because he shall return no more to see his native soil, [Jer. 22, 1, 2, to 13, 1, 2.]

2, 10, 11, 12.] In the beginning of the reign of Jehojakim, Jeremy, commanded by God, went and stood in the court of the Temple, and there exhorted the people (assembled out of all the cities of Judah) to bow themselves there before the Lord, it being then the feast of Tabernacles, wherein all the males out of the cities were bound to appear at Jerusalem, Deut. 16, 16. to repentance, saying, That that House should become as Shilo: and that city should be as Jerusalem among all the nations of the earth: Whereupon, he was presently apprehended by the Priests and Prophets, and all the people that were then in the court; and accused as a man worthy of death: but was acquitted and set at liberty by the public judgment of the Princes and Elders [Jer. 26, 1, 2, 19.]

lick judgment of the Princes and Elders, [Jer. 20, 1, 2, 19.]
Uriah also the son of Shemaiah, of Kirath-jearim, prophesied against Jerusalem, and the land of Judah, agreeably to the sayings of the Prophet Jeremy; and when Jehoiah king the King fought to put him to death, he fled into Egypt. But the King sent after him Eliahthan the son of Achor, and others with him who overtook him, and brought him back to the King, and he put him to the sword, and threw his carcass among the vilest sepulchres of the common people; yet Ahikam, [2 Regs. 22, 12, 2 Chron. 34, 20.] formerly been a man of great authority with king Jolia, [2 Regs. 22, 12, 2 Chron. 34, 20.] tickled so well for the Prophet Jeremy, that he was not delivered over into the hand of the people to be put to death, [Jer. 26, 20, 24.]

To this I might add the Prophet Habakkuk; to whom, when he complained of the subburrance of the Jews, God made this answer: That be would shortly fend the Chaldeans into Judea; and further declared his purpose concerning that matter, in these words, I will do a work in your days, which you will not see when it shall be told unto you: For behold I will stir up the Chaldeans, a fierce nation, and a swift: which shall walk thorough the breadth of the land, to possess a land which is none of theirs: at their own inheritance, [Habakkuk, i. 5, 6.]

[Habakkuk 1. 5, 6.]
In the beginning also of the reign of Jehojakim, Jeremy also foretold that Sedechia should be king of Juda, and Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon; and that he should subdue the neighbouring nations to his dominions; [Jerem. 27. 1, 12.]

3397. [¹ cap. v. 1. of the Prophet Isaiah, who wrote with his father in the kingdom, the things which he was to act, were, preludely, revealed unto jeremy: the first whereof was the overthrow of the Egyptians, the first at the River Euphrates, then in their own country, and that Nebuchadnezar should make him self master of it. [Jer. 46.] The first whereof came to passe almost immediately; Pharao Neco his force, which he led at Carchemish being cut off by Nebuchadnezar King of Babylon, in the 4 year of Jehoiakim, [Jer. 46. 2.] The second was not till after the taking of Tyre, in the 27 year of the captivity of Ieconia. [Ezek. 29. 17, 18, 19.]

In the felfe fame 4 year of Jehojakim reuolving the Jewes, for not harkening to the word of the Lord, which from time to time he had spoken to them, from the 13 year of King Jofia, euen to that preſent 4 year of Jehojakim; this, ſaith he, is 23 years; and for that they had ſhedwed themſelues ſtubborne and refractory to the admonitions and exhortations tions of himself, and all the other Prophets which the Lord had sent unto them : and then again told them of the coming of N-buchadnezar upon them, and of their being carried away slaves to Babylon, and that captivity to last 70 years long [which term the Jews first, then the other nations there mentioned every one in his order, were to serve the King of Babylon : and that at last the kingdom of Babylon it self, should be destroyed, and the land of Chaldaea exposed to desolation, [Jer. 25, 12, 13, 14, 12.] of which 70 years mention also was long before made by the Prophet Eliaha, though more obscurely, when he spake of the destruction of Tyrys, [Esa. 23, 15, 17.]

In the year of Jehoiakim, Baruc the son of Neria wrote in a book from the mouth of the Prophet Jeremy, all the words of the Lord which he had spoken to him concerning Israel and Juda, from the time of Josiah until that day: and he read them in the house of the Lord, in the audience of the men of Jerusalem and of all the Jews which were there assembled out of all their cities, in the day of the fast, [Jer. 36. 1, 8.] to wit, of that solemn fast which was yearly kept upon the 10 day of the 7 month, [Levitic. 23. 29, & c. 23. 27. & Num. 29. 7.] five days before the feast of Tabernacles; wherein all the males out of all the cities of judca, were to appear at Jerusalem: as I have shewed before in the year of the World 3399. As for Baruc himself, who was extremely amazed and afflicted in his soul, with the horror of these direful judgements which he had written, the Prophet comforted him, by the word of the Lord; over this calamity which was to be brought upon all flesh by the Babylonians, and assured him of his owne life, in the midst of all these troubles, [Jer. 45. 1, 5.] whereunto also perhaps all those consolatory speeches contained in 30 and 31 chapters of the same Prophet, and promises made concerning the reformation of the Church, may be referred.

The Rechabites, of the posterity of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, [2 Reg. 10. 15, etc.] when Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon approached now unto Judea, for fear of the bolt of the Chaldeans and Syrians, leaving their tents (wearing, by the rule of their conscience) a yoke, they were wont to remain and dwell) came into Jerusalem [Jerem. 35. 1-13] whence (seeing they speak of the present time; so we do now remain in Jerusalem) we gather, that the matter of this chapter which concerns the Rechabites refusing to drink wine, was in agitation, at what time the city was besieged round, by Nebuchadnezzar, [Dan. 1. 1-2].

[Dan. 1. 1.] God therefore gave up Jehojakim the King of Juda, into the hands of Nebuchadnezar King of Babylon, with part of the furniture of the Houſe of the Lord, [Dan. 1. 2.] to wit, in the 9 month called Ciffu: as may be collected out of the anniversary faſt, which in remembrance, as it ſeemeth, of this calamity, by a received cuſtom of the Jews, [Zachar. 7. 3. 5. and chap. 8. 19.] was kept in this month, [Jer. 39. 9.] Nebuchadnezar put Jehojakim at firſt in chains, to carry him away to Babylon, [2 Chron. 36. 6.] but afterwards upon ſubmiſſion, and his promiſes of ſubjection, he let him in his own houſe: where he lived his ſervant 3 years. From which entering of the King and people of the Jews into the ſubjection and ſervice of Nebuchadnezar, are the 70 years of the captivity of Babylon to be reckoned, which were foretold by the Prophet Jeremy, [Jer. 25. 11, and c. 29. 10.] ſuch of theſe things as paſſed there

Nebuchadnezzar gave order to Aliphanai the overseer-of the eunuchs, or pages, that he should carry from among the children of Israel, both of the blood-royals, (as was expressly foretold by Elyas the Prophet to Ezechia it should come to pass, Efay 39:7.), as also of the noblett families, the choicest boys, both for beauty and wit, that he could find, which being by his care educated 3 years in the language and sciences of the Chaldeans, might be thought afterward fit to stand before the King, and serve in his Palace: among whom of the tribe of Juda, were Daniel, who was Bel-shazzar, Hananiah, who was Shadrach, Mithael, who was Melchiah; and Anania, who was Abdenago: every of them having his name changed at the discretion of the overseer, or matter of the Eunuchs, [Dan. 1. 3, 7.]

Now after those Scythians of whom I spake before, had taken their pleasure in Afia 28 years, Cyaxares and the Medes feasting them, and making them all drunk upon a certain day, cut all or the greatest part of their throats, [Herod. lib. i. ca. 106.] Besides which, certain other Scythians of the Nomades or Shepherds, being driven out of their own country by a contrary faction, had been entertained by Cyaxares, and by him employed, partly in hunting, partly in the educating of children: who being roughly and basely used by him, and also, as it seems, repining at the general malice of their other country-men, killed one of the boys which they had taken to educate and instruct; and dressing the flesh of him for venison, let it before Cyaxares and his guests to eat: which done, they fled away speedily to Halyattes the King at Sardes, and put themselves under his protection; whom when Cyaxares demanded to be given up unto him, and Halyattes refused to deliver them, there grew a truce of war between the Medes and Lydians, which lasted five years, [Herod. lib. i. ca. 73-74.] As for the Cimmerians of whom I spake before in the year of the World, 3368, Halyattes himself drove them out of all Afia, [Herod. ib. ca. 16.]

In the 9 month of the 5 year of Jehoiakim, there was a solemn fast before the Lord proclaimed to all the people at Jerusalem, in remembrance, as it seemeth, of the taking of the city by the Chaldeans the year before in the same month. Where Baruch standing at the gate of the House of the Lord, read all the words of the Lord, which he had taken from the mouth of Jeremy the Prophet, out of a book, in the audience of all the people, who were then assembled at Jerusalem, called Baruch unto them; heard him read being advertised by Micah the son of Gemaria, called Baruch unto them; heard him read the same book, and for fear of the King, advised Jeremy and him, to hide themselves out of the way: But the King himself, having heard some part of the book read unto him, first cut the book thorough with a pen-knife, and then hurled it into the fire, that was in the chimney, and burnt it, [Jer. 36, 9, 23.] in memory of which detestable act of the King, the Jews to this day keep a fast, upon the 7 day of the 9 month called Caphu.

And Jehoiakim, having burnt the book, gave order to Jerahmeel his son, and to Seraia the son of Azriel, and to Shelemia the son of Abdiel, to apprehend Baruch the Writer, and Jeremy the Prophet: But God hid them, and against that impious King and his kingdom, pronounced this sentence. Thou hast burnt this book, saying, Why hast thou written therein, that the King of Babylon shall surely come, and shall lay waste this land, so that there shall no man nor beast remain therein? Therefore thus saith the Lord concerning Jehoiakim King of Judah: There shall none of his sit upon the throne of David; and his carcass shall be thrown out and exposed to the forcing of the day, and freezing of the night; and I will shall be thrown out and exposed to the forcing of the day, and freezing of the night; and I will punish the wickedness of him and of his seed, and servants: and I will bring upon them, and upon punish the wickedness of him and of his seed, and servants: and I will bring the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and upon all the men of Judah, all the evil which I said I would bring upon them: to wit, in that book, which they had burnt. Afterward by Gods appointment, Baruch wrote again from the mouth of the Prophet Jeremy, the same words, which he had written in the former, adding many like things thereto, [Jer. 36, 26, 32.]

Nebuchadnezzar, following the point of his victory gotten, took from the Egyptian all that ever he possessed, between Egypt and Euphrates: so that from thence forwards, Neco was faine to keep himself within his own bounds of Egypt, [2 Reg. 24, 7.] Mean while his father Nabopolassar, falling into infirmities, in the land of Babylon, died: when he had reigned 21 years. Which no sooner came to Nebuchadnezzars care, but he giving order for the bringing away of the captives, as well of the Jews, as others: Syrians, Phœnicians, and Egyptians, to Babylon, with the army and baggage; posted with a small company the nearest way thorough the desert, and came to Babylon before them; who being received as sole Lord, of all his fathers large Dominions, he disposed the captives, when they were brought, here and there, by way of colonies as he thought fit, [Ezra's lib. 3, of the affairs of Chaldeans,] of the vessels also and other furniture of the Temple Nebuchadnezzar, took away with him to Babylon what he thought fit and disposed of them in the temple of his god, [Dan. 1, 2, 2 Chron. 36, 7.] to wit, Belshazzar whom he called his Progenitor; as Abdenus in his Assyrian History, and Berosus also tells us, that he did wonderfully enrich and adorne that Temple, with the spoils which he had taken in that war.

The remainder of the Scythians, which had escaped the slaughter of the Medes returning home, were met by a great army of lusty young-men, which had been begotten on their own wives, in their long absence, by their slaves: with these they fought many a sharp battle: but at last, laying aside their swords, they took every man a whip in his hand, as more proper for the correction of slaves, and thereby made them all to flee. [Herod. in the beginning of his 4 book.]

Jehoiakim, when he had lived 3 years in subjection to the King of Babylon, according to his allegiance, fell off and rebelled against him, [2 Reg. 24, 1.]

Daniel and his three followers, when, restraining the diet provided them of the Kings allowance, they dined onely of pulse and water; yet were they found to look more lively and fair of complexion, than the rest which did eat of the Kings fare. And when at the three years end, they were brought to Court to attend the King, they appeared in all matters of knowledge, wisdom, and sciences, which the King was pleased to ask them in, far and far, to excell, all the Magi, and Astronomers that were in his kingdom, [Dan. 1, 5, 20.]

In the second year of his kingdom, or of the Babylonish Monarchies, begun by his father Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, dreamt his dream, of the great Image, made of divers metalls: and forgetting his dream, what it was, would needs know of his Magi and Astronomers, both what his dream was, and also what it meant: and when they could not satisfy him in to unreasonable a demand, he commanded them all to be put to death. But Daniel, when he saw the execution preparing, and understood the cause thereof, moved the King to forbear a while, and joining in prayer with his fellows unto God, obtained both the dreame it self, and also the interpretation thereof to be revealed to him. He therefore declared to the King what his dream was, and also the four Monarchies which were in their order to succeed, which was the thing signified by that Image which he saw in his dream: whereupon the King enriched him presently with great gifts, and made him governour of all the Province of Babylon, and chief over all the witemen thereof; and moreover at his request, made his three fellows, Sinadrach, Misach, and Abednego, principal officers in all that Province, [Dan. 2, 1, 49.]

In the beginning of the sixth year of the war between the Medes and the Lydians, the victory inclining neither way; there fell out an Eclipse of the Sun, which Thales the Philosopher of Milerus had foretold the Ionians of. At which, both the foretold armies seeing the day grown dark like the night, left off fighting, and afterward, by the mediation of Syennesis of Cilicia, and of Labynthus the Babylonian (which was Nebuchadnezzar) they made a peace between themselves; and Alyattes gave his daughter Ariana, to Alyattes the son of Cyaxares to wife, [Herod. lib. 1, cap. 74.] And that this Eclipse foreshadowed the fall of the Lydians, fell out at the very instant, when Cyaxares the father of Alyattes and King of the Medes and Alyattes Cretus his father, and King of the Lydians, were in fight together, is confirmed by Endemius, in his Astronomical History; and Pliny also, speaking thereof, and giving the reason of the Eclipses of these two great stars, lib. 1, cap. 12, faith in this wise: Apud Græcos invenitur hæc prima omnium Thales Milefius, olympiadis 48 anno quarto, prædicto Solis defectus qui, Alyattes Regis, factus est, V. C. an. 170. (i. e.) quæ Græci, the first that found it out, (to wit, the reason of the Eclipses) was Thales the Milefian, who foretold the Eclipse of the Sun, in the 4 year of the 48 olympiad, which was in the reign of Alyattes, (for so the old copy reads, not of Alyattes, as the vulgar edition hath it) 170. years after the building of Rome. Clemens Alexan. lib. 1, Strom. placeth this fight of Cyaxares, and Eclipse of the Sun, about the 50 olympiad, wherein he is far wide of the opinion of Endemius, whom he cites for it; for both the time assigned, as well by him as by Pliny, suites not with Cyaxares, but with Alyattes his reign; and also out of Ptolemy's, Sun and Moon Tables, which are the same with those of Hipparchus, it appeareth plainly that the Sun was eclipsed in the 4 years of the 44 olympiad, to wit, in the 147. of Nabonassar, on the 4 day of the Egyptian month Pagon, (or 20 day of September, according to the Julian Calendar, on a Sunday,) 3 hours 25 minutes before noon: And this Eclipse was of 9 digits; and continued almost two hours.

Pamian the son of Neco reigned in Egypt 6 years. [Herod. lib. 2, cap. 16.]

The Phœnices, setting saile out of Ionia, built Marseilles, upon the coast of Liguria in Italy 120. years before the sea-fight at Salamis: as Marzianus in his Periægesis reports out of Timæus to wit, in the first year of the 45 olympiad, as both Euseb. us delivers in his Chronicle: and Solinus in Polyhistor, though this latter confounds this first plantation of the Phœnices made in the days of Tarquinus Priscus, with their latter under Servius Tullius; whereof more hereafter in the year 2461. But the story of the wedding which gave occasion of the building of this City, is more at large set out by Achenes, lib. 3, out of Aristotle, where he speaks of the common-wealth of the Marseillians, and by Justin in his 43 book out of Tro. Pomp. who relates the same thing, though differing in the names of the persons concerned therein.

Nebuchadnezzars army consisting of troops and companies of Syrians, Chaldeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, going against Jehoiakim, and against Judæa, [2 Reg. 24, 2.] leading away from thence 203. prisoners, an. 707. Nebuchadnezzar, [Jer. 52, 28.]

Alyattes or Aluents, [Dan. 9, 1.] had issue by Ariana, (whom he married the year before,) his son Cyaxares; who was also called Darius, the Mede, and who was 62 years old when he succeeded Belshazzar, (who was slain) in the kingdom of the Chaldeans, [Dan. 5, 30, 31.] But Alyattes, in the life time of his father, married Mandaces his daughter, borne of his former wife, to Cambyfes son of Achemenes King of Persia (as Xenophon says in his first book of the education of Cyrus) who derives his pedigree from Perseus; and of these two, the year followings was borne Cyrus: so that we may in no sort believe Ctesias, who contrary to Herodotus and Xenophon and others, agreeing with them, will in no wife have it, that Astiages (for so he calls him) was any kin at all to Cyrus.

Jehoiakim being taken prisoner by the Chaldeans, was thrown out without burial, that is, was buried like an ass: his carcass being tugged and drawn out of the gate of Jerusalem, according as was foretold by the Prophet, [Jeremy 22, 18, 19, and chap. 36, 30.] though in reference to the common course of nature, he also may be said to have slept with his fathers, as he is, [2 Reg. 24, 6.]

After him came his son Jehoiachin, who was also called Conias and Jeconias, and reigned 3 months and ten days in Jerusalem; and he also did what was evil in the sight of the Lord, as his father Jehoiakim had done before him, [2 Reg. 24, 8, 9, 2 Chron. 36, 8, 9.] Against him therefore a most dread decree went out from God, in the end of the 23 of Jeremy, and as an Act to be entered of record, concluded in this wise. Write this man childless, a man which shall not prosper in his days; for none of his seed shall prosper to sit in the throne of David, nor reign any more in Judah, [Jer. 22, 30.] concerning which matter, more is to be read in Christophorus Helvicius his book of the Genealogie of Christ.

The year before Christ.	The fifth Age of the World.	The year before Christ.	The year before Christ.	The year before Christ.	The fifth Age of the World.	87	The year before Christ.
	And at this time also, the prophetic of Jeremiah contained in the chapter following, [c. 23.] seemeth to have been uttered. In the same year, after the sending of the former army, came up the servants of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, to besiege Jerusalem. And when Nebuchadnezzar himself came before the City, whilst his servants besieged it: Jehoachim the king, with his mother Nehustia, a woman of Jerusalem, and his servants and officers, with all his Courtiers, came forth to the king of Babylon: Him the king of Babylon took; in the 8 year of his reign over Babylon: and taking from thence all the treasure, both of the Temple, and of the kings house, he brake in pieces all the golden vessels and furniture, which Salomon had made for the Temple of the Lord; as the Lord, [1. Sam. 6.] had foretold; and the king carried away king Jehoachim unto Babylon, with his mother, and his wives, or women, and his Courtiers, and out of all Jerusalem, the Magistrates, and every man of strength, to the number of ten thousand men: and all Carpenters and Smiths; leaving none behind him at Jerusalem, besides the poorer sort of people: and out of other parts of the land, he carried away 7000 men of able bodies, and of Smiths and Carpenters: ten thousand, all strong men, and fit for the wars; all which were carried prisoners into Babylon, [2 Reg. 28. 8, 16, 2 Chron. 36. 10, Jer. 24. 1, and c. 29. 1, 2, Ezech. 17. 12.] among which captives, one was Mordecai of the tribe of Benjamin, the son of Jaitsus, [Ezra. 2. 5, 6.] and Ezechiel the priest, the son of Buzi, another: Who therefore in his prophetic reckons the time all along from the beginning of this captivity, [Ezech. 1. 2, 3.] which he also terms his own banishment, [c. 40. 1.] An Epistle said to be Jeremiahs, is sent to those that were appointed to be carried away to Babylon, to beware of the Idolatry, which they should see used in Babylon, [Baruc. 6.] Whiles the king of Babylon thus raged in Judea, God prepared a worme, which in due time, should eat out this spreading tree: the city of this poor people entering into the ear of the Lord: O daughter of Babylon, waisted with misery, happy shall he be that shall reward thee, as thou hast served us, who shall take thy children, and destroy them as against the stones, [Psal. 137. 8.] For in this very year, was Cyrus the Perso-Median born; whose father was a Persian, and his mother a Mede, as I shewed before; of whom this very Nebuchadnezzar, at the hour of his death, as Aby-denus hath it, uttered this prophetic: There shall come a Persian Male, who shall make use of your Devils, at his fellow-soldiers, to bring you into bondage: as also was foretold by that Oracle given to Croesus, When a mule King, shall to the Medes be borne, &c. Which the Pythian Priestess interpreted to be meant of Cyrus, which was to be borne of a father and a mother of two divers Nations, a Persian and a Mede: Herod. 1. 2. c. 55. and 91. but above all most plainly and truly our Isaiah foretold, [c. 11. 1, 2.] that the Babylonians also should have a time wherein to endure their hell of slavery; and that their children should one day be dashed against the stones before their eyes, [c. 13. 16.] and that these miserably captivated Jewes, should one day be restored to their liberty; calling their deliverer for many years before by his proper name of Cyrus, [Isa. 44. 28. and 45. 1.] God himself giving the reason, of this to be so unusual a revelation, in these words: For my servant Jacob, and for Israel my chosen sake, have I called thee by thy name, and given thee a surname, though thou hast not known me, [Isa. 45. 4.] As for the age of this Cyrus, we are beholden to Tully for it; who in his 1. book de Dictionibus, cites it out of one Dionysius a Persian writer, in this manner: The sun (saith Dionysius) appeared to Cyrus in his sleep, standing at his feet, whom, when Cyrus thence endeavored to take in his hands, the sun fell turned aside, and went away: and the Magi, who are counted as wise and learned men among the Persians, saith that by his thrice offering to take hold of the sun, was portended to him that he should reign thirty years, which came to passe accordingly, for he lived to the age of seventy years, when he began not to reign till he was forty: From which dream perhaps, so expounded by the Magicians, Cyrus took his name; for, as Ctesias rightly says, Cyrus in the Persian language, signifies the sun: So doth Plutarch, following him, in the life of Artaxerxes; and so doth Chur or Churshid, in the Persian Poets; as it is said, unto this day, and out of this place of Tullies, compared with [Dan. 5. 31.] it appears that Darius the Mede, or Cyaxares the son of Astyages, Cyrus his uncle, was born before him, and is therefore by Xenophon, in his book entitled, of the Institution of Cyrus, lib. 6. brought in, speaking in this manner, ἔπειτα παρὸν τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ, καὶ τοῦ νεώτερου τοῦ Κροῦσου, καὶ τοῦ ἑταίρου αὐτοῦ, (c. c.) saying I am here present, and am elder than Cyrus, it is fit that I speak first: and in the fourth of the same book, Cyrus writing to Darius, useth these words, οὐκ ἔστιν αὐτῷ δι σοι, καὶ τῶν νεώτερος αὐτοῦ, (c. c.) I advise you, though he be the younger of the two. Nebuchadnezzar, made Mattania, Jechonia his uncle and son of Josiah, king in Jeconia his stead, changing his name into Sedechia; which signifieth the Justice of the Lord; [Jer. 37. 1, 2 Reg. 24. 17.] for whereas he had made a covenant with him, and had taken an oath of allegiance from him, and Sedechia, had taken an oath by God to performe it, [2 Chron. 36. 13, Ezech. 17. 13, 14, 18.] by the imposition of this name, his purpose was to put him in mind of the just judgement of God, in case he should break in. Sedechias reigned full 21 years in Jerusalem; and did evil in the sight of the Lord his God				God; nor did he humble himself before Jeremy the prophet, who spake unto him in the name, and from the mouth of the Lord; but stiffened his neck, and hardened his heart, that he might not return to the Lord God of Israel, [Jer. 1. 3, and chap. 32. 1, 2, 2 Reg. 24. 18, 19, 2 Chron. 36. 11, 12, 13.] yea, all the chief of the priests, and the people of the whole land sundry wayes transgressed the law, polluting the house of the Lord, which he had sanctified in Jerusalem; nor would they hearken to the word of the Lord, which he spake unto them by the mouth of his prophet Jeremy, and other prophets, but despised them, and mockt the messengers, which God sent unto them, till the fire of Gods fury brake forth against his people, for that there was no remedy to heal them, [Jer. 37. 2, 2 Chron. 63. 14, 15, 16.] After Jeconia was carried away, God by a vision of two baskets of figs, signified to Jeremy, the carrying away of the new king Sedechia, and the remainder of the people, [Jer. 24. 1, 2, 8, 9.] In the beginning of Sedechias his reign; the prophetic concerning the Elamites, both of their fall and rising again, was uttered by the prophet Jeremy, [Jer. 49. 34, 39.] For Nebuchadnezzar had taken from Astyages, the whole province of Elamais, with the city Sula, the Metropolis thereof, and which was seated upon the river Ulaie or Ulie; and annexed it to the Empire of Chaldaa, [Jer. 25. 25, with Dan. 8. 1, 2.] But afterward these Elamites combining with the Medes, against the Babylonians, [Ezra 2. 1, 2.] when Belshazzar was destroyed, recovered their state again, under Cyrus, the anointed of the Lord; and their chief city Sula, was made by Cyrus, the fear of the Persian kingdom, as Strabo in his 15. book teacheth us. When Embassadors came from the several kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon to Jerusalem, to visit the new king Sedechia, God willed Jeremy to deliver unto every of them chains and whips, to be presented to their several masters, and commanding them withall to submit themselves to Nebuchadnezzar; not to give ear any longer, to their wizards and star-gazers, who advised them to the contrary: he advised also Sedechia, to hold him fast to the king of Babylon, and to beware of false prophets, and both by threats and promises, perswaded all sorts of the people, to submit unto, and obey the king of Babylon, [Jer. 39.] After the carrying away of Jeconia, and the other captives, Sedechia sent Elhasbam, the son of Shaphan, and Gemaria the son of Helkai, to Nebuchadnezzar in Babylon; and by them also Jeremias gave a letter to be carried, which he had written to the Elders, and Priests, and Prophets, and the rest of the people, which had been carried from thence by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon; in which letter the prophet instructeth them, how to demean themselves in that condition of captivity, wherein for the present they were, and comforts them, with a gracious promise of deliverance, at the expiration of the 70 years, and foretells them, of the grand calamities, which were to fall upon them, whom they had left behind them in Jerusalem, and of the miserable end which Anab, the son of Koliaia, and Sedechia the son of Mahaselia, the two false prophets should come unto, [Jer. 29. 1, 2, 23.] Shemajaz, sent letters, as it seems, by Sedechia his messenger, when they returned to him from Babylon, unto Zephania, (who was the second chief priest, 2 Reg. 25. 18.) and the rest of the priests at Jerusalem, against what the prophet Jeremy had written in his to them: which being read in his hearing, he presently denounced a heavy judgement from God upon him, [Jer. 29. 24, 32.] At what time also it seemeth, were uttered those notable prophecies of his, concerning the kingdom of Christ, and reftauration of the church contained in the two following chapters, [30. and 31.] This year was born Cræsus, the son of Halyattes, king of Lydia, begotten upon his wife, a woman of Caria, for it appeareth, that he was 35 years of age, when he began to reign, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 26. and 92.] In the 5 montheth of the 4 year of Sedechia, Hanania: a false prophet, prophesied, that at the end of two years, all the vessels, and furniture of the house of the Lord, and Jeconia, and all the people, which were carried away to Babylon, should returne and be brought home again: and when Jeremy gaind him, he took a yoke of wood, from about his own neck, and brake it, saying, Thus shall the Lord break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar, within two years precisely, from off the neck of all the Nations: whereunto Jeremy replied, That God, in stead of that wooden yoke, would lay an Iron one upon the neck of all these nations, under which they should bow, and serve the king of Babylon, [Jerem. 28. 1, 14.] Hanania the false prophet, in the seventh montheth dyed, according to the fore-telling of Jeremy, Astyages, after the death of his father Cyaxares, reigned over the Medes 35 years, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 130, Dan. 9. 1, and Tobit 1. 4. 17.] where he is called, Αβασερνός, or Αβερνός. God by his prophet Jeremy, foretold that Babylon, and the land of Chaldaa should be over-run and waisted by the Medes and Persians; and re-comforts his own people with the sweet promises of their deliverance, [Jerem. 50. and chap. 51.] Sedechia,

Sedechia, in the 4 year of his reign, went, or rather, in his own head, fent Scraia, the son of Neria, the son of Maafcia, prince of Menucha, to Babylon, to whom Jeremy delivered the forefaid prophecies, of the destruction of Babylon, written in a book to be fift read, and then to be throwa into the river Euphrates, [Jer. 51. 59.] with whom his brother Baruc, son also of Neria, the son of Moafcia, [Jer. 32. 12.] Jeremy his pen-man, is thought also to have gone to Babylon.

Baruc is faid to have read all the words of his own book, in the audience of Jeconia, the son of Jehojachim, and of all the captives, that were then dwelling with him at that time in Babylon, in the 5 year, (to wit, after Jeconia, his being carried away to Babylon) in the 7 months at the time when the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire, (Baruc. 1. 2, 3, 4.) even in the same month, as it is thought, wherein, Jeconia giving himself up to the king of Babylon, Jerusalem was taken, and perhaps begun in part, to be set on fire by the Chaldeans: for I cannot assent to Severus Salpicius, who (grounding himself perchance upon this text) saith, that at this very time, Nebuchadnezzar entered Jerusalem with his army, and laid both city and walls, Temple and all, even with the ground, in his first book of his Sacred History, yet the former guess of Fran. Junius, concerning the quenching of the fire, and having the city, is somewhat more tolerable, than that of our Seminary priests at Doway is, where they say, that the whole time of the taking of Jerusalem, lasted eleven years before it was wholly burnt: to wit, from the time, when it was taken under Jeconia, till the time it was taken under Sedechia, and this book was written in the fifth year of that interval of time. But Hugo Grotius thinks, that the first writer thereof, here meant, the fifth year, after the carrying away of Jeconia, but that the rest of the burning of Jerusalem, was added afterward, by some other hand, who was of opinion, that Baruc never went to Babylon, till after the consuming of Jerusalem by fire, which fell out in Sedechia his reign.

In the beginning then of the 30 year, from that solemn renewing of the covenant, and reftauration of the worship of God, in that memorable year, the eighteenth of Josia his reign, which falls in with the fifth year of the carrying away of Jehojachim, al. Jeconia, in the beginning thereof, in the fifth day of the fourth month, (upon the 24 of our July, falling upon a Saturday) was the first vision from God shewed to Ezekiel, being then, among the rest of the company, carried away to Babylon, by the river Chebar, called by Strabo and Ptolomy, Chaboras, [Ezek. 1. 1, 2, 28.] and from hence was he sent, to execute the function of a prophet among the Jews of the captivity, unto whom dwelling at Thel-abibi, near the river Chebar, when he was come, he fate him down, as a man beloved, for 7 dayes space: after which time God again put him in mind of his charge, both with promises, if he undertook it, and with threats, if he refused; and then confirmed him, with a new sign shewed unto him; gave him courage and boldness by his word and raising his vocation by a new command, Ezek. 2. 6, 3.]

The prophet is commanded to make a draught of the siege of Jerusalem, in a table of slate, and to yeal upon one side 396 dayes, which was to be a type or prefiguration, of so many dayes, that the siege of the city of Jerusalem should last, and of so many years, of the iniquity of the house of Israel, [Ezek. 4.]

Phaonius king, of Egypt, returning from his journey which he had made into Ethiopia, shortly after died, and to him succeeded his son Apries, who reigned 25 years, [Herod. lib. 2. cap. 161.] and is the same, who in the scripture is called Pharaoh Hephra, [Jer. 44. 30.] He with an army every way well furnished, having made an incursion upon the life of Cyprus, and upon Phenicia, took Sidon by main force, and the rest of that country; by the very dread and terror of his name, and after a main victory gotten at sea, over both Cyprians and Phenicians, returned into Egypt, with a huge spoile taken from them, [Diod. Sic. lib. 1.] And it is reported of him, that he was altogether of opinion, that no God was able to put him besides his kingdom, so sure he thought he had made it, [Herod. 2. cap. 169.] which in [Ezek. 39. 3.] (as Tremelius hath noted) is in that allegorical Propopoeia, most elegantly expressed, The river is mine own, for I have made it for my self.

Ezekiel, when he had lain 350 dayes upon his left side, turned him on his right, and there lay 40 dayes more, which were for a type of as many years of the iniquity of Juda, [Ezek. 4. 6.] to which we must also refer what is said in the fifth chapter, of the same prophecy, with the two chapters following.

In the sixth year of Jeconia his going into captivity, and fifth day thereof, (which was the 22 of our Septemb, falling upon a Wednesday) God carrying away Ezekiel by the spirit, to Jerusalem, in a vision there, shewed him the infinite idolatry there used; and the plagues which were to befall that city for the same, [Ezek. 8. 1. and c. 9. 10. 11. 16.]

According to his foretelling, Pelatias, the son of Benaja died. God comforts the godly in their captivity in Babylon, by the sanctification of his presence, and with his evangelical promises for the time to come. The vision vanishing, the prophet is brought back by the spirit, to his people in Chaldea, and there declares to them, all that God had shewed him, [chap. 11. 13, 25.]

God both by typical figures, and also in plain words foretels Sedechia his flight by night the the putting out of his eyes, his leading into captivity, his dying in Babylon, the carrying away of the Jews into captivity, and the calamities which they were to endure before their going, [Ezek. 12.] to which year also the seven following chapters belong: out of which we further understand, that Daniels name was at that time grown very famous for the continual prayers which he made for the people of the captivity, [Ezek. 14. 14, 20.] and that Sedechia, not regarding the covenant and oath which he had sworn, rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, [Jer. 27. 15, 17.]

In the 7 year of Jeconia his captivity, 10 day of the 5 month (27 of our August, being Sunday) Ezechiel reproved the Elders, which came and requested him to aske counsel of God, for their greivous hypocritie: and then foretells them of the calamities that were to come upon all flesh; pronounces Gods judgments upon the Idolaters, and gives sweet comforts to the godly, [Ezek. 20. 1.] to which the three chapters following, seem also to appertain.

After Batus the founder of the kingdom of Cyrene, succeeded his son Arcellias, and reigned 16 years, [Herod. lib. 4. c. 159.]

This fell out to be a sabbatical year; wherein the men of Jerusalem, hearing that Nebuchadnezzar approached with his army, proclaimed liberty to their servants, [Jer. 34. 8, 9, 10.] according to the law, [Exod. 21. 2. Dent. 15. 1, 2, 3.] For Nebuchadnezzar marching with his army against Sedechia, and having wasted all the country, and taken their strong holds, came now before the very walls of Jerusalem, [Joseph. Antiq. l. 10. c. 10.] For he had taken all the Cities of Juda, saving only Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem: all which, he besieged with all the forces which he could make out of all the lands of his dominions, [Jer. 34. 1, 7.]

But the siege of Jerusalem began not till the midst of winter, for in the 9 year of the reign of Sedechia upon the 10 day of the 10 month, (answering to our 30 of January, falling upon a Thursday,) Nebuchadnezzar with all his army came before Jerusalem: raising forts round about it, [2 Reg. 25. 1. Jer. 39. 1. c. 52. 4.] For a memorial whereof, not only during the captivity, [Zech. 8. 19.] but even unto this day there is a yearly fast kept among the Jews.

Upon the very self-same day, was the siege of Jerusalem, revealed by God to Ezechiel, being then in Chaldea; and the utter destruction thereof, represented to him by the type a seething pot; and his wife died that day in the evening: for whose death he was charged not to mourn: thereby signifying the grievous calamity of the Jews, which was to surpass all expressions of grief by mourning, [Ezech. 24. 1, 2, 8cc.]

Jeremiah the Prophet was commanded by God to foretell the utter destruction and burning of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon, to Sedechia: and that he should be carried away prisoner to Babylon; and that there he should end his daies, and yet be honourably entered, [Jer. 34. 1, 7.]

The Prophet for so saying, was by Sedechia clapt up, in the court of the prison of the kings house, where in the tenth year of Sedechia and beginning of the 18 year of Nebuchadnezzar, having a promise of his delivery, made him by God, he recovered the land of Hammeel, his uncles son, by right of redemption, [Jer. 32. 1, 6.] and all things then came to pass, which he foretold, and are contained in the 32 and 33 chapters of his Prophecia.

Pharaoh Hophra, al. Vaphris, coming with his army out of Egypt, to relieve Sedechia, the Chaldeans raised the siege from before Jerusalem; and Sedechia sent messengers to Jeremiah (who upon the raising of the siege was set at liberty, and not yet cast into the dungeon, as afterwards he was,) to pray him to make intercession to God for the deliverance of the people; but the Prophet returned him answer, that those succours out of Egypt, should into Egypt returne again, and that the Chaldeans should returne to Jerusalem, and take the City, and destroy it by fire, [Jer. 37. 3, 10.]

They of Jerusalem seeing the siege raised, and themselves quit of that fear, presently took back their Hebrew servants again, whom they had formerly set at liberty according to the law; and made them serve as before, contrary to their covenant; for which, as for a most impious and barbarous act, Jeremy reproved them, and to cry quittance with them for it, proclaimed a liberty to the sword and pestilence and famine, against them, telling them withall, that the Chaldeans, should come again to the siege, and should take their City, and destroy it, with fire, [Jer. 34. 1, 22.]

But while the Chaldeans were away to encounter the Egyptian army, Jeremiah purposed to save himself by flight; but was prevented by the Princes, and taken and scourged, &c. cast into the Dungeon, which was in Ionathans house, &c. there lay a long time, [Jer. 37. 11, 16.] Nebuchadnezzar, at his going against the Egyptians in the 18 year of his reign, took 83 men which had fled out of Jerusalem to him, for safeguard, and sent them all away prisoners to Babylon, [Jer. 52. 29.]

Pittacus of Mitylene, one of the 7 wise men, was sent against Phrynon, surnamed the Pancretastis, i. e. a man excellent in all feats of chivalrie, and the Olympicke games, one that had won the bell in the games at Olympus; and at that time, General of the Athenian army, and had taken two towns, Sigum and Achilleum, from the Lesbians, with a Navie to Troas; in which battle, the Athenians, having gotten the victory, took the Target of Abreus, the Poet of Mitylene, who in flying had thrown it away, and hung hung it up in the temple of Minerva in Sigeum: Phrynon afterward challenged any man that durst encounter him to a single combat. Pittacus undertook him, and with a little net which he had hid privily under the hollow of his target, caught him by the head, and so flew him with his three-forked Spear; for which service, when the Mitylenians offered him a large proportion of lands, he desired no more of it, than so far only as he could throw his Spear; wherein he afterward built a temple, which from him was called Pittacium. This story seems to be mangled and is imperfect in Herodotus, [lib. 5, c. 95.] but that defect in him, is supplied by Plutarch, in his book entitled, De malignitate Herodoti, (1.) of the envy, or spitefulness of Herodotus, together with [Strabo, lib. 13. Polybius, lib. 1. Fugio, in the word, Retiarius (i. a fighter with a net; and Diogenes Laertius, lib. 1.] who tell us, that the Mitylenians for that service made him their Prince, or Sovereign, of their own accord, 20 years before he died: which as he there saith, was in the third year of the 52 olympiade: and which upon a due account I chuse rather to place in the 3 year of the 57, than with Eusebius, upon the 2 year of the 43 olympiade: though that seems more to favour his opinion, because in the Catalogue of the Stadioniceles, (2.) of those which got the prize in running, Phrynon is said to have gotten it in the 36 olympiade. Neither yet was the war ended by this duel; but the matter of their quarrel being referred by both parties to Perander of Corinth, who was also reckoned an other of the seven Wisemen of the world; as to an indifferent Arbitrator, he ordered, that each party should hold what they had then in their possession: (4.) that the Mitylenians should keep the Town of Achilleus, and the Athenians Sigeum, [Herod. lib. 5, cap. 94. 54. Strabo lib. 13.] which Perander, as Laertius in his life, out of Solicitacies shews, did 6 years after this, and before the 49 olympiade; which bewayes Herodotus his error in his account of times, where he makes this peace so made between the Athenians and Mitylenians, not to have been till toward the latter end of the Pisistratide, or successors of Pisistratus in the government of Athens.

3415. In the 10 year of the carrying away of Jeconia, and on the 13 day of the 10 month, 6. [upon our Feb. 1. falling upon a Sunday] Ezechiel uttered his prophetic against Pharaoh and all Egypt: that he should prove but a staffe of reed, and feed for Pharaoh Hophra or Apries himself, that he should have an overthrow given him in the Desert of Lybia by the Cyrenians, (as we shall see anon in the year 3430. of the World) and then for Egypt it self; that it should be miserably wasted by the Babylonian; and that, that desolation should last 40 years, [Ezech. 29. 1, 16.]

c. When Nebuchadnezzar had routed the Egyptian army, he presently returned to the siege of Jerusalem about the 15 day of the 4 month, to wit, 30 days before he took it: as we may gather out of that type or representation of, [Ezech. 4. 5, 8.] But then Jeremia, being consulted with by Sedechia, told him that he must be given up into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar: and he then, at Jeremia's humble suit, commanded him to be removed out of the Dungeon of the prison in Jonathans house, into the court of the prison; and that he should have a rowle of bread daily out of the bakers street, so long as there was any bread left in the city, [Jer. 37. 17, 21.]

d. The siege continuing, Sedechia sent again to Jeremia; but he still sent him the same answer, that both King and people must fall into Nebuchadnezzars hands: that they who would stay in the city should perish, either by the sword, or by famine, or by pestilence: but they that would go out, and submit to the King of Babylon, should have their lives saved, and be glad with that, [Jeremia 21.]

c. For this answer, the Princes cast Jeremia into Malchias his Dungeon, which was in the court of the prison: from whence, yet he was delivered by the help of Ebed-Melech, one of the kings Eunuchs, and was again consulted by the King: and when he still continued in pronouncing judgment against the Land of Judah, he was still kept in the Court of the prison, till the very taking of the City, [Jer. 38.] Where he assured Ebed-Melech, in the Name of the Lord; that he for his own part, should be free from all harme and danger in that general calamity, [Jer. 39. 15, 18.]

3416. In the 11 year of the carrying away of Jeconias, in the first day of the first month; c. as it seemeth, not of the 5 month, as Tremellius and Pradus would have it, (for that would fall upon the 12 year of Jeconias his carrying away to Babylon) God, by Ezechiel, foretold the city of Tyrrus, which much rejoiced in the wretched condition into which Jerusalem was fallen, by the power of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, that the also should perish by the same hand, and in so dreadful a manner, that all who had seen her former wealth and bravery should be amazed thereat: Foretelling the like misery to befall the Sidonians, their neighbours, to the glory of God, and good of his Church; concluding this whole prophetic with this assurance to her, [Ezech. 26. 1. and from thence to the end of the 18 chapter.] In all which prophetic this is also to be noted; that at that time: the fame of Daniels wisdom was grown to great, even in forreigne nations, that they used to say, by way of a proverb; as wife as Daniel, from whence it was that God upbraiding Ithobalus King of Tyre, with his pride and arrogance of his minde; Ebdo, faith faith he, thou art wiser than Daniel; no secret can be hid from thee, [Ezech. 28. 3.]

In the same year, the 7 day of the 3 month, (our 26 of April, upon a Tuesday) God revealed his will to Ezechiel, of sending and arming Nebuchadnezzar against Pharaoh, to the ruine of Egypt, [Ezech. 30. 20, 26.]

In the same year also, upon the first day of the 3 month, (June 19. falling upon a Sunday) God declared that the Egyptian, could no more avoide his determination, than the Assyrian had done before him, [Ezech. 31.]

In the latter end of the 11 year of Sedechia, [Jer. 1. 3.] 9 day of the 4 month (17 of our July, upon a Wednesday) when the famine grew strong in Jerusalem; the Cite was broken up, and the Caldeans entered in, [2 Reg. 25. v. 2, 3, 4. Jer. 39. v. 2, 3. and c. 52. v. 5, 6, 7.]

The City being taken, Sedechia, and all the men of war, fled away by night: but the Caldeans pursuing after them, took Sedechia, and brought him prisoner to Riblah, where Nebuchadnezzar lay, and where having seen his children slaughtered before his eyes, he had then his eyes put out, and being clogged with chains of steel, he was carried away from thence to Babylon, [2 Reg. 25. v. 4, 7. Jer. 39. v. 4, 7. and chap. 52. 7, 11.] fulfilling therein the propheties foretold of him that with his eyes he should see the King of Babylon, [Jer. 32. 4. and chap. 34. 3.] but Babylon, he should not see, though he was to die there, [Ezech. 12. 13.]

Upon the 7 day of the 4 month (being of our August 24. Wednesday) Nebuzaradan, Captain of the Guard, sent by Nebuchadnezzar, made his entry into the city, [2 Reg. 25. 8.] and having spent two dayes in making provision, upon the 10 day of the said month, (our Aug. 27. falling upon the Sabbath) to which time perhaps he had purposely put off the execution of that his charge; he let fire on the Temple, and on the Kings Palace, and upon all the Noble-mens houses, with all the rest of the houses in Jerusalem, and burnt all down to the ground, [Jer. 52. 13. with chap. 39. 8.] though our Country-man Tho. Lydiate, thinks that fire was set on it, upon the 7 day; but not burnt down till the 10. In remembrance of which calamity, the fast of the 5 month was ordained to be kept, [Zech. 7. 3, 5. and chap. 8. 19.] which is observed by the Jewes unto this day: though kept by them, upon the 9 day, and not the 10 of the month 12. But the Temple was destroyed in the 19 year of Nebuchadnezzars reign, [Jer. 52. 12. 2 Reg. 25. 8.] in the latter end thereof, in the beginning of the first year of the 48 olympiade, in the 16. year, running of Nabonassars account, 424 years, 3 months and 8 dayes, from the time that Solomon laid the first stone thereof.

Upon the same 5 month, [Jer. 1. 3.] all the walls of Jerusalem being razed to the ground, all that were left in the City, and all that had formerly fled over to Nebuchadnezzar, and all the common people of the City, with all the treasure of the King, and of his Nobles, and furniture of the Temple, did Nabuzaradan carry away unto Babylon, [Jer. 52. 8, 9. c. 52. 14, 23. 2 Reg. 25. 10, 17. 2 Chron. 36. 18, 19, 20.] And thus was Juda carried away out of her own land, [Jer. 52. 27. 2 Reg. 25. 21.] 468 years after David began to reign over it; from the dividing of the 10 Tribes, from the Tribe of Juda, 388 years, and from the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, 134 years.

The Sixth Age of the World.

The basest sort of the people of the land of Juda, and such as were nothing worth, Nebuzaradan left there, to dresse the vineyards, and to till the ground; over whom the King let Gedalia the son of Ahikam, a man of the same country, to govern them, [Jer. 39. 10. and chap. 42. 16. 2 Reg. 25. 1, 2, 23.] but without any badge of Regality, or Kingly title: because, as Severus Sulpitius, in his sacred History, saith, To have some preeminence over a few miserable boors, or passants, was not reckoned to be any dignity at all.

Seraia the chief, and Sephanias the secondary Priests; and the three Keepers of the gate of the Temple, and other principal men, Nebuzaradan took and carried them to Riblah, to Nebuchadnezzar, and there were they put to death, [Jerem. 52. 24, 27. 2 Reg. 18, 21.] but Jehoiadake the son of Seraia, and who after him came to be high Priest, was carried away prisoner to Babylon, [1 Chron. 6. 15.]

Jeremy being bound with chains, was carried with the rest as far as Rama towards Babylon, and had there his irons knockt off, and was set at liberty, and had his choice given him whether he would go on to babylon, there to be honourably entertained, or stay in the country with that miserable crew, which was left behind; and he chusing to stay, was sent back to Gedalia the governour; who made his residence at Mizpa, in the Tribe of Benjamin, with money in his purse, [Jer. 39. 11, 14. and chap. 4. 1, 6.]

The captains and companies, which upon the first taking of the city, fled away by night, [2 Reg. 25. 4, 3er. 52. 7.] and were scattered over the country, and all the Jews, which had fled to the Moabites and Ammonites, and other nations adjoining, returned after a while, to Gedalia, into their own country, where they gate good provision of Wine and Oyl, and other summer fruits to subsist withall, [Jer. 40. 7, 12, 2 Reg. 25. 23, 24.]

Ismael, the son of Nethania, of the race of the kings of Juda, being suborned by Baalis king of the Ammonites to kill Gedalia, came to him with ten resolute fellows to Mizpa, and were familiarly entertained by him, and he gave no credit to such as disclosed their treacherous intent unto him, which turned to his own destruction, [Jerem. 40. 13, 16.]

3417. In the 7th month, therefore Ismael with his ten companions, taking their opportunity, wickedly murdered Gedalia, and such Chaldeans and men of armes, as at that time he had about him at Mizpa, [Jer. 41. 1, 2, 3. 2 Reg. 25. 25.] In remembrance whereof, the Jews keep a fast unto this time, upon the third day of this month Tazri. And a day or two after, the same Ismael slew 80 men more, which clad in mourning apparel, brought offerings and frankincense from Sichem, Shilo, and Samaria to the house of the Lord, now lying in her own dust; and these, having drawn them by a sleight to Mizpa, they flew there in the open streets, and threw their carcases into king Aza his well, [Jer. 41. 4, 9.]

As Ismael returned with the kings daughters, and the rest of the people which was left at Mizpa, his prisoners, to the king of Ammon, Johanan the son of Karek, met him with a band of men; took away from him all his prisoners, and set them at liberty; and Ismael, with eight men only in his company, fled to the Ammonites, [Jerem. 41. 10, 15.]

Johanan, and all his captains, with the rest of the people remaining about Bethlehem, for fear of the Chaldeans, had a purpose to flee into Egypt, [Jerem. 41. 16, 17, 18.] But went many of them to Jeremy, desiring an answer by him from God thereupon, and he from God, after ten dayes, brought them an answer, exhorting them all in his name, not to stir out of their own country: assuring them, if they stayed, of Gods protection there, and that no harme should befall them from the Babylonians; but if they went into Egypt, they should there, every man of them perish by sword, by famine, by sundry kinds of death. But the common sort, according to their old custom, of never obeying wholesome counsell, nor Gods commands, went into Egypt; and, because needs they would have it so, Jeremy and Baruc the son of Neria, went thither with them; and when they were come as far as Taphnes, Jeremy there, declared to them in a figure, the destruction of Egypt, even by Nebuchadnezzar, of whom they were now so much afraid, [Jer. 42. and 43, with Severus Sulpicius, in his Sacred History, lib. 2.]

In the 12 year of the carrying away of Jeconia, the 5 day of the 10 month, [our 25 Jan. being Wednesday] when tidings came to Ezekiel of the taking of Jerusalems the prophet foretold of the utter destruction, which should befall the last remainder of the Israelites, (after those others which went into Egypt) even to those which remained in their desolate country, [Ezek. 32. 1, 6.]

In the same 12 year, in the first day of the 12 month, [March 22. being Wednesday] Ezekiel uttered his prophecy, concerning the grievous plague and affliction, which Nebuchadnezzar should bring upon the land Egypt, [Ezek. 33. 1, 16.]

And upon the 15 day, the same prophet foretold, of Pharaos, and all the tag and rag of Egypt, that they should be brought down as low as hell, with the rest of the uncircumcised nations, [Ezek. 32. 17, 32.]

Jeremy also prophesied of the destruction, which should follow the Israelites, at Migdol, not far from the red sea, [Exod. 14. 2.] at Taphnes, al, Daphne-Pesufim, at Noph; al, Memphis, and in Pathros, a country in Egypt: and for a sure sign of their own misery, gave them Pharaos, al, Apries, king of Egypt himself, whom they should see brought to all extremities before their eyes, [Jer. 44. 1, 30.]

Obadiah the prophet uttered a prophecy against Edom, which shamefully insulted over the calamity of the Jews, when Jerusalem was destroyed, and the like did Jeremy, [49. 7. and Ezek. 25. 12.] and the authors of the Psalms, [79. and 137.] which wrote all about the same time.

3418. Cyrus, when he had lived 12 years, or somewhat more with his father in Persia, being sent for, with his mother Mandane, by his grandfather Astyages, came into Media. [Xenophon, lib. 1. of the Infinit, of Cyrus.]

4419. Tyrrus (Ithobalus then reigning there) was besieged 13 years by Nebuchadnezzar; as Josephus reports out of Philostratus and other writers of the affairs of Phoenicia. [Antiq. lib. 10. cap. 11. & lib. 1. cont. Apion.] And in the compass of those 13 years, it seemeth that the neighbouring nations, as the Moabites, the Ammonites, and Edomites, were also subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, according to the foretellings of the prophet, [Jeremy in his 27, 48, 49. chapters, and of Ezek. cap. 25.]

Whiles

4420. Whiles Nebuchadnezzar lay before Tyre, which borders upon the land of Israel, [Isa. 19. 29.] in the 13 of his reign, Nebuzaradan, captain of his guard, carried away all the remainder of the Jews and Israelites together unto Babylon, to the number of 745 persons, [Jerem. 52. 30.] In which extreme depopulation, which left the very ground, untill the 390 years of the iniquity of Israel, distinct from Juda; and the 40 years of the iniquity of Juda by it self, foretold by [Ezekiel 4. 5, 6] were accomplished; and fully ended.

4421. When Cyrus was now almost 16 years of age, Evil-merodach, the king of Assyria his son, being about to marry a wife, called Nicotris, made an inroad, with a great army of horse and foot, upon the borders of Media, there to take his pleasure, in hunting and harrowing of the country: against whom Astyages, and Cyaxares his son, and Cyrus his grandchild; who then first began to bear armes, marched out, met with him, and in a battail of horse, overthrew him, and drove him out of his borders, [Xenophon lib. 1. of the Infinit of Cyrus.]

Cyrus afterward, was called home, by his father Cambyles; when as yet he had one year to spend at Schoole, as Xenophon in the same book tells us, to which also that hath reference, which Athenæus, in his 14 book Dipnosoph, reports out of Dion; that Cyrus, when he had served Astyages, first as one of his halbardiers, and then as one of his armour bearers returned into Persia, and that at the same time Angares a musician, when Astyages feasted his friends, sang them a song, wherein he said, That a fierce wild beast, more fierce than any bear; was let go, and sent into a fenny country, and that he should reign over all these provinces, and should with a handful of men, maintain war against great armies, &c. and that thereupon, Astyages would him have called back Cyrus again, but could not get him.

4424. In the 50 Olympiade, wherein Epitides, the Lacedæmonian, wan the race in running, certain men out of Cnidus, nor Rhodes, and brooking the rough carriage, of the kings of Asia, agreed together, to make a plantation of themselves, some where else: and making one Pentathlus a Cnidian, (who deduced his pedigree from Hippotas, the son of Hercules,) they went for Sicily, at the time, when they of Eggesta, and Selinuntæ, were in war each against the other: where Pentathlus taking part with the Selinuntians, was slain; and the rest, making Gorgus, and Thestor, and Epithicus, all men of Pentathlus his lineage and kindred, their captains, let sail again, and seized themselves in the Isle of Lipara, [Diodor. Sic. lib. 5.]

4429. Arcefflus, when he had reigned 16 years, in Cyrenaica, left to succeed him his son Batus, surnamed Eudæmon; unto whom a huge multitude of Grecians, advised thereto by the Oracle at Delphos, repaired; waited first the lands of the bordering Lybians, and then parted it among themselves: whereas before, the plantation made in Cyrene consisted only of thole, which came from the Isle of Thera, with their first founder Batus, [Hærod. lib. 4. cap. 159.]

4430. In the 25 year of the captivity of Jeconia, in the becing of that year, (i. e.) in the first month thereof (as Jonathan the Chalde Paraphrast expoundeth it) upon the 10 day of the month (our April 30. upon a Tuesday) 14 years after the destruction of Jerusalem, Ezekiel had a vision, of the restitution of the Temple, City, and Kingdom of the Israelites; portending the reſtauration of the Church by Christ, with the greatest grace, honour, and excellence thereof, [Ezekiel 40. 1. to the end of the chapter.]

The Lybians, being put out of their lands and country, by the inhabitants of Cyrenaica, put themselves under the protection of Apries king of Egypt: and he gathering a great army together, sent them against the Cyrenians, and the Cyrenians, pitching at a place called Irala, near the mountain called Thelitis, so routed the army of the Egyptians, that few of them were left to return again into Egypt, whereupon the Egyptians grew angry with Apries, and revolted from him; supposing that he purposely lent them to that break-neck service, to be rid of them, that so he might the more easily, dominion over the rest that were left, [Hærod. lib. 4. cap. 159, lib. 2. 161. Diodor. Sic. lib. 1.]

4431. Amasis, (being that Saites, so much spoken of by Plato in his Timæus) was sent by his father to appease this mutiny of the people; but they took and made him king, in his fathers stead, And Apries, having sent a noble person, named Paterchanes to call back Amasis, at his return, cut off his nose and ears, because he brought him not with him. Upon which unworthy act of his, all fell off from him to Amasis his side, [Hærod. lib. 2. cap. 162.]

4432. Tyre at last was given up to Nebuchadnezzar, for that it was not taken by force, and given up to be ransacked by the Souldiers, appears by [Ezek. 29. 18, 19.] but rather rendred upon conditions. And therefore for king Ithobalus, (יְהוֹבָב) he appointed one Baal (בָּאָל) a man of the same country, to be a petty king there, who who governed them 10 years, as Iosephus affirms out of the Annals of the Phenicians, lib. 1. contra Apion.

In the 1 day of the 1. month of the 27 year of the captivity of Jeconia, (21 of April, upon the Friday with us,) God promised to give all Egypt to be Nebuchadnezzar to be spoiled, in recompence of his long labour; endured in the taking in of Tyrus, [Ezech. 29. 17, 20.]

Cyrus having now attained almost the full age of 27 years; was taken out of the rank of the triplelings, and reckoned among the number of full men, according to the discipline, and use of the Persians, [Xenophon, l. 1. of the Institution of Cyrus.]

Nebuchadnezzar laying hold of the rebellion in Egypt, and peradventure solicited by Amasis to assist him against his Father Apries; invaded Egypt with his army; and having gotten it into his hands, even from Syene, to the end thereof: made havock as well of the Egyptians, as of the Jews which dwelt among them, killing some, and leading away the rest into captivity, according to the several prophecies of Jeremiah, [43. 44, 46, and Ezech. 29, 30, 31.]

Pharaoh Hophra, al. Apries, being forced to retire into the Country of Thebais; Nebuchadnezzar, as it should seem, made Amasis his Viceroy, over all Egypt; though Herodotus knew not this: for as Scaliger well observeth in his notes, Ad Fragmenta: Th. Priests of Egypt, which informed him, of such thing, as he desired to be satisfied in, told him so much only as made for the honour of their Nation, but concealed the rest, which betrayed their cowardice and slavery, and payments of tribute to the Chaldeans.

443. Nebuchadnezzar, having finished his conquests, returned to Babylon: and there, as he lay at ease, and in all kind of jollity in his own house, had that remarkable dream, of the great Tree, (whose destiny was to be cut down) represented to him, the meaning whereof, when he could not learn by his wifards of Chaldea, the Prophet Daniel unfolded to him, [Dan. 4.]

Nebuchadnezzar new built Babylon, in a wonderfull magnificence and beauty; building a whole new City without the old, and enclosing all, with a treble wall, made of brick: and in favour of his wife called Amyrris, (of whom I spake in the year of the world, 3374) a woman of Media, and King Altayges his daughter, made that famous and so much renowned garden, borne upon pillars: of which Berolus; He built (saith he) that garden, called, the hanging Garden, because his wife desired the pleasure of the hills, as having been brought up in Media: And Q. Curtius; It is said (saith he) that a King of Syria, reigning in Babylon, built this great work at the importunity of his wife, whom he dearly loved; and who out of a desire she had to enjoy the pleasure of hills and woods, in that low country of Babylon, let her husband upon it, to imitate the genius or spirit of Nature in itself, by the amenity and pleasantness of this work.

But who so will know more of the infinite magnificence, and sumptuousness of this work, must read the Fragments which are left, of Berolus and Abydenus, the former of which, blames the Greek writers, who attribute this work to Semyramis, whereas indeed, this, and those other vast and magnificent structures, were the proper work of this Nebuchadnezzar; as Iosephus, in his first Book, contra Apion, reports out of him. And the latter saies plainly that those vast walls, with the brazen gates thereof, reckoned among the miracles of the world, and which remained to the times of Alexander the great, were built by this Nebuchadnezzar, as we find in Eusebius, in his meth. book, De Evangelica Preparat. And Clitarchus, and others, which attended Alexander in that voyage, say that the compass of that wall, was 365 furlongs, according to the number of the days of the year, [Diod. Sic. l. 2.] and that every furlong length thereof, was built and perfected in one day, as Q. Curtius, lib. 5. c. 4. reports.

445. Twelve whole months were no sooner past, but Nebuchadnezzar, growing proud, and boasting of the magnificence of his buildings, fell disdraught of his wits, and being put from his house and home, spent seven years in the woods and fields among beasts, [Daniel 4. 32, 33.]

Apries, gathering an army out of Ionia and Caria, to the number of thirty thousand soldiers, to assist him for their hire, fought with his son Amasis, at Memphis: but being routed and taken prisoner, was kept for a while in the City of Sais: and not long after strangled, according to the prophetic of [Jer. 44. 30. and reported by Herod. lib. 2. c. 63. and 169, and by Diod. Sic. lib. 1.]

After his death Amasis reigned 44 years, as Herod. reporteth, lib. 3. c. 10. but, which the Priests would not be known of to Herodotus, paid tribute all that while to the king of Babylon.

442. Was the 8 year of Jubilee. Nebuchadnezzar at the end of 7 years, after his humble acknowledgment of the power of God, was restored both to his right wits and kingdom also, and thereupon publicly proclaimed Gods great grace and mercy shewed upon himself, and his power over all Nations, [Dan. 4.]

And having himself foretold concerning the taking of Babylon by Cyrus as Abydenus (quoted by Euseb. l. 9. Prepar. Evang. c. ult.) reports out of the relation of the Chaldeans, departed departed this life, when he had reigned about 20 moneths co-partner in the kingdom with his father; and 43 years by himself alone.

After him came Evil-merodach, his son in the 37 year of the captivity of Jehoiachin, or Jeconia: about the 25 day of the 13 month (our April 15, upon a Tuesday) on which he gave order for the enlarging of Jeconia, [Jer. 52. 31.] and two days after he took him out of his prison-clothes, and setting him above all the Princes of his Court, reckoned him among the number of the Kings friends; so that all his life time after he did eat at the Kings table, [2 Reg. 25. 27, 28, 29.]

In Lydia Cressus, after the decease of his father Halyattes, reigned 14 years, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 86.]

After King Baal, the King of Babylon governed Tyrus by Judges: the first of which was Esenibai the son of Ballach, whom Scaliger calleth (עסניבאי בללך) and he ruled there 3 moneths: then Chelbes, the son of Abdeus, whom he also calleth (חלביס בללך) and he ruled there 10 moneths; as Iosephus reports out of the Phœnician Annals, in [his 1. book, cont. Apion.]

443. Abbarus (אבברוס) the High Priest judged the Tyrians 3 moneths: and after him, Mitygonus and Gereftratus (מיתיוגוס גרעפטרטוס) governed them 6 years, [ib.]

To Cæsius living at Sardes reformed all the wife and learned men of Greece; and among them, Solon the law-maker: who had with him that so much renowned conference of the uncertainty of mans life, and of all humane felicity therein, [Herod. lib. 2. from the 28 chapter to the 33.] There is extant a short Epistle of Solons to Cæsius, in the end of Solons life, in Laertius; wherein he saies, that he was sent for by Cæsius, what time Pisistratus governed in Athens. Ælope a Phrygian borne, that famous compoler of Fables, was at the same time sent for by Cæsius, to come to him at Sardes; and was held in great esteem by him: And he condoling with Solon in a letter, for that he was uncivily turned away by Cæsius, only for the freedom of speech, which he had used to him; and telling him withal, that Kings must have, αἰσχρολογία (i.) either very few, or very pleasing words used to them; wrote back in answer thereto, That Kings must have, ἡσυχία, ἡσυχία (i.) either very few, or very honest things spoken to them. [Plutarch in the life of Solon.]

Ælope going from Sardes to Delphos, was there most unjustly sentenced to die; and accordingly was thrown down the rock there, called Pædrias, about the 54 olympiads, as Strabo; to wit, toward the end of the 4 year of that olympiads, if the precedent times be rightly calculated. Therewenge of which foule murder, so often threatened by the Oracle there, was taken afterward by Judmon, grandchild to that Judmon of the Isle of Samos; whose slave, together with Rhodope of Thracia, that famous trumpeter, Ælope sometime had been, [Herod. lib. 2. ca. 134.]

Solon, leaving Cæsius, went into Cilicia, and there built a city, and from his own name, called it Solos: wherein he planted certain Athenians, who in process of time, having corrupted the native language, were said Σολοικιστæ (i.) to commit to themselves in their speech; as Laertius in his life reporteth: which yet is more properly said of the Soloi in Cyprus, than of the Solonicæ in Cilicia; as Solon in his elegies written to Philonypus the King, recorded by Plutarch, in the life of Solon, shewes: where Plutarch also tells us, that this petty king of Cyprus, who made use of Solons wit and counsel, in some affairs of his own; removed a little town formerly called Epea, into a lower ground more fit and useful for habitation, and in honour of Solon, called it Solos.

After Solons departure, Cæsius, who deemed himself the happiest man alive; found by late experience, that all Solon had told him, of the instability of mans life, and felicity thereof, to be too true: for presently after he had a dream, wherein he saw his son Atys thrust thorough with a Spear: a true token of a violent death, which was effoon to befall him; which whilst he sought by all care and diligence to prevent, and was now busie about a marriage for him, one Adrastus a Phrygian borne, and of the Kings blood there, who having slain his own brother against his will, was by his father Midas, the son of Gordius, (not that old Midas, the son of Gordias King of Phrygia, whose Epitaph made by Homer and set upon his tombe, Herodotus in the life of Homer recounteth) banished, and came to Sardes, there to receive his expiation from Cæsius his hand: Cæsius having expiated or cleansed him, committed to him over and above, the care and charge of his son Atys; who at that time, was sent unto by the Mylians, and requested to come and help to kill a boar of a vast bigness, which wasted the corn and other country commodities growing about the hill Olympus, not without the destruction, many times, of the husbandmen themselves. Where Adrastus aiming at the boar with the point of his Spear, goaded Atys, and so against his will slew him. But when Cæsius had pardoned him the fact as done unawares, he flew himself upon the tombe of the deceased. Cæsius having thus lost his son; passed two whole years in continual dweil, and mourning for him: from which yet he was forced in the end to rouse himself, for fear of Cyrus, his growing then into power; and by whom indeed, he was afterward deposed of all, [Herod. lib. 1. from the 34. chapter to the 46.] whereof also you may see, what Crcfus, being made General of the confederate army of the Babylonians and others, passed the river Halys, which parted the dominions of Media and Lydia, without a bridge, by the skill, and industry of Thales the Milesian Philosopher, and came into Cappadocia: and there took the City of Peria: and all the Cities thereabout, utterly destroying the Syrians, who had deserved no ill at his hand: for that the Cappadocians were called Syrians by the Grecians, is testified by Herodotus, [lib. 1. c. 72.] Cyrus, having first sent to the Ionians to settle their pulse; and to try whether he could draw them over from Crcfus or no, fought a pitched battle with Crcfus, and it fell out to be a drawn battle between them: But the next day Crcfus, because Cyrus came not on upon him, returned to Sardes; where he meant to hang up his sword for that winter, and the beginning of the next spring, to march against the Persian again. In the mean while, he sent all his Auxiliaries to their own homes; and employed Ambassadors to such as were in league and friendship with him, among whom were the Lacedaemonians; giving order to all, to come to the Rendezvous at Sardes, upon the fifth month after: But when Crcfus had thus sent away, and scattered his army, then fell Cyrus upon him with all his forces; upon which sudden and unexpected approach of his; Crcfus, though much troubled, yet he went forth to fight with him, with such of his Lydians as he had about him, trust in principally in his troops of horse. Cyrus to cross him in that designe, placed his camels in front against them; the very smell of which beast, a horse cannot endure; and therefore all the horse of Crcfus presently turned taile, and carried their riders away with them: But the Lydians left their horses, and ranged themselves in battalion on foot: yet at last, many being slain on either side, they betook them to their heels: But the Persians pursuing the point of this victory, followed them to Sardes; which after 14 dayes lying before it, they took. Crcfus was condemned to the fire, but coming to the place of execution, and there crying out, O Solon, Solon, (whose wife counsell, concerning the instability of humane condition he had formerly so much deplored) Cyrus thereupon not only spared his life; but took him also into his privie counsell, Cyrus took care then of the funerals of Abradates the king of Sufa (who having fallen off from the king of Babylon to him, was slain in the battle) and of Panthea his Queen, who seeing her husband lying dead, flew her self over his dead body: and made them a huge and sumptuous monument, [Herod. lib. 1. from the 75th cap. to the 90th with Xenoph. Infrst. lib. 7. The collections out of Diod. Sic. by Hen. Valf. p. 241. Plut. in the life of Solon. Polyb. in his Infrst. lib. 7. in Cyrus and Crcfus: and Solinus in Polybist. lib. 1.] where he saith that Cyrus made his entry into Sardes, in the 28 Olympiade, to wit, in the 1 year thereof, as Eusebius hath it in Chron.

Crcfus, sending his shackles for a present to Delphos, complained all in vain, that he had been cheated by the Oracle there, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 90, 91.] When the men of Ionia and Eolia, would fain have submitted to Cyrus, upon the same conditions, that they had for merly lived in under Crcfus, Cyrus refused them; granting that only to the miletians, who fearing what might fall, had formerly made their peace with him, [Herodotus. c. 141. 143. 169.] The rest of the Greek Nations, fortifying each of them their own Cities, sent Pithemion of Phocaea, with other Ambassadors, to the Lacedaemonians, to crave aide of them: which though they refused to send, yet they sent their Ambassadors Lachnines to Cyrus, to forewarn him not to touch any of the Greeks in Asia; and he sent them word again, that he would shortly make them leave off caring for the Ionians, and the rest of the Greeks in Asia, and look to themselves at home, [Ibid. cap. 141. 152. 153.]

Thales the Milesian, gave them all advice to hold a Common Council at Teos, which was a City, seated in the very heart of Ionia, [Herod. lib. cap. 170.] whiles Cyrus remained at Sardes, and there made his provision of Rams and other Instruments of battery, purposing to raze the walls of all that stood out against him, the Carions sent and craved his help to compose a war which was grown among themselves. He sent thither Adusius, a Persian, with an army, in which service, the Cilicians and Cyprians very willingly followed him. Adusius put an end to their difference, yet so, as he left sufficient garriisons of his own, in the Cities of either party, [Xenoph. lib. 7. Infrst.]

In the 58 Olympiade, toward the end of the 1 year thereof, Thales the Milesian Philosopher, died, as Laertius reports out of Soficrates; and Anaximander his countryman first observed the Loxodromic, or biasing motions of the stars, in the Zodiac, as Pliny, out of other authors saies, [lib. 1. cap. 8.] though Plutarch in his 2 book, de Placitis Philosophorum, hath more rightly informed us that that point of Astronomy was not unknown to Thales the Milesian, Anaximanders master: And that he himself, in the 2 year of this Olympiade, at the age of 64 years, died, Laertius tells us, out of the Chronicle of Apollodorus the Athenian, of whose Mathematical inventions, he further addeth out of Phavorinus, that he first invented the making of the Dial, and set it up in Sparta, in a place, fit to receive the shadow of the sun; as, saith he, Phavorinus reporteth in his Varia Historica: adding further, that he also invented the Horoscopes; for the finding out the equinoctials and Solstices for the Dials: to find out the hour of the day by is, one thing, and the Horoscope, or instrument whereby to observe the Equinoctials, and the Tropicks, or the summer and winter winter solstice, is another: though Pliny attributes the invention of the Dial and Clock to Anaximenes his scholar, and fellow citizen, [lib. 2. ca. 76.] in these words: This rule and reason of shadows, which we use to call Chronological, or Dial-work, was first found out by Anaximenes, Anaximanders scholar; and he was the first that set up a Scithaerium, (i. a Dial to show what a clock, in Sparta: v. d. sup. in the year of the World, 3291.

Anaximenes the son of Eurytraus succeeded Anaximander in his schpole at Miletus; as Clemens [Alexanders, in his a book of his Stromata,] shewes: but Pythagoras, when both his masters, Anaximander and Anaximenes were dead, went into Egypt; as Thales had advised him to do: being commended to Amasis King of Egypt, by a letter from Polycrates of Samos, as Laertius in his life reporteth: which Amasis, it seemeth, the Egyptians (surnamed Sommeisfortum). For that in his reign, Pythagoras came into Egypt; Pliny in his 36, book, cap. 9. sheweth: and there he continued 22 years, conversing with the Priests, and from them it was that he learned his skill and knowledge in Astroonomy and Geometry; and was catechised or initiated in all their rites and ceremonies, as saith [Lamblichus, in the life of Pythagoras; ca. 3. and 4.] for therefore also was he circumcised by them, that being admitted into the secrets of their religions, he might the more freely partake of the mystical philosophy of the Egyptians: in the attaining whereof, he was principally beholding to one Sonchides, the Arch-prophet among them, [Tem. Alvan. lib. 1. Strom.] This Sonchides, I take to be him of Sais, with whom Solon had formerly much conversed, as Plutarch in his life reporteth. And from them it was that Pythagoras learned his Metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls out of one body into another, as Diador. Sic. reporteth: and being used to their books, and diving into their writings, concerning former times, he thence pickt out the observations of innumerable by passages, saith, [Valer. Max. lib. 8. c. 7.]

Hyttalpes and Adusius, joining together, conquered all Phrygia bordering upon the Hellespont; and took the King thereof, and brought him prisoner to Cyrus, [Xenoph. Infrst. lib. 7.]

Cyrus committing Sardes to the keeping of Tabalus a Persians borne, and delivering the treasure of Crcfus, and the rest of the Lydians with him, little regarding how matters went in Ionia: but no sooner was Cyrus gone from Sardes, but Pactyas forthwith perwaded the Lydians to revolt from Cyrus, and from Tabalo, the Governour there; and laying out the Kings treasure, to hire souldiers from other parts, drave Tabalo into the Castle and there beleagied him very straitly: whereof when Cyrus was advertised upon the way; by the advice of Crcfus, he sent back Mazares a Median, with a part of his army, who darning the Lydians, brought them to follow a more idle course of life, [Herod. lib. 1. from the 153. to the 157. chap.] and for a Nation formerly famous for laboriousness, power, and chivalry, falling into effeminacy and luxury, lost their courage, and all kind of virtue, as saith Justin. out of Trogius, lib. 1. ca. 7.

Mazares redeemed Pactyas of the Cumans, unto whom he was fled out of the Castle. The Cumans consulted the Oracle at Branchis, and received from thence an answer, That they should deliver him up yet they not willing, either to give him up to be slain by the Persians (being much diswaded therefrom by Aristodocus the son of Heraclides, a man of great authority among them) or by keeping him, to draw Cyrus his displeasure upon their city to their own destruction, they sent him away safe to Mylene. And when the Muylenians were ready to give him up, the Cumans again sent a Ship to Lesbos and there took him in, and conveyed him to Chios: and the Chii drew him by force out of the temple of Minerva there, and delivered him up to Mazares: and had in reward therefore Atracneum a place in Mytia, lying over against Lesbos given them, [Herod. lib. 1. from cha. 157. to cha. 160.] though Plutarch seeks to justify both the Mitylenians and the Chii in this point, in his book, of the malignity of Herodotus, upon this ground, for that a more ancient Historian than he; to wit, Caron of Lampiscus, tells the matter simply in this wise. Pactyas hearing of the approach of the Persian Army, fled first to Mylene, and then to Chios, and there Cyrus took him.

Mazares having gotten Pactyas into his power, marched presently against those, who with him, had assaulted Tabalas: and in part subdued the inhabitants of Priene, partly wasted the country lying upon the Mazander, and gave both it, and the city of Magnefia for a prey to his souldiers, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 161.]

Harpagus, who was a chief man about Cyrus, went with his army against Ionia, and fought with them (as Eusebius in his Chron. upon the 2 year of the 59 Olympiade noteth) for Mazares dying of a disease, Harpagus (whom some erroneously call Harpalus) was made General in his place. And he coming into Ionia, fell presently to entrencing round about, and blocking up their cities where ever he came, and thereby took Paoceas, the chief city of all Ionia, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 162.]

The Phoeaens, abandoning the city, which they could not hold, thipt themselves, their wives and children, and put over into Chios: whence returning upon an o-

cation offered, to Phocæa, they there put to the sword all the garison, which Hærgæus had there left to keep it : and from thence set sail again, and came to the Illes of Centauri, and from thence failed to the Ille of Cyrtus, all Corfica, where 20 years before they had made a plantation, and there built a city called Alatia: where when they had staid five years, and made all the neighbouring countries weary of them, by their robbing and spoiling the Italians and Carthaginians, let out a navy of 60 ships, and had a fleet fight with them; wherein the Phocæans, having gotten the victory; but with much blood staving, getting it, and 40 of their ship, removed themselves to Regium in Italy; and there built the city Hyela, afterward called Velia in the territory of Cenotria, [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 164.] Lucius alludes also, [lib. 7. of his birth] confirms it, that the Phocæans, which built Velicellus, gave the Carthaginians an overthrow at sea, for that one part of them built Velia, and another Marellis, in the time of Servius Tullius king of Rome, quoted by A. 600 years after the coming of Aeneas into Italy, testified by Hyginus, quoted by A. Gellius [lib. 10. Noct. Atticae, cap. 6.] and of this colony of the Marellis, or Phocæans, A. allude in his Archidamian making mention; see before in the year 1464, from 1464

But to return to Harpagus, the Teians sail, when he had untretheth himself round about their city, got them on shipboard, and sailed away into Thracæ, and there built them a city called Abdera, the foundations whereof Timeus, a man of Cleomenes had laid; as was noted before, in the year of the world 3349. But the rest of the Ionians, all save the Milietians, who had before-hand made a league with Cyrus, being vanquished one after another, fell into Harpagus his hand, and being suffered to live every man in his own country, paid what was imposed upon them, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 168, 169.] yet Bias of Priene, chief of all the wife men of Greece, when, though thus afflicted, they would needs assemble in their old Common Council of Ionia, called Panionium, counselled them, that they should rather make a common navy, and sail away, to Sardinia, and there make a common city for all Ionians to inhabit in; for, laich he, by this means, you shall be free from this slavery, and live happily, [Herod. lib. ix. cap. 170.] from this slavery, and live happily. [Hered. lib. 1. cap. 170.]

499. ^c Cyrus, when he had now brought into his subjection all the continent westward, forthwith made war upon the Assyrians; and marched with his army, against Babylonius, & Nabonidus their king. [Hered. lib. 1. cap. 178. & 181.] whereat a fame was spread, and came to the Babylonians ears, two full years before the city was besieged. [Ibid. 184. & 186.] for when Cyrus was upon his march toward Babylon, he came to the river Guides, which falls into the Tigris, which for want of boats, he could not pass. And while he stayed there, one of the white horses, which were consecrate to the Ion, going into the river, was there by the violence of the river swallowed up, and drowned, which Cyrus upon very grievously, surceased his journey for Babylon; for that time, and fell to work upon the river, which he drew out into 360 several channels, so that, (as he had threatened to make it) a woman might passe over it, and never wet a knee in it: in which work, he spent all that summer. [Hered. lib. 1. cap. 189, 190, 202. with the fifth book, cap. 52.]

3465. ^{cap. 52.} In the year following, Cyrus went on his way to Babylon: where, in a pitch field, fought
b. the year following, Cyrus went on his way to Babylon: where, in a pitch field, fought the two great Lords of the world, Cyrus and Belshazzar, or Nabonidus: so Chaldeans being put to the worth, retired to the city, resolved to endure a siege. [Hered.
lib. 1, cap. 130. Jerem. 51. 27, 28, 30.] which they made light of; both because they had above 20 years provision in it, and also because they thought there were many in Cyrus his army, who bare more good wil to them, than to the Persians; [Hered. lib. Xenophon. Infir.
lib. 7.]

Cyrus caused presently a vast trench, both for breadth and depth, to be cast round about the wall of the city, casting up the earth ever toward his own army, and making store of bulworks all along; for guards to be upon, and dividing his whole army into twelve parts, ordered, that every of them, should watch his month by turnes. [Xenophon. lib. 7.]

Cyrus, when he had spent much time in this work to little purpose, at last, drew a ditch from the river to that vast pond, which was every way 3 or 4 hundred furlongs wide, which this Belshazzar mother Nicotris had formerly digged; as I shewed before: and then opening the mouths of: this and that other ditch, which he had newly callt about the city, I let out the river into them, and so made the channel thereof, which was not above two furlongs broad, passable for his men, [Herod, lib. 2. cap. 190. Xenophon Infinita lib. 7. with Jeremy 53. cap. 35.]

Cyrus passing now the river with his army, guards up the water-gates, and sealing every where the rampiers, [and] got into the city, upon a festival day, whiles all men there, were buffed in their bays, [Id. ib. with Jerem 51. 39, 57.] And fo vappily big was that city, that the inhabitants reported, when the skirts it of was flattened, and taken by the enemy, they who dwelt in the heart of the city, never heard thereof; [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 191.] to which that of that Jeremy, 51. 31. hath reference, where he saith, thus saith the Lord, upon poft, and messenger upon messenger shall run to tell the king of Babylon, thus all the skirts of the city were poffelled by the enemies.

At the same time, Belshazzar purposing to feast all his nobles, caused to be brought forth all the vessels of the house of the Lord, which Nebuchadnezzar his father, or grand-father (for that he was his son, may be gathered out of Jer. 27. 7.) had brought away from Jerusalem, to the glory of his Idols, and dishonour of the true God : and God, on the other side, by sending a hand to write upon the wall of the room, where Belshazzar late drinking, the number of years which the Babylonish Empire was to continue; and that it had been now weighed in the balance, and was found too light; and was therefore to be transferred to, and settled upon the Medes : evidently declared, what present destruction was to fall upon him. But when his wizards of Chalde, could not read the writing, the Queen advised him to send for Daniel, who, when he came, both read the writing, and could give him the interpretation of it, and for his pains, was publicly proclaimed, the third man in the kingdom; [Dan. 5. 1] But whereas the kings wives are afraid to have been present at the banquet, [verse 2. 3.] and the Queen to have come in afterward, [verse 10.] this is to be understood of the Queen-mother, Nitocris, for that she was the mother of this last king of Babylon, we have already shewn out of Herodotus.

In the same night, that this banquet was made, was Balthazar the king of the Chaldeans slain, [Dan. 5. 30.] by the soldiers of Gobryas, and Gadatas, [Xen. lib. 7. diff. 1.] and by the Babylonian kingdom came to an end, as had been sundry times foretold; as by [Ezra. 1. chap. 13, 14, 21, 34, 46, 47. Habbakkuk, chap. 2. and Jerem. cap. 25, 50, 51.] and the Empire translated to the Medes and Persians; [Daniel 5. 21. chap. 6. 12, 15.]

132, 15.] Darius the Mede, son of Astyages, the son of Astyages, took upon him the kingdom, delivered to him by Cyrus the conqueror, [Dan. 5. 31. and chap. 9. 1.] for whom Cyrus had set apart the kings house, and all his palaces in Babylon, to the end, that if upon occasion he should come thither, he might have a Palace of his own to lodge in; [Xenophon, Infinit. lib. 8.] and the Angels, in this first year of his reign, is said to have confirmed and strengthened him in his kingdom; [Dan. 1. 1.] after which he reigned 20 years.

Cyrus, having fed all things in order at Babylon, returned through Media into Persia, to his father Cambyfes, and Mandana his mother, who were yet living, and from thence, returning again into Media, married the only daughter and heir of Cyaxares, and from dowry had the whole kingdom of Media, given him with her: and the marriage finished, he presently went his way, and took her with him: and coming to Babylon, from thence, he sent Governors into all his Dominions: Megabyzus into Arabia; Artacarnan into Phrygia the greater, Chryfantas into Lydia and Ionia, Adulfus into Caria, Pharmichas into Phrygia Hellespontica, &c. the lesser; but into Cilicia and Cyprus, and Paphlagonia, he sent no Persians to govern them, because they seemed voluntary, and of their own accord to have taken his part against the king of Babylon: yet he made even them also to pay him tribute. (Xen. Infir. lib. 3.) him tribute, [Xen. Infid. lib. 5.]

Now all the countries, which he subdued by the forces of Media, of which himself was General, Cyrus ever professed that he laid them to the dominions of Cyaxares, [Xen. l. 5.] and therefore it is most likely that at the former meeting in Council, he made that distinction of the Governments by his advice, for as Xenophon [lib. 8.] saith of Cyrus, It seemed good unto him, so [to] Governours over all the Nations which he had subdued: So the prophet Dani. i. who, as it seemeth, went at this time with Cyrus from Babylon into Media to assist Cyaxares, It seemed goods to Darius; to five over the kingdoms, 120 Governours, that the faith of Cyaxares, It seemed goods to Darius; to five over the kingdoms, 120 Governours, that the faith beaver all the Kingdom, [Dan. 6. 1.] yet over all the Governours he made three vicer-veers, the principal of which was Daniel: whereupon it was that the self, thirrethor uply a spirit of envy against him, put into the kings head to make a Decree, that for six daies space, no Petition should be made to any God or man, but to himself only: which Decreee when Daniel had broke, by making his prayer unto God; he was cast into the Lyons den: and thence delivered without hurt done at all unto him: and then Darius, having cast those plotters against Daniel into the same Lyons den, published that memorable Decreee through all his dominions, that every man therein, should reverence, and stand in awe of Daniels God, [Dan. 6.]

4177. 537. Toward the end of the first year of the reign of Darius the Mede, to be reckoned from the subversion of the Babylonish Empire, began the 70 year of the Babylonish captivity of the Jews, which began under Jehoiakim, in the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, which was the last of those years of their calamity (specified by [Jer. 29. 10.]) Thus saith the Lord, when the 70 years shall be to the fullness in Babylon, then will I visit you, and perform that my good word unto you, and will bring you again to this place, and when you shall call upon me to depart from thence, and when you shall pray unto me, then will I hear you. Upon consideration of which very time, now to near approaching, it was that Daniel poured out that most fervent prayer, for the remission of his own sins, and of his peoples; and for that promised deliverance out of their captivity: whereupon the Angel Gabriel brought him an answer, not only for this, but also concerning the spiritual deliverance of the Church, to be wrought

It is of the same stamp with that other cited by Lucian, out of the same Onesicritus in his discourse, De Longævis, or of long-lived men, that Cyrus missing at last those friends of his his, which his son Cambyzes had made away, when he had lived an hundred years, died for grief.

Cyrus left his kingdom to his eldest son Cambyzes, and to his younger son, Tanyoxarces, al. Tanyoxarces, whom Herodotus calls Smerdis, Justin out of Trogus calls Merdis, he left as Ctesias saies, the Ignominies or Commandries, of Bactria, Choromies, Parthia and Caramania, but as Xenophon, [Isid. lib. 8.] of the Medes, Armenians, and Cadusians.

In the entrance of the king-dom of Ahasuerus (for by that name is Cambyzes known in the language of the Scripture) the Samaritans, who had hitherto fought secretly to undermine the Israelites, now openly framed a direct information in writing to the king against the inhabitants of Juda and Jerusalem, [Ez. 4. 6.] for they knew very well, what difference there was between the father and the sons nature and disposition; for that Cyrus was naturally kind and loving to those that were under him, and the other furious by nature, and sudden in his resentments, as Diad. Sic. rightly observeth of him, in his Excerptis, published by Hen. Valsius, [p. 238, 249.] with Herodotus, [l. 3. c. 89.]

This was the 2 Sabbathal year held by the Jewes after their returne from Babylon.

Cambaphes an Eunuch, who could do all in all with the king of Egypt, by the means of his cousin germane, Ihabat an Eunuch likewise, who could do also as much with Cambyzes king of Persia, betrayed the bridges, passages and other things to the Persian, upon promise made him, that he for his pains, should have the Government of Egypt, conferred upon him, [Ctes. lib. 3. Persecutum.]

In pursuance whereof, Cambyzes gathered an army: whereof his land companies consisted, as of sundry other Nations, to among them, of Grecians, out of Ionia and Eolia in Asia; but his sea forces principally of Sidonians and Cyprians, who had freely submitted to him; Polyocrates also, the king or tyrant of Samos, furnished him with 40 sail of ships, all men of war, and into them he put all such as he suspected for enemies at home, desiring Cambyzes that he would spend them there, and never send them home again, [Herod. lib. 3. c. 1. 19. 44.]

Phanes of Halicarnassus, a chief man among the aides of Egypt; and well versed in their affairs, but one that bare a hate to Amasis, seeing Cambyzes preparing war against Egypt, fled over to him: and disclosed to him many secrets of the land of Egypt, and hiding Cambyzes much troubled how he should pass through the deserts that lay in his way, for want of water, advised him to send to the king of Arabia, to obtain leave to pass through his country; [Id. lib. 3. c. 7.] for against his will, there was no passing for him, to the borders of Egypt, [Id. c. 88.]

The king of Arabia, making a league with Cambyzes, by the messengers that were sent unto him, sent all his camels laden with borachos or lethren bags full of water to the places by which Cambyzes with his army was to pass; and there attended his coming, [Id. lib. c. 9.]

Cambyzes coming with his army into Egypt, found Amasis newly dead, when he had reigned 44 years, [Id. lib. c. 9. & 10.] Diad. Sic. lib. 1. Bitholus, tells us, that he died, when Cambyzes began his war in Egypt, in the 1. year of the 3 year of the 63 Olympiads; after whom, his son Plammenites, (whom Ctesias calleth Amyrtes) reigned 6 months, [Herod. l. 3. c. 14.] in whose reign it rained at Thebes, which in the upper part of Egypt is taken for a great prodigie, [Id. c. 10.]

The Persians, having passed those fardie dry deserts of Arabia, late down upon the edge of Egypt, [Id. c. 11.]

But Cambyzes coming at last to besiege Pelusium, caused cats and dogs, and sheep, and birds called Ibides, and all kinds of living creatures, which the Egyptians worship for gods, to be placed in the front of his army; whereat the Egyptians being troubled, for fear of hurting their own gods, forbore shooting at the enemy, and so Cambyzes taking Pelusium, got an entrance into, and a footing in Egypt, [Polyem. in the 7 book of Stratag.]

They that came to assist the Egyptians, as the Grecians and Carians, in hatred of Phanes who had been a chief instrument in conducting this foreign army into Egypt, slew his sons, whom he had there left, before his eyes, and drinking up their blood, fell a skirmishing with him, [Her. l. 3. c. 11.]

After a sharpe encounter, where in many were slain on either side, the Egyptians fled; [Id. lib. 3.]

Cambyzes, sent a Persian Herald up the river in a ship of Mitylene, to Memphis, whither the Egyptians in great disorder and confusion were fled, to exhort them to render themselves; but the men of the city salied out upon the ship, took her, brake or burnt her, and having cut all the men in her, into gobbets, brought them into the city; and afterward endured the siege for some short time, [Id. lib. 3. c. 13.]

Arcesilaus, son of Batus the Lame, and of Phocetima his wife; yielded up Cyrene to Cambyzes, and submitted to pay him tribute, [Id. l. 4. c. 16.] for they of Cyrene, y and the Barcaei, and the Lybians, bordering upon Egypt, terrified with his successe against their neighbours neighbours the Egyptians, rendered them selves unto him, and sent their presents to Cambyzes and Cambyzes took what came from the Lybians graciously, and in good part; but those of the Cyrenians, not so, because they were so small, for they sent him onely five hundred pounds, which he took, and threw among the Souldiers, [Id. lib. 3. cap. 13. and cap. 91.]

Ten dayes after he had taken the walls of Memphis, he had thought to try the patience of Plammenites, whom in contempt of him, he had with other Egyptians, committed to prison, in the suburbs of the city, sending his daughter with other maidens of the prime nobility of Egypt, with pitchers on their arms to the river, to fetch him water; and sending his young son, with two thousand more of the same age, and all principally noble mens sons with ropes about their necks, and bridles in their mouths, to be hamellut-pur to death: all which was done, in revenge of those Mitylenians, whom being sent in a ship to Memphis, they had murdered the kings Judges, having so ordered, that for every Mitylenian then slain, ten of the chief of the Egyptians should be put to death, and among them, in the first place, Plammenites his own son, whom Cambyzes would have saved, but, when it was too late. But the father himself lived afterward with Cambyzes, without violence, or other wrong done too his person: till at last, being convicted of stirring up the people to a new rebellion, he drank bulls blood, and died, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 14. 15.] though Ctesias saies that he was sent away prisoner, to live in Susa.

Cambyzes marching from Memphis, came with his army before the city Sais; where coming into the palace of Amasis, against whom he undertook this war, he caused his body to be haled out of his vault, and to be brought before him, and causing his carcase to be whipt with scourges, and all kind of reproach and contumely to be used upon it, then caused it to be consumed with fire, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 16. and Diad. Sic. in his Excerptis published by Hen. Valsius, pag. 249.]

Cambyzes having thus conquered Egypt, in the 5 year of his monarchy; he reigned in it 3 years, [Jul. African. and Ensebj. in Chron. Græc. pag. 17.] having slain fifty thousand of the Egyptians in fight, and sent away seven thousand of them prisoners to Susa, [Ctes.]

Iamblichus reporteth, that Pythagoras was among the rest then also taken and sent away to Babylon, where he converted with the Chaldeans, [Iamblich. in his Life], and another writer of his life, namely Malchus, al. Paphyrus, saith, that at Babylon, he not onely converted with the other Chaldeans, but applied himself also to Zabratus, and that he was by him purified and cleansed from the sins of his former life. This Zabratus is thought by some, to have been that Nazareus of Assyria, whom Alexander, (Polyhistor I think) in his book of Pythagorickall opinions, makes to have been Pythagoras his master, and some others mistaking the matter, judge to have been the prophet Ezekiel, as Clement of Alexandria, [lib. 1. Strom.] relateth. But this sheweth, that he did converse with the wise-men of the Jews in Babylon, for that he made use of many of their opinions afterwards, in the course of his Philosophy, as Hermippus, in his first book of Pythagoras, quoted by Josephus [lib. 1. cont. Apion.] and in his first book of Law-makrs. cited by Origen, [lib. 1. cont. Celsum.] reporteth, And no little doth Aristobolus the Jew, a Pripaticke Philosopher, in his first book to Phylomator, as we find in Clements of Alex. lib. 1. Strom. and as Ensebj. (lib. 13. Prepar. Evangel.) affirms; and upon the same ground believes, that the books of Moses were translated into Greek, before the Persian Monarchy began: whereas it is far more likely, that that part of his learning and knowledge, by converting with the Jewish Babylon; for that Pythagoras had familiarity and discourse with them also, appeareth by Pyrrhies in his Life, out of Diogenes, in his Sixtus dicitur (i. e. of the incredible relation made of Thule).

Cambyzes also was about to prepare a navy, to go against the Carthaginians: but gave it off, for that the Sidonians, upon whom he was most to rely, for that kind of service, refused to go against their own Colony and kindred: mean while, he sent for some of the Hebichophages, from the city Elephantina; who of all others in those parts, were most versed in the Ehyopian language; and sent them for so many spies, to the Ehyopians called Macrobi; because they are generally very long lived, and inhabit the lower parts of Africa, bordering upon the fourth sea; yet under colour of carrying presents to their king, and to see The Table of the Sun. The king of Ethiopia in the presence of those, whether Embassadors or spies, took his bow, and bent it, and then unbent it again, and so gave it them, to carry it to Cambyzes, and bad them tell him, that when his Persians should be able to easily to bend such bows as those, he should then, and not before begin to get him an excessive great army, and come fight with the long lived Ehyopians, [Herod. lib. 3. from chap. 17. to chap. 25.]

Smerdis, al. Tanyoxarces, Cambyzes his full Brother, assaying to bend this bow, came within two fingers breadth of the nock, which none other of all the Persians could do, for very envy whereof, Cambyzes presently dismissed and sent him away into Persia, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 30.]

4190. 524.

Cambyſes in a rage, gave order out of hand for a voyage into Ethiopia; wthout provision made of corn, or other victual: not re-counting with himſelf, that he was to go to the furtheſt end, as it were of the world, but like a bedlam-man, ſo ſoon as he had heard what his Iſchthyophages had ſaid, marched away inſtantly with all his own foot, commanding the Grecians to ſtay behind; [Id. ib. cap. 4.]

When he came as far as Thebes in Egypt, he there called out about 50 thouland men of his army, and lent them to rob firſt, and then to burn the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, and to make ſlaves of all the inhabitants of the place: but himſelf marched forward towards Eritopia; [Id. ib. Diodor. Sic. in his Excerpta, published by Hen. Valeſ. pag. 249.]

In that voyage, Cambyſes ſubdued the Ethiopians, which bordered upon the lower parts of Egypt, which inhabit the city Niſa, and keep holy-days to Bacchus, [Herod. lib. 3. c. 97.] and there, unto Saba the chief houſe or palace, of the king of the Ethiopians and the Iſland wherein it ſtood, he gave the name of Merocis, in memory of Meroc, who was both wife and ſiſter to him. [Sirabo. lib. 17. of his Geogr. Joſephus. l. 2. Antiq. uſq. a. cap. 10.] for ſhe accompanied him into Egypt, and there died, and her he had married, a thing ſtrange, and never heard of before in Perſia, and not long after, he married his elder ſiſter alſo, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 31.] called Attoſſa: who after his death was married alſo, to Magus, and after him to Darius Hyſtaſpis, [Id. cap. 68. and 88.]

The army which went from Thebes againſt the Ammonians, having travelled ſeven dayes journey over the land, came at length to the city, Oaſis, (which city was inhabited by thoſe Samians, which were of the Eſſicionian tribe) and from thence, to a country called Batorum inſula, (i. e.) the Iſle of the happy ones, and as they marched from thence, over the ſandy plains, and were at dinner, in the mid-way between Oaſis and Ammonia, it is ſaid, that the earole, a mighty ſtrong winde out of the South, which brought thoſe moveable ſands upon them, and overwhelmed them all. [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 26. juſt. lib. 1. cap. 9.] Plutarch in the life of Alexander, ſaith, that there were 50 thouland men loſt in the land, that time, (i. e.) that the whole army that went, every man of them were drowned in that deludage of quick ſands.

As for the Army which went forward with him againſt the Ethiopians, they had not gone five dayes march, but all provisions ſaid them: and a little after they had no hopes left them to eat, and when ſtill they went on, and came to the ſands, they were then fain to caſt lots, and to eat up one another, which when Cambyſes ſaw, he returned, and came back to Thebes, having ſpent a multitude of his army, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 25. Seneca, lib. 2. cap. 30.] of his naſural queſtions, of whom Lucan alſo ſpeaking, ſaith,

And mad Cambyſes, marching toward the Eaſt,
Came to the long-liv'd Ethiopians:
And wanting food, his own men up did eat;
And yet the Head of Niſus never found.

Cambyſes returning to Memphis, diſcharged his Grecians; and ſhipt them there to be gone, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 25.] But when he there ſaw the Egyptians keeping holy-day, becauſe their god Apis had appeared to them, he conceiving they had done it for joy of his diſaſtarpus voyage, ſent for Apis to be brought unto him, and ran his own (word into him, commanding all his prieſts to be ſcourged with whips, and the reſt of the Egyptians, which were found keeping holy-day, to be ſlain by his ſoldiers. Apis being ſo wounded by him, pined away in the Temple, and died, and the prieſts took the body of the beaſt, and ſecretly buried it, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 25, 28, 29.]

For this cauſe, the Egyptians ſay, that Cambyſes, being not otherwiſe overwell in his wits, fell ſtark mad; which appeared firſt in cauſing his own brother to be kill'd: for having ſent him away, formerly into Perſia, (as was ſaid before) he now dreamt, that a meſſenger came to him from thence, who told him, that Smerdis, ſitting in the regal throne, touched the Heavens with his head: wherefore Cambyſes, being ſatisfied with this dream, he forthwith diſpatched away Prexalpes, who was being intimate with him of all the Perſians, to kill his brother Smerdis, and he accordingly coming to Suſa, cauſed him to be murdered, having drawn him forth, as ſome ſay, upon a hunting match: but as others report, that having toiled him along, as far as the Red ſea; he there threw him in, and drowned him, [Id. cap. 30. and 36.] But Juſtin out of Trogus, lib. 1. cap. 9. ſaith, that this charge was committed to Cometes, one of the Magi, and that he murdered not this Meges, for by that name Smerdis goes in him (until after Cambyſes was dead; Cecias, purpoſely (as his manner was) diſſenting from Herodotus tells us a quite other tale; That Spendabates, one of the Magi, having been ſcourged by Tanyaxares, that iſy this Smerdis his command, accuſed him to Cambyſes, of ſeeking to make himſelf king; And that by the advice of this Spendabates, he was ſent for out of Baſtria into Egypt, and was there made to drink Bulls blood, and thereof died; and that he himſelf was ſent back into Baſtria, and there, becauſe he was in all lineaments of face and body, very like unto him, ruled alſo, as if he had been very Tanyaxares, or Smerdis himſelf.

he

After Harpagus, Oretes a Perſian born, being made Governour of Sardes, and of all the Provinces of Lydia, Ionia, and Phrygia, by Cyrus, is ſaid to have ſent a meſſenger to Polycrates of Samos, to aſk him about a certain matter; and that Polycrates then happening to be lying upon his bed in his chamber (Anacreon the Teian, that excellent Lyric Poet of Ionia, and who, as Clem. Alexand. ſayes, was the firſt inventor of Love-Songs, ſitting by) vouchſafed the meſſenger not ſo much as a look, much leſſe an answer. And Oretes reſolving to be revenged of him for this affront, ſent one Myrtus a Lydian born, the ſon of Gyges, in an other meſſage; to tell him, that himſelf for fear of Cambyſes, would ſaine flee over to him, with all his treaſure. Polycrates giving overhaſtly credit hereto, to haſten the matter, went himſelf unto him, carrying one Democedes, a Phyſician of Crotona in Italy, along with him; and when he came as far as Magnesia toward him; there Oretes took and crucified him: letting the Samians who came with him go; the reſt, and among them this Democedes, he took and made his bondſervants, [Herod. lib. 3. from ca. 126. to 127.] But Faler. Max. [lib. 6. cap. ult.] relates, that he was crucified by Oretes, (for ſo he calls him, with Tully, lib. 3. de Fimbria) Governour under King Darius, upon the top of the mount Mycala; to wit, in that fore-land of Ionia, which looks toward Samos: where as yet Darius at that time, was but one of the guards to Cambyſes, and of no ſuch high place or authority among the Perſians: as appears out of, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 139. and cap. 140.] where he ſaith, that in Cambyſes his expedition into Egypt, Syſion the brother of Polycrates, pretended him with a moſt rich robe publicly at Memphis, whence came the proverb; Syſion robe: and he alſo ſayes, that Polycrates came to that foul end, at what time Cambyſes was ſcarce his own man in Egypt, [Id. ca. 130.] and with him agrees [Pliny lib. 33. ca. 1.] where he ſaith, that this fell out in the 230. year after the building of Rome, which according to Varro his account; and which for the moſt part he follows; falls upon the 64 Olym-piade.

Cambyſes ſeeing his wife Meroc take on, as he did, for the death of her brother Smerdis, diſpatched her out of the way, too, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 31. 32.]

In the 7 year of Cambyſes, the 22. year of Nabonſſſſers calling, upon the 17 day of the month Phamenoth, with the Egyptians, (16 day of our July) one hour before mid-night, the Moon was eclipſed at Babylon, [Plut. in his, Mag. Syntax. lib. 5. c. 14.]

Cambyſes: tho't Prexalpes his ſon, who was his cup-bearer thorough with an arrow: and the day following, cauſed 12 principal men more of the Perſians who had done no hurt at all, to be buried alive, with their heads downward. He gave order alſo, that Cecias, who had ſome time been King of Lydia, onely becauſe he had in a fair and friendly manner admoniſhed him not to do ſuch things, to be put to death. But repenſing him ſoon after, he was glad that execution was not done upon him; Many like mad put them to death who were appointed to do, and had not done it. Many like mad praunkes played he, both upon Perſians, and alſo upon other friends of his, while he remained at Memphis: he opened many of their Sepulchres to ſee the bodies of thoſe who exceed lay buried in them; going upon a time into the Temple of Vulcan, he laughed exceedingly, and jeered at his image there; and another time going into the temple of the Cabire, where it was not lawful for any to have acceſſe; but for the Prieſts onely; and having ſpent many a jeſt upon the images which he ſaw there, he cauſed them all to be conſumed with fire, [Herod. lib. 3. from ca. 34. to ca. 38.] The reſt of their temples, partly he burnt down, partly he pull'd down, and partly he detaced, and mangled; as alſo he did their Ocellis, [Sirabo lib. 17.]

Patzithes one of the Magi, whom he had left Overſeer of his private eſtate at home, having gotten knowledge of Smerdis his death, which was kept very cloſe, and known to very few of the Perſians, ſet his own brother, whole name was alſo Smerdis; and very like him both in ſtature and feature, upon the Kingly throne: and forthwith poſted away meſſengers into all parts, and among the reſt, to the army in Egypt; that from thence forward they ſhould obey none, but Smerdis, Cyrus his ſon, and not Cambyſes: ſo Herodotus, [lib. 3. ca. 61.] for Juſtin out of Trogus, lib. 1. ca. 9. ſayes, that Cometes one of the Magi, having killed Meges, al. Smerdis, (to whom the kingdom indeed belonged after Cambyſes) ſet up his own brother Oropates, who was very like him in the lineaments of his face and body, as was ſaid before, But Cecias writes, that Bagabates the Eunuch, and Artayras an Myrcanian borne, (both which were with Cambyſes in Egypt, and of great authority about him) took counſel, while Cambyſes was yet living, how to ſet up Spendadates, one of the Magi alſo, who was very like unto Smerdis whiles he lived; and after Cambyſes death, did proclaim him King.

Cambyſes was answered by the Oracle of Ecabane in Media, where alſo his treaſure lay, die at Ecabane: which the underſtood of Ecabane in Media, where alſo his treaſure lay.

But

But as he lay at Ecbatane in Syria, the messenger brought him word, what the commandment of Patiziches was: who hearing of the conspiracy that was against him, presently leapt to horse, purposing in all haste to march with his army to Sula, against the conspirators; but as he was leaping, his sword fell out of his scabbard: and ran into his thigh. Upon the twentieth day after which accident, hest for the Nobles of Persia to come unto him, unto whom he made known both the slaughter of his brother, and the treason of the Magi, against himself: requiring them by no means to suffer the kingdom to return to the Medes, (for the Magus was a Median born as may be gathered out of Herodotus, lib. 3. cap. 73. and cap. 126.) and soon after, his wife being fettering, he died, when he had reigned only 7 years and 5 months. [Herodotus, lib. 3. from cap. 62. to 66.] Josephus tells us that in his return out of Egypt, he dyed at Damalus, [lib. 11. Antig. cap. 3.] putting Herodotus instead of Herodotus his Ecbatane in Syria. Ctesias will have it, that he came as far as Babylon: and that there he took his wound, and died of it, writing of his death, and the foregoing signes and presages thereof in this manner.

When Cambyles was offering sacrifices, and the beasts' throats were cut, there came no blood out, at which he was much amazed, and Roxane bare him a boy without a head, and that amazed him much more, and the Magi told him, that this portended, that he should leave no successor of his own blood behind him. His mother also appearing to him in a dream, seemed to threaten him destruction, for his brother's death, which troubled him yet more than all the rest, and that when he was come to Babylon, and there fate whitening a little stick with a knife, to spend the time, he by chance hurt there-with a muscle in his thigh, whereof he dyed the 11 day after: [Ctesias.] But at his departure out of Egypt, he left Artaxerxes to govern it, in his stead.

When Cambyles was now dead, little thought the Persians that they had got a Magus to be their king: but that his brother indeed, had succeeded him in the kingdom, appeared, when Prexalpes stood to it, that he never kill'd him, nor was it in truth false for him now to confesse that he had killed a son of Cyrus with his own hand, [Herod. lib. 3. c. 66.] and the matter it self was therefore the more easie to be concealed, because among the Persians, it was ever held for a point of state, to have the person of the king seldom sent abroad [Justin. lib. 1. c. 9.] and so it came to passe, that this Magus, bearing himself for Smerdes, Cyrus's son, as being of the same name, and very like him, held the kingdom seven whole months quietly, which served to make up the 8 year of Cambyles his reign. But during that time he spared for no cost, to shew all kind of bounty and munificence to the subjects in all parts, inasmuch, that when news came afterward of his death, all Asia, and all nations save the Persians, much lamented for it, for the dispatching away couriers into all parts, he proclaimed three years freedom from paying of tribute, and service in the wars and this he did, to soon as ever he took the title upon him, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 67.] and he took moreover Artabazus Cyrus his daughter, and all the rest of Cambyles his wives to himself, [lib. c. 68. 89.]

Ammianus Marcellinus [lib. 23.] out of ancient books reporteth, that after Cambyles his death, 7 Magi took the management of the kingdom of Persia into their hands: which number, Vale. Max. also in his [9 book, c. 2.] retaineth. But of them there were two chief, named by Herodotus, [lib. 3. c. 61. 78.] Patiziches, whom Trogus calls Cometes and his brother, who only bare the name of king, as in the person of Cyrus his son: and is called by Herodotus, Smerdis; by Elicylus, Mardus; by Ctesias, Spendabates; by Trogus, Orontes, and in the Scripture, Artachabastar.

To this Artachabastar was that letters were brought from the Samaritans, to forbid the further building of Jerusalem, as of a city, which they blazoned for a rebellious and wicked place, and which if it went on to be built, would never pay tribute to the kings of Persia [Eccl. 4. 7. 16.]

Artachabastar, by his letter, forbade the building of Jerusalem, until he should give further order, by virtue of which inhibition, the Samaritans taking courage, came flying to Jerusalem by strong hand, made the Jews give off their building, not of the City only, but also of the Temple, for which nevertheless, they had Cyrus his expresse order, to finish it: But as they had been hitherto often interrupted in that work, lo now they wholly gave it off, till the second year of the reign of Darius, [Eccl. 4. 17. 24.]

Whiles this Artachabastar held the kingdom, Otanes the Persian continuing at Sardes first reproached Microbares, Governor, of Dascylium in the continent of Asia, for not having gotten the Isle of Samos, into his hands, and annexed it to his government; in Polycrates his life time, and afterward took both him and his son Cranaeus, both men of good esteeme among the Persians, and slew them: committing sundry other outrages, and among the rest, caused a messenger, which came to him from Darius, because he told him something that pleased him not, to be murdered. [Herod. lib. 3. c. 126.]

Ctesias tells us, that Ištābates the Eunuch, who had the charge of carrying the Corps of Cambyles into Persia, disclosed all the plot, and fraud of the Magi to the army: & that being therefore pursued by them, he fled for safe guard to a Temple, and there they took off his head: but Herodotus saies, that 8 months after Cambyles his death, the matter was brought first to light by the cunning of Otanes the son of Pharnapes, and afterward, more more fully manifested by Prexalpes; who being himself in a certain Tower, called the people to him, and from thence declared to them, and acknowledged that he himself, being forced thereto by Cambyles his command, had murdered his Brother Smerdes the son of Cyrus, and that they were the Magi which then ruled all, and having to laide, he threw himself thence down headlong among them, [Herod. lib. 3. c. 68. and 75.] As for the discovery made by Otanes, and destruction of the Magi, Justin out of Herodotus, and Trogus Pompeius, lets it down in this wise.

Ofotanes (which is that Otanes) saith he, by a messenger enquired of his daughter (which was one of the concubines, or barbers of the King) whether it were indeed Cyrus his son that was King: she answered, that she herself knew not, nor could possibly tell how to learn it out of any of her fellows, because they were all kept apart in several lodgings one from the other. Then he advised her when her turn came to lie with him, to feel his head, as he lay a sleep; for Cambyles, or (as Herodotus hath it) Cyrus had caused the Magus his eares to be cut off. And being afterward assured by his daughter, that the King had no eares, he made the Princes of Persia acquainted therewith: and having drawn them into a conspiracy against the mock-king, bound them all with an oath unto it. There were seven of them only in this conjunction: who instantly, least by delay repentance might befall any, and so the thing come to be disclosed; carrying every man a dagger under his coat, went directly to the place where the King was, and killing such as stood in their way, at last came where the Magi were assembled: nor were they wanting to their own defence; for they slew down right two of the conspirators, (or rather wounded them only, as Herodotus hath it) but they were all laid hold on by the more in number: among which, Gobryas having one of them about the middle, when his fellows could not come at the Magus to kill him for fear of hurting Gobryas himself; he bade them kill the Magus thorough his body. But yet as good luck would, they killed the Magus, and did him no hurt, [Justin lib. 1. c. 9.]

The names of these 7 Persians (whom Jerome upon Daniel 11. verse 2. would needs call the Magi) were these. Onophas, Idernes, Nardobates, Mardonius, Bajistes, Artaphernes, and Darius, the son of Hytaltapes: as Ctesias hath it: But in Herodotus, these, Otanes, Hydarnes, Megabyzus, Gobryas, Aspathines, Intaphernes, and Darius: which Darius was then newly arrived there from Sula, where his father Hytaltapes was Governor. But both Ctesias and Herodotus tell us, that the Persians ever after kept a yearly Festival upon the day wherein the Magi were thus destroyed.

Six days after the Magi were made away, those 7 Persians met in counsel, and advised together, what form of government they should now set up in Persia. Otanes advised for an Aristocracy; Megabyzus, for an Oligarchie; but Darius, perwaded by all means for a Monarchie; and when this last opinion, for the supreme power to be settled in one person, had carried it by the major part of voices, Otanes resigned all his right to the other six, upon condition that neither himself, nor any of his should ever be subject to any of them, or theirs: whence it was that his family only among the Persians were left free, and not subject to the Kings command further than themselves liked: provided that they brake no law of the Persians: and because he was the first that set this wheele a going, and drew the rest into the action; therefore they thought fit, to heap all kinds of magnificence and honour upon him and his posterity. And among the rest, to have him every year presented with a Median Robe. But for the Election of a new King, they came to this agreement among themselves, that every of them should get on horse-back a little before sun-rising, and whose horse happened first to neigh after the sun was up, he should be King in Cambyles room: which when the horse of Darius the son of Hytaltapes, by the craft and subtilty of Oebaris his Quiry happened to do presently: all the rest leapt off their horses, and adored Darius, crying, God have the King, [Herod. lib. 3 from cap. 80. to ca. 88.]

Nor yet were they lesse mindful of their own priviledges and immunities, than Otanes had been; for this they had common to them all: First that both Otanes and the rest, should come to Court when they pleased; and have free access to the Kings person, without sending in word that he was there to speak with him, unless he were in bed with the Queen, [Id. lib. ca. 84. and ca. 128.] And secondly, that they might wear every man his turban, in a different fashion from all other men. For whereas the King only and his heir apparent, might wear their turbans upright: (as Semca habet, lib. 6. De Beneficiis ca. 31. and so hath Plutarch in the lives of Theseus and Aristoxenus) and the rest of the Nobility wear them hanging backward; it was now granted to them and their posterity, that they should wear them pointing forward; because when they went about the slaughter of the Magi, they used this fashion as a token or sign between themselves, [Plutarch in his Precepts of government.] For Darius had given this as a sign for each to know another by in the dark: that they should turn the buckle that fastened their turbans behind, and wear them in their fore-heads, [Polya. lib. Strang. 7.]

But this, as it seemeth, was the grand priviledge to them granted; that although the King had, as it were a perpetual Dictatorship in himself over them, yet they every man in his turn, should have a kind of a tribunician power with him; to which opinion or imagination of mine own, there are three considerations moving me. First, for that these conspirators foreseeing that they should prove burdensome (and wherein I pray more than in this way ?) to Darius, they bound him with an oath (which is most religiously observed among the Persians) that he should never do any of them to death, either by poison, or sword, or by any violent way, or by starving them; as Valer. Max. [lib. 3, ca. 2.] affirmeth. Secondly, for that Elchylus, who was in the fight against the Persians at Marathon names two Kings, successively between the slaughter of the Magi, and Darius his reign; to wit, Maraphis and Artaphernes. Of whom the first seemeth to be him whom Ctesias calleth Mardonius, and the other Artaphernes. And lastly, for that in Ezra, in the edict of Darius, in the second year of his reign, for the rebuilding of the Temple, we find Artachabast also called by the name of King of Persia, [Ezra 6, 14.] to have given his consent thereto, in his 2 year of his reign; for the rebuilding of the Temple; we find Artachabast also called sometime King of Persia, [Ezra 6, 14.] to have given his consent thereto: by whom it is hard to understand any other than Artaphernes.

In the beginning of his reign, Darius took Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, who had formerly been married to his own Brother Cambyles, and afterward to the Magus, and made her his wife, purposing to establish his kingdom the better, by matching into the Royal Stock: that to the kingdom might not seem translated to another family, but rather returned into Cyrus his house, [Herod. lib. 3, ca. 88, and lib. 7, ca. 2, and Justin out of Troguus lib. 1, ca. 10.] And as himself was first called Ochus, as appears by [Valer. Max. lib. 9, ca. 2.] (i.e. Ὀχὺς) yet afterward taking the Royal addition upon him, with the kingdom of Cambyles, took also his surname to him; so I conceive, that both he was that Achash-veroeth, al. Astucrus, which in the Story of Esther, is said to have reigned from India to Ethiopia, over one hundred twenty and seven Provinces; and that this his chief wife Atossa, was none other than Valhti, of whom there is so much mention made in the same book.

Orcetes continued still Governour at Sardes, and kept a thousand Persians for his guard about him. But Darius sending his royal letters by Bagages the son of Artan to the soldiers there, caused him to be dispatched out of the way; whose goods being all brought as confiscate to him; there came also a long with them Democedes, whom he had made his slave, a Physician of Crotona, [Herod. lib. 3, c. 127, 128, 129.] as was said before.

It fell out afterward that Darius, as he was a hunting fell from his horse, and with the fall, wrenched his foot, and strained it very sorely; which whiles the Egyptian Chirurgeons sought to bring right again, and used much violence in the cure, they made him that he could not sleep for seven dayes. Upon the 8 day this Democedes was brought unto him, all poor and ragged, and shacked, as he was; he with such Greek lamentations as he used, quickly brought the King to sleep again; and in short time recovered him. Whereupon he was rewarded with rich gifts by the King and his Wives; and dwelt in a goodly house in Susa: and sat at Table with the King, abounding with all things that his heart could wish: save only that he could not return into Greece again; and moreover when Darius would have hung up his Egyptian Physicians, because a Grecian could do more in his cure than they all, he obtained their pardon of the King: And whereas there was a certain Fortune-teller of Elis, which came in company with him, and had followed Polycrates to Magnesia, and was brought to Susa, among the rest of Orcetes his slaves; he got him also to be set at liberty, [Herod. lib. 3, ca. 129, 130, 132.]

It fell out afterward that Atossa, daughter to Cyrus, and Darius his chief wife, had a Cancer in her breast: and being lanced, it spread further and further; and when Democedes had cured her of that sore, he prevailed to far with her, as to move the King to make war upon Greece. Upon whose perswasion, Darius presently called to him fifteen choice men, all Persians; and commanded them to follow Democedes, and by his directions to view all the Maritime places of Greece, and bring him back again with them to him. These when they were come into Phoenicia, and from thence to Sidon; fitted themselves there of shipping, and other provisions; and sailed into Greece, and viewed all the Sea-coasts of Greece, and drew it into Maps: and were the first Persian spies that ever came into Greece. And then having taken a view of the most celebrated cities and places in the heart of Greece, they passed from thence to Tarentum in Italy, from whence Democedes stole away to Crotona where his own home was, and there marrying the daughter of Milo Crotoniates, that famous Wrestler: would not return any more to Darius, [Herod. lib. 3, ca. 133, to ca. 138, with Athenaeus, lib. 12. Dipsopoli, and Aelian, Var. Hist. lib. 8, ca. 19.]

This was the third Sabbatical year held by the Jews, after their return from Babylon.

Marδοכי the Jewis said to have had a dream in the Greek additions of [Ezra 6, 11.] upon the 1 day of the month Nisan, in the 2 year of the reign of Artaxerxes the great (for so Astucrus al. Darius the son of Hyftapes, is there called) concerning a River signifying Elther, and two Dragons portending himself and Haman, [cap. 10.]

In

In the second year of king Darius, which was in the 65 Olympiade, Haggai the prophet reproved the idleness of the Jews, in setting forward the building of the temple, declaring to them, that that long sterility of the ground; and other plagues which continually fell upon them, between the first and third Sabbatical years, were all for their great neglect in that work, and earnestly perswaded them to mend that fault, whereupon Zerobabel, the governour of the Jews, and Jothua the High priest, and all the people took the work in hand afresh, and provided materials necessary for the building, upon the 24 day of the same month, [Hag. 1, 1, 5.]

Upon the 21 day of the 7 month, the same year Haggai animated the Jews, to go on with the work, with a promise of Gods presence, and blessing upon them in it, and although the beginning of this present structure seemed base and despicable in the eyes of such, as had seen the glory of the former 169 years before; yet he told them, that if they considered that blessed, and to much desired Messias, which after a time, to wit 516 years from thence, should there first be manifested, and the peace which should thence be propagated to all nations, they must acknowledge the glory of this Temple, far to exceed the beauty of the former, [Hag. 2, 1, 9.]

In the 8 month of the same 2 years of Darius, Zacharias the son of Barachias exhorted the people to repentance, [Zach. 1, 1, 6.]

On the 24 day of the 9 month of the same second year, about the middle of the space between feed time, (which immediately followed the end of the tabernacular year,) and the harvest, the Temple began to be reared, by Zerobabel, and Jothua the high priest, with the assistance of Haggai and Zachary the prophets, upon the foundation, which had been formerly laid, [Ezra 5, 1, 2, Hag. 2, 10, 18, 19.]

Upon the same 24 day, the two last prophecies of Haggai, were revealed to him, the one of the cessation of those plagues which hitherto had followed them: the other of the subversion of sundry kingdoms; and the exaltation of Zerobabel, [Haggai 2, 10, 23.]

Taneis, governour of the countries of this side the river, and Serthabroznaius, and the Apharacites, their associates coming to Jerusalem, endeavour to hinder them in the work of the Temple; asking the chief of the Jews, by whose command they did it: and they answering that they did it by virtue of Cyrus his edict, went on stoutly with their work, [Ezra. 5, 3, 4, 5, 13, 16.] For whereas by the Laws of Medes and Persians, the commands and grants of their kings ought to be perpetual, and unalterable, [Dan. 6, 8, 12, Eph. 1, 19, c. 8, 8.] it was therefore lawfull for the Jews to proceed in the work; without expecting any new order thereupon.

Their enemies, by a letter certifie this answer to Darius, desiring that search might be made in the records at Babylon, whether there were any such grant made by Cyrus or not, and desire to know the kings further pleasure therein, [Ezra 5, 5, 17.]

The work being thus interrupted, and the scarcity concontinuing in Judea, because the corne was not yet ripe, upon the 24 day of the 11 month Sebat, in the second year of Darius, the prophet Zachary had a vision, of horsesmen galloping up and down over the face of the whole earth, being now all at rest and quiet, whereupon, in the hearing of the prophet, God made a good and gracious answer with many comfortable words to the Angel, which entreated God to cease his anger and fury, which had been so hot against the people of the Jews, and Jerusalem, and cities of Judah, now these 70 years, [Zach. 1, 7, chap. 12, 13.] the beginning of which 70 years is to be reckoned, from the coming of the Assyrians, to the last siege laid unto Jerusalem, (of which more above in the 345. year of the world) [Jer. 34, 1. with Ezek. 5, 12, 13.] whither also is referred, all that which is spoken, [Zach. 1.] and in the three chapters following, as also, all that exhortation which is read, [chap. 2, 6, 7.] sent to the Jews remaining still in Babylon; that they should go out of her with all speed, pointing to that calamity, which a while after Darius brought upon Babylon when he took it.

The edict of Cyrus, for the re-building of the Temple, which was found at Acmethe, al. Ecabtan, in the province of the Medes; together with a second command, in favour of the Jews from Darius himself, was sent to Taneis and his fellows; wherein it was given them in charge, that they should not only not hinder the work of the Lords house, but also should, let it forward, by furnishing the expence thereof, out of the kings tribute; and moreover, to supply the necessary charge of the daily sacrifices to be offered by the priests at Jerusalem, which command of the king, being forthwith put in execution, the Jews encouraged by the prophecies of Haggai and Zachary went on roundly to the finishing of the work, [Ezra. 6, 1, 14.]

But I conceive that at this time, Artachabast, whom Ezra 6, 14. joyneth with Darius in this edict, as partaker with him in the power of the kingdom, was one of the 7 princes of Persia, which slew the Magus; to wit, he whom Elchylus (in Persia) calls Artaphernes, Hellenicus, (as a Scholiast terms him, Daphernes, Ctesias Artaphernes, and Herod. Insaphernes. He therefore, according to the privilege granted by Darius, coming upon a time time to speak with Darius, without sending in, to tell him that he was there, was kept out by the door keeper, and groom of the bedchamber, who told him that the King was asleep with the Queen: But he, supposing that they lied unto him, drew his Cimbre, and cut off both their ears and noses; and tying the reigns of a horse about both their necks turned them going: But when they presently ran in to the king, shewing him what they had suffered, and upon what occasion: the king esteems, sent for the rest of the Princes, severally, fearing that this might happily have been done by the common consent of them all: but finding it was not, he caused both Intraphernes and all his sons, save only the eldest, whom he spared at his mothers petition, to be put to death: Herodotus relateth this matter [lib. 3. cap. 118, 119.] as a thing acted presently upon the execution done upon the Magi; but Valer. Max. following other Authors, [lib. 9. cap. 2.] tells us, that finding himself curbed by these Princes, put them all to death by a new devised kind of punishment: For faith he, making a lower room, and filling it with cinders, and bearing up the room over it, with one post, and having feasted and filled them with meat and drink, he put them all into that upper room; and when they were all fast a sleep, taking away the post that bare it up, they all fell into the cinders, in the under room, and there perished.

Now though it be not very likely that they perished in this manner, yet is it very credible, that putting them from the government of the kingdom, he eased himself of that yoke, which hitherto lay so heavy on his neck.

And from that time forward, Darius was a free and absolute Monarch; and he it is, that we, in the Scripture, find called by the name of Assuerus. This Assuerus, therefore, in the 3 year, reckoned from the beginning of his reign, as he sat in his throne, in his palace at Sula; to shew the glory of his kingdom, and magnificence of his state, made a feast for all the Governors, and great men of his dominions, which lasted 180 dayes long, [Efb. 1. 2, 3, 4.] now this city of Sula, as Pliny, [lib. 6. c. 27.] saies, was built by this Darius; or rather as Elian, [lib. 13. de animal. c. 59.] was embellishd with goodly and magnificent palaces by him; and Herod. [lib. 5. c. 49.] tells us, that he made that the place of his residing and there kept all his treasure.

After this half years banquet was ended, there followed an other of seven dayes long; whereunto were invited all the dwellers, and whoever else was then present at Sula, from the greatest to the least. The men sitting with the King, in the court of the garden of the kings house, and the women within the palace it self, with Vasthi the Queen, (which to us, is Arofta, the daughter of Cyrus), [Efb. 1. 5, 9.]

Upon the last day of this feast; the king, being somewhat high flown with drink, would needs shew the beauty of the Queen to the men, and sent for him to come unto him: but he refused; and thereupon, by the advice of Memucan, one of the seven wise men, of the Medes and Persians, which knew the lawes and statutes of those countries (for these were the Kings Judges, which judged in all causes arising among the Persians, and resolved all cases in point of law; of whom, Herod. [lib. 3. c. 14, 31.] and Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes maketh mention,) divorced and put her away, making moreover a law, that every man thereafter, (should be Master in his own house), [Efb. 1. 10, 22.]

Hereupon, there was enquiry made after all the faire damels that were to be found in Assuerus his dominions, to find out a fit consort for the King to reign in the stead of Vasthi, which was divorced, and among others, Hadassah, a damsel of the Jews, which was also called Esther; the daughter of Abichajiel, a woman of Benjamin, was taken into consideration, [Efb. 2. 1, 8.]

In the fourth year of Darius, the fourth day of the ninth month, called Chisleu, when the Jews, by Shazerer, and Regem-melech, consulted with the Priests and Prophets, concerning the fast appointed to be held upon the day of the destruction of the City and Temple of Jerusalem, God answered them, that those fasts of the fifth and seventh months which they had observed for seventeen years (space were no wayes pleasing to him) and put them in mind of their obstinacie, and pervertnesse in their sins, which had brought that terrible desolation upon them, [Zach. 7. 1, 14.] now from the said destruction, and the death of Gedalia (which gave occasion of that fast, held in the 7 month), following two months after, to the very instant of this prophetic, we in our Chronologie, gather, that there were 70 years.

And in the eighth chapter of the same Zacharie, God tells them, that he would restore Jerusalem, and put an end to all their former miseries, and that he would change their fasts; as well that of the fourth month, on the ninth day whereof, the City was taken, as that of the fifth month, upon the tenth whereof, the Temple was burnt, and of the seventh month, wherein the remnant of the people, upon the murder of Gedalia, was scattered among the Nations, and of the 10 month, upon the 10 day whereof, the City under Sedechia, began to be sieged by Nebuchadnesar, into mirth; and would send joy and gladness, and liberty unto his people.

In the 6 year of Darius, toward the later end thereof, on the 3 day of the 12 moneth, called Adar, was the structure of the Temple finished. The dedication whereof, the Israelites which returned out of the captivity, celebrated with great joy, and abundance of sacrifices, the Priests and Levites, every one in his place and office attending in the ministry of the Temple, [Esra 6. 15, 18.]

And they also upon the 14 day of the first moneth, celebrated the first Passeeover in the second Temple; keeping also the feast of sweet-bread seven dayes, with great joy, for that God had turned the heart of the king of Assyria toward them, [Esra 6. 19, 22.] to wit of Darius, who having recovered Babylon, after 20 moneths siege, by the means of Zopyrus, was in full right, titled now king of the Assyrians, no less than of the Persians, [Herod. lib. 3. in fin.] and Justin in the end of his first book.

When Esther turn came to be brought to the king Assuerus, she was attended on, from the Serailgia, to the kings chamber, by Hegaius the Eunuch, [Efb. 2. 12, 15.] 'By me was she brought to the king's chamber, saith Herod, lib. 3. cap. 69. (i. c.) the women in Persia, come round in their turn, to their husbands beds.

But in the 7 year of Assuerus his reign, in the 10 moneth, called Tebeth; when Esther came unto the king, she found grace and favour in his eyes, above all the other damfels; insomuch, that he put the crown of the kingdom upon her head, and made her Queen in the stead of Vasthi, [Efb. 2. 16, 17.] whence I gather, that as Vasthi was Arofta, so Esther was she, whom Herodotus, calls the Virgin Artystona, and whom he saies, that Darius loved above all his wives, and whose father, he caused to be made of solid gold, [lib. 3. cap. 88. with cap. 69. lib. 7.] though I am not ignorant, that Hadassa, which was another name given to Esther, comes a great deal nearer to Arofta, and that Herodotus makes Artistona, to have been Cyrus his daughter, and Aroftas sisters, whether we should say, that Herodotus was not so well skilled in the Persian genealogies, or that the Persians themselves, for very envy, concealed the name of Esther.

Assuerus in honour of his new spouse, made a most sumptuous feast for all his Princes and servants, and called it Esthers feast, wherein he eased the provinces of many taxes and tallages, and gave gifts answerable to the state and magnificence of so great a king, [Efb. 2. 18.]

Jubile 19.

Hippias, the Tyrant of Athens, in the fourth year before his banishment from thence, fearing what might fall, began to look about for some foreign support, and to that end, gave his daughter Archidice to Antides the son of Hippocles the Tyrant, of Lamprus, the rather for that he perceived, that they were both gracious and in great esteem with Darius, [Theuid. lib. 6.]

3494.

Haman, the son of Amadetha, an Aggagite, of the race of the Amalekites, malicious Mordecaie a Jew, because he would not fall down and adore him as others did, refused for his sake to be revenged of all his nation (which was ever indeed adverse to his, Deut. 25. 19.) and to root it out, for the executing of which purpose, that he might find out a successful time, on the first moneth Nisan, in the 12 year of king Assuerus, he caused pur, that is, lots to be cast before him; for the knowing of the day and the moneth, wherein the Jews should be destroyed: and the lot fell upon the 12 moneth Adar, the last of the whole year, [Efb. 3. 1, 7.]

Then pretending some specious reasons to Assuerus, with the offer of ten thousand talents of silver, (which yet the king would not accept) obtained a grant from him to root out all the generation of the Jews, [Efb. 3. 7, 11.]

Upon the 13 day of the first moneth, the kings edict was published in Sula, and copies thereof were dispatched away by carriers into all the provinces of the kings dominions, that all Jews, without respect to sex or age; upon the 13 day of the 12 moneth Adar, should dye the death, [Efb. 3. 12, 15.] Hereupon Mordecai, Esther, and all the Jews, humbled themselves before the Lord, by fasting and prayer, [ib. chap. 4.] and in remembrance thereof, their posterity to this day observe a solemn fast, upon the 13 day of the moneth Adar, which they terme, Esthers fast.

Esther goes to the king, in gorgeous apparel, is graciously received by him; she invites the king once and again to a banquet, and Haman mean while is busie, in giving order for a gallows to be made, to hang Mordecai on, [ib. chap. 5. ib.]

Assuerus, one night, when he could not sleep, would needs have some records read unto him, and among other things, it was there read unto him, how two of his servants, Bigthan and Teresh his door-keepers, had conspired his death, and that one Mordecai had revealed this conspiracy unto him, and thereupon gave order, that the author of this discovery should be highly honoured, and that to be done publicly, and by whom? but by Haman himself his deadly enemy, [Efb. 6.]

And presently after this, Haman was himself hanged up, at the gibbet which he had provided for Mordecai; [chap. 7.] Haman's house was given to the Queen; and Mordecai her cousin-germaine, and who had brought her up, had daily honours bestowed upon him; [ca. 8, 1, 2, 3, 5. ib.]

Upon the 23 day of the month Sivan, there was an edict published at Susa, and copies thereof sent away (speedily by carriers, into the 127 Provinces, that the Jews upon the 13 day of the month Adar, which was the day appointed for their massacre, should have leave to stand upon their own guard, and to defend themselves every where, and to kill all such as should offer to assault them, and should moreover, have the spoils of such mens goods: whereupon both in Susa, and in all the Provinces there was great rejoicing among them, and divers of the people in several countries joyning themselves to their side, turned Jews; [ib. cap. 8, 9, 17.]

Hippas (twenty years before the fight at Marathon, in which he served on the Median party) being now grown an old man; was thrust out of Athens by the Lacedæmonians, and the faction of the Alcmaonids there: and taking a pass from the Athenians, went first to Sigeum, and from thence failed to Lampacus, to his son in law Æantrius, and from thence got him away to Darius; [Theod. lib. 6.] Now Pissistratus, Hippas's father, had committed Sigeum to Tras, to Hegesistratus his base son: and that was a receivable now for Hippas, and afterward for others of the race of Pissistratus, in case of extremity to retire unto; [Herod. lib. 5, ca. 65, 91, 94.]

Upon the 13 day of the 12 month Adar the Jews in all parts slew all those who were provided to slay them upon the same day, according to Haman's decree: In Susa itself, and the very Palace there, they slew 500 men, together with Haman's ten sons: and in the rest of the Provinces to the number of 75000 men: but meddled not with one penny of their goods; [Esth. 9, 1, 16.]

Upon the 14 of the same month, the Jews in the Provinces ceased from killing, and made merry among themselves: But they which dwell in Susa, having another day given them by the King, slew therein 500 men more of their enemies; and hung the carcasses of Haman's ten sons, upon the gibbet; [ib. cap. 9, 13, 19.]

Upon the 15 day the Jews that dwell in Susa made merry and feasted themselves, [D. c. 9, 18.]

Mordecai began the custom of keeping Holiday in remembrance of Purim, or Lots yearly, upon the 14 and 15 dayes of the month Adar: and this was established by Esther; [ib. ca. 9, 23, 30.] And this is the Jews Shrove-tide, wherein they read over the History of Esther: and to often as the name of Haman comes to be read, they rap and make a noise with their hands or mallets, upon the desks or settles in their Synagogues.

In the Isle of Naxos, some of the richer sort were turn'd out by the meaner people; and they repaired to Aristagoras son of Molpagoas, and son in law, and cousin-germain by the mothers side, to Histieus, Tyrant of Miletus; and whom Histieus had left Governour there in his room, when Darius under a shew of Honour, had taken himself along with him into Susa: and Aristagoras imparting the matter to Artaphernes, son of Histaspes, and brother to Darius, Governour of Ionia, residing at Sardes, perswaded him to possess himself of Naxos, and Paros, and Andros, and the rest of the Cyclades, all depending of Naxos, to the Kings use: which being well liked of by Darius at Susa, he furnished out the next Spring, 200 Ships for that service; [Herod. lib. 5, cap. 30, 31, 32.]

Artaphernes, making Megabates a Persian borne, Darius his, and his own, near kinsman, Commander in Chief of the Persian Army: gave him order with his Fleet of 200 sail, to go to Miletus; and there to take in Aristagoras and the Ionian Army, which he did; and failed from thence to Chios: where a jar falling between Aristagoras and Artaphernes, when they had spent four months in the siege of Naxos to no purpose: each returned home, nothing done; [Herod. ib. ca. 32, 33, 34.]

Here end the 70 years from the taking of Tyre, by Nebuchadnezzar, which is the just number of years of the bondage of that city, expressly foretold by the Prophet, [Ezra 3, 15, 17.] from which time, it seems they lived in freedom from any foreign subjection, till the time it was again taken afterward by Alex. the Great.

Aristagoras fearing what might befall him, because he had not been able to perform what he had undertaken to Artaphernes for the taking of Naxos, and had not wherewithal to pay his army; began to think of revolting from the Persians. And it fell out in the very nick, that there came a messenger from Histieus in Babylon, having his errand written in letters made with hot iron upon the flesh of his head, and now grown over with hair, by which Aristagoras was advised both himself to fall off from Darius, and also to put all Ionia in arms against him, if he could; [Herod. lib. 5, ca. 35, Polyæ. Strateg. lib. 1.]

Aristagoras hereupon, having imparted this to his friends, perswaded them to side with him, though Hecateus the Historian dissuaded them by all means from rising in arms against the King of Persia: but all in vain; for the conspirators dispatched away

Iatrogas to Myus to the army, which upon their return from Naxos, remained there, and by a stratagem, took all the principal Commanders of their Fleet, And Aristagoras, now openly revolting from Darius, made a fair shew of a kind of liberty to the Milesians, and took away the tyrants that were in some cities of Ionia; and then went to the Lacedæmonians to pray an aide of them; but received a flat denial at their hands, [Herod. lib. 3, ca. 36, 37, 38, 49, 50, 51.]

In the 20 year of the reign of Darius, 245. of Nabonassars æra, upon the 28 day of the month Epiphu, according to the Egyptian Calendar, (upon the 29, of our November) ending about midnight, there was an Eclipse of the Moon observed at Babylon, [Ptol. Mag. Syntax. lib. 4, ca. 9.]

Hippias the son of Pissistratus being sent for from Sigeum upon a vain hope given him of being restored to his Principality in Athens, by the Lacedæmonians, returned from thence into Asia, and accusing the Athenians of many things to Artaphernes, did what in him lay to bring Athens under the subjection of Darius; [Herod. lib. 5, chap. 91, 98.]

The Athenians understanding that Hippias had defamed them to Artaphernes, sent their messengers to Sardes, to perswade the Persians there, not to give credit, nor to lend any ear, to those out-laws of the Athenians: But Artaphernes advised them, if they loved themselves, and their own safety, to call home, and receive Hippias again: But whilst they stood out, and refused to hearken to any such conditions, it fell out that Aristagoras the Milesian returning from Sparta, where he got nothing but a denial, came to Athens, and there obtained of them 20 sail of Ships to aid the Ionians in their war against the Persians: whereof they made Melantho an eminent man in Athens Commander; [Herod. lib. 3, ca. 96, 97.] Which Fleet, as [Herod. ca. 98, ib.] hath well noted, was the beginning of all mischief, both to the Grecians and Persians: for this was the beginning of all the wars which grew between the Grecians and the Persians, and which ended in the ruine of the Persian Empire.

Aristagoras, returning to Miletus, perswaded the Præones, whom Megabazus the Governour of Thracia, had carried away from their own habitation upon the banks of the River Strymon into Phrygia, and by the command of Darius planted them there, to return into their own country; wherefore they taking with them their wives and children, gat away to the sea side, where some for fear, abode still: the rest putting over to Chios, from thence gat shippings, and came to Lesbos, and from thence to Doricus: and from thence again, by land went away into their own country; [Herod. lib. 5, ca. 98.]

The Athenian Fleet, there Aristagoras staid himself, but sent his own brother Charopius Commander over the Milesians, and Helimophantus Commander over the rest of the Ionians, against Sardes. The Ionians, in company with the Athenians and Eretrians, coming with their Fleet to Ephesus, left their Ships at Goretus, a Port of the Ephesians, and marched themselves in a body over-land to Sardes: and took and burnt it all, save the Castle which Artaphernes himself kept, not sparing the very temple of Cybele. But when the Lydians and Persians joyning together, made good the Market-place, thorough the middle whereof ran the River Pactolus, and there defended themselves against them; the Ionians for very fear left the place, and retired to the Hill Tmolus, therto adjoining, and from thence by night fled away to their ships: whereupon the Persians dwelling on that side the River Halys, gathering into a body, pursued them, and overtaking them about Ephesus: fought with them, and routed them; killing many, and among them Enalcidas Captain of the Eretrians; a man who had borne away the garland in many of their games, and highly commended by Simonides the Poet in his verses. They which escaped out of the battel, dispersed themselves into their several cities: and the Athenians abandoning from thenceforth the Ionian cause, though earnestly entreated thereto by Aristagoras, would no more appear in it; [Herod. from ca. 99, 100, 103.]

Onclitus, turning out his own elder brother Gorgus, King of the Salaminians, and forcing him to flee over to the Medes for succour, prevailed with the whole Isle of Cyprus to fall off from them; save only those of Amathus: But while he was besieging that city, tydings came of the firing of Sardes by the Athenians, to Darius: who thereupon growing wrath with the Athenians, gave order to one of his attendants, that as often as he late at meat, he should three times remember him of it, and say, Sir, Remember the Athenians: and then, very immediately sent away Histieus, the brother of that Aristagoras, from Susa to Miletus as if of purpose to be afterward the ring-leader of the Ionian Rebels against himself; [Herod. lib. 5, ca. 104, 105, 106.]

The Ionians entering into the Hellespont, took Byzantium, and other cities in those parts; and sailing from thence drew over many of the cities of Caria to join with them in this war against the Persians; for the city Canus, which hitherto stood off, and would not side with them, hearing now of the firing of Sardes, fell also to them; [ib. ca. 103.]

At Clazomene (which was of it self sometimes an Island, but now joined to the continent of Ionia, by a neck of land, as [Strabo lib. 1.] sheweth) was borne Anaxagoras the Philosopher, son of Hegesibulus, [Olym. 70.] as Diogenes Laertius sheweth in his life, out of Apollodorus his Chronicle.

Whiles Onesilus, lay with his army before Amathula, news came to him, that Artymbus, a Captain of the Persians was making toward Cyprus, with a very numerous army, whereupon he sent to crave aide of the Ionians, and they out of hand advanced toward Cyprus, with a great fleet. But the Persians putting over out of Cilicia, into Cyprus, landed there, their men, and marched by land to the city of Salamis, sending about the Phenians with the ships, to double the point of a Promontory in that Island, called, Claves Cyprus, (i. e.) the keys of Cyprus, and anon after, there followed a fight between the parties, both at land, and sea. And at sea, the Ionians, behaved themselves all very bravely that day, especially the Samians, and had the better of the Phazians. But at land, while the rest were busie in fight, first Stelenor, Tyrant of the Carii, betrayed his fellows: and then presently the men of Salamis, who fought in chariots, did the like; whereupon the whole army of the Cypriots being routed, many of them were put to the sword; and among them Onesilus, the author of this war, and with him, Aristocyptus, king of the Solians, son of that Philocyphrus, whom Solon, at his being in Cyprus, so much extolled above all other Tyrants, in his verses. The Ionians hearing that Onesilus was slain, and the rest of the cities of that Isle besieged, and that Salamis it self had opened her gates to Gorgus, their old king, returned into Ionia, with all the haste they could make. But among all the cities of Cyprus, that of Solos stood it out longest, yet at seven months end, the Persians having undermined the wall round about, took it; and to the Cypriots paid dearly for their one years liberty, and were reduced to their former estate of slavery, [Herod. lib. 5. from cap. 108. to 116.]

The Persian Lords at Sardes, who had married Darius his daughters, as Daurises, Hymenes, and Oranes, pursuing the Ionians, who had been in the service against Sardes, after they had routed them near unto Ephesus, and driven them aboard their ships, parted the rest of the work among themselves, and took each of them, in hand what cities of theirs, they would subdue, [Herod. lib. 1. 116.] Dauriles for his part, undertook the parts joyning upon the Hellespont; but as he was on his way from thence, to the city Paros, he and Patron, every day a city: but as he was on his way from thence, to the city Paros, he understood that all Caria had revolted from the king, and joynd with the Ionians, wherefore he gave off that purpose, and marched away with all his army into Caria, [c. 117.] Hymenes undertook the parts about Propontis, and coming thither, went Cios in Mylia. But then hearing that Dauriles was marched out of Hellespont into Caria, he left Propontis, and marched into Hellespont, [lib. cap. 123.] But Artaphernes, the Governor of Sardes, and Oranes the third of those undertakers, went against Ionia it self, and the country of Eolia, adjoining therunto. In Ionia they took Clazomenae, and in Eolia, the city Cuma, [lib. cap. 125.] which being taken, Anaxagoras with his companions, consulted together, whether they might flee, in which counsaile, Hecateus the Historian advised, first to transport into the Isle of Leros, and there to fortify for the present; and dwell till occasion were offered to return to Miletus. But Aristagoras his opinion was, to saile rather to a place called Myrcinus, a city among the Edones, (who dwelt upon the bank of the river Strimon) which his own Brother Histaeus had formerly built: wherefore committing the charge of Miletus to Pythagoras himself, with such Volunteers, as he could get, sailed from thence into Thrace, and possessed himself of the place, which he intended, [lib. c. 124, 125, 126.]

Histaeus, the Tyrant of Miletus, dismissed from Susa by Darius, came to Sardes: where being upon his very first arrival, hotly charged by Artaphernes, as the author of all the rebellion in Ionia; he got away the night following to the sea side, and there finding a ship ready, sailed over into Chios; where the people supposing that he had been faine: thither by Darius, of purpose to sollicite them against the Grecians, laid him in tents; but understanding shortly after, that he came in a contrary errand, they quickly left him at liberty: and he forthwith dispatched away letters to Sardes, by Hermippus of Atracae, to persuade some Persians there, to a revolt. But Artaphernes having gotten knowledge of this practise, by the discovery of the messenger, put those Persians to death, wherefore Histaeus, failing of this purpose, obtained of them of Cios, to grant him a convoy back to Miletus. But the Milesiens, as they were glad to be rid of Aristagoras, so they would by no means hear of taking another Tyrant in his room; inasmuch, that when Histaeus, assailed to get privilage into the city by night, he received a wound in the thigh, given him by a Milesian; and to being cast out thence, he returned again to Chios, [Herod. lib. 6. in the beginning of it.]

Dauriles the Persian, leading his army against the Carians, they met together, and made a body, at a place called Columna Albae, (i. e.) the white Pillars, near the river Marlyas, where Pixodorus the son of Maufolus, a man of Cyndya, who had married the daughter of Siendes the king of Cilicia, gave them advice to passe over the river Mazander; and that having that river at the back of them, they should there abide the coming of the enemy, and fight with him, upon that advantage: but the contrary opinion carried it, that they should put the Persians to have the river at their backs, and force them to fight at that disadvantage, to the end, laid they, that if they fled, having that river at their back, they should not be able to get away. At last therefore, the Carians and Persians came to a barrail, near the river Marlyas, which was a very sharp one, and lasted long, and in which the Persians lost two thousand men, and the Carians ten thousand. But when the Carians fled at last to a place called Labranda to the Temple, of Jupiter the warlike, and were there in consultation what to do, whether to submit to the Persian, or to abandon Asia, the Milesiens with their paratrakers, came to aide them: whereupon they took fresh courage, and fought again with the Persians which invaded them, and after a fight longer than the former, they fled again: in which they lost very many men, especially of the Milesiens: after which great losses; yet the Carians, upon a new supply, fought with them a third time; for hearing that the Persians, went about now to sack and ransack their cities, they lay in ambush for them upon their way, as they were marching to Mylassa, following therein the advice, of Heraclides Inaboliis, a man of Mylassa, into which ambushment, the Persians falling by night, were all cut off, and their commanders, Daurices, and Amorges, and Sismaces, and with the rest Myrles also the son of Gyges, were slain, [Herodotus lib. 5. from cap. 118. to 121.]

Hymenes the Persian which led his army into the country of Hellespont, took in all the Eoles, which inhabited near the coast of old Troy, and the Gergiches, the remainder of those ancient Tuecrians, and having done all, deceased himself, of a sickness at Troas, [lib. cap. 122.]

Histaeus the Milesian, when he could not prevail with the men of Chios, to let him have away their shipping, put over to Mitene; where the Leclians by his perswasion, let him have eight tall men of war, well and fully furnished, in which they sailed with him to Byzantium, and slaying there, they intercepted certain ships of loading, of the Ionians, which came out of Pontus, all, excepte such as professed themselves willing and ready to serve Histaeus, [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 5. and 26.]

Aristagoras, Histaeus his brother, lying with his army at the siege of Miteneus, a city of the Edones, was there slain with all his men by the Thracians, after they had taken his word, for their owne safe passage, and leaving of the place, as Herodotus, in the very end of his fifth book delivers. But Thucidides, [lib. 4.] reckons from hence, 61 years, to the carrying of a colony of the Athenians, by Agnon the son of Nicias, and planting it in Amphipolis, which Diod. Sic. in his 12 book, saies, was done in the 85 Olympiade, to which period of times, we have here conformed our relation of the fix years (ending the year following) of the rebellion of the Ionians against the Persians.

There was now a huge preparation making against the city of Miletus, by land and sea, for the Persian Commanders, of all those parts, uniting their forces, set up their rest, to carry that place, what ever became of the rest. Among the Seamen their Phenicians, were the forwardest of all others, and with them were joynd the Cypriots, lately subdued by the Persians, and the Cilicians, and Egyptians, [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 6.] of which danger thus hanging over their heads, mention seems to be made in those letters, which are attributed to Anaximines the Milesian, written to Pythagoras living then in Crotona, by Diogenes Laertius in his life: where, when he had spent 20 years, he went to Metapontus, and there ended his dayes, as Justin reports out of Trogus, [lib. 20. cap. 4.] to wit in the fourth year of the 78 Olympiade, [as Ensch. hath it in his Chron.] which takes up part of this, and part of the year following.

The Ionian fleet consisted of 363 ships; the Persian of 600. Acaces the son of Solyson, the Tyrant of Samos and other Tyrants of Ionia, which having been thrust out by Aristagoras, were now in the Persian army, laboured what they could to draw over every man his country-men, and acquaintance from the Ionian to the Persian side. In a sea fight at Lada, which is a little Island lying over against Miletus, between the Phenicians, and the Ionians, of 60 ships that came from the Isle of Samos, and fifty blunk out of the sight, and returned home, so did 70 more of the Lesbian ships; and sundry other of the Ionians in like manner, onely there were 100 faile of the Isle of Chios, which fought it out very manfully, till at length having taken many of the enemies ships, and lost many of their own with what they had left, they returned home: some of which yet being hardly pursued by the enemy, ran themselves upon ground, at the promontory of Mycalae, and there gar to land, and travelling all night on foot, came safe to Ephesus, whiles the women there were celebrating their feast and sacrifices called Theophorbia, to wit, in honour of their goddesse Ceres: whereupon the men of the city, supposing the Chians to have been thieves, came to spoil them at that time, fell suddenly upon them, and slew them. But Dionysius, captain of three ships of the Phocians, having taken three ships of the enemies, carried them, not into Phocaea, which he knew well enough was ere this seized on, and possessed by the enemies, with the rest of the Ionian territories, but furnished as he was, sailed directly into Penzicia; where lighting upon some ships of loading, and having taken out of them a great booty of monies, and other things, he set sail, and came away for Sicilie, [Herodotus lib. 6. from cap. 7. to 17.]

The

The Persians having thus mastered the Ionians at sea, fell presently to beleaguering Miletus, both by sea and land: and undermining the walls thereof with all kind of engines, they utterly overthrew and razed it to the ground in the sixth year after Aristagoras began his rebellion against the King of Persia, [Herod. lib. 6, ca. 18.] Some of the Milesians which escaped the fury of the sword with the Samians, carried a colony of them that were left into Sicily, [ib. ca. 22.] the rest were carried away to Sufa: upon whom Darius inflicted no punishment more than that he placed them in the City of Am-pa, seated upon the Sea called the Red-Sea, where the River Tigris running under the walls thereof, falleth into the Ocean. The champion and low grounds lying near the city of Miletus, the Persians took to themselves, but the mountainous parts, they gave to the Carians of Pedalio to possess, [ib. ca. 20. ib.]

Upon the taking of Miletus, the Carians all were quickly taken in; some readily yielding themselves, others upon compulsion, [ib. ca. 25.] Histieus the Milesian, hearing what was become of his city Miletus, failed presently with those Lesbians which were with him to Chios; which he easily subdued, being formerly weakened with that great loss which he had lately suffered at Lada: from thence with a strong party of Ionians and Eolians, he went to Thalus: but whilst he was besieging of Thalus, news was brought him, that the Persians were fallen upon the rest of Ionia; wherefore raising his siege from before Thalus, he failed forthwith to Lesbos, with all his forces. And from thence, because he saw his men a little doubtful, he set sail again and came into the Province of of Ararnis: as if he meant only to forage as well there, as in the country lying upon the River Caius, in the Province of Mylia. Harpagus the Persian then lay in those parts with a very considerable army: who setting upon Histieus, as he came out of his ships, at a place called Malena, took him alive, and destroyed the greater part of his men. When Histieus was brought prisoner to Sardes, and Athens, took and crucified him, and sent his head to Darius at Sufa. Darius blamed them for their labour, in that they had not brought him alive unto him: and gave order that his head should be entered, as a man well deserving of him and the Persian nation, [Herod. ib. ca. 27, 28, 29.]

The Persian Sea-forces, wintering about Miletus, went to take in the Islands bordering upon the continent, and in less than two years took in and subdued Chios, Lesbos, Tenedos, and the rest, [Herod. lib. 6, ca. 31.]

After the Islands, the Persian Captains took in also, the Cities of the Continent of Ionia; and having them in their power, they chose out of them the most beautiful boyes and maids among them, and sent them to Darius; but set fire on the Cities with the Temples in them: And so the Ionians were thrice brought into bondage; once by the Lydians, and now twice by the Persians, [ib. ca. 31, 32.]

Those of Byzantium, as also of Chalcedon, which lies over against it, before the Phenician Fleet came near them, left every man his habitation, and fled up into the remoter parts of the Euxin Sea, and there built them a city, which they named, Melembria, [ib. ca. 33.]

The Phenician Fleet failing from Ionia, subdued all that lay on the left hand of them as you go into the Hellespont: for what lay on the right hand in Asia side, was already subdued by the Persians in the Continent. Then went the Fleet and took in Chersonese, and the cities thereof, all save the city Cardia: where till then, Miltiades the son of Cimon, had been tyrant, [ib. ca. 33, 34.] But when Miltiades failed from Cardia with five tall men of War for Athens, the Phenicians pursued him, and took one of his ships, wherein was his son Metiochus: who being sent prisoner to Darius, was by him honourably received; Darius also bestowed on him, both house and lands, and gave him a Persian woman to wife, by whom he had also many children, [ib. ca. 42.]

Artaphernes Governour of Sardes, finding the Ionians at wars one with another; sent for some of each party to come before him, and made them friends upon certain covenants and conditions and willed them upon failer thereof to go to laws, and try out the right that way rather, than to spoile and butcher one another as they did, [ib. ca. 42.]

When Artaphernes had brought them to this, then laid he out all their country by Paragages: for so the Persians call every division, containing 30 furlongs: and laid a certain tribute upon every such division, which they were to pay yearly to the King, much after the rate of what formerly was paid, [saith Herodotus lib. 6, cap. 42.] meaning that rate, which (as he had formerly written) Darius, when he came first to the crown, had imposed throughout all his Dominions, [ib. 3, cap. 89, 90.] and before, he was Master of the Islands, [cap. 96.] In the narration whereof we may observe, that however, for Demore ease levying of tributes, the 127. Provinces mentioned in Esther, were now by Darius reduced to 20 Governments, yet the bounds of that Empire were still the same, namely, India, and Ethiopia, whereof the one was of Cambyles with his conquest, and the other of Darius himself: of whose revenue out of India, Herodotus speaking, saith in this wise. The Indians as they are a most populous nation, above all other men living, that we know, so they pay tribute far more than any other nation doth, to wit 360, talents of gold dust; and this is the twentieth two sixth part, or a Sattapie. But for as much, as we find that Darius at his first coming to the crown, was not possessed of the country of India, as may appear even by Herodotus himself, [ib. 4, c. 44.] it is therefore most likely, that at what time this book of rates upon lands was made by Artaphernes in Ionia, the like was done all over the Kingdom, by the Governours of the several provinces.

It would be considered then, whether that which is laid in [Esther 10.] After this the king Assuerus imposed a tribute upon the firme land, and Isles of the sea; or, as it is in the vulgar latin edition, Rex vero Assuerus omnem terram, & omnes maris Insulas fecit tributarias, (i.e.) But king Assuerus made all the earth, and all the Islands of the sea tributary; hath not reference to this very time. For as Thucydides, [lib. 1.] tells us, (and Plato in his Menexenus confirms as much) that Darius, by the means of his Phenician fleet, subdued all the Islands lying in the Egean sea, so doth Diodorus Siculus, [lib. 12.] teach us, that they were all lost again by his son Xerxes, immediately upon his overthrow in Greece; and before the 2 year of his reign, after which it was, that the Scripture tells us, that Assuerus imposed this Tribute upon the Isles. For that in Xerxes his war against Greece, all the Islands which lay between the Cyanean Isles, and the two fore-lands, that of Triopium in Cnidia, and that other of Sumium in Atica, did send him in shipping; the same Diodorus Siculus in his said 12 book, testifieth; And that his successors, held none of them all, save Clazomene, (which was at that time, but a poor little Isle, as Thucydides, [ib. 8.] teacheth us) and Cyprus, is manifest by the tenor of Antalcides his peace, recorded by Xenophon, [lib. 5, Hellenic.] Which to me seemeth a great argument, that Assuerus mentioned in Esther, can be none other than this Darius, whom for this, and other such like impositions laid upon the people, the Persians used to call camars (i.e.) a crafty Merchant or Huckleer, as Herodotus observeth of him: Because that under Cyrus and Cambyles, his two Predecessors there was no talk of any tribute charged upon the subject: only they brought the king presents, [Herod. lib. 3, cap. 89.] To which purpose it is also, that we read in the 1 book of the Epitome of Strabo: The first, saith he, that ever brought up paying of tribute, was Darius Longimanus (mistaking the surname of Artaxerxes the grandchild, and giving it to the grandfather) for before him, men paid their kings, out of that which every country yielded, as corn, horses, &c. And Polyenus, Straategem lib. 7. Darius, saith he, was the first that ever imposed a tribute upon the people; nevertheless, to make it the better to digest with them; he put his officers to rate it: which when they had laid on very heavily, he took off one half thereof; which they willingly paid, and took it for a great favour too, as the kings hand, which story is toucht upon also, by Ptoarch in his Apothegmes of kings and Emperors.

In the beginning of this spring, the king taking off all other commanders, sent Mardonius the son of Gobryas, a young gentleman, and newly married to the kings daughter Artiozotira: who coming to the sea side, in Cilicia, with a vast army, and provision accordingly, both by sea and land, sent away the rest of his forces, over land to Hellepont; but he with the navie, came into the parts of Ionia; and putting down the Tyrants, in the several Cities, restored to them every where their popular governments: He shortly after subdued the Thasy by his fleet, and the Macedonians, by his land army. His navie failing from Thalus to Acanthus, and looting from thence, whilst they fought to double the cape of the mount Athos, was assailed by a mighty tempest; wherein he lost 300 of his ships, and upward of 20000 men: But whilst Mardonius with his land army kept in Macedonia, the Thracians, called the Brygi, fell upon his camp by night; in which on-let, they slew many of his men, and withal wounded Mardonius himself; but having subdued Macedonia, he left it, and returned into Asia.

In the year following, Darius commanded the inhabitants of Thalus, who had been accused to him, for intending a rebellion against him, to demolish the walls of their City, and to send away all their shipping to Abdera: and then to try whether the Grecians would indeed stand it out, or come in and submit to him, he sent Embassadors into Greece, with order to demand Earth and Water of them, giving order nevertheless to his tributary towns upon the sea coast, to prepare and furnish out fighting ships, and others, to transport horses in: many therefore, as well of the continent of Greece, as of the Isles thereunto adjoining, gave him Earth and Water, and among them the inhabitants of the Island of Egina, and that with the first, [Herod. lib. c. 46, 46, 49.]

The Eginae therefore as Traytors to Greece, were presently set upon by Cleomenes king of the Spartans; between whom and Demaratus his colleague in the kingdom a strife arising, put Demaratus out of his place; who thereupon fled into Asia; and betook himself to Darius: by whom he was magnificently entertained, and had Cities, and territories bestowed on him, [Herod. lib. 6, cap. 49, 52, 61, 67, 70.]

In the 31 year of Darius; 257 of Nabonalar, the 3 day of the month Tybi (a day of our April) half an hour before midnight, there was an eclipse of the moone, observed at Babylon, [Ptol. mag. Syntax. lib. 4, cap. 9.] Darius removed Mardonius from his charge, as a man that had not ordered matters well at sea, and sent others to take charge of the war against the Eretrians and Athenians, to wit, Darys, a Median born, and Artaphernes, (whom whom the Scholiast of Aristophanes calls Artabazus) Commander of the horse, the son of his brother Artaphernes. To these, as they lay encamped in a plain of Cilicia, near the sea, repaired all the sea forces, with their ships, as well for fight, as for transportation of horses; which the tributary Cities had provided and furnished according to order given: into which having put their foot and horse, they set sail for Ionia, [Herod. lib. 6, cap. 94, 95.] with a fleet of 600 ships. Yet Plato in his Menexenus, counteth only 300 ships, and 500 thousand land soldiers: which number Lyfias also holds to, in the Epitaph which he made, upon the Corinthian Auxiliaries; but Emilius Probus, in the life of Miltiades, says, there were in that fleet, 500 ships; 200000 foot, and 10000 horse.

3514 The Persians, setting sail from Samo, came to Naxos, and set fire on all their houses, and Temples: But sparing Delos, they went to other Islands, from whence they took away both men to serve them, and also their children for hostages; which when the Carystii refused to deliver; they endured a siege, till at last they also were fain to surrender their City, and give up themselves to their enemies discretion, [Herod. lib. 6, cap. 95, 96, 99.]

The Persians, having taken Eretria, after seven daies siege, and spent some few daies in settling things there, sailed thence to the land of Attica, and wasted a great part thereof: and came at last, by the guidance of Hippias the son of Pisistratus into the field of Marathon; where they were all defeated by the men of Athens, and of Platea, under the conduct of Miltiades, who had gotten the sovereignty, or command of the Cherfoneus, in Thracia: of their part were slain, 193 men: of the Persians, 6400, [Herod. lib. 6, cap. 101, 102, 112, 117.]

d. The Persians, being routed, fled to their ships, of which many were sunk, and many taken: in both the fights, the Persians lost 200000 men, Hippias also, sometimes the tyrant of Athens, died there, who had been the author and procurer of this war, [Justin. out of Trogus, lib. 2, c. 9.] The whole army of the Persians at this battle consisted of 300000, as Valer. Max. lib. 5, c. 3, saith, and Plutarch intimates no less in the beginning of his Parallel: Justin, and Orosius following him say, they were in all 600000 men: Emilius Probus in his Miltiades, says there were 100000 foot, and 20 thousand horse: the Athenians there were 10000, and of their auxiliaries out of Platea, 10000, saith Justin with Orosius. Probus assures us, that the Athenians, with the men of Platea, and the 10000. This inglorious victory, was gotten by them, upon the 6 day of Boedromion, the 3 month in the Attic Calendar, after the longer solstice, as Plutarch as the same Plutarch saith; when Phanippus was Prætor or L. Chancellor of Athens: 7 years before hath it in the life of Aristides: to wit, in the year of the 75 Olympiade, 4 years before in the death of Darius, as Severus Sulpicius, in 2 book of his Sacra Historia telleth us: and in the death of Darius, as Theophrastus in his 1 book of his history, witnesseth; and Lyfias in his Epitaph of the Corinthian Auxiliaries, hath it) and before the sea fight at Salamis, in the same month of Boedromion, 10 years compleat, as we find in Plato [3 de Legibus.]

Darius and Artaphernes returning into Asia, carried with them their captives of Eretria to Susa, [Herod. lib. 6, cap. 119.] though Ctesias would have it, that Darius was slain in the fight at Marathon: and that, when the Persians desired to have his corpse, the Athenians refused to give it.

3515 Darius, when the Eretrian captives were brought unto his presence, gave order to have them placed in a part of the Cissian country, which is called Anderica, 110 furlongs from Susa, [Herod. lib. 6, c. 119.] of whom a man may see more in Philostratus, in the life of Apollonius, lib. 1, c. 17.

3517 When Darius had spent now 3 years, in making greater preparations against Greece than before; in the fourth year the Egyptians revolted from him, [Herodotus, lib. 7, cap. 1.]

3519 When Darius was now ready to begin his war against the Egyptians, and Athenians both, he was, by the Lawes of the Persians, to declare his successor in the kingdom.

Artobazanes, whom others call Artomenes, or Ariamenes, his son by Gobryas his daughter, born to him before he came to be king, claimed the succession, by right of primogeniture, or as first born: But Xerxes, who was begotten and born, after Darius came to be king, and that of Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Monarchie, was declared to be king, in succession, [Herod. lib. 7, cap. 2, 3.] of which friendly contention between the two brothers, more is to be seen in Justin, out of Trogus, [l. 2, c. 16.] and in Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes, and in his Apoph. gemis, and in his treatise megalastus, (i. e.) of Brotherly love.

Darius, having declared Xerxes to be king in succession, when he was now ready to take his journey, nay rather when he was now putting over into Greece, as Diad. Sic. lib. 11, reporteth, in the year after the revolt of the Egyptians, at the later end thereof, departed this life, when he had reigned full 36 years, [Herod. lib. 7, c. 4.]

Next

Next him came Xerxes, the 4 king of Persia after Cyrus: who trusting in his riches, (as they were indeed exceeding great) flattered up his own subjects together with all his allies and friends, to make war upon the Grecian kingdom: according to the prophecy of [Daniel xi. 2,] though not moved hereto at the first so much by any desire of his own, as for so, by the persuasions and instigations of Mardonius, his Cousin Germanus, the Acadæ, the kings of Thessaly, of the kindred of Pisistratus, and of one Oonomacrus, a Sorcerer of Athens, [Herod. lib. 7, cap. 5, 6.]

3520 Xerxes, in the very beginning of the second year, after the death of Darius, took a journey against his rebel Egyptians; whom when he had subdued, and brought into a harder state of bondage, than they had ever felt under his predecessors, he set his brother Achæmenes, the son of Darius to be ruler over them, [Herodotus lib. 7, cap. 7.]

This year was Herodotus the Historian, the son of Lyxus, and Eryone born at Halicarnassus, in the province of Caria: for that he was 53 year old, when the Peloponnesian war began, [D. Sallust lib. 15, cap. 23.] affirmeth out of Pamphyla. Now at that very time, Artemelia, the daughter of Lygdamis of her young son, whose name was Pfundelis, her husband, obtained, (during the pupillage of her young son, whose name was Pfundelis, as may be gathered out of Suidas, in the word Περσικὸν (i. e.) Herodotus) the Tyranny which her husband held, and ruled over the Halicarnassians, the Coi, the Nisiriens, and Calydoniens: and she, a while after, came into Greece with five good fighting ships, to the aid of Xerxes in his war there, [Herod. lib. 7, cap. 99.]

At Critalis in Cappadocia, all Xerxes his forces came into one body; and from thence he passed the river Halys, and came to Celæna, a city in Phrygia: where Pythius, a Lydian born, (whom yet Pliny lib. 33, cap. 10,) makes to be a Bithynian) the son of Atylis entertained him, and his whole army, in a most magnificent and sumptuous manner: from hence passing by Anava, a city of Phrygia, and a Lough, out of which salt is made, he came to Colossæ, a city likewise of Phrygia, where the river Lycus running under ground, loatheth it self, and from thence again, to a town called Cyndras, seated in the confines of Phrygia, and Lydia, and then passing the river Maeander, and passing by the city called Callatebus, he at length arrived at Sardes, from whence he dispatched away his messengers into Greece, to demand of them earth and water, (i. e.) to require them to give themselves up into his power, [Herodotus, lib. 7, from the 26, chapter, to the 32.]

The Navy in this mean while, was at Eleus, in Cherfoneus, from whence a part of the army went to dig thorough the neck of the mount Athos, which was twelve furlongs over; and were forced to this work, with Bastinadoes. The inhabitants also of the places adjoining, were drawn into the work, and Bubares the son of Megabyalus, and Artachates the son of Artabaz, both Persians, were appointed, to overlook the workmen, by whose industry at last that neck of land was cut through, and the sea let in, so broad, that two great ships with their oars out, might therein meet, and pass without falling foul each of other, [Id. lib. cap. 22, 23, 24.] And another part of the army was occupied in making a bridge of ships over the Hellepont, where the sea from Abydos to the shore, on the other side, is seven furlongs over: and when the bridge was all made, came a mighty tempest, and brake it all down again: at which Xerxes growing mad for anger, caused 300 stripes to be given to the Hellepont, and a pair of shakles to be thrown into the sea, to bind and fetter it withall : as for those, who were employed in making of the bridge ; he cauled their heads to be smitten off : and then let others on work, to make the bridge stronger, [Id. ib. from chap. 33. to 36.]

In the beginning of the Spring, Xerxes with his whole Army, moved from Sardes, where he had quartered all that winter, marching toward Abydus ; and as he was letting forth, the sun withdrew his light ; there being no clouds to cover it, but a most clear air, and the day was turned into night, at which stupendous prodigy, Pythius the Lydian being amazed, (for that it was no natural Eclipse, the Astronomical tables easily declare) becaughe the King, that of his five sons, who were then in his army, he would leave his eldest out, to be a comfort to him in his old age : Whereat growing into a rage, he cauled that eldest son of his to be cut in two, and his whole army to march between the parts of his body, [Id. ib. ca. 37. 38. 39.]

Hermotimus, who was an Halicarnassian borne, and could do most of all the other Eunuchs with Xerxes, coming into the country of Atarne, in the province of Mysia, sent for Pamionius, of the Isle of Chios (who was by his trade, a dealer in buying and selling of slaves, and by whom himself had formerly been gelt, and made an Eunuch) with his wife and children to come unto him : and making the father to cut out his childrens stones, and then them to do as much to their father ; he thought himself in some revenge for the wrong which had been done him in his eviration, [Id. lib. 8. chap. 105. 106.]

Xerxes his army going from Lydia to the River Caiicus, and the country of Mysia, from thence came into the country, where old Ilium, or Troy, stood ; and as he lay that night at the foot of the Hill Ida, there fell a terrible tempest of lightening and thunder, which destroyed many of his army : after which they came to the River Scamander, which they quite drank up ; nor was it able to satisfy the men and catel of the army with water for their thirst ; when Xerxes was there, he went up to see and view the old habitation of King Priame ; and there he sacrificed to Minerva of Troy, 1000 Oxen : and the Magi that attended him offered cakes to the Worthies, sometimes of that place. This done, a panic or sudden fright fell and seized upon his army by night : and he removing from thence in the morning so soon as it was light, came to Abydus, [Id. lib. 7. cap. 42. 43.]

Here a toy took Xerxes in the head, to see all his army together ; wherefore sitting in a Hall, which he had cauled for that purpose to be there prepared, very sumptuous, and all of fair white stone ; he there looking toward the sea, beheld all his Navy, and to the land-ward, all his land Forces at once, which while he beheld ; he would needs also see a sea-fight : and when that fight was done, wherein the Phœnicians gave the prize, the King took great pleasure, both in the fight itself, and also in the number of his men. And when he beheld all the sea of Hellespont covered with his ships, and all the shoares and plains about Abydus with his souldiers ; and withal considering the shortness of mans life, and that none of all those men should be alive at one hundred years end, he wept, [Id. ib. cap. 44. 45. and Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 13.]

Xerxes, sending away his Uncle Artabanus to be Vice-roy at Susa, and there look to his house and kingdom, prepared himself now, to passe over into Europe : so soon therefore as the sun was up, himself holding a golden vial in his hand over the sea, made his prayer to the sun, that nothing might hinder him in the conquest of Europe, till he had gone to the utmost bounds thereof : And having thus said, he flung both the vial, and a golden goblet, and a Persian cimitre, into the sea. These things thus done, he sent his horse and foot to passe over the bridge on the right hand, which was toward Pontus ; but over that on the left hand, which was toward the Egean-sea, he made all the bag and baggage, servants, and carriages to passe : spending (even whole dayes, and as many nights in the transportation. When all was over, the Navy fell down out of the Hellespont westward, to a place called Sarpedons Foreland. His land army passing thorough Chersonesus to Agora, turned aside to a place called the Black Bay : where a river of the same name, or Black water, was not able to make all his army drink. Having passed this River, the army held on their march westward, till they came to Dorisca, which is the name both of a sea-coast or shoar, and also of a spacious field in the country, of Thracia, which the great River Hebrus runneth thorough : and there they camped, [Id. from the end of chap. 52. to the beginning of 59.]

The Navy coming to this place, and being halted a shoar, Xerxes would needs again take a muster, first of his land Forces, and then of his sea. Of his Foot, Herodotus reckons 170 myriads, or 1700000. men, [chap. 66.] and of his Horse, besides Camels, and Chariots, 8 myriads, or 800000. Horse, [chap. 87.] Among the Commanders of his Foot, he mentions two sons of his, begotten of his Queen Artitiona, (whom I conceive to have been Esther) and of them he makes, the one called Artanes, Commander of the Ethiopians, to the southward of Egypt, [chap. 69.] and the other, named Gobryas, Leader of the Maryandeni, and Ligyes, and Syrians, [chap. 72.] Diodorus Siculus reck- oneth of his foot Forces 80 myriads, or eight hundred thousand men ; not coming to Herodo-

Herodotus his number of them by one half : and yet the number which Diodorus attributes to the Foot, that doth Ctesias allow only to the whole Army of all sorts, viz. 80 myriads, besides the Chariots. Isocrates in his Panathœnicæ, saith, that in his army of Foot, there were 70 myriads, (i. e.) seven hundred thousand souldiers ; which scit same number, Elian, [lib. 13. cin. 1.] of his Various History alloweth, and no more, to the whole Army. Pliny counteth them 788000. men, [lib. 32. cap. 10.] where yet for Xerxes, Darius his army is named. Justin, out of Trogus, and Orosius, following him, [lib. 1. ca. 10.] sayes, that Xerxes had of his own subjects, seven hundred thousand, and three hundred thousand Auxiliaries from his friends, Emilius Probus, in the life of Themistocles, saith, that his Foot were seven hundred thousand men, and his Horse four hundred thousand.

His Ship : for fight, were 1207. of which the Phœnicians furnished him, with 300. reckoning with them the Syrians dwelling in Palæstina : as Herodotus saith, [lib. 7. ca. 89.] adding that by the name of Palæstina, he meant all the sea coast of Syria, as far as the borders of Egypt, [lib. 3. ca. 91.] which also in another place he affirmeth to have been anciently called Syria Palæstina, [lib. 3. ca. 91.] and that the inhabitants thereof are all circumcised, [lib. 2. ca. 104.] for among other nations subject to the Persian Empire, the Jews also were one. And that he had of his country-men in this army against the Grecians, Josephus would faine prove out of those Verses of the Poet, [Charilus, lib. 1. cont. Apion.]

*His camp a nation strang to see, did follow,
Who spake the language of Phœnicia ;
And did the Hills of Solymi inhabit,
Near to a broad Lake which on them both border :
Whose heads were round, and on their bald crownes,
Of a horse head the dried skin did wear.*

by which the learned Salmasius also conceives the Jews were meant : in lingue Hellenistica Ussingio ; though Scaliger, [In notis suis ad fragmenta] and Cunæus, [lib. 2. De Rep. Hebrææ, ca. 18.] and that most learned Bochartus [in Geogr. Sacra Par. 2. lib. 1. ca. 6.] tak'them as understood of Solymi in Pisidia.

But besides these men of War, Herodotus tells us, that he had 1207. Ships of burden, some of 2, some of 50 oares a piece, besides lesser vessels, and ships to carry horses in, to the number of 3000. [lib. 7. ca. 97.] Diodor. Sic. saith, there were above 1207. ships of War : for carriage of horses, 850. and 3000. ships of burden of 30 oares a piece : and the Poet Eichylus, in Persis brings in a messenger reporting the number of those ships in this manner.

*I know that Xerxes ships a thousand were ;
But full two hundred and seven ships he had,
Exceeding swift ones. So the same doth go.*

Now whether he means that the total sum of them was a thousand ; and so the 207. swift ones a part of them ; or whether both summes put together, make up the number of 1207. which agreeth best with the particular catalogue of the ships, which every nation contributed to this voyage, mentioned by Herodotus, and with the totals of them by him cast up, doth not very clearly appear out of the Verses themselves. Ctesias seems to favour the former opinion, and doth Tully in the first of his Orations against Vercres, [Isocrates in his Panegyric, and Panathœnicæ Orations, agreeth with the latter ; and Lylius in his Epitaph, sets them down in a round summe, 1200. ships : adding, that there were over and above them, 3000. ships of burden : For to say with Justin, that there were ten hundred thousand ships of them, no doubt, cannot be right.

That in those 1207. ships which came out of Asia, there were 241400. men stowed, Herodotus collecteth, by placing 200. men in every bottom : besides 30 passengers in every one of them, of Persians, Medes and Sæcæans, which make in all 36210. men. But to those other 3000. ships of burden, he allows 240000. men, by placing in each of them, 80 persons, one with another : those which had more bearing out, those that had fewer in them. So that the whole Navy consisted of, 571610. men ; to which if you add the number of the land souldiers, 1700000. Foot, and 800000. Horse, and the Arabians which had charge of the Camels, and the Lybians who intended the Waggon, amounting to about 20000. then will the whole number of them which followed Xerxes out of Asia into Greece, in all kinds, rise to the number of 2317610. thousand men, besides horse-boys and other servants, hangers-on, and besides those which were employed in furnishing the camp with corn and other victuals, [Herod. lib. 7. ca. 184.]

Xerxes marching now from Dorisca into Greece, as he came to any country, took all that were fit, and made them serve him in the War, [Id. ib. ca. 118.] whereby his Navy grew greater by 120. ships ; into every of which, putting as before 200. heads, his Sea-Forces were increased 24000. men : and Herodotus thinketh that his Army by land, was likewise increased 30 myriads ; that is, 300 thousand men : though, Diod. Sic.

be of opinion, that they came to somewhat less than 200 thousand: and so the total of Xerxes his Army in European and Asiatic soldiers amounteth to 2642610 men. Now the number of horse-boyes, and of hangers-on, and the tarpsailers in the corn-ships, and others, he thinks to be greater rather than less, than that of the soldiers came unto. So that if that former summe should be but doubled, the number of those which Xerxes carried by sea to Sepias, and by land to Thermopylae, would come to 5283220 men; for as for the women which baked, and whores, and eunuchs, no man can tell the true number of them: no more can he of the horses and other beasts, of drought, or burden, and Indian dogs that followed the Gentlemen in the camp for their pleasure, so that it is no wonder, if so many rivers failed some belies of so many as were there of all kinds to fill, [Id. ib. c. 185, 186, 187.] as Juneval saith, Strayr. 10.

*We now believe that many rivers deep, and therefore the lesse wonder, if both Ilocrates in his Panathenaic oration, and Plutarch in his Parallels, report, that Xerxes drew with him into Greece, 500000, of men.

And yet in all this great number, was there not a man found comparable to Xerxes himself, for the beauty and goodlinesse of his person, or one that might seem more worthy of that great Empire than himself, if we believe Herodotus, [lib. 7. cap. 187.] that as Saul among the children of Israel, [1 Sam. 10. 23, 24.] so here, Xerxes might well seem to have had, ἡ δὲ αὐτοῦ μορφή, (i.e.) a stature fit for, and worthy of a crown. And yet if you speak of him as for a king, saith Justin out of Trogus, you will find cause to commend his wealth, (fore-spoken of by Daniel 11. 2.) rather than his wits, of which, saith he, there was such infinite abundance in his kingdom, that when whole rivers failed the multitude of his army, yet his wealth could never be exhausted: as for himself, he was ever seen last in the fight, and first in the flight, fearful when any danger was, but swift up with pride, when there was none.

Leonidas king of Sparta, with an army of 4000 Grecians, opposed himself against him and his whole army, consisting of three hundred thousand men, at the straits of Thermopylae in Thessaly, so called from the hot springs of water, which there do rise, as appears by the Epitaph which was made upon them, recorded by Herod. [lib. 7. cap. 228.]

*Μυριάδων τρεῖς ἑκατομμύσιαι ἑβόμενοι
Ἐκ Πλαταιῶν ἡλιόθεν ἔτιζον. (i.e.)
Here gainst three hundred thousand Persians, Four thousand Spartans fought it out and died. For* Thirty Myriads make three hundred thousand; which are as many as Theodoret, [l. 1. o. 1.] de magnitudine giveth to that whole army, [Diodor. Sic. lib. 11. 1.] in this very Epitaph, p. 26. in the Greek and Latin edition, for τρεῖς μυριάδες, (i.e.) for the 30 Myriads hath θρασύτατοι, (i.e.) 20 Myriads, which make 20 hundred thousand; whereas yet, (p. 5.) he saith, (i.e.) the whole army consisted of little less, than 100 Myriads, which is 1000000, of that one hundred hundred thousand men, and speaking particularly of this fight at Thermopylae, (p. 9.) he says, that 500 men there set upon 100 Myriads, (i.e.) one hundred hundred thousand men. And yet Justin relating the same story out of Trogus, [lib. 2. c. 11.] saith, that 600 men, brake into the camp of five hundred, or as in Oroclus, of fix hundred thousand men. And Ilocrates in his Archidamus saith, that one thousand of them, went against seven hundred thousand of the Persians: But those whom Ilocrates calls a thousand, Justin and Oroclus, six hundred, and Diodorus, five hundred; are to be understood of those, who when the rest of the Grecians were sent away, stood it out to the last breath, in which they all, together with their king Leonidas died; of which number, 300 were Spartans, the rest, thelians and Thebans, [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 223, 224.] for whom amends was fully made by 30000 of the enemies then slain upon the place, [Id. ib. 8. c. 24.]

While these things thus passed at Thermopylae by land, sundry encounters and fights at sea happened also about Artemisium, a fore-land of Eubaea, [Id. ib. cap. 15.] Eurybiades, a Lacedaemonian, was chief Commander or Ammiral of the fleet, which consisted of 271 ship, besides 9 others, of 50 oars a piece, of which 127 were let out by the Athenians, and Plataeans, as Herod. saith, [ib. cap. 1.] whereas yet, Ilocrates, in his Arcopagical oration, saith, that the Athenians furnished only sixty of them: but Emelius Probus delivers, that the whole Grecian fleet consisted of 300 saile, and that 200 of them were of the Athenians, in this Themistocles, Herodotus, Diodorus, and Probus, all say, that this was a drawn battle on either side, though Ilocrates in his Panegyric oration, and Eljan, [lib. 2. cap. 25.] Varia Histor. talk as of a great blow, which the Persians received in it; yet the day when this battle was fought, is said by Eljan, to have been upon the

the sixth of Thargelion, which was the second month, of the spring time, with the Athenians, agreeeth not well with the relation of Herodotus, who [lib. 8. cap. 12.] saith, that this was done in the midst of Summer, to wit, near after the end of the spring, at what time the Olympic games, in the midst of all these troubles, were kept in Greece, [lib. 2. 6.] to wit, in the 75 Olympiads; wherein, besides others, Dionysius Halicarnassus in his Roman Antiquities, [l. 9.] saith it was that his army, Xerxes coming to Athens, Four months after his passing the Hellespont thereof, what time Callias was Prætor; Lord Chancellor there, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 51.] In which year also, Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ, a scholar of Anaximenes the Milesian, being but 20 years of age, was made publique reader of Philosophy in Athens, as Laertius, out of Demetrius Phalerus in his Catalogue of the 50 Prætors, or Lord Chancellors of Athens, in his life reporteth, Phyllophorus being then first brought out of Ionia, and planted in the city of Athens, as Clemens Alexan. [lib. 1. from.] saith, to wit, at what time, Xerxes, when he had taken Athens, took also a multitude of books, which Pisistratus, and the Athenians had there stored up, and sitting all the rest of the city, (save the Castle) on fire, sent them away into Persia, as A. Gellius [lib. 17. No. 8.]

Attica, Jralateth. In which exception yet of the Castle, I cannot easily assent, unto him; since Herodotus saith plainly, that all that Acropolis or Citadel was burnt down, [lib. 8. cap. 53.] and so doth Ctesias and Diodorus Sic. further affirmeth, that the Temple of Minerva, which was undoubtedly in the Castle, was then also ruined.

The further Xerxes marched into Greece, the more nations still joined with him; the Melienes, the Dorienes, the Locri, the Boethians, Caristians, Andrians, Tenians, and sundry other: whereby it came to passe, that his forces, by land and sea, were no less, at Salamis and Athens, than when he first landed at Sepias; and came to Thermopylae, [Herod. lib. 8. cap. 66.] which those verses of Elchilus before mentioned, seem also to imply, where he tells us, that at that fight at Salamis, there were 1000, or 1207 ships of his, and that Ctesias says, that in that fight, the Persians had a thousand ships; not to speak of Plutarch in his discourse, De glor. Athen. (i.e.) of the glory of the Athenians, where he saith, that that victory of Themistocles at Salamis, was gotten with the losse of a thousand ships of the enemies. At which sea fight before Salamis, the Grecians fleet was far greater than when they fought at Artemisium, to wit, 380 tall ships of war, whereof there were in all but 16, from Sparta; but the Athenians had there 180, [Id. ib. cap. 43, 43, 44, 48, 62.] And with him, for the number of the Athenian ships, agreeeth Plutarch, in the Life of Themistocles, not to trouble the reader here, with that place of Herod. [lib. 8. cap. 61.] nor of Diod. [lib. 15.] where, speaking of the Athenians, they say, that they had in it, 300 ships, πεντακοντα, (i.e.) fully manned and furnished, Elchilus says, that the whole number of the Grecian ships in the fight before Salamis, was but 300, besides ten other of an extraordinary bignesse: though Ctesias writes, that there were 700 of the Grecian fleet. There were lost in this fight of the Grecian ships, to the number of 40, of the Persian, 200; besides those which were taken with the men in them, as Diodor. Sic. [lib. 11.] hath it, whereas Ctesias reports, that the Persians in that fight, lost 500 ships. But Artemisia, the Queen of Halkarnassus, who came to aid Xerxes in this war, behaved her self most manfully in this fight; so that as in Xerxes, a man might see a womanly timourousness, so in her might perceive, a most heroic courage, [Justin. lib. 2. cap. 12.] in somuch, that Xerxes himself upon this occasion was heard to say, [Id. lib. 2. cap. 12.] that he had slain the women, and the women the men; in that service. [Her. l. 8. c. 88.]

And so it came to pass, that by the leading indeed of Eurybiades, the Lacedaemonian, but the sage and prudent counsel, and great prowle of Themistocles the Athenian; and the sage and prudent counsel, and great prowle of Themistocles the Athenian; a victory was gotten at Salamis every way equal to that at Marathon: but in setting down the time when this battle was fought, Plutarch is found very divers and differing from himself. For in the life of Lylander, and in his discourse, of the glory of the Athenians, he placeth it as done in the 16 day of the month Munichus, (which is the first of the vernal months, with the Athenians; but in the Life of Camillus, as on the 20 day of Bocdromian, which was their third month in Summer. 'Tis true, in the Bay of Saron, which is otherwise called, the Bay of Salamis, as Sirabus in his eighth book, witnesseth, between the two Islands of Salamis an Egina, there was a night's fight at sea, between 10 Lacedaemonian ships, commanded by Gorgopas, and 13 Athenian ships, commanded by Eurymachus, near unto Zollers a fore-land of the isthmus of Attica, in the days of Artemisius, memorizing of Persia, of which Xenophon, in his fifth book of his History of the Greeks, maketh mention in this wise. In a sea fight made by moon-light, Gorgopas took 4 tall ships of war, and drawing them after him, carried them away to Egina: and the rest of the Athenian fleet fled home to their port of Piræum, but because as upon the 16 day of that Lunar month among the Athenians, upon which Gorgopas set upon that small fleet of the Athenians, it happened to be the full of the moon, by the benefit whereof, the Athenian fleet saved it self, with the losse only of 4 ships; heretofore did the Athenians as it seemeth consecrate that day ever after to Diana, and kept it holy-day to her honour; whereupon it was that Plutarch confounding this later sea fight, fought at Salamis, with that other, fought in the same place, against gainst Xerxes, in that discourse of his, of the glory of the Athenians, thorough error wrote of it in this manner: They consecrated, faith he, the 16 day of the month Munichion to Diana, because upon that day, after the victory gotten by the Grecians, the Goddess appeared full that night: nor that the victory of the Greeks against Xerxes was gotten about the 16 day of Bœdromion, both Plutarch in a Treatise of his, Of days, quoted by himself in the life of Camillus declareth; and it plainly appeareth in Herodotus: for that at that time, the Eleanian Mysteries were celebrated by the Athenians, Herodotus plainly foweth, [lib. 8, ca. 65.] the chief day of which solemnity, was upon the twentieth of the month Bœdromion; on which the mystic Pomp of Iacchus was openly showed to the people, as appeareth out of the same Plutarch, in the life of Camillus above mentioned: whence also it was, that when Themistocles would stay his country-men from pursuing the enemies, after their defeat at Salamis, when they had used this speech unto them: Now, faith he, let us finish the Greeks, and take care of our ships and families; and look, to the billage, and sailing of our land, seeing the enemy is quiet, and at leisure of it; and when the Spring comes on, when will we take a time to sail into Hellepont and Ionia. Argument sufficient, that the Persians were vanquished at Salamis, not in the beginning of the Spring, but in the later end of summer.

After the night Xerxes put to death certain of the Phœnicians, which were the first that fled, and threatened the rest of them with punishments answerable to their delinquencies; for fear whereof, the Phœnicians returned that day to Africa; but the night after they put over all into Asia, [Diod. Sic. l. 11. in the 1 year of the 75 Olympiads.] Many other ships also, learning more terror of the King, than the fury of the enemy, flunk away, every one to his own home, [Justin lib. 2, c. 12.]

Xerxes, terrified with this disaster at sea, committed his sons to Artemisia the Queen, by her to be transported to Ephesus, with Hieronymus their Governor, [Herod. lib. 8, ca. 101. 107.]

Cleombrotus of Sparta, brother to Leonidas, which died at Thermopylæ, to stop the passage against Xerxes his coming by land into Peloponnesus, caused a wall to be drawn athwart the neck of land which is called, Isthmus Corinthiacus, [Id. lib. 8, ca. 71.] but whilst he was offering of a sacrifice against the Persians, the sun in the firmament lost his light, and grew dark: whereupon he withdrew his army which was employed in that fortification, and shortly after died: unto whom succeeded his son Paulanias, as continuing his main and Tutor of Plutarchus, a child, the son of Leonidas deceased, [Id. lib. 9, ca. 10.] But Plutarchian account gives us an Eclipse of the Sun of 8 digits and 32 minutes, upon the 2 day of October, after the Julian Calendar, at one of the clock 39 minutes in the afternoon, in this year.

Themistocles, to send Xerxes packing the more speedily out of Greece, sent a feigned messenger to him from Salamis, that the Grecians had a purpose to send a Fleet of Ships to Hellepont, there to burn or break his bridge: which he no sooner heard, but he provided with all speed to get him gone out of Europe into Asia, [Herod. lib. 8, ca. 110. Diod. Sic. lib. 11. in 1 year of 75 Olympiads: and Plut. in the life of Themistocles.]

Resolving therefore to be gone, he sent away his Fleet from Phalcrus to Hellepont, to keep the bridge there, for his passage: and himself with Mardonius, and his land army accompanying him, marched speedily towards Theffalie, [Herod. lib. 8, cap. 107. 113. 115.]

Mardonius coming with Xerxes into Theffalie, chose out of all his army, three hundred thousand men, which he kept with him to go on with the conquest of Greece; and with them, because the time of the year for keeping the field was past, he wintered in Theffalia, [Id. ca. 113. 114.] and herein with him agrees Justin out of Trogus, [lib. 2, ca. 13.] and Plutarch in the life of Aristides, though Diod. Sic. faith, that there stayed with him no less than four hundred thousand men.

In this mean while, the Lacedæmonians by the command of the Oracle at Delphos, sent a Herald to Xerxes, to require reparation of him for the death of their King Leonidas: unto whom he returned this answer: that Mardonius should pay them their due. After which, leaving Mardonius in Theffalie, he hastened away to the Hellepont; taking along with him a very inconsiderable part of his army for his guard: but left the rest to be brought after him, by Hydarnes, [Herod. lib. 8, cap. 114. 115. 118.]

As for those land Forces which he left behind him with Mardonius: first a famine, then a pestilence, fell upon them; and so foule was the mortality among them, that the high-ways lay strowed with the dead carcasses of them, and both birds and beasts of prey, followed the army by the sent, where ever they went, [Id. ca. 115. Justin lib. 2, cap. 13.]

In Asia, they that were called Archæanactides, held the kingdom of Bosphorus Cimæreus 40 years long, [Diod. Sic. lib. 12. in 3 year of 85 Olympiads. These had their beginning from Archæanactes of Mitylene; who is said to have built Sigæum, with the stones digged out of the ruins of Troy, [Strabo, lib. 13.]

Xerxes at 45 dayes end, came to the passage at Hellepont, as faith Herod. [lib. 8, ca. 115.] Emil. Probus bates a third part of that time in the life of Themistocles: where he faith, faith, that upon the way wherein he spent six months, in going into Europe, upon the same he spent less than thirty days, in his return from thence into Asia.

Xerxes finding his bridge broken down with the rage of Winter-formes; for very fear, put over in a poor filter-boat: And truly it was a thing worthy the fight, and a rare example of humane frailty and change of things in this world, to see him like shuffling in a little wherry, whom a little before, the whole Sea seemed too little to contain; and him diffident of a page, to wait upon him under whose army, the very earth ear-shoilers, seemed to groane for the burden of it, [Justin lib. 2, cap. 13.]

The land Forces also, which followed him under the conduct of Hydarnes, coming thither, and finding the bridge broken down, passed over in boats to Abydus: and there finding more plenty of victuals than they had upon their way, what with gorging themselves with meats: what with change of water, they dyed by heaps; the rest accompanied Xerxes to Sardes, [Herod. lib. 8, c. 117.]

Xerxes, whilst he was upon the way to Sardes, sent Megabyzus to spoil the Temple of Delphos, but when he desired to be excused, Maturus an Eunuch undertook it, and having done the errand he was sent in, returned to him; [Ctesias.]

News being brought to Susa, by the Courtiers which were sent, that Xerxes had taken Athens, put the Persians into such a fit of mirth, that they strewed all the streets with mirtle boughs, and burnt frankincense in them: and set themselves wholly to sacrificing, and feasting: But when the second tidings came of his overthrow at Salamis; that put them into such a consternation of mind, that every man rent his garments, and filled all places with howlings and lamentations, [Herod. l. 8, c. 99.] which mourning of theirs, Elichylus hath described, and set out to the lives in Persia.

The fleet which remained, and the sea-men which were therein left, having waited over the land forces, out of Cheroneus to Abydus, wintered at Cumæ in Asia, [Herod. lib. 8, c. 130.]

Artabazus the son of Pharnabazus, having accompanied Xerxes with 60 thousand soldiers to Hellepont, seeing him lately landed in Asia side; took his journey back again and laid about Pallene: seeing that Mardonius himself had taken up his winter quarter in Macedonia and Theffalia, and looked not after the rest of the army: and during his abode there, finding that the City of Poudeia, with Pallene, had already revolted from the Persian, and Olynthus in terms to do the like, he clapt down before Poudeia and Olynthus and besieged them both at once, and having taken Olynthus, and put all the Bottian inhabitants thereof to the sword, he committed the place to the keeping of Critobolus of Torona, a Chæcedonian born, [Id. lib. 8, c. 126. 127.]

When the Persians had now lain 3 months before Poudeia, a huge tide of the sea, brake in upon them, in their trenches, which made them raise their siege; yet many of them perished with that inundation; and when others fought to save themselves by swimming, the Poudeians went in boats, and knockt them in the head; those that escaped, Artabazus took, and carried with him into Theffalie to Mardonius, [Id. c. 129.]

In the first of the Spring, the remainder of the Persian fleet, which had wintered at Cumæ, put over to the Iles of Samos, where some other of their fellows had taken up their winter quarter. The greatest part in this Navie, were Persian and Median soldiers: and to them came shortly after certain Commanders, as Mardoutus Fitz Bærgus, and Antantes Fitz Artacheus, who staying there, kept all Ionia from revolting, having a fleet of 300 sail, (reckoning in the Ionians that were with them) at their command, [Id. c. 130.] But Diodorus faith, that they were no less than 400 sail, which lay then at Samos, waiting the motion of the Ionians: in this 2 year of the 75 Olympiads.

The Grecian fleet consisting of one hundred and ten ships, under two Commanders, Leocythides king of the Spartans, and Xanthippus an Athenian, went to Egina, where certain messengers came to them out of Ionia; to beseech them, all delay left apart, to come and relieve them in Ionia; and with much ado, drew them as far as to Delos, thitherward, [Herod. lib. 8, c. 131. 132.] and yet Diodorus tells us, that having staid some certain dayes at Egina, they then, of themselves, failed to Delos, with 250 tall ships of war.

Xerxes is said to have built both a Palace, and a Castle at Celene in Phrygia, Xen. in his Expedition of Cyrus, [lib. 1.]

Mardonius with his army came to Athens, not yet reinhabited, ten months after it was first taken by Xerxes: and there ruined and burnt down, what ever Xerxes had left standing, and thence marched into the country of Megare, which was the farthest place that the Persians were at westward, in all Greece, [Herodotus, lib. 9, cap. 3. 13. 14.]

Whiles the Grecian fleet lay at Delos, messengers came to them from Samos, praying them to succour both themselves, and the rest of the Greek nation, which dwelt in Asia, against the Persians. Leocythides the king of Sparta, at a Council of war, resolved to let all the Greek Cities at liberty from the Persians: and they entering a league with the Samians, came with their whole fleet to Samos, and lay close under the Temple of Juno, providing there for a sea fight, against the Persians, [Id. ib. cap. 89. 91. 95. with Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

The Commanders of the Persian navy continuing still at Samos, and hearing that the Grecians were coming against them, and finding themselves not able to match them at sea; suffered the Phenician ships all to be gone; but with the rest failed to Micalæ, which is a fore-land, or promontory in Ionia: where the land army lay, left there on purpose by Xerxes, to keep Ionia in order; consisting of 60000 men, under the command of Tirabazus, who was the tallest and goodliest man to look too, of all the Persians: There, near to the Temple of Ceres, of Eleusis, they drew up their ships, and enclofed them with a rampart, which they fortified with stones and flakes, and such materials as the place afforded; [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 95. 96.] and withal, sent to Sardes, and other places adjoining; for more land forces: so that they made up a body of an hundred thousand men: making provision also, of all other things necessary for the war, [Diodorus, lib. 11.]

In an encounter of the horse, near a place called Erythræ in Beotia, between the Grecians and Persians, a commander of the Persians called Masfines, but by the Greeks, Macifias, happened to be slain; for whom, great lamentation was made by the Persians, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 20. 22. 24. and Plutarch, in the Life of Aristides.]

The Grecians, under the conduct of Paulanias the son of Cleombrotus, routed the Persian army at Platea: which, as Ctesias saith, consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand fighting men. Emil. Probus, in his Paulanias, saith there were of them, two hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse; and Plutarch in the life of Aristides affirms, that there were not fewer, than three hundred thousand: to which three hundred thousand, Herodotus addeth also, all the Grecian auxiliaries, which Mardonius had drest thousand, Herodotus addeth also, all the Grecian auxiliaries, which Mardonius had drest thousand men: In the Grecian army, Ctesias reckons not above seven thousand and three hundred men; whereas Herodotus and Plutarch affirm, that of the Athenian party alone, there were no less than eight thousand men: and that the whole Grecian army consisted either of one hundred thousand fighting men: as Diodorus Siculus, Trogus, Pompeius, and Orosius, or of one hundred and ten thousand, as Herodotus, [lib. 9. cap. 29.] saith: of whom there fell in this battle, not above one thousand three hundred and sixty, as Plutarch in the Life of Aristides reports; though Diod. Sic. saith, there were slain of them in that fight, above 10000.

Mardonius the son in law, (not of Xerxes, as Emil. Probus, in the life of Paulanias hath it, but of Darius, who was father to Xerxes, as I shewed before, in the year of the world 3510. General of all this army, was slain in this fight, by a stone flung at him, by Arimnestus, or Arimnestus, a man of Sparta, [Herodotus, lib. 1. cap. 65.] Plutarch in the Life of Aristides, and Paulanias, [lib. 1.] for we may not believe Ctesias, who saith, that he of Aristides, and Paulanias, [lib. 1.] for we may not believe Ctesias, who saith, that he was only hurt, and so got away for that time, and that being commanded afterward, to spoil the Temple of Apollo, he was there killed, with a storme of haile that fell upon Marhm: though Justin out of Trogus, and out of Justin Orofius reports, that Marhm, accompanied with a very small number, escaped away thence, as out of a shipwreck.

The Persian army, having lost their General, fled to a fortress of theirs, made up of wood, and the Grecians, having forced it, slew therein above one hundred thousand of them, [Diodorus Siculus,] so that of three hundred thousand of them, there were not left full three thousand men; besides 40000 only, which fled away with Artabazus, [Her. lib. 9. cap. 69.]

Leotychides, who commanded at sea, coming to Mycale, dealt with the Ionians to fall off from the Persians, whom they served: and what with his own army, what with their help, he obtained there a most memorable victory; wherein he slew above 30 thousand Persians; besides Mardonius, who commanded them by sea, and Tigranes, who was General by land: but two other great Commanders of their fleet, Artayntes, and Ithramitres fled; the rest that escaped, brook themselves to the tops of the promontory of Mycale, [Id. ib. from c. 97. to 104. with Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

Both these fights fell out near to two Temples of Ceres of Eleusis, and upon the same day of the same month: that at Platea in Europe, early in the morning; that other at Mycale in Asia, later in the afternoon; and so swift winged was fame in spreading the news hereof, that at so far a distance, and in so few hours space, the report of the victory at Platea, came to them at Mycale; the same day, before they began to fight there, [Id. ib. cap. 99. 100. with Justin lib. 2. c. 14.] though Diod. Sic. thinks (and that more probably) that Leotychides heard nothing at all of what was done at Platea, but cunningly cast abroad such a rumor among his souldiers, to put the more courage thereby into their hearts, by way of a stratagem. Now the day of these two battles [Asian Var. Hist. lib. 2. c. 25.] saith, was the sixth of the month Thargelion, the 2 month in the Spring, with the Athenians; which Plutarch with more judgment saith, was in the month Bædromion, which was the 3 month in Summer; and that either upon the 3 day thereof; as [in the life of Camillus, and in his discourse of the glory of the Athenians,] or upon the fourth, as in the life of Aristides; and to this fight at Micalæ, was in the second year after Xerxes his first passage over into Greece, [Herod. lib. 7. ca. 80.]

cast

Hereupon all Ionia revolted from the Persian, [Herod. lib. 9. ca. 103.] together with the Eolians and Ilanders bordering upon both, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

The Greeks having let fire upon, and consumed the Persian ships and camps; returned to the Isle of Samos, and there entered into a consultation how to transplant all the Ionian nation (yea and the Eolian too, as Diod. hath it) out of Asia, (where they seemed to be too openly expoled to the danger of the Persian cruelty) into Greece: But the Athenians fearing least the Ionians, which were now a Colony of their own, would by this means become common to the rest of Greece; opposed it, and told them, that themselves, as tied to them in blood, would never be wanting to their defence; and therefore desired that they might continue still where they were in Asia, [Herod. ib. ca. 105. Diod. ib. in a year of 75 Olympiads.]

They of the continent of Greece, entered into a firm association and league with them of Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and other Ilanders, who had joyed in this War against the Persian; and having plighted their faith each to other with a solemn oath, to continue firm in this association, and never to break the bond now made between them: sailed in a body towards Hellepont, and in their way thitherward, came to an anchor first at a Foreland called Lection; being there taken forth by a contrary winde: but the winde coming faire again, they passed on, and came to Abydos; and when they found the bridges there already broken down, which was the principal cause of their going thither, Leotychides with his men of Peloponnesus returned home; but the Athenians with their Captain Xanthippus, and (as Thucydides saith,) with their associates out of Ionia and Hellepont, which had revolted from the Persians, passed over from Abydos into Chersonesus, and there besieged Sestos: now Artayntes, a Persian born, and a wicked man, was Governour of that province, appointed by Xerxes: and because that Town was fenced with a very strong Wall, therefore as well others of the neighbouring places; as Oebus himself, a Persian born, who had laid up all the Flags and Streamers, and other furniture of the bridges at Cardya, left that place, and put himself into Sestos also, [Herod. ib. ca. 105. 113. 114. 115.]

Artabazus the son of Pharnaces, who with 40000 men fled out of the battle at Platea, haltered away thorough the countries of Phocis, Thessalie, and Macedonia, into Thracia; and cutting the nearest way over-land, came unto Byzantium: having left many of his men behind him in his march; which were either knocked in head by the Thracians, or died with hunger, and travel on the way; and from Byzantium he got shipping, and pulled over into Asia, [Id. ib. ca. 65. 69. 76. 88.]

But those few which had saved themselves in the top of the rocks, in the Foreland or Promontory of Micalæ, repaired to Sardes, from whence Xerxes was not yet gone. In that journey, when Malfyses, one of the sons of Darius Hytaspes, had charged Artayntes, one of the chief Commanders of the Fleet at Mycale, among other reproachful words, that he had carried himself basely in that service, and more like a woman than a man; and was therefore assaulted by Artayntes with his naked sword: Xenagoras of Halicarnassus stepped in, bare off the blow, and saved Malfyses from that present danger: and Xerxes, for so saving his brothers life, made him Governour of all Cilicia, [Id. cap. 106.]

But whilst Xerxes spent his time at Sardes, he there fell desperately in love with his brother Malfyses wife; when whom he had often solicited to adultery, and could not prevail that way, he thereupon married Artaynta, hers and his brother Malfyses daughter, to his own son: Darius hoping to get his will of her the more easily by this occasion. Which done, and the wedding ended, he returned toward Sula, [Id. cap. 107.] leaving part of his army at Sardes, to continue the War against the Grecians, [Diod. Sic. an. 2. of 75. Olympiads.]

326. Xerxes in his flight burnt the Oracle of Apollo Didymus in Branchis, as he did all the other Temples in Asia, save that at Ephebus; those of Branchis having, without resistance, delivered up the treasury of their god, went altogether along with him, leaving, least, if they stayed behind, they should have been punished for sacrilege and treason both, [Srabo, lib. 14. with Solinus cap. 40.] Herodotus saith that Xerxes, going from Sardes, went to Sula: Diodorus, that he went to Ecabatean. Ctesias writeth, that he went from Babylon to Persia: Ariannus in his book of Alexanders Acts, affirmeth that coming to Babylon, he there demolished the Temple of Belus, and all other consecrated places; and with them, the Sepulchre of Belus; as Srabo, [lib. 16.] saith, who also

there tells us, that he took away the statue of Belus, made all of massie gold, of twelve cubits high: and when the Priests opposed it, and would not suffer it to be removed, he slew him also, as we read in Herod. [lib. 1. cap. 182.]

While the Athenians lay at the siege of Sestos, and the Autumn coming on, could not take it, they fell into a consultation to leave it; but the people within, were so near driven with famine, that they were faine to boile their very bed-cords and eat them; so that Artayctes and Oebalus, with many of the Persians, gat down the walls by night, and fled; which the inhabitants perceiving early the next morning, signified the same to the Athenians, and opened their gates unto them, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 116, 117.]

When there was now a great number of prisoners taken, what at Sestos, what at Byzantium by the Athenians, and their confederates in the army; the confederates, of their own accord, offered to reker the division and sharing of that prey, to Cimon, a young Gentleman of the Athenians, to be made as he should think good, and they would stand to it, who falling presently to work, let all the persons on the one hand, and all the cloaths, toys, and ornaments which they wore, on the other, and then bad them take which they list: saying, that the Athenians would content themselves, with that part which they list: their Associates, by the perswasion, of Hierophytus of Samos, chose the cloaths and ornaments, as of far greater value, than the bare bodies of the prisoners, and left the bodies, as not made for labour, to the Athenians. But soon after, the friends and kinsmen of the prisoners, coming out of Phrygia and Lydia; redeemed those prisoners at a great rate, wherewith Cimon maintained the fleet four whole moneths after, and brought more over a very considerable stock of silver and gold into the treasury at Athens. This act first gave a reputation of wit and wisdom unto Cimon among the Athenians; and they having gotten so much money by the bargain, laughed at their fellows, by whom they had formerly been laughed at, [Plutarch, in the life of Cimon, and Polyanius, lib. 1. Strabo.]

When Oebalus had gotten away into Thracia, the Thracians, called Abynthii, took him, and sacrificed him to their god Pleistors; and put his followers, some to one kind of death, some to another. Artayctes and his followers, they seized on at Egos potamus, and carryed him prisoner to Sestos: and by the sea side, where Xerxes had made his bridge, or as others say, upon a hill near the city Madytus, set up gibets, and there hung them up, stoning his own son first to death before his eyes. These things thus done, the Athenians returned into Greece, carrying with them besides money, the flags and streamers, ornaments of the bridges, which had been made over the Hellespont, purposing to hang them up as trophies in their Temples. And this was all that was done this year, [Herod. lib. 9. cap. 118, 119, 120.] Xanthippus leaving a garrison in Sestos, dismissed all his strangers, and he with his own companies returned to Athens: and for the war of the Medes, as they call it, came to an end, after it had lasted full two years, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11. in the 75. Olympiade.]

Bagabates the Eunuch, when he had continued sitting by the tomb of Darius 7 years, died, [Ctesias.]

Megabytus accused his wife Amyris, Xerxes his daughter, of adultery; who blamed his daughter for it, very sharply, [Ctesias] whilst he himself lay wallowing all the while in adultery and incest both; for turning his lewd affection now from his Brother Malfites his wife, to their daughter Artayna, whom he had now made his own daughter in laws, he lay with her continually at Sula. [Herod. lib. 9. cap. 107, 108.]

3527. Paulanias the son of Cleombrotus, who was sent General of the Grecians from Lacedaemonia, to free such Greek cities, as were yet held by the garrisons of the Persians, with 20 ships out of Peloponessus, and 30 more from Athens. (Diodor. saith 50.) commanded by Artides made a voyage into Cyprus, and there restored many cities, which were hitherto held by Persian garrisons to their native liberty, [Thucid. lib. 1. Diodor. Sic. in the 4 year of the 75 Olympiade.]

Xerxes celebrating his coronation day, gave to his Queen Amestris, who asked it of him for a boon, Malfites his brothers wife; whose paps, nostrils, ears, lips, and tongue he presently caused to be cut off, and so sent her home again; wherupon Malfites, the conspiring with his own children, purposed to get him privily away with them into the province of Bactria, whereof himself was then Governour; and to raise both them and the king, to a rebellion against the king, but was intercepted by the way, by Xerxes his Souldier, and both he and his children, and all that were in his company put to the sword, [Herod. lib. 9. from chap. 108. to 112.] And that government of Bactria, Xerxes bestowed upon his own son Hytaspes, [Diod. Sic. in the 4 year of the 78 Olympiade.]

3528. Paulanias, after his return out of Cyprus, went and took Byzantium: and then, without the privy of his associates in the war, sent the Persians whom he had there taken (some of them being Xerxes his neer friends and kinsmen) giving it out that they were fled) home to Xerxes, safe and sound, and all this brinsse he negotiated, by one Gongylus an Eretrian born, whom also he employed with letters unto Xerxes, wherein he

he desired his daughter in marriage: and in lieu thereof he undertook and promised, to bring Sparta, and all Greece, into his subjection. Glad was Xerxes at this news; and presently wrote back unto him by Artabazus the son of Phanaces, whom for this purpose he dispatched away to the sea side; that at a shorter distance he might the more easily communicate his counsels with Paulanias: and therefore gave him the Government of the province of Dalcylis, calling home Magabates, who was Governour there before. And when Paulanias upon these hopes grew more intolent than before, and began to live after the Persian garbe, and carryed himself more ruggedly and imperiously towards those who were in league with that State, the greater part of them, and especially the Ionians, and others who had been lately freed from their slavery under the Persian, fell all to the Athenians, and desired rather to serve under them, [Thucid. lib. 1.]

3529. Paulanias being hereof accused by the friends and associates of the Spartans was presently sent for, to return home from Byzantium; where being found guilty and condemned for some private misdemeanours; yet was wholly acquitted from all suspicion of treason against the State: Nevertheless he was put from the Government of Hellespont; yet thither he went again without leave asking, in a ship of his own providing; to the end that under colour of prosecuting the war on the behalf of the Grecians in those parts, he might the better negotiate and drive on his own designs with Xerxes: and therefore when the Athenians would not suffer him to nestle in Byzantium, he returned not to Sparta, but staid at Colonæ in Troas: wherupon he was again accused at Sparta, that he held intelligence with the Persians, and that it was for no good, that he stayed hovering so long in those parts. Wherefore, being sent for again by the Ephori, so soon as he came, they threw him into prison: but upon a hearing he was again acquitted, [Id. ib.]

3530. But when the Principality of Greece, in hatred to Paulanias was taken from the Lacedaemonians, and settled upon the Athenians; they under a colour of revenging the wrong done to the several countries by the common enemy, made a tax of what monies, and what ships, the particular cities should contribute against the Persians: wherunto the cities both of Greece, and of the Grecians in Asia readily agreed, for the common safeties sake. The first tax made, amounted to 460. (not as Diodorus hath it, 560.) talents: to be laid up in the Isle of Delos, as in the common treasury of all Greece, [Thucid. lib. 1. Diod. lib. 11. Justin lib. 16. cap. 3. Plutarch and Emil. Probus, in the life of Arifpides.]

Paulanias, being discovered by Argilius, his love-boy, to whom he committed his last letters sent to Artabazus, was by the Ephori tarved to death, [Thucid. lib. 1. Diod. lib. 11. Emil. Probus, in the life of Paulanias.]

3531. Artabazus, an Hyrcanian borne, Captain of the Guard, and one who was above all others of greatest credit and authority with King Xerxes, as his father Artalyras was before with Darius; conspiring with Mithridates an Eunuch, Chamberlaine to the King, (Ctesias calls him Spamtires or Alpatitres) who was his intimate friend and near kinsman, bringer into the bed-chamber with his seven sons, all robustious young men, by night, flew Xerxes as he lay in his bed: and in the deep of the night, went speedily to his father, that he might the sooner come to the Crown, (which Elian lib. 13. killed his father, that he might the sooner come to the Crown,) but by this false tale, he perswaded Artaxerxes, to let the Kings Guard upon his brother Darius; and they slew him, [Ctesias, Diod. Justin lib. 3. cap. 1.]

Thus by Artabazus his means, Artaxerxes came to the Crown. Ctesias, who was a man of a milde disposition, and full of magnanimity withal: (turnamed Longimanus, because his right hands was longer than his left. [Plutarch in the beginning of the life of Artauerxes].) But the 7 first moneths of his reign, are by Euseb. in his Chron. attributed to Artabazus: because that for so long, he ruled all things, as it should seem, in Artaxerxes name; for though Diodorus intimates, that Artabazus himself was presently done to death, after his murders committed upon Xerxes and Darius; yet that there was some time passed between, appears by the more full narrations of the matter, both by Ctesias, and also by Justin.

Themistocles of Athens, being suspected of the conspiracy with Paulanias for the betraying of Greece into the hands of the Persians, was searched for, and had he been taken, had out of all doubt died for it: and therefore he fled out of Greece, and came to Pydna, (a Town lying in the Thermaic bay of Macedonia) & there finding a Merchant's ship going into Ionia, put himself aboard her. But by tempest, he was carried into the middest of the Athenian army, which lay at the siege of Naxos. But the Master of the Barque being well fed by Themistocles, lay a whole night and day at an anchor without the Athenian Fleet; and so when the tempest was over, came safe to Ephesus, [Thucid. lib. 1. Emil. Probus, in the life of Themistocles. Polyan. lib. 1. Strabo.]

Plutarch reports that he came to Cuma, and there found that many Sea Captains laid waite to take him, especially Ergoteles and Theodoros, for that Xerxes had promised 200. talents to whosoever should bring in his head : and therefore, he conveyed himself privately from thence, and came to a little town called Egas in Eolia : and there lay close for a few days, in the house of one Nicogenes, a very wealthy man in those parts, and one who was very well acquainted, and familiar, with divers of the kings nearest attendants : Diodorus calls him Lythæus, and says further, that he was a man of so very great wealth, that when Xerxes passed that way, he feasted both him and all his army, in a very bountiful manner. By this good Host's means, he was put into a close waggon, such as the kings, and other great men's harlots used, among the Persians to be carried in and that he came safe into Persia, both Plutarch and Thucidides agree ; though Thucidides only saith, that he went all the way from the sea side into Persia, in the company of a certain Persian : now Herodotus tells us, that from Ephesus to Sardes, it is 3 days journey, and from thence to Sula 3 months, (lib. 5. c. 50, 53, 54.)

Artabanus purposing now to destroy Xerxes as he had formerly done his father and brother ; disclosed his intention unto Megabyzus, whom he knew to be discontented, for the jealousy he had conceived of his wives disloyalty, Amytis, sister unto Artaxerxes himself : and they ware secrecy each to other : but Megabyzus, presently went and disclosed the matter to the king ; who thereupon put Artabanus to death, and then also came to light, his practices concerning the death both of Xerxes, and also of Darius. And then Aspamitres, or Spaminthes the eunuchs who was of counsel with him in both, was put to a most bitter death, by certain racks, and other engines in a boat (described more at large by Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes) [Ctesias.] For Megabyzus, Justin puts Beasibus, as consort with Artabanus in this plot ; and lets out the manner of Artabanus his death in this wise. Artaxerxes, saith he, fearing the number of Artabanus his children, commanded all the army to be ready in the field the next day, for that he would take a view of them, both how many they were, and also how every man could stand to his arms, wherefore, when Artabanus was there present in armor, Artaxerxes said, that his own counselor was a little with the sword, but put off his corslet, Artaxerxes ran his naked body thorough with his sword, out of which menace of his corslet, we may well learn, by the way, that Artaxerxes, was not at this time so very a boy or child, as Justin makes him, but that he was at mans estate ; and so old, as that the Scripture tells us, that in the seventh year of his kingdom, he was grown a father, [Exod 7: 29.]

After Artabanus his death, there was a battail fought between his friends, and the other Persians, wherein three of his sons were slain ; and Megabyzus, on the other side, sorely wounded, whereas both Artaxerxes himself and his sisters, Amytis, Megabyzus his wife, and Rhodogyne, and his mother Amestris, much grieved ; and hardly at length was Megabyzus recovered by the great skill and industry of one Apollonius a Physician, or Chirurgeon, of the Isle of Cos : But hereupon all Bactria revolted from Artaxerxes, and another Artabanus was there made Governour, between whom and them, a field was fought, where they parted upon even terms, (so saith Ctesias : where yet those words, ἐν ὁμοῖς ὅμοις Ἀρταβανὸς or Ἀρταβανῶν, are ambiguously spoken ; for either it may be meant, as I have here expressed it, according to the construction thereof made by Hen. Stephanus ; that there was another Artabanus made Governour of Bactria, in stead of the former, or that there was at this time another Artabanus, formerly Governour of that province, differing from him that was lately put to death ; if we take the first, then to the present. For that at this present, Hytaspes, Xerxes his son, was Governour of Bactria, we learn out of Diodor. Sic. and that he was the middle brother between Darius, and Artaxerxes, we find in Ctesias : and every man may think, that it stood with a great deal of reason, that Hytaspes seeing his younger brother Artaxerxes preferred before him in the kingdom, would stir up, not only the Bactrians, whose governour he then was, but also all his other friends, for the recovery of his right.

Eusebius in his Chron. noteth, that in the fourth year of this 76 Olympiade, (upon which we now are) it was, that Themistocles fled to the Persians, which surely well enough with that which is delivered by Thucidides ; who placeth the coming of Themistocles to Artaxerxes, between the siege of Naxos, and that famous victory gotten over the Persians, at the mouth of the river Eurymedon by Cimon the Athenian ; and withall, maketh the beginning of the reign of Artaxerxes, to fall in with the same time, for he saith, That Themistocles first letters to Artaxerxes, πρὸς Ἀρταξέρξεω, (i. e.) when he was come newly to the crown, wherein he both craved his favour, and offered him his service against the Greeks : from whence we may fully discern the true beginning of Artaxerxes his reign, which was almost full nine years sooner, than it is commonly laid to have been.

Plutarch out of Phanias reports, that Themistocles was brought to Artaxerxes his presence, by Artabanus, a Colonel ; and out of Eratosthenes that he obtained this favour at that Colonels hand, by the means of his Lie-by ; which was a wench of Eretria : but doth doth not explain, what Artabanus this was : whether he, who affecting the kingdom, was slain by Artaxerxes ; or that Artabanus to whom Xerxes, seven years before, when he went into Greece, committed the Government of his kingdom : For if he mean the first, then Themistocles his coming to Artaxerxes, must needs be within the first seven months after his coming to the crown ; according to Euseb. his account : but if any other, than his coming to the king, might also have fallen upon any other month of the same first year, which will very well also suit with that place of Thucidides above mentioned ; where he saith, that he was brought to Artaxerxes, when he was newly come to the crown. Now that it was the office of the Colonel, or Chiliarch, being the second officer in the kingdom, to bring such as were to be admitted to the presence of the king, appeareth plainly by Emilius Probus, in the Life of Cimon ; and by Elian, [lib. 1.] Varus Histor. cap. 21.

When Themistocles, was thus graciously received, and welcomed by the king, a new danger grew upon him by the means of Mandane a daughter of Darius Hytaspes : for the having lost all her children in the sea-fight before Salamis, and not being able to prevail with the king, tried and solicited all her friends and great men about the Court, and at last stirred up the common people it self, to be revenged of this Themistocles, for the hurt he had done them in that battle. And when they all in a hurry came flocking into the Court, Artaxerxes told them fairly, that he would refer the whole matter to the judgment of his Lords : and so, by appointing a long time, for the preparing and hearing, and determining of this great cause, he found the means to deliver Themistocles, out of the peoples hands, for the present, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

In the second battel, between the Persians and the Bactrians, by reason of a strong tempestuous wind, sitting in their faces, Artaxerxes got the victory of them, and reduced them wholly to his subjection, [Ctesias.]

Themistocles, when he had spent a whole year in learning, as well as possibly he could the Persian tongue, and withal, was grown perfect in the lawes and customes of the country, and then coming to his trial, did not only quit himself from all objections made against him, but grew moreover into such favour with the King, as no Grecian was ever in before : for he not only used to carry him abroad with him a hunting, but also to call him to his private delights and recreations at home, inasmuch, that he was admitted to the presence of Amestris the kings mother, and converted familiarly with her. He bestowed on him also, a Persian wife, of noble parentage, excellent for beauty and goodness of disposition ; besides servants to attend upon him, cupboards of plate of all sorts, and all other things, not only for his necessary use, but even for delight and pleasure, [Thucidides, lib. 1. Diodorus Siculus, lib. 11. Plutarch in the Life of Themistocles.]

When Demaratus the Lacedemonian, who returned out of Greece with Xerxes, was fallen into the kings high displeasure, for that he came riding into Sardes in his Chariot, wearing his turban upright, upon his heads, in a kingly fashion upon the mediation, and entreaty of Themistocles, he allayed his anger, and grew friends with him again : [Plut. in Them. with Sen. lib. 6. de Benefic. 31.]

Themistocles being made Governour of the province of Magnesia, returned into Asia ; [Thucid. lib. 1.]

In his return, he escaped a great danger, intended toward him, by the lying in wait of Epyrius, a Persian, Governour of the Upper Phrygia, and the Pisidians, and he escaped it by the forewarning of Dindymene, the mother of the gods, in a dream which he had, as he lay sleeping at noon : in memory whereof, he built her a Temple at Magnesia : and made his own daughter Messipolema to be consecrated Priestess to her, [Plutarch in Themistocles : or, as some will have it, his wife ; as in Strabo, [lib. 14.]

But that Themistocles might appear in Asia, with the greater lustre, the king gave him, besides the government of the province of Magnesia, the very city of Magnesia, upon Meander, which paid the king yearly, fifty talents, to find him bread for his Table ; and Lampachus in Hellepont, to buy him wine to his meat and Mysis, at the mouth of Meander, for his second course. Neantech Cyzicenses, and Phanias and Athenæus, [lib. 1. c. 27.] add two Cities more, in the country of Troas, to wit, Perceotes and Paletepes, to furnish him with cloaths, and carpets, [Thucid. 1. lib. 11. Diod. and Emil. Prob. in the Life of Themistocles.]

Cimon the son of Miltiades, who was General in the field at Marathon, being now himself made General by the Athenians against the Persians, set out of the Pyreum at Athens, with 200 fighting ships : which afterward, what out of Ionia, what out of other parts, he increased to the number of 300, and with this Fleet he set sail for the coast of Caria : where all the sea-towns, which had been at any time heretofore planted by Grecians, presently revolted to him from the Persians. Therewith which were possessed by the natives of the country, he held by the Persian garrisons, he set upon, and took them all by pure force of war. Having thus dispatched the errand he came on, in Caria, he passed into Lycia : and in like manner took in all there too ; and when as upon their submission to the Athenian government, he demanded shipping of them, his Navy was forthwith exceedingly much increased, [Diod. lib. 11.]

The Perfians lifted what men they could out of other the Kings Dominions, for land service; but for shipping, they lent to the Phenicians, Cyprians, and Cilicians. The chief Commander of all the Persian Fleet, when it came together, was Titrauthras, a bastard son of Xerxes, [Id. ib.] Ephorus saith, that he was Admiral of the Fleet, and Perendras Commander by land: But Callisthenes saith, that Ariomandes the son of Cambyses commanded the army, [Plut. in Cimon.]

After the Athenians had subdued Naxos, as Thucydides, in his first book teacheth us. They and their confederates under the conduct of their General Cimon, in one and the same day, put to flight the Persians, both in a sea-fight, not far from the Isle of Cyprus, and also in a fight at land, at the mouth of the river Eurymedon in Pamphylia, the 3 year of the 77 Olympiade, as C. [Diod. Sic. lib. xi.] reporteth; who was of opinion, (and so was Justin, lib. 2. in fine,) that Xerxes was yet living: contrary to what Thucides affirms, who yet of all other, liveth nearest to that time. And therefore Eusebius is in the right, who placeth this great victory in the 4 year of Artaxerxes; with this further note upon it: Cimon obtained this victory by sea and land against the Persians, near the River Eurymedon; and so the war with the Medes ended. For from the beginning of Artaxerxes reign (as we have put it according to Thucides his account.) his fourth year fell in with the third year of the 77 Olympiade, here mentioned by Diodorus, though Eusebius misforcing the first year of his reign, with the first year of the 79 Olympiade, made of necessity in consequence thereof, have placed his 4. years, with the 4. year of the fame Olympiade. But the best way will be, to set down this whole matter in order as we find it in Diodor. and Plutarch, thus.

When Cimon had heard, that the Kings Captains had taken up their Station with a great army by land, and a fleet by sea, in the coast of Pamphylia; he to keep the least that they might not come within the Chelidonian Islands, went with 200. saile from Cnidus and Triopium, and came to the city of the Perfians, who were Grecians: and because they would not receive his Navy into their Port, nor fall off from the Perfian, he fired their country, and assaulted their city. Nevertheless, at the intercession of twenty of Chios, who were in the Fleet, a peace was made, upon condition that they should pay down ten talents ready money, follow Cimon, and partake in the war against the Perfians, [Plut. in the life of Cimon.

Then Cimon, understanding that the Persian Fleet hovered about the coast of Cyprus; let secretly fail towards them, with 250. ships against 340. of theirs: Diod. Though Ephorus saith that the Persians were 350. and Phanodemus 600. strong: yet theie did nothing worthy of so great a Navy: but they that were next the land, abandoned their ships, and fled to land, to the army that there was ready ranged in battel a-ray: the rest were set upon by Cimon, taken, and put to the sword, [Plutarch.] Thucidides saith, that they took all the Phœnician ships, to the number of 200. and sunk them every one, [Emil. Probns in the life of Cimon] saith that, he overcame and took all the Fleet of the Cyprians and Phœnicians, to the number of 200. false. Diodorus, that the Athenians having sunk many of their ships, took 120. with the men in their prisoners, and that the rest when the fouldiers were fied out of them into Cyprus, came, all empty into their hands: which yet to have been taken full of fouldiers appears by those Veries, which the Athenians made and offered to their god; found both in Diodorus, and also in Aristides his 2. Platonic Oration.

For these when soldiers all were kill'd at land,
An hundred Ships of the Phœnicians took,
All full of men.

Plutarch also in his little discourse of the Athenian glory, saith that Cimon brought from Eurymedon about 100. ships of war of the Phœnicians. But Diodorus affirms, that he took not onely more than 100. but also full 340. ships, that is, the whole Persian Navy, and 20000. men in them.

Nor was Cimon fatished with this victory at sea, but presently put over with his Fleet, and fet upon the land army of the Persians in Asia which he law ranged upon the shoar, near the mouth of the river in Lycaenon; which the better to effect, he put all his own souldiers, into the enemies bottoms, which he had taken, and clad them all in Persian habill; whereupon they conceiving them to have been their own ships, hailed them as friends: Cimon therefore, to loom as the night came on, (and it was very dark without moon-shine,) landed his men, who breaking suddenly into the enemies Camp, flew all they met with, and killed one of the two chief Commanders, Pharendates, the kings brothers son, as he lay in his pavilion; and after a while made them (all amazed as they were with this sodain onfall,) to betake them to their heeles: Diodorus. [And of this Stratagem, Polyænus, [lib. 1.] maketh mention, saying that by a mistake, he saith, that Cimon landed his men in Cyprus, and not in Pamphilia; and so doth Julius Frontinus, in the end of his book: where Conon is found written instead of Cimon.

Cimon moreover took 80 of the Phœnicians ships, riding near Hydrus, and were not in the fight, nor had heard any incding of it, [Plutarch]

1593.] This year Cimon letting leave from Athens, and driving out thence, both Persians and Thracians, possessed the place for the Athenians; and so wrought the matter, that in all Asia from Ionia to Pamphylia, there was not anybody of a Persian army to be seen: [Plut. in the Life of Cimon.] And thence it came to pass, that Pericles, who this year began to have the principality at Athens, with 50 ships, and Ephialtes with 30 more, sailing beyond the Chelidonian Islands, in the sea of Pamphylia, saw never a ship of any Persian fleet all the way, as Plutarch out of Callisthenes reporteth: and Idocrates, in his Panathenaic, says, that neither a Persian man of war, durst appear nearer Greece, than the port Phaeacis; nor any company of them by land, over the river fell to Halys: yet Dio, writes, that the Persians seeing the encraze of the Athenian power fell to building of ships faster than ever.

337r. Ezra the Priest, a Scribe (or a Lawyer) skill'd in the Law of Moses, obtained a large patent, and was therewith furnished by Asuerus the king and his seven counsellours to settle the Jewish Commonwealth, and to reform the Church at Jerusalem; by which patent, it was againe granted, that whomever would not onely to get themselves, but also to lend or give with them what gold or silver, either the king and his nobles, or the Jew themselves would offer to their God: there were also thereby given all sorts of furniture for the Lords house, and order given to the Treasurers beyond the river, to supply them with all other necessities, out of the kings exchequer; and that all that asked for any way upon the service of the Temple, should be free from any tax, and with all people was suffered, to live according to their own laws, [Ezra 7. 21, 26.]

In the seventh year of Artaxerxes, the first day of the first month, Ezra, with a great multitude of the Jews, set out from Babylon, [Ezra 7. 6, 7, 9. chap. 8. 1, 14.]

great multitude of the Jews, & Ketodan from the river Abaya, till the Levites, which Ezra and his company spent 3 days at their Tents at Abava; till the Levites, which were wanting, came unto them: when all were come together, Ezra commanded a solemn fast to be kept, and prayer to be made unto God, to prosper them in their journey, and conigned all the gold and silver, which was consecrated to God, into the hands of 12 chofve men of the Priests, and to as many of the Levites, [Ezra 8. 13, 30.]

Upon the 12 day of the the first moneth, they removed from the river Abava, and upon the 10 day of the 5 moneth, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes his reign, they arrived at Jerusalem : and there rested themselves three days, [Extra 7. 8, 9. chap.

8. 30, 31.] Upon the 4 day of the 5 moneth, the gold and silver which they had brought, was weighed out, and with the other furniture was laid up, in the house of the Lord : and they which returned offered also their sacrifices unto God : which done, the kings editors were presented to the Governours and rulers beyond the river ; who, thereupon, shewed all favour to the people, and house of the Lord, [Exra 8. 33, 36.]

8. Ezra, understanding that the Israelites had entered into amity with the heathen nations, fasts; and openly made intercession to God, to avert his wrathful indignation from them, [Ezra 9.] And when many of the people also made great lamentation for the same, Shecnaias advised Ezra to move the people, that they might mention for the fame, Shecnaias desired Ezra, to put away their heathenish wives, which would binde themselves by a vow to God, to put away their heathenish wives, and the children which they had by them: which was done accordingly, [chap. 10.]

Warning was given to all such, as were returned out of the captivity, that they should appear at Jerusalem within three days, upon a great penalty to those, which should then be found absent. Wherefore all the men of Juda and Benjamin, coming together with the council of the Temple, the 30 day of the 9 month, and their quaking, with the fear of the Lord, and the counsel of the priests, and the multitude of the people, who with the voice of the Lord, did command them every male to separate himself from his brethren, with wife, who readily consenting therunto; and deferring further, that Judges might be appointed to take care of the order put in execution; there were forthwith appointed two out of the Priests, and two judges more out of the Levites to assist them, in taking the cognizance of cases of this nature, [chap. 10. v. 7, 8.]

Themistocles died of a natural death at Magnesia, or as others will have it, of poyson voluntarily taken, when he saw, that he could not perform what he had undertaken to the King, for the subduing of Greece, (Thuc. lib. 1.) Cicero saith in his Laelius, that he killed himself, 20 years after the death of Coriolanus; which according to Dionysius Halicarnassensis his reckoning, falls in juſt with the 3 year of the 78 Olymp. upon which year there there is this note put by Eusebius in his Chron. Themistocles, saith he, whom his own words had made the conqueror, his countries injuries made the General, of the Persians: Nevertheless, that he might keep himself from going in hostile manner against it; he appointed to offer a sacrifice, at which, taking a bowl full of the bulls blood, he drank it off, and so fell down, as a noble sacrifice of piety, dead before the Altar, which so memorable a departure of his out of this life wrought this effect, that Greece should never need another Themistocles after him. Against which manner of his death, yet Tully in his Brutus, makes Pompo Atticus to argue in this wise: For as you now, saith he, tell us a tale of Coriolanus, so Clitarchus and Strabo do in the like of Themistocles; for of whom Thucydides, who was an Athenian himself, and nobly born, and an excellent man, and who lived not long after him, saith only that he dyed, and that he was an excellent man, and that there was some suspicion, that he made away himself by poison; of him these men write, that when he had sacrificed a bull, he took of the blood of him in a basin, and quaffing it off, fell down dead in the place: Though indeed before the writing of this History by Thucydides, the Athenians themselves had heard it from Aristophanes, in Equinibus; which Comedy he wrote and taught in Athens, the 7 year of the Peloponnesian war, when Stratocles was Pretor, or L. Chancellor of Athens, that he died with drinking of bulls blood.

3540. Jubily, 20.

3544. Inaros the son of Pfammeticus king of Lybia (not a Lydian as Ctesias hath it) going from Maraca, a City bordering upon Pharus, turned away the greater part of Egypt, from the obedience of Artaxerxes; and being made and proclaimed king by them, sent for the Athenians, from Cyprus; who by chance were there at that time, imploied in a war, with two hundred sail of ships, partly of their own, partly of their allies and friends, [Thucid. lib. 1.]

Artaxerxes hearing of the Egyptians revolt, presently gathered an army out of all his dominions, and rigged up a Navie, sparing for no pains nor cost therein, [Diodorus Siculus, 2 year, 79 Olympiade, for running here in Thucydides his more exact accompt, by two full years.

Artaxerxes purposed to go himself in the head of this army into Egypt: but upon his friends dissuasion, he gave that off, and sent his Brother Achemenes in that voyage with 400 thousand foot, and 80 sail of ships, [Ctesias], and Diodorus agree with him for the sending of Achemenes General in this Egyptian war: but saith that he was Darius his son, and Artaxerxes his own great Uncle; and he gave him 300 thousand horse and foot, wherewith to go upon that service; meaning hereby Achemenes the son of Darius Hyftaspes, and Atofia, unto whom Xerxes had formerly committed the kingdom of Egypt, which himself had subdued, to be governed, [Herodotus, lib. 7. cap. 7. & 97.]

3545. Achemenes, al. Achemenides, coming into Egypt, late down with his army upon the bank of the river Nile; and having refreshed his army a while, alter their long march, prepared to give them battle: They on the other side, having gotten together what forces they could make out of Egypt and Liba, lay still, waiting for the coming of the Athenians, [Diod. Sic.]

The Athenians, coming from sea; and entering the mouth of the Nile, quickly made themselves masters of the river, [Thucid.] Inaros, together with Charamis, who was Ammiral of a fleet of 40 ships, sent from Athens, got a victory at sea; wherein of 50 Persian ships, they took 20, with all the men in them; and sunk the other thirty, [Ctesias]. But Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the whole Athenian fleet which lay before Cyprus, and consisted of 200 saile, came at this time into Egypt; not forty ships only, as Ctesias said.

Inaros, with his own Egyptians, and this supply of the Athenians, fought also a battle with the Persians by land: wherein for a while the Persians, by reason of their overpowering multitude, had the better; but when the Athenians came and made a strong impression on them, and made the wing which they encountered with to retire, many of them died in the place; and the rest of the Persian army betook themselves to their heels: in which flight, there was a huge slaughter made of them, [Diodor.] for of 400 thousand men, which Achemenides brought into the field, there fell that day, together with himself, 100 thousand: for he died of a wound which he received from Inaros his own hand, and his body was sent to Artaxerxes, [Ctesias]. Herodotus also makes mention [lib. 3. c. 12. and lib. 7. c. 7.] of one Achemenes a son of Darius, and of other Persians slain by Inaros a Lybian, son of Pfammetichus, in a place called Papremes.

The Athenians following the chase upon the Persians, took two parts of Memphis, and assaulted the third part also, called the white Wall, wherinto the Persians and Medes were fled, [Thucid. and Diod.]

3546. Artaxerxes, hearing of this great overthrow, dispatched away presently, Megababus a Persian, to Sparta, with a masse of money, to stir up the Pelopon-

Peloponnesians to a war against the Athenians, thinking that this would draw home the Athenians out of Egypt. But the Lacedaemonians would none of his money, nor yield to any of his demands: which the King perceiving, he called Megababus thence again with the monies which were left; and commanded Megababus the son of Zopyrus to provide himself for a journey into Egypt, [Id. ib.] to wit, that Megababus, who was formerly General in Xerxes his army; as [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 82.] and married Xerxes his daughter, Amytis: as Ctesias, the son of that Zopyrus, who recovered Babylon to Darius the son of Hyftaspes: as Herod. in the very end of his third book saith.

3547. Artabazus and Megababus designed Commanders for the war in Egypt, carried with them out of their own country, horse and foot 300. thousand men, [Diod.] but Ctesias saith only 200. thousand.

When they were come into the part of Cilicia and Phoenicia, the Commanders thought fit there to rest a while, and to refresh the army after so long a march: mean while they command the Cilicians, Cyprians, and Phoenicians to rig up and provide the Navy: and they in a trice provided 300. sail of tall ships, which were forthwith furnished with sea-men and soldiers, with store of ammunition, and all things fit and necessary for a sea-fight. Diod. Admirall of which Fleet was appointed Oniscus, [Ctesias].

In making of which preparations, and in training and exercising their men in arms, and making them apt and serviceable for the war, they spent almost a whole year; mean while the Athenians press the siege of the Fort of White-wall in Memphis: But when the Persians within manfully defended it, and the Athenians saw no possibility of taking it by assault; yet they lay before it all this year, [Diod.]

3548. The Persian Commanders in Asia having all things fitted, march from thence thorough Syria, and Phoenicia, with their land Army; and their Navy of 300. saile coasting their sail as they went: Until at last, they came to Memphis, [Diod.] whereto those two hundred thousand which they brought with them, there joined three hundred thousand more of those which Achemenides had left in Egypt. Between these and the Egyptians there was a stout barrel fought, and many fell on either side; but most of the Egyptians. At length Megababus with his own hand wounded Inaros in the thigh: wherupon he fled, and put himself into a most strong hold, called Byblus, in the Isle of Protoproitis in the river of Nile; and with him the Grecians which were left, and not slain with Charamites their General; and all Egypt besides save only that Fort of Byblus, followed the part of Megababus, [Ctesias].

Megababus having driven all, both Egyptians and Grecians out of the field, and out of Memphis, and shut them up all in the little Isle of Protoproitis; continued the siege of them there, one year and six months, [Thucid lib. 1.]

3550. In the 20 year of the reign of Artaxerxes, in the 9 month called Cisleu, Nehemias being then at Sufa, where the Kings of Persia used to keep their Winter-quarter: as Acheneas [Demophilus, 1. 2.] teacheth us, having received news how ill matters went with the Jews at Jerusalem, namely, that the wall thereof was broken down, and the gates consumed with fire; fell to mourning, and fasted and prayed to God, that he would remit the sins of his people, and give to himself grace and labour in the fight of the Kings, [Nehem. 1. 1. & 11.]

In the same 20 year of the King, in the month Nisan, when the time came that Nehemias in his turn was to attend upon the King; (for he was one of the Cup-bearers to him) and both King and Queen, (whom I suppose to be her whom Ctesias calls Damaspia) took notice of his sorrowful and dejected looks; he opened the cause thereof unto them, and obtained from the King a grant, not only to be Governour of all Judea; but also to rebuild Jerusalem, [Neh. 1. 1. & 6.] and from this time, begins the account of Daniels 70 weeks, [Dan. 9. 24. 25.]

Nehemias furnished now with a Commission, and equipage from the Kings in sight of Sanballat the Horonite of Moab, and of Tobia the Ammonite, the Governour of some place thereabouts; comes to Jerusalem, begins the work, and answereth them who laughed at him for undertaking so idle a business as that was, [Nehem. 11. 7. & 20.]

The Persian Commanders in Egypt, laid the channel of the river which compassed the Isle of Protoproitis dry, turning the water another way by ditches, which they cut; and so left the Athenian ships aground: and now was Protoproitis no longer an Island, but joynted to, and made a part of the Continent. As soon therefore as the Egyptians laid the Athenian ships, in what case they were, they took a fright, and presently, not caring what became of them, made their own peace with the Persians: and the Athenians for their parts, seeing themselves thus deserted by the Egyptians, and their ships made useless, set them all on fire, that the enemy might not gain them. The Persians therefore now passing the channel on dry foot, entered the Island; and by a fight at land land took it nevertheless, seeing the excellence of valour in the Athenians, and remembering what losses they had formerly received by them, were content to come to a fair agreement and composition with them, that they should all, (and there were six thousand of them) depart out of Egypt, with bag and baggage; and return home when they would, [Thucid. 2. 10. 1.]

And thus the fortunes of the Athenians in Egypt, where they had spent out the war six years, came to nothing: and Egypt returned unto Artaxerxes his power and obedience again, all save Amyrtaeus, who was king of those which dwell in the ten countries of Egypt; for him they could not take in, both because of the valour of the son of himself, and also for that the inhabitants thereof were a most warlike nation, [Thucid. 2. 10. 1.]

d. Eliashib, the son of Joiakim, the son of Jehu (or Jehoshaphat) the High Priest, and the rest of the Jews, every one in his place, set in hand very stoutly with the building of the wall of Jerusalem, [Nehem. 2.] beginning on the fourth day of the fifth month Ab. as is gathered out of chap. 6. 15. 1b.

Sanballat and Tobias, with the Samaritans, and other enemies of the Jews, first fell a laughing and scoffing at this new work: but when they saw the wall half up, they left their mocking, and laid their heads together, and consulted how to destroy the builders, which when Nehemias understood, he first prayed to God, and then began to order his men, all in a military way; and so put by the purpose and practise of their enemies, [chap. 4. 1b.]

Nehemias, upon the complaints and outcries of the people, taketh an order to have them all freed, the slaves of their bondage, the debtors of their debts; and those that had pawn'd or mortgaged their lands or goods, of their fortifications; and himself to give an example in so good and charitable a work, released his own debts, and all engagements of lands or goods made unto him, and called the poorer sort of publick taxes, and contribution, and gave liberally of his own unto them that wanted, [chap. 4. 1b.]

But Nehemias was not only in danger from Sanballat, and other enemies abroad, but also from false prophets and false brethren at home, which sought to hinder the work no less than the other did. All which difficulties well overcome, the wall in fifty two days was finished, to wit, upon the 25 day of the sixth month called Ethel, do their enemies at home and abroad, what they could to the contrary, [chap. 6. 1b.]

The dedication of the wall was performed with much celebrity, and great joy, [Neh. 12. 27. 43.]

Then did Nehemiah take into consideration the several offices belonging to the house of the Lord, appoints Governors over the city, and orders the guards thereof; and calling their congregation together, takes a notice of all that had returned out of the captivity, that out of them a number might be selected, to people and fortify the city now it was built, with inhabitants: all which, every one according to his ability, made their several offerings unto God, [Neh. 10. 1.]

When so false of Grecian ships were sent into Egypt, to serve in their room, who had been there so long already, it fell out, that they knowing nothing of what had happened to their countrymen there, came to anchor at Mendesium, which is one of the mouths of Nilus. There as they lay, the Persian land upon them from the land, and the Phenicians by sea, and destroyed the greatest part of them; few escaped to carry news into Greece. And even of that great army which was there before, few returned into Greece again, but were lost as they passed thorough the deserts of Libya, to get unto Cyrene. And this was the end, which that great voyage of the Athenians unto Egypt came unto, [Thucid. 2. 10. 1.]

355. In the feast of Trompets, the first day of the seventh month, when all the Jews came together at Jerusalem, the Law of God was by Ezra read and expounded to them, at the hearing whereof, when they were all sorely grieved, and fell a weeping, they were heartened up by Nehemiah, Ezra, and the Levites, and by them persuaded to keep that feast, with merriment and joy of mind, [Nehem. 8. 1, 2, 12.]

Upon the second day of the same month, Ezra, was consulted withal, by the Elders of the families, and by the Priests and Levites, concerning certain doubts arising upon the reading of the Law, and it was enjoyed by them to keep the feast of Tabernacles, [Nehem. 8. 13, 14, 15.] abroad in the fields, and in booths made of boughs, according to the Law, [Lev. 23. 40.]

Upon the 15 day, and the six days following, the feast of Tabernacles was celebrated with great care and devotion, and for seven days together, the law of God was read in their ears, and the eighth day also was kept very solemnly, according as was prescribed, [Lev. 23. 36.] Neither was there the like feast of Tabernacles kept from the days of Joshua the son of Nun, unto that time, and there was great joy made at it, [ib. 17. 18.]

Of which the Jews in their greater Chronicle, [chap. 20.] speak in this manner: It may be said that he compareth the return of the children of Israel into the land, in the days of Ezra, with that of their first entering into it in the days of Joshua: and as in the days of Joshua they were bound to tithes, to the years of Shemitah, or Remission, and to Jubilees, and to the halloving of their walled towns: so now in their return in the time of Esarhaddon they were in like manner obliged to the law of Tithes, of the years of Shemitah or remission, of Jubilees, and to the halloving of their walled Cities; and they rejoiced greatly before the Lord.

Upon the 24 of this month, the Israelites which returned, separating themselves from all strangers, made publick profession of their repentance, [Nehem. 9.] and renewing their covenant with God, bound themselves to the observation of the Law of God and of his Worship, [chap. 10.] and in special of that Law, [Levit. 25. 4. Dent. 19. 1, 2.] concerning the tillage of their land, and exaction of debts: and of letting their land rest every seventh year, [Nehem. 10. 31.]

The chief Heads of the people seated themselves all at Hierusalem; the rest cast lots, according to which every tenth man, should inhabit and have his dwelling in the holy City, [Nehem. 11. with 1 Chron. 9. 9.]

c. Megabyzus, leaving Sartamah Governor of Egypt, returned to Artaxerxes with Inarus, and certain of the Grecians in his company; having given them his word, that they should have no hurt done unto them; which Artaxerxes himself carefully observed and performed toward them, though grievously incensed against Inarus for having slain his brother Achamenides. Insomuch, that when his mother Amestris (instead of which, the name of Amytis is here crept into Celsus) desired vengeance to be taken of Inarus, and the Grecians, and even of Megabyzus himself; her son in law the King, denied her request, [Celsus.]

355. The Athenians and Cimon their General with a Fleet of 200. sail of their own, and their confederates into Cyprus: of which sixty went away into Egypt to Amyrtaeus, who continued still in the fenny country of Egypt: the rest besieged Citium a City in Cyprus, [Thucid. 2. 10. 1.] At this time Artabazus and Megabyzus commanded the Persian Army; the first of which Artabazus lay with the Fleet consisting of 300. sail, about Cyprus: the other with his land Forces, which amounted to the number of 300. thousand men, remained in Cilicia, [Diod. Sic. lib. 12. in the 3 year of 89 Olympiads.]

Cimon sent certain messengers to the Temple of Ammon to consult the Oracle there, about some secret matter, [Plutarch in the life of Cimon.]

355. In the siege of Citium in Cyprus, (as Thucydides saith) Cimon died; either of a natural disease (as Emilius Probust hath it) or, as others, of a wound which he received in a fight against the enemy. Being ready to depart this life, he advised those that were about him to conceal his death, and to get them gone with all the speed they could. And itself out, that neither friends nor foes knowing any thing of his death, all the Greek army returned home safe, under the conduct, (as Phancemus speaketh) of Cimon when he had been a whole month dead: But they who were sent to consult the Oracle, having received no other answer, but that Cimon was already with him: returned to their fellows in Egypt, and understood by them that Cimon died, at that very time; when that answer was made unto them, [Plutarch in the life of Cimon.]

When the Grecian army returned out of Egypt, they which lay before Citium in Cyprus, being sorely pressed with famine, raised their siege from thence, and sailed to Salamis in the same life: where they fought with the Phenicians, Cyprians, and Cilicians, both by sea and land. In the sea-fight, they sunk many ships of the enemies Navy, and took a hundred bottomes, with all the fouldest: and Mariners in them: and the rest they pursued as far as unto Phenicia itself: But the Persians with such of the ships as were left, fled into Cilicia, where Megabyzus with the army lay. And the Athenians making thitherward with all possible speed, landed their men upon the open shoar, and set upon the enemy. In which fight, Anaxicrates who commanded the Fleet, behaving himself in most manful wile, died a most noble and heroic death. The rest having gotten the victory, and made a great slaughter of their foes, returned to their ships; and came home all in company with those, which were upon their way returning out of Egypt, [Diod. Sic. in the 3 and 4 year of the 82 Olympiads.] as he stands corrected out of Thucydides. But Elian writeth, that the Athenians lost in Egypt 200. tall men of War, and in Cyprus 150. with all their tackle, ammunition, and furniture, in them, [Elian. Variar. H. stor. lib. 5. cap. 10.]

Artaxerxes, hearing of the loss of his men in Cyprus, advised with his Council concerning this war; and in the end it was resolved, that it was for the good of that kingdom, that peace should be made with the Grecians. Therefore the King wrote his letters to the Captains and Commanders in Cyprus that they should at any hand, and upon any terms come to a treaty, and conclude a peace with the Grecians. Hecuba Artabazus and Megabyzus dispatched away messengers to Athens, there to treat of a peace; and when the Athenians had consented to the conditions by them proposed, they also sent sent commissioners on their part with full power and authority, the chief of which was Callias, the son of Hipponicus, [Diod. in the 4. year of the 82. Olympiads.] At which time also the men of Argos, sent their messengers to Sufa, to know of Artaxerxes, whether he thought the league and friendship which they had heretofore made with his father Xerxes, did continue still; or whether they were held by him as enemies. To whom Artaxerxes returned this answer, that the league continued by all means, and that he held no City more friend to him than that of Argos was, [Herodotus, lib. 7. cap. 15.]

The peace between the Athenians and their confederates on the one side, and the Persians on the other, was concluded on, upon these conditions, That the Grecian cities, in all Asia, should enjoy their own liberty, and rights. That no Persian Governour, should at any time come within three dayes journey of the Sea: that there should no ship of war, of either side be sent riding out, between Phœlia, and the Cyprian Isles: or as Plutarch expelleth it, That the King should not have any beaked ship, or man of war surging in all the sea, between the Cyprian, and the Chet-donian Islands.

Now when the King and his Council of war had subscribed to these articles, then the Athenians also, took their oath, that they would not in hostile manner invade any of the Kings Provinces, [Diod. ut sup.]

It is said also, that they built an altar in memory of this peace, and that they heaped many honours upon Callias, who had been the contriver and procurer of it, [Plut. in the life of Cimon.]

Artaxerxes tired out with the importune sollicitation of his mother, which for five years space she continually used unto him, at length gave up Inaros the Egyptian, king, and the Greeks that came with him into his hand; whereupon the Queen caused the body of Inaros to be so racked, and stretched out, and wreathed several ways, that he hung upon three several crosses at one time: as for the Grecians she caused fifty of them (for she could catch no more) to have their heads smitten off. [Ctesias.] Thucydides saith that Inarus king of Libya, was taken by treachery and crucified; yet Herodotus telleth us, that his son Thammyras, by the favour of the Persians, held the Principality in Egypt; and that his father had held before him, [lib. 3. c. 15.]

Megabyzus, being sorely grieved for the death of Inaros and those Grecians, asked leave that he might go to his own government in Syria: and had under hand sent away thither, the rest of the Grecians which had eloped; and he following after, so soon as he came thither revolted from the king: and gathered an army of 150000 men, [Ctesias.]

Against Megabyzus was sent Ofliris, with an army of 200 thousand men: they fought and in the night, Ofliris wounded Megabyzus with a dart in the thigh, two inches deep: and he likewise wounded Ofliris with a dart, first in the thigh, and then in the shoulder; with which Ofliris fell from his horse; but Megabyzus took him about by the middle, and saved him, many of the Persians fell: so that Megabyzus had Zopyrus and Artiplyus, fought valiantly that day: so that Megabyzus had the better of it, and having gotten in the end a full victory, had great care of Ofliris and sent him to Artaxerxes, who demanded him at his hands, [Ctesias.]

Against Megabyzus was sent another army, whereof was general Menofanes, or Menofanes, son to Artarius, Governor of Babylon, and brother to king Artaxerxes; who met and fought, and Megabyzus wounded Menofanes in the shoulder: and also in the head; yet was neither of those wounds mortal: but upon those wounds received, he and all his whole army left the field and fled, and Megabyzus obtained a most glorious victory, [Ctesias.]

Artarius, first by messengers, then Artaxerxes the Eunuch, a Paphlagonian born, and Amestris, the Queen mother, perswaded Megabyzus, to come to an agreement with the king: and with much ado could Artarius himself, and Amyris his wife, and Artaxerxes, who was now 20 years of age, and Perifas, Ofliris his son, prevail with him to come unto the king: and when he came, the king sent him word, that he freely pardoned him all his by-past offences. But when a while after, the king went a hunting, and there a lion set upon him, and Megabyzus, seeing the lion raised upon his hinder feet, slew him with his spear; the king growing wroth with him, because he had done it, before he himself had given the lion any blow, commanded his head to be taken off: yet upon the intercession of Amestris, & Amyris & others, his life was spared: and he sent away and confined to a certain Island, called Cirra, in the read sea: Artaxerxes also, the Eunuch, for having oft-times spoken liberally to the king, on the behalf of Megabyzus was banished into Armenia, [Ctesias.]

Herodotus, when he had read his books at Athens, before the Council there; was much honoured for them, as saith Enchiridion, where Scalliger noteth, that Herodotus wrote his books, before his going into great Greece; not in great Greece itself, as some imagine, following herein Pliny, and we shall see more in the year following. But I observe, that in these his books, mention is often made of the Peloponnesian War, both in [the 7. book. cap. 137. and in the 9. book. cap. 72.] In the former of which is related a thing done in the 3. year of that War 3, and in the later, a thing acted in the 19. year thereof at Decelæa: full 33 years after the time assigned by Euseb. to the reading of his books at Athens. See more after in the year 3396. and 3597.

In the first year of the 84 Olympiads, when Praxiteles was Prætor or L. Chancellor of Athens, 12 years before the Peloponnesian war began: the Athenians sent a Plantation or Colony of theirs into Great Greece, to rebuild a certain decayed City there, called Thurii: which Colony was carried thither by Lyfias, a youth, at that time, of 15 years of age, and no more, [Plutarch and Dionysius Halicarnassensis in the life of Lyfias the Orator.] And Herodotus being then 41 years old, who thought he were born at Halicarnassus in Caria; yet obtained he the surname of Thurinus afterward διὰ νομισθῆναι, τῆς Ἰσουλίας, καὶ Ὀψιανῶν, (i.e.) because he was one who had his part in carrying that Colony or Plantation to Thurii: as Strabo saith in his 14. book: Now this 84 Olympiad fell in with the 310. year of the nativity of Rome, according to Varro's account. In which year Pliny saith, that Herodotus compiled his History at Thurii in Italy, [lib. 2. cap. 4.] as we touched in the precedent year.

In this year all wars were laid asleep throughout Asia, Greece, Sicily, Italy, Gaule, Spain, and almost all the World over, [Diod. Sic. 3. year of the 84 Olympiads.] Nehemias, when he had governed Judea 12 years; (i.e.) from the 20. year of the reign of Artaxerxes, to the 32. of the same; returned to the King, [Nehem. 5. 14. and chap. 13. 6.]

In his absence Eliashib the Priest, which was over the Chamber of the House of God, having contracted affinity with Tobia: had prepared him a fair chamber in the court of the temple: in which chamber, were formerly wont to be laid up and kept the hallowed Gifts and Tithes. And the son of Joiah the son of Eliashib the High Priest, (who was a different man from Eliashib, of whom I spake before) became son in law, and had married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite; which disorders, with sundry others which had crept in, in his absence, Nehemias upon his return to Jerusalem with a new Commission, quickly redressed, and severely punished, [Nehem. 13.]

Megabyzus when he had lived now full five years in banishment; fled out of the Island where he was confined, and joining himself to be a Pilgrimage, (i.e. a Leper in the Persian language, and one to whom no man might approach) came home to his own wife Amyris: and what by her, what by Amestris the Kings mother, was in the end reconciled to the King: who thereupon made him fit at table with him, as he had done in former times: and when he had lived 76 years he died; for which the King grieved very sorely. [Ctesias.]

In this year began a war between the Samians and Milesians, about the City of Priene, (i.e.) the sixth year in the beginning thereof, (Thucydides hath it) after the 30 years peace and league made between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians: and in the 4. year about the middle thereof, of the 84 Olympiads as Diodorus noteth. Now Priene was a City in Caria, which the Samians and Milesians, each laid claim to as their own: the Milesians finding themselves too weak at blows drew unto their party some of the Samians, who desired an alteration of things in their own State; and with them repaired to Athens, and there complained of the injurious carriage of the Citizens of Samos: whereupon the Athenians sent unto them, requiring them to kneele before their arms, and to come and debate the matter in difference, before them at Athens. Which when the Samians refused to do, Pericles prevailed to have open War proclaimed against them: and all this in favour of his wench Aspasia, that famous Courtisan, and one whom he doted on, not so much for her beauty, as for her wit; and because she was the daughter of one Axiochus, who was a Milesian borne. The Athenians therefore sending a Fleet of 40 sail, under the command of Pericles, easily took the City of Samos, and changed the Aristocracy thereof into a democratical kind of Government.

But presently after, Pericles was returned from Samos, there arose among them a terrible sedition: some striving to maintain the new established popular Government, and others holding that the old Aristocratical was the better. They therefore who disliked the Democratical, conspiring with the chief men of the city, sent into Asia 20 Pistruthes the son of Hyllaspes Governor of Sardes; and having made a confederacy with him, obtained of him a company of 700. soldiers; with which putting over in the full of the night into the Isle of Samos: they there joyined with other of their conforts, who attended their coming, and so altogether surprized and took the Town, and proscribing themselves open enemies to the Athenians, took the whole Garrison of them that there was, with the Captain and Officers, and sent them all for a present to Pistruthes: which done, they forthwith march against Miletus, having drawn the inhabitants of Byzantium also into their confederacy against the Athenians.

The Athenians hearing of the revolt of Samos, dispatch away thither sixty sail of ships well furnished; whereof sixteen went partly towards Caria, to encounter the Phœnician fleet in those parts, and partly into Chios and Lesbos, to take in aides from thence, the other 44 vessels continued with Pericles the Ammiral and his 9 colleagues. The Samians hereupon recall their 20 sail of ships, which they had sent all full of soldiers to assault Miletus, and joyning to them 50 sail more, fought with the 44 ships of the Athenians, near an Island called Tragia, and had there the worst of it. From whence the Athenians, having a supply of 40 sail more from home, and 35 more by way of aid from Chios and Lesbos, went and landed with their forces, in the Isle of Samos, and getting the better of it there also, they possessed themselves of the Haven, and having drawn a treble ditch about the city by land, they barred up the Haven with their ships.

A few days after, Pericles understanding by letters out of Caria, and Caunus, that the Phœnician fleet, was coming towards him, to the relief of Samos, he, leaving a part of his army to maintain the siege, took with him 60 sail out of the Navy; and went to encounter them, with all the speed he could possibly make, and with him went Sestagoras with five ships of Samos, and others, to meet with the Phœnician Navy.

The Samians taking advantage of the absence of Pericles, by the periwallow and leading of Melistis, the son of Ithogenes; a singular Philosopher, suddenly sallied out upon the Athenian camp, which was neither fenced nor manned, as it ought to have been; and having sunk the ships which kept the Haven, fought with the land forces in the open field, and routed them; and hereby, having an open sea, for 14 dayes space, they freely imported and exported, what they would, without impeachment.

Pericles, hearing what had befallen his men at Samos, made back thitherward, as fast as conveniently he could, encreased his fleet; and when Thucydides, Agnon—and Phormio, were come to him with 40 sail, and Teleplemus and Anticles, with 20 ships more from Athens; and those of Chios and Mitylene had sent him 20 sail, with these great forces, he set upon Melistis, and overthrew him in the field, and then fell to besiege the town, it self by land and sea, as afore, and harassed them with frequent assaults on every side; in such, that some say, those engines of Battre, as Rams, and Vines, and Galleries, were there first invented, by one Artemon, of Glazomena: which Artemon the Engineer, Ephorus the Historian doth unskilfully confound with Artemon Periphrasus, of whom Anacreon the Poet, in his verses (reputed by Athenæus lib. 12.) maketh mention, [Thucid. lib. 1, Diad. Sic. in the 4 year of 84 Olympiade, and Plut. in the life of Pericles.]

3565. After 9 months siege, the Samians gave up the town, which was forthwith dismantled, they gave hostages also for their fidelity in time to come, they gave up all their shipping, and paid for the expense of the war, according to an entailment then made. Those of Byzantium also came in, and submitted to the Athenian government as before, [Thucid. lib. 1.]

3566. Spartacus succeeded Archæanactides, in the kingdom of Bosphorus Cimmericus, [Diad. the third year of the 85 Olympiade.]

3571. Spartacus died, whom Diodorus Siculus, in the 4 year of the 86 Olympiade, affirmeth then to have reigned 17 years; and in the 3 year of the 85 Olympiade, he affirmeth him to have reigned 17 years, when as yet the interval between their two Olympiads assigned by him, the one to the beginning, the other to the end of his reign, make up but five, or at most (both parts being included) but six years of his reign; after him succeeded Seleucus.

4572. At Athens, in the year when Apuleius was Archon or President, and in the last year, almost compleat of the 86 Olympiade, Meton observed the summer solstice, to be upon the 21 day of the Egyptian month, Phaenoth (or the 27 day of June, according to the Julian Calendar) in the morning, [Platoni, in his Mag. Syntax lib. 3, cap. 2.] and thereupon framed the Cyclis Pannaris, or the circle of the moon, which we call the Golden number, of 19 years, [Diad. Sic. the fourth year, of the 85 Olympiade, deducting the beginning of this Cycle, from the new moon next following that Solstice, or the 15 day of July, according to the Julian account.]

3573. Arcefilaus was kill'd by the Cyrenians his own subjects; and was the 8 king in that state. And the man which in the 3 year of the 73 Olympiade, won the 31 Pythian race with his chariot; and which is so much renowned for it by Pindarus, in his 4. and 5 Ode, whom when his son would have succeeded, he was put by, by the Syrenians; whereupon he sailed into the Hælpides, or western Islands, and there died: and so that kingdom of Cyrenia, which had stood 200 years, four of the name of Battus, and four of the name of Archelaus, interchangeably succeeding each the other therein, according to the oracle at Delphos, reported by Herodotus, [lib. 4. cap. 163.] came to an end, [Scholiast. Pind. in Od. 4. Pythion.]

The 1 year of 87 Olympiade drawing to an end, when there were but two months left of the Prætorship of Pythodorus of Athens, in the beginning of the spring, began the war which is called the Peloponnesian war, between the Lacedæmonians and the Athenians; wherein the Nations inhabiting all along the coast of Asia, sided with the Athenians; as the Carians, the Dories, the Ionians, those of Hellepont; and all the Islanders adjoining, except those only, which inhabited the two Islands of Melos, and Thera: But both parties sent their Embassies to Artaxerxes, to crave his aide, [Thucid. lib. 2.]

In the beginning of this war, there flourished 3 noble Historiographers, Hællanicus, of the age of 65. Herodotus 53, and Thucydides 40 years old; as A. Gellius, in his 15 book, cap. 23. reporteth out of Pamphilus, [lib. 1.] of which Thucydides wrote the full history of this war; to the 21 year thereof; diligently letting down all things done therein, by winters and summers: beginning every summer from the first of the spring; and every winter from the first of Autumn.

In the first summer of this war, there fell so great an eclipse of the sun, that the stars appeared in the firmament, [Thucid. lib. 2.] which bred a great terror in all mens minds as a sad and great prodigie in the world. But Pericles, seeing the Master of the ship wherein he was, overtroubled therewith, cast his cloak over his eyes, and asked him whether he were afraid at that? or whether he thought it portended any great matter or no; and when he said, no: why, replied Pericles, what difference is between this covering of the sun, and that, I have only, that, that which causeth this darkness, is greater than my cloak; [Plutarch in the life of Pericles:] and thereupon entered into a discourse concerning the eclipses of the sun and moon, and their motions, by which they come, according as he had heard and learned from his Master Anaxagoras; and perwaded his fellow citizens, not to trouble themselves, with a vain and needless fear, [Plutarch, Max. lib. 8, cap. 11.] And that this year also, upon the 3 day of August, at 5 a clock in the after-noon, the sun was eclipsed at Athens, to about the quantity of 10 digits, the Astronomical account plainly demonstrates.

3574. A fearful plague, beginning first in Ethiopia, and thence spreading it self into the parts of Libya and Egypt, and especially into the regions of the Persian dominion, came at last, and lay very sore upon the City of Athens in the 2 year of this war; [Thucid. l. 2.] where he letteth down historically, the kind and manner of this plague; as he might well do, having himself been taken with it, and oft in company with those who were sick thereof: and what he doth historically; that doth Hippocrates as a Physician, as living then in Athens, and was employed in the curing of sundry persons, afflicted therewith, [lib. 3, Epidem. Sect. 3.] but poetically, Lucretius, who lived many ages after, hath set it forth, and painted it to the life.

In a town of the Colophonians, called Notium, upon a sedition raised among themselves, Iapeneus and his Median soldiers, being called in by one of the sides, came and possessed himself of the strongest part of the town, [Thucid. lib. 3.]

In the latter end of this summer, Aristeas, the son of Adimantus a Corinthian, and the Embassadors of the Lacedæmonians, Aneritis, and Nicolaus, and Patrodemus, and Timagoras of Tægea, and Polis of Argos, in his own name, taking their journey into Asia towards Artaxerxes, to entreat of him aide of men and money for the war, took Thracæ in their way, and came to Sitalces the king thereof, the son of Tereas: But when they thought to passe the Hellepont, and to go to Pharnaces the son of Pharnatacus, hoping by him to be convoyed and brought to Artaxerxes, they were betrayed by Sadoceus, the son of Sitalces the king, and Nymphodorus of Abdera, the son of Pytheus, and were all taken and carried to Athens: and the Athenians without judgment, or hearing them so much as speak, when they would have said something for themselves, the selfsame day they came, caused them all to be kill'd, and throwne into a ditch, [Thucid. l. 2. as way Herod. l. 7, c. 137.]

3575. The winter following, the Athenians, sent six ships, into Caria; under the command of Melæandrus, both to gather what money they could in those parts; and to scour the seas from pirates and robbers, who out of Peloponnesus, were wont to take up poor Merchants ships with their loadings, which traded along the coast of Phælias, Phenice, and other parts of the continent. But Melæandrus, with his Athenians, and other confederates, not keeping the sea, but going a land in Licia, was there met, and fought withally, and slain with a great part of his army, [Thucid. lib. 2.]

Seleucus, the king of Bosphorus Cimmericus, died, having held that principality 4 years [Diad. 4 year of the 86 Olympiade,] after whom, as it seemeth, Spartacus the 2. reigned, and he continued 22 years.

3576. Pericles died, the 4 year of 87 Olympiade, [Diad. l. 12.] 2 years and 6 months after the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, whereof himself had been the chief occasion, [Thucid. lib. 2.] and when he had continued Prince of the Athenian state, 40 years, [Cic. lib. 1, de oratore, and Plutarch in the life of Pericles.]

In the same year died Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ, Pericles his master, who was born in the 70 Olympiade, and died in the first year of the 88 Olympiade, as Lærtius in his life reporteth, out of Apollodorus his Chron. though it be there miswritten, Olympiade 78. Where he also addeth, that the men of Lamplacus, bestowed on him, an honourable burial, with this Epitaph, recorded also by Elian, lib. 8. Var. Hist. cap. ult. upon his tomb.

*Great Anaxagoras lies here in mold,
Who did all secrets of the Heavens unfold.*

3577. In the winter season of the fourth year of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians sent 12 ships, commanded by Lycicles, and four commonsailors with him, to collect their tribute from their confederate cities. Lycicles, as he went from place to place to gather moneys, at last going from Myus, thorough Caria, the Carians, and Anaxia rose suddenly upon him out of an Ambuscado, and slew both him, and the greatest part of his army, [Thucid. lib. 3.]

Alcides commander of the Lacedæmonian fleet, coming to the foreland of Myonæus, in the country of the Teii, put to death there the greatest part of the Greeks, whom he had taken prisoners out of Asia: but when he was come to Ephelus, some messengers sent unto him, by the Samians, which were of the Anaxia, told him that he took a wrong way to deliver the Greek nation out of servitude and thralldom, if he purposed to destroy such, as neither ever bare arms against him, nor were his enemies; but only were forced to pay contribution, to the Athenians: whereupon he spared the rest, and let them go.

A new broile rising between the old citizens, which dwelt in the bafe town of Notium, and those which had newly fled thither, these confiding in the power of such Arcadians, and other barbarians as Pisistratus, the Governor of Lydia had sent them, drew a wall round about the upper town, for a fortification against the bafe town, and confederating with those Colophonians, who dwelling in the upper town, took part with the Medes, made one Common-wealth with them. But the other side fell for Pachetes, a captain of the Athenians to come and help them; who when he came, desired Hippias, whom Pisistratus had made captain of the Arcadians in the fort to come forth to a parlee, covenananting that, if they could not agree, he should return fat, and found into the fort again, whereupon he came forth: but so soon as he came, Pachetes took, and committed him to safe custody, yet without manacles or fetters; and setting presently upon the fort took it, and put all whom they found therein to the sword, as well Arcadians as Barbarians, and last of all, to keep his word with Hippias he let him come safe and found into the fort; but so soon as he was come, laid hold on him again, and shot him to death with arrows, to be restored Notium to the Colophonians, save to those, who had taken part with the Medes. Afterward the Athenians sent a plantation thither of their own, and governed the place, according to their own laws, gathering together as many of the Colophonians out of all parts, as they could find to inhabit it, [Thucid. lib. 3. Polyæ. Strateg. lib. 3.]

3578. Artaxerxes sent Artaphernes, a Persian Ambassador, with a letter written in the Assyrian language, to Lacedæmon: wherein, among other things signified to them, that he knew not what they would have, nor what their meaning or intention was; for that they had sent unto him a multitude of Ambassadors: but no one of them agreed with another; wherefore if they would have him to understand their minds, they should send some men of their own unto him, with the bearer thereof, [Thucid. lib. 4.]

d. Artaxerxes, in the interim died, and his son Xerxes succeeded him, only for one year, [Diod. Sic. the 4 year of the 88 Olympiade.] whose mother Damaspia, died the same day, that Xerxes, or rather, that her husband Artaxerxes (as the sequel sheweth) did; and Bagorazus the Eunuch carried the corps, both of father and mother into Persia, [Ctesias.]

3580. In the winter of the seventh year of the Peloponnesian war, Aristides, the son of Archippus, one of the captains which were sent from Athens, to gather the tribute of their confederates, lighted upon Artaphernes the Persian Ambassador, as he was going to Lacedæmon, at a place called Eione, upon the river Irtimion, and brought him prisoner to Athens, whom the Athenians presently ship away, and sent him back to Ephelus, and an Ambassador of their own with him; but coming thither, and hearing there, that Artaxerxes was lately dead, they returned home again, [Thucid. lib. 4.]

b. In the beginning of the next summers Thucydides sayes, there was a little Eclipse of the Sun, beginning, as his manner is the Summer, from the first of the spring, for that upon the 21 day of March, according to the Julian Calendar, toward the end of the fourth fourth year of the 88 Olympiade, in the forenoon, the Sun was more than half overt eclipsed, the Prutenian account sheweth.

The Banditoes of Mitylene, after their city was taken by the Athenians, joyning with the Banditoes of Lesbos, and hiring some others out of Peloponnesus, went in a great body and took Rhægium; and having received of them a round summe of money, spared the City: and from thence went to Andrandus and took that by intelligence within: for their purpose from the beginning was to set at liberty, as many other Cities of the country called Ægeæ, (which formerly was held by the Mitylenians, but was then possessed by the Athenians,) so especially Andrandus; to the end that having furnished it they might there build them shipping enough, as having the hill Ida, and store of timber from thence at hand: and hoped with that and other provision, to get Lesbos, and other Cities of Eolia, in the Continent, into their possession, [Thucid. lib. 6. 4.]

c. At the same time; Aristides and Demodocus, whom Diodorus calleth Symmachus, Captains of the Athenian Navy, lay in Hellepont, gathering of their tribute; whilst Lamachus, their third Captain, was gone with ten ships into Pontus. They therefore hearing that the Mitylenians purposed to fortifie Andrandus; gathered an army of their confederates, and set sail thitherward; and when the enemy sallied out from thence, foiled them in the field, and gat the Town again. But Lamachus who was gone into Pontus, coming into the mouth of the river Calcees, (which Diodorus calls Caches) in Heracleotis, leaving their ships at an anchor, there went and spoiled all the country about Heraclea, which in favour of the Persian, had refused to pay contribution to the Athenians. But when upon the falling of a great raie the river (swol), and ran with a mighty current, and drove their ships upon the rocky shoar, he there wholly lost his Fleet, and a great part of his army besides. Wherefore when by sea he could not, having lost his ships, and by land durst not with so small a company return home, thorough to many fierce & warlike Nations as lay in his way; they of Heraclea, taking this occasion to gratifie them rather than to be revenged of them, and thinking the spoil of their country well bestowed, if they might thereby purchase them for friends, which were before their foes, sent them away fairly, with all manner of provision for their journey homeward. So Lamachus, with the company which he had left, went over land thorough the country of the Thracians, which dwelt in Asia side, and came safely to Chalcedon, [Thucid. lib. 4. Diodor. lib. 12. Justin lib. 16. cap. 3.]

d. When Xerxes, upon a Festival day had drunk himself stark drunk, and was laid asleep in his chamber, his brother Secundianus, begotten upon Aloguna, a Babylonish woman, and Pharnacys an Eunuch, came in upon him; and murdered him, [Ctesias.]

Secundianus, who had a long time born a grudge to Bagoras the Eunuch, picking a quarrel with him for burying his fathers body without his advice taken therein, commanded him to be stoned to death: which act of his the army took very ill; and although he bestowed large monies among them, yet what for this, what for the murder of his brother, they ever hated him. [Ctesias.]

3581. d. Ochus, whom his father Artaxerxes had made Governour of Hyrcania, being sent for by his Brother Secundianus to come unto him, sent word he would, but came not; and this he often did: but at length, gathered a mighty army, and intended for the kingdom. Artabarius who was General of the Horle to Secundianus, tell over unto Ochus: and Artaxanes the Governour of Egypt did the like. Artaxares also, out of Armenia came unto him in person, and whether he would or no, set the Cidaris, (i. e. the Crown upon his head, [Ctesias.]

b. Thus Ochus was made King, and called himself from thence forward Darius: and by the advice of Parylati, his wife and flatterer, first what he could do with his brother Secundianus by fair words and oaths: But Menofthanes, who was the greatest man with him among all his Eunuchs, was earnest with him not to believe his oaths, nor have any treaty with faithlesse men: yet Secundianus, came to a treaty, and was there laid hold on; and being thrown into a heap of ashes, there died, [Ctesias.] of which kind of punishment, see more before, in the year of the World, 3485. b. and in 2 Maccabees, [cap. 13. 5, 6.]

When Scundianus, d. Sogdianus, was now dead, then reigned Ochus alone, known by the name of Darius Nactus toward the later end of the first year of 89 Olympiade; as appears by [Thucydides, lib. 8. and Diodor. 3 year of 89 Olympiade.]

3582. When the men of Delos were driven out of their country by the Athenians, Pharnaces gave them Adramyttium in Asia for a dwelling place, [Thucid. lib. 5. Diod. 3 year of 89 Olympiade.]

3583. The Athenians, by command of the Oracle at Delphos, restored those of Delos to their Island again, [Thucid. lib. 5.]

The winter following, two Governours of Darius, upon the sea coast in the lesser Asia, Tifaphernes of Lydia, and Pharnabazus of Hellepont, seeking to recover the old tribute from the Grecian Cities lying within their severall Govern-

Governments, which the Athenians had of late forbidden them to pay unto the King, dealt with them under hand, to fall off from the Athenians: and whilst soliciting the Peloponnesians in general to make a fresh war upon the Athenians, moved the Lacedæmonians in special to confederate and joyn in armies with the King against them: when the Athenians power was thus weakened in Asia; upon whom Pylarchus had founded all his hopes, Tisaphernes fought by all means how to get A-morges, a baird son of Pylarchus, who had taken up arms in Caria, into his hands; and, as he was commanded, to send him alive or dead to the king. But finding at this present, that the Citizens of Chios and Erythræ, were ready to revolt from the Athenians, he sent his messenger with theirs to Lacedæmon, there to negotiate the matter; by the joyned advice of both, [Thucid. lib. 9.]

At the same time Calligenus and Timagoras the one of Megara, the other of Cyzicum, each banished out of his own country, came to Lacedæmon, first indeed by Pharnabazus, who had entertained them, during the time of their exilement, but in the name of the inhabitants of Cyzicum: to get shipping of them, to carry into Hellepont. And when the messengers of Pharnabazus and Tilaphernes, made each of them his suit a part from the other, the Lacedæmonians were thereupon extremely divided among themselves: some advising that Ionia and Chios should first be holpen; other that Hellepont: but in the end, the Perition of Tilaphernes and the Chii carried it; and the rathey, by the help of Alcibiades, who standing at that time a condemned man at Athens, lived at Sparta, in house with Endrius, one of the Ephori, his fathers old acquaintance, wherefore having made a confederacy with the Chii and Erythreans, they presently ordered 40 faile of ships to be sent away to their fucor. But Calligenus and Timagoras, who were there in the behalf of Pharnabazus, and the men of Cyzicum, would contribute nothing toward the setting out of this fleet to Chios; nor would lay out the 25 talents which they had brought with them to hire ships for themselves that way; because they had a purpose shortly to prepare a fleet of their own. [Id. 16.]

In the 20th summer of the Peloponnesian war, Alcibiades an Athenian, and Chabrias a Lacedaemonian, were sent to the Euboean islands. The Greek cities there off from the Athenian party and coming to the aid of the Lacedaemonians. The Greek cities there off from the Athenian party and coming to the aid of the Lacedaemonians. with fortifications, and other preparations for the war; ¹⁷ and when the Athenians, coming with 8 ships to Samos, and taking with him one more from thence, failed to Teus, and perished there, not to enter into any practice against the Athenians. Chalcideus also came thither with 23 ships, and with him 23 more from Chios, and 23 more from the Clazomenians and Erythraeus. The Teians, though at first refused to receive those folk, yet when they saw the Athenians fled and gone, took them in: who living a while expected the return of Chalcideus from the chafe of the Athenians, and he not returning they of their own heads, threw down the wall which the Athenians had made to the landward, with the assistance of certain others which came to help them, under the command of Tages Tisaphernes his Lievtenant. Chalcideus and Alcibiades, having pursued Strombichides, as far as to Samos, taking with them 30 ships more from Chios, failed to Miletus, and by the means of Alcibiades, who had great acquaintance with the chief men there, perished them also to fall off from the Athenians; and when the Athenians followed them thither, but were kept off by the Milesians, they retreated to an Island called Lada, lying over against Miletus, [76.]

After this revolt of the Milesians, the first association of the Lacedaemonians and the Persians was concluded and made, by Tissaphernes and Chalcideus, upon this condition, that what ever cities the Persians did then hold, or heretofore had held, should continue still in their power. [Ibid.]

The Chii therefore presently to know how the squares went at Mileus, and with all to induce other cities to the like revolt, from the Athenians, bent their course with this intent. And as a pith in Caria: but being called back by Charæides, a wealthy Amorges Pitychus his sonne, was drawing down thitherward, with his land forces, they came to a place, called Dis-bierron, a small town, in Ionia, where, eying a fleet of 16 faine of the Athenians, sent from thence under the command of Diomedon to joyn with Thraciæ, they disperced themselves, and one ship of them came to Ephesus, the rest to Teus, but four of them fell into the Athenians hands: yet nothing but the bare hulls, for the men were got to land, the rest of the ships came safe to Teus. After this when the Athenians were gone to Samos, the Chii pursued their purpose, with the remainder of their Fleet and Forces, and drew over to their party Lebedus and Eras, cities of Ionia. [16.]

After the Foot companies of the Chii, were departed from Teus, Tissaphernes, coming thither with his army, pulled down what was left of the walls of Teus, and departed: and no sooner was he gone, but Diomedon, with ten sail of Athenians came thither, and agreed with the Teians to receive him too: and going from thence to Eras, when he had tried, and could not force it, went his way. [16.]

The Athenians, having taken the Fort, which the Clazomenians had built in the Continents, made them go back again into their own Island, all save the heads of that revolt, who went to Daphnus: and so the Clazomenians returned into the obedience of the Athenians. [16.]

In the same Summer, the Athenians with 20 sail which lay at Lada against Miletus, landing at Panormus, and lighting there upon Chalchideus, the Lacedemonian slenderly accompanied, slew him, and all that were with him; and returning thence the third day after, erected a Trophie in memory of what they had there done: which the Milesians, as set up by those who had not mastered the country, demolished. [16.]

In the end of that Summer, the Athenians with 1500. Corsiers, and 1000. men out of Argos, and as many of their other confederates, with 48 ships, commanded by Phrynichus, and Onomacles, and Saronidas, sailed into Samos first, and from thence fell sail for Miletus; and landing there, fate down before it with their army. Against them went out 800. of the Milesians themselves, all Corsiers; and Alcibiades, with those companies which Chalchideus had brought out of Peloponnesus, and certain companies of foreign nation which followed Tissaphernes, and Tissaphernes himself with his Horse. The Argivi which led the Van in the wing where they were, trusting over much to their valour, were wholly routed by the Milesians, whom they vilified and contemned as being but Ionians, and lost 300. upon the place: yet the Athenians had the better of the day: and therefore setting up a Trophie in the field, set themselves to besiege the city, seated as it was, in a peninsula or neck of land: but when news was brought that a Fleet out of Sicily and Peloponnesus was upon the sea thitherward, by the advice of Phrynichus, they drew off, and returned to Samos. [16.]

The Fleet when it came, with the ships of Chios which had formerly been beaten with Chalchideus by the enemy, at the entreaty of Tissaphernes, set upon Jalos: where Amorges the base son of Pylutines, (who had revolted from the King) then kept himself. The Peloponnesians under the command of Atyochus the Ammiral, to whom Theramenes a Lacedemonian had brought that Fleet, and the Syraculans who made principal proof of their valour in this service under their General Hermocrates (setting suddenly upon the Jassians, who thought they had been friends, surprised them, and took the city. The Peloponnesians having therein taken Amorges alive, delivered him up to Tissaphernes, to send him to Darius, if he pleased. The city Jalos it self, which long peace had made to abound with all plenty, they sacked, and made a vast booty of it: The companies which Amorges had there in pay, they saved, and because most of them were Peloponnesians borne, they lifted them among themselves; but the Town it self they gave over to Tissaphernes, with all the persons thereof, bound and free, taking for every head of them half a crown; and returning from thence to Miletus, they convoyed Pædarius, who was sent by the Lacedemonians as Governour to Chios, overland, with the companies belonging to Amorges, as far as Erythre; and left Philippus, Governour of Miletus. [16.]

The Winter following Tissaphernes, having put a Garrison into Jassos, came to Miletus, and there according to promise made at Lacedemon; paid them and their fellows, the monies which were due, which was a drachma of Athens, upon every head; and agreed with them for a standing pay, in time to come. [16.]

Attyochus the Ammiral of the Lacedemonian Fleet with ten ships of Lacedemon, and as many of Chios, having in vain for a while besieged the city Pteleus, put over to Clazomenæ, and there commanded such as favoured the Athenian party to leave the place, and go and dwell in Daphnus: which was the command also upon them laid by Tarnes Lieutenant of Ionia: which when they refused to do, he set upon the Town; being but an open bourgade: yet not being able to carry it by assault, he left it and went his way: But meeting with a strong wind at sea, he himself came safe to Phocæa and Cuma, but the rest of his ships, were driven aloof upon the Isles lying before Clazomenæ, Marathusa, Pelsa, and Dymissa: where they lay 8 days for the violence of the tempests, and there spent and spoiled what they pleased of such goods as the Clazomenians had transported thither for fear of the war; and the rest they put aboard their ships, and carried away, and came to Attyochus at Phocæa and Cuma. [16.]

The same Winter, Hippocrates of Lacedemon, setting sail from Peloponnesus with ten ships of the Thuriens, commanded by Dorcius and two others in commission with him, and one of Laconica, and another of Syraculæ, came to Cnidus, which had now revolted revolted from Tissaphernes, whereof so soon as the Micians heard, they presently lent unto Hippocrates, by all means to leave one half of his ships in garrison at Cnidus, and to go with the rest, and surprize certain ships laden with Merchandise from Egypt, lying at Triop um, which is a foreland of Cnidia; and the Athenians hearing thereof, went from Samos, and surprized the six ships which lay at Triopium, as a garrison to the places, but the Marriners were got out of them, and so left them nothing but the hulls: and then coming to Cnidus, mistled but little of surprizing it, at the first onsets, being but an open bourgade without walls; but being put off for that time, their purpose was, to try again the next day: but the Cnidians having callt up some works about the place that night, and they which were forced a shoar at Triopium, coming thither also, the thing grew harder to do now, than it was before, wherefore having wasted the country, they returned to Samos. [16.]

When the league concluded between Chalchideus, and Tissaphernes, was judged at Sparta, not to be right, and each a little on the Lacedemonians side, another form was drawn up between the Lacedemonians and their confederates on the one side; and Darius and his sons, and Tissaphernes on the other, in clearer terms than the former was, and subscribed, in the presence of Theramenes of Lacedemon, after which Theramenes, having given up the charge of the Navy to Attyochus, put himself aboard a little Skiff, and went his way. [16.]

The buinefs, which Pharnabazus, (who was Governour for the king in Hellespont) had sent Calligenus of Megara, and Timagoras of Cyzicum about to Sparta, was there granted, according as he desired, and 27 saile of ships were sent under the command of Antithenes a Lacedemonian, in the depth of winter from Peloponnesus into Ionia. The Lacedemonians also sent 11 Commissioners of theirs (whereof one was Lycas, the son of Arcsilaus) to be of counsel with Attyochus, in the management of this war, one of their instructions was, that when they came to Miletus, they should send of these 27 ships, all or some, more or less, as they should see cause into Hellespont, to Pharnabazus, and make Clearchus Commander of theirs, they thought fit to send, and further, that, if they saw cause, they should remove Attyochus (who was drawn into some suspicion upon Pædarius his information by letters against him), from the charge of the Navy, and put Antithenes in his room. Now these Commissioners looting from Males, a port in Peloponnesus, came first to the Island of Melos; and from thence fetched a further compass, about that they might go in the less danger of the enemy, and landed at Caunus in Asia. [16.]

Attyochus coming to Cnidus, waited from thence to meet with the Athenian fleet, which waited for the Peloponnesian ships coming from Caunus, where they were safely arrived: and meeting with them, they fought, where the Athenians gave at first the enemy a blow, but receiving a far greater one in the second fight from them, they retired, and came to Halicarnassus: and the Peloponnesians as conquerors, returned to Cnidus. The Athenians after this, came to an Island called Sima, where they had received their overthrow; with all their fleet, and yet durst not attempt any thing upon the Lacedemonian navy, which lay at Cnidus, but taking in only some tackle and furniture from Sima, and having done something against Lorynæ, in the continent, they returned again to Samos. [16.]

When all the Peloponnesian Navy was come together at Cnidus, consisting in all of 94 ships, the 11 Commissioners debated with Tissaphernes of matters already transacted, if they found fault with any thing therein, and how the war for the future might be carried on, for the best advantage on both sides, but especially Lichas, considering what had passed, said, that neither of the two leagues, no, nor that which was made with Theramenes, was as it should be, for that it was a thing not to be endured, that the king should hold all those countreys, which he or his ancestors had held; for by this reason, said he, all the Islands, and all Thessaly, and Locri, and consequently, all Bæothia, must all fall again into the kings power, and the Lacedemonians, instead of freeing the Greek cities, must help to enslave them to the power of the Persian more than ever; and therefore, that they must fall to a new draught & form of a league between them, or vacate this, and never ask nor receive Stipend more of the king of Persia, by virtue of this that was already made; whereupon Tissaphernes growing into cholour, brake up the treaty, and went his way. [16.]

Now when letters came from the Peloponnesians to Attyochus, that he should make away Alcibiades, for that they had him in suspicion, and he was a professed enemy to Agis the king of Lacedemon, Alcibiades getting an inclining thereof, withdrew himself secretly, and fled over to Tissaphernes, and perswaded with him not to make such large allowance of Stipend to the peloponnesian Navy; but rather hold matters in such a balance, that neither they might subvert the state of the Athenians, nor the Athenians theirs; and to when they had wearied and worn out each other with a war, both in the end might easily be brought into the kings subjection. Hereupon Pilsander and ten ten other Ambassadors with him, sent by the people of Athens, to treat with Tissaphernes and Alcibiades, upon such terms as to them should seem meetest for the Commonwealth, and benefit of both, of whom Alcibiades in Tissaphernes his name made such vast demands, as though they yielded to many of them, yet were they fain at last to break off without doing any thing, for he demanded that they should surrender into the kings hands, all Ionia, with the Islands adjacent thereunto: and when they had yielded therunto, then he demanded, that the king might make what ships he would, and where he would, and that he might passe and repasse by their coast as often, and with as many ships in a fleet as he pleased. But then the Athenians conceiving these demands to be intolerable, and themselves abused by Alcibiades, brake up in a rage, and returned to Samos, [Ibid.]

After this, toward the end of this winter (season, Thralyphern went to Canus, purposing to recall the Lacedemonian Commissioners back to Miletus, and to make them take their pay again, upon any conditions, least they should turn trait enemies against him: when they came, he paid them down all their arrears: and made a third league with them: which began thus,

In the 13 year of the reign of Darius, when Alexipidas was Ephorus, (i.e.) agreements were made, in the field of Meander, between the Lacedemonians, and their confederates on the one side, and Tissaphernes and Hieramenes, and the sonnes of Pharnabazus on the other, concerning the affairs of the king, and of the Lacedemonians and their confederates, to wit, That what country soever in Asia is the kings, that let him hold still, and of his own country, let him dispose as he will, &c. But concerning the payment of their yearly stipend it was thus agreed, That Tissaphernes should pay the fleet that then was there, all the kings own ships came, and after they were come, then the Lacedemonians and their confederates, should maintain their own navy if they would, but if they would rather have a stipend for it, then Tissaphernes should furnish it: but with conditions, that upon the end of the wars, they should refund all the money, which they had received, [Ibid.] from whence we may gather the full meaning of what Justin, [lib. 5. c. 1.] more concisely hath delivered, Darius the king of Persians, saith he, making a league with the Lacedemonians by Tissaphernes his Governour of Lydia, provided to bear all the charge of the war.

In the very beginning of the summer following, which began the 21 year of the Peloponnesian war, Dercylidas, a Lacedemonian, is sent from Miletus over-land, with a small company into Hellepont, to stir up the city of Abydos, which was a colony or planton of the Milesians to rebel against the Athenians: whereupon that city first, and two dayes after Lampacus, fell off from them to Dercylides, and Pharnabazus.

Upon the first news whereof, Strombichides fell saille out of Chios, with a fleet of 24 Athenian vessels, and came to Lesbos; and when the Lesbians, made a sally to encounter him, he routed them, and took the town at the first assault, being but an open bourtage, and having settled matters there, went to Abydos, but being there manfully repulled, he put over to Sestos, and there placed a strong garrison for the defence of all the Hellepont, [Thucide. lib. 8.]

The whole Navy of the Athenians coming together at Samos, they there entered a covenant with the Samians, to joyn in the restoring of the Popular estate in Athens, and to abolish the Junto or Government of 400 newly there created, and bound themselves with solemn oath for performance hereof; and appointed Thralyphern and Thralyphern for captaines in this action; they consulted also of calling home Alcibiades, and hoping by his means, to draw away Tissaphernes from the Lacedemonian party, and to gain the kings favour and assistance to themselves, [Id. ibid.]

Among the sea-men of the Peloponnesians, which were at Miletus, there grew a grudge and murmuring against Tissaphernes, and Atyachius both; against Atyachius for that he, when as heretofore they were strong in shipping, and the Athenians weak, would never fight with them at sea, nor to this day would, though it were known well enough unto him, what division there was among the Athenians; nor would ever so much as draw the Lacedemonian Navy into a body; and against Tissaphernes, for that he cared not to send for the Navy of the Phenicians, according to his promise, nor payed them their stipends, but when pleased himself; and then by halves neither: when therefore they cried out to put the matter to a bataille; Atyachius and his confederates, commanded the Milesians to march over-land, to the fore-land of Micalé, whiles they went about by sea, with their whole fleet, consisting of 112 ships, to the same place. But when the Athenians, which lay at Glaucia, under Mycale, with eighty two ships, saw their fleet coming, they presently weighed anchor, and highed them away as fast as they could to Samos: yet when Strombichides with his fleet, hearing thereof, halted him to come to their help out of Hellepont, the Peloponnesians withdrew and returned to Miletus. And the Athenians, having now 208 ships together, all strong and well provided, followed them home to Miletus, and there going on land, ranged their army in the open field, but seeing that the Peloponnesians would not not come forth, they took sea again, and returned to Samos without stroke striking. After which, the Peloponnesians, seeing they were not able to deale with the Athenians, with all the force they could make by sea, and not being able of themselves to pay to many leamen, especially when Tissaphernes, was so sparing and backward, in sending in their stipend, according to agreement; they sent away Clearchus with 40 of their ships into Hellepont, to Pharnabazus; who both desired their coming very earnestly and promised them pay very liberally, and many good offices besides, if they pleased to come, [Id.]

Thralyphern, going to Tissaphernes, brought over Alcibiades with him to Samos, where the army made him one of their chief commanders; and indeed committed the whole charge of things to his ordering: who being thus made, in a sort, General to the Athenian army; sailed back presently to Tissaphernes; that he might seem to communicate in all counsels with him; and handled matters so cunningly to his own advantage, that he could make the Athenians afraid of Tissaphernes, and Tissaphernes of them, at his pleasure; [Ibid.]

And moreover wrought this effect in the Peloponnesians which lay at Miletus, that he set them further out with Tissaphernes, than they were before, so that they began now to mutiny again, not only against him, but also against Atyachius: whom they charged of collusion with Tissaphernes for his own gain and advantage sake. And in this mangling it fell out that the Mariners of the Syracusan and Thurian companies cried, pellets, and demanded pay of Atyachius in a very fawcie and mutinous manner; and when he again answered them somewhat roughly, and with some menacing termes withal, and offered to bastinado Dercius, who commanded the Thurian Squadron (though the Greek Schoiaft of Thucidides, understands hereby, Hermocrates, commander of the Syracusan Squadron) for upholding his mariners, they, crying, One and All, ran in upon him; and had, no doubt, there made an end of him, had he not ran and saved himself at an altar there by. The Milesians also, making a head, got secretly into the fort or citadel, which Tissaphernes had built, and turning out the soldiery that were there in garrison, took it into their own hands: which was very well liked of by the rest, save only by Lychas the Lacedemonian, who said that the Milesians, and the rest under the kings dominion ought in duty to obey Tissaphernes (so long as he governed so moderately as he did; and until the war should receive a happy end, [Ibid.])

Whiles they were busie in this alteration, Pindarus arrived, sent from Lacedemon to successe Atyachius in the Admiralty or command of the Navie; and he took it upon him, upon the surrender of Atyachius. When Atyachius took shipping to returne home to Lacedemon, Tissaphernes sent a messenger of his own along with him, one Gauletes, a Carian born, but one that could both the Greek and Persian tongue; who was both to charge the Milesians for surprizing his citadel, and withall to clear him from those false aspersions, which the Milesians, and Hermocrates the Syracusan had cast upon him, for he well knew, that they would along too, and accuse him for conspiring with Alcibiades against the Lacedemonian state; and for sicklenesse of minde toward them.

Tissaphernes seeing the Peloponnesians bent against him, (among other things, for suffering Alcibiades to return to his own again) as one who now openly favored the Athenian party against them, went to Apendus, where the Phenician fleet, consisting of 147 list of ships, was now arrived to purge himself, as he thought: and took Lichas the Lacedemonian along with him, leaving his Agent Tamos with them, to see the stipend duly paid to the Peloponnesian Navy, which yet was but so performed by him: moreover the Peloponnesians at Tissaphernes his request, sent Philippus a Lacedemonian, with two tall ships to Apendus, there to take a view of the Phenician fleet. And Alcibiades, understanding that Tissaphernes was at Apendus came with 13 sail to Canus first, and then to Phaelis, promising every where to his friends huge supplies and aides in all kinds, and when he was returned to Samos, he informed them there, that he had wrought matters so, as that the Phenician fleet should not assit the Peloponnesians; and that Tissaphernes was now become more friend to the Athenian than ever; for true it was, that Tissaphernes met with the Phenicians at Apendus, but would not let a saile of them go to the Peloponnesians; putting them off with this idle excuse, that there were not so many ships come to him, as the king had commanded: whereas indeed his purpose was to hold both parties of the Greeks in suspense; and by siding with neither, to make them waste and consume one another, [Id.]

The Junto or Government of 400 at Athens was dissolved, and 5000 put in their places: who by an Act of theirs, ratified, and confirmed the recalling of Alcibiades home into his country, [Ibid.] and by the same order, was he joyned in Commission, though absent, with Thralyphern, and Hieramenes, and by their valour, and verue, the Athenian state, was in short time, much reformed and brought into better order than erst it was, [Emil. Prob. in the life of Alcibiades.]

Whiles the Peloponnesians linger out the time at Miletum, none of those, whom Tisaphernes, when he went for Alpendus, had left behind him, took care to pay the Navie, nor did Tisaphernes himself, or the fleet which he promised, come at them: and both Philippos, who was sent with Tisaphernes to Alpendus, wrote to Mindarus, who had the charge of things belonging to the Navie, and to did Hippocrates from Phae-lis, that he should not look for any supply of ships, or any thing else that good was from Tisaphernes his hand: But on the contrary, Pharnabazus, who served the king, in the parts of Hellepont, threw them all the favour and friendship, that could be imagined: For he both solicited their coming, and of his own accord, moved all the Greek cities within his Province, to fall off from the Athenians (which Tisaphernes would have seemed to do too) hoping hereby to have increased his own power. Mindarus, being netted with this newes, made ready in an instant 74 ships; and gave the word, on a suddain to be gone, to the end, that there might no tidings thereof be carried to Samos, where the Athenians lay, and presently weighing anchor from Miletus, ran a straight course to Hellepont; and Thrasyllus hearing thereof, followed him from Samos, with 55 saile [Thucid. lib. 8.]

Mindarus and the Syracusan Squadron had a fight at sea with Thrasyllus and Thrasybulus, at a fore-land of Cynos-tema (a place known by old Hecubaea's tombe) where after a sharp bickering on both sides, the Athenians went away with the victory, having had 15 of their own ships sunk, and taken 21 of their enemies: which sea-fight is more fully set forth by Thucid. in his 8. book, and by Diod. Sic. 2. year of 92 Olympiads.

The 4 day after this fight, the Athenians having used all possible diligence, in repairing their fleet, set sail from Sestos to Cyzicum, which had revolted from them, and having espied 8 ships at Harpagium and Priapus, which came from Byzantium, set upon them; and having beaten those who defended them from the shoare, took the ships into their own possession: and going on their way to Cyzicum, took that also, being then but an open bourgade, and squeezed a great summe of money out of them, [Thucid. 8.]

Alcibiades setting out from Samos with 22 ships, exacted great summes of money out of them of Halycarnassus: and then waiting the country of Coos, fenced the town of Coos, with a wall; and the winter now drawing on, returned with a great prey to Samos [Id. ib. Diod. 2. year of 92 Olympiads.]

Affacus a Persian borne, and Lieutenant to Tisaphernes, having conceived secret deadly hatred against the men of Delos (who being diven out of their old habitation, dwelt at Antarmyrtium) coming that way, sent for all the chief men among them, as friends and confederates, to come and serve the king in his wars, and upon a time, seeing them altogether at dinner, closed them round with his souldiers, and they with their darts slew them every man, [Thucid. ib.]

Those of Antandrus in Eolia, fearing least Affacus should serve them with the same sauce, and impatient of those taxes which he had laid upon them, sent for certain Peloponnesian souldiers, from Abydus, and drawing them privily over the mount Ida, received them into their city, and turned the garrison of Affacus out of the Castle there, [Id. ibid.]

Tisaphernes returning from Alpendus into Ionia, and being much moved with this last attempt at Antandrus, and with other the like at Miletus and Cnidus (for there also the inhabitants had turned out his garrisons) thought himself much wronged by the Peloponnesians: wherefore fearing worse matters from them, and troubled moreover in his mind, least Pharnabazus, in a shorter time, and with far lesse charge in paying them, should seem to have gone further against the Athenians than himself had done, he purposed to go in person to the Peloponnesians in Hellepont, both to exposestulate with them their fault in turning his Garrison out of Antandrus, and also to clear himself, in the best manner he could, of those imputations which they laid upon him, concerning the sacrificial fleet and other things: and as soon as he was come to Ephesus, he there sacrificed to Diana, [Id. lib. 8. in fin.] Here ends the History of Thucid, which Theopompus continues for 17 years, and Xenophon for 48 years after; [Diod. 2. year of 92 Olympiads.] Theopompus we have not, the later we have, but maimed in the head: for besides the proeme of his History, we want his whole two first years of it: to wit, from the end of the summer of the 21 year of the Peloponnesian war, where Thucidides left, to the end of the 23 summer of the same war.

Of the 300 ships sent back into Phenicia, Tisaphernes purged himself to the Lacedemonians, laying that he had received advertisement, that the coast of Phenicia was in danger to be assailed both by the Arabians, and also by the king of Egypt (meaning K. Amyrtus) [as Diod. Sic. hath it, 3. year of the 93 Olympiads.] whereas Thucid. taught us, that there came but 147 ships to Alpendus out of Phenicia, and that they were all sent back again by Tisaphernes; contrary to his promise made.

There was this year another sea-fight, between the Lacedemonians, and Athenians, at Cynos-tema aforesaid; which was described by Theopompus, as a certain nameless greck writer saith, in the life of Thucid.

Thymarches, coming to Athens with a small company of ships, presently the Lacedemonians and Athenians had another sea-fight, wherein the Lacedemonians, under the conduct of Hegeladridus, gat the victory, [Xen. in the beginning of his History of the Greeks.]

Nor long after Doreus of the Isle of Rhodes, Ammiral of the Thuriian Fleet, out of Italy, in the beginning of Winter, setting out from Rhodes with 14 fail of ships, went to the Hellepont, there to joyn with Mindarus: who lying at Abydus, did there attend the coming of all the friends and confederates of the Peloponnesian name and nation. And now was this Doreus come as far as Sigum, a Port in Troas, when the Athenians lying at Sestos, having knowledge of his being there, and whether he was going, went toward him with 20 ships: but Doreus hearing of their coming, fled from thence, and drew up his ships upon the Rhaxzan shoar; and having therelanded his men, with the help of the men of Dardania, they defended both themselves and their ship: too, in spite of the Athenians: who seeing at last, they could do no good upon them, came back to Madytus, to the rest of their army. Mindarus seeing this fight, who at that time happened to be at old Troy, sacrificing to Minerva, went speedily with 84 ships to the Foreland of Dardania, to relieve Doreus, and to save his ships; where he found also the land Forces of Pharnabazus ready to assist the Lacedemonian Navy against their enemies. Against whom the Athenian Fleet consisting of 74 ships came forth, close to the shoar of Abydus; and there began the fight. Mindarus having under his command 97 ships in all of his own, besides those of Doreus, he placed the Syracusians in the left wing; himself took charge of the right: on the other side, Thrasybulus had the right wing, Thrasyllus the left. The fight continued doubtful from morning to the evening: when upon the sudden Alcibiades came stemming in with 18 fresh ships which came from Samos towards Hellepont: upon sight whereof the Lacedemonians fled towards Abydus. And the Athenians, following them close, took ten of their ships; and then a great storm of winde arose, so that the Athenians could not do as they would have done in the chase, and so the Peloponnesians escaped all safe to shoar, and fled to Pharnabazus his land army that was thereby: and Pharnabazus himself during the fight, rid his horse into the very sea, up to his saddle-skirts, and there fought, and commanded his men both Horse and Foot to do the like. The Peloponnesians also themselves, locking the ships close together, and making one bulke of them, fought against their enemies from the decks close to the shoar: but the night drawing on, the Athenians with 30 empty ships which they had taken of their enemies, and taking with them such of their own as had been hurt, and either battered or bilged in the fight, returned to Sestos: and the next morning so soon as it was light, gathering what spoils they could get together of their enemies wreck, they erected a Trophy: and then leaving 40 sail to guard the Hellepont, they disposed of the rest, some here, some there, to gather up their tribute monies: yet one of their chief Captains, Thrasyllus, sailed back to Athens, there to let them know what a victory they had gotten, and wishal to desire a supply both of men and shipping for the carrying on of the war in those parts. [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. Diod. Sic. lib. 13. Plutarch in the life of Alcibiades.]

Mindarus, about the first watch of the night, came back to the sea side, and gave order for the curing of his ships which were hurt and broken in the fight: and sent in all haste to Lacedemon for fresh supplies, both by land and sea. And whilst these things were in providing, his purpose was to joyn his land Forces with Pharnabazus, to take in the tributary cities of the Athenians, that were in Asia; [Diod. ib.]

Meane while came Tisaphernes in Hellepont, and Alcibiades thinking to magnifie himself after great and glorious a victory achieved against the Lacedemonians, came a land unto him with rich presents, and a princely train. But Tisaphernes, who was already ill spoken of at Lacedemon, and fearing lest some information would be made against him to Darius, laid hold on him, and put him in irons at Sardes: pretending, that such was the Kings command, to bew, that he reckoned the Athenians for his open enemies. But within a month after, he with one Mantheus, a Carian borne, and a fellow prisoner of his, gat horses, and by night stole a way to Clazomenae; and gave out, that it was with Tisaphernes his privy and consent, [Xen. Hellen. lib. 11. Plutarch in Alcibia.]

Mindarus with 60 fail of ships, in the later end of Winter, went to Cyzicum, and joyning with Pharnabazus his land army, took the place by force; and against him with 86 ships went Alcibiades, Thrasybulus, and Theramenes: and routed him first at sea, and then in a second fight at land; in which Mindarus himself, bravely fighting, died. The Syracusians, seeing no means left to escape, set their own ships on fire. The rest of the Fleet came all entirely into the Athenians hands, who carried them all away to Preconneclus. This fight is more amply described [by Xenophon Hellen. lib. 1. by Diod. lib. 13. by Plutarch in the life of Alcibiades, and by Polyannus, stratag. lib. 1.]

The next day, the Athenians sailed from Preconneclus to Cyzicum, where they were received received into the city; which was abandoned by Pharnabazus, and the Peloponnesians, [Xenop.] and there erected two Trophies; the one for their victory at sea, in the Isle of Polydorus, the other for that at land; where they first put the enemies to flight, [Diod.]

Alcibiades staying at Cyzicum 20 days, and having gotten a vast summe of money out of them, departed without doing them any other harme : and returned to Ptoconellus [Xenop.]

The Commanders of the Athenians, which remained behind at Cyzicum, came at length to Chalcedon, and there walled Chrysolope, and made it a place where to gather a role or tribute of every bottom that passed by out of Pontus, [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. Polyb. lib. 4. pa. 312. and Diod. 4 year of 93 Olympiade] leaving there a Garrison, and a Fleet of 30. ships, under the command of Theramenes and Eubulius; both to keep the Town, and also to watch what ships came in and out at the mouth of Pontus; and to do what other mischief they could to the enemy, [Xenop.]

The Athenians also intercepted certain letters, written Laconically, or concisely, from Hippocrates, Mindarus his Lieutenant to Lacedæmon, to the Ephori there, of the loss they had sustained at Cyzicum : in this wise Εἴ μιν καὶ Μινδαρὸς δ' ἀνιόντων πνεύματι τ' ἀνδρῶν ἀποκρίσται τὴν πόλιν. (i.) All his loss: Mindarus is dead; our men starve; we know not what to do; [Xenop. and Plutarch.]

The Lacedæmonians hereupon sued for peace, which they opposed, who lived by the war, [Justin. lib. 5. cap. 4.] For though the more moderate sort of the Athenians were inclinable enough to peace, yet they who made their advantage of these combustions, chose rather to continue the war : especially one Cleophon, who was a principal Leader of the people; He, when he had spoken many things proper enough to the purpose then in hand, ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἐθέλομεν τὴν πόλιν ἀποδοῦναι, as Diodor. Sic. elegantly expretheth it : (i. e.) He made the people proud, by recounting to them the greatness of their good successes; as if Fortune did not use to bestow her favours in the war by turns; Now this Cleophon, who by his turbulent speeches, stirred up the people to a continuance of this war, (though to his own confusion, as appeared afterward) was by his occupation a Lute-maker; and one who, as every man knew, had been a slave and kept in irons; yet afterward by devices and tricks, came to be a Denison of Athens, and at this time, having won the people to him by his munificence and largesse, grew so bold, as openly to profess, that he would with his own hand, cut off that man's head who ever he wate, that should offer to speak any more of a peace : as 25. Ephians hath in his Orations, De falsa legatione, (i. e.) of a false Embassie.

The Peloponnesians, and their confederates the Syracusians, as many as had escaped alive out of the fight, betook themselves to Pharnabazus, [Diodor. lib. 13.] whom Pharnabazus courteously entertained, and with many words of comfort told them, that for the loss of a few wooden ships, they should not let fall their courage, seeing the king had wood enough in his Dominions to build more ships: withal, so long as the men were safe, and withal gave them every man a new suite of cloaths, and two moneths were faine : and moreover arming the Mariners, placed Garrisons all along the sea coasts of his Government; and assembling all the Commanders of Cities, and Captains of every ship, gave them order to build as many new ships at Antandrus, as Captains had lost of their old; and gave large allowance of monies to go in hand therewith; and allowed them timber out of the mount Ida, as much as they would for that purpose : which done, he presently sent to relieve Chalcedon, [Xenop. Hellen. lib. 1.]

While this Navy was in building, the Syracusians, joyning with the inhabitants of Antandrus, built a wall about the Town, and made it a most strong place of defence; in requital whereof, the Antandrians made the Syracusians free of their City, [Xenop. ib.]

The Captains of these Syracusan companies, being all condemned to exile, by their country-men at home; Their General Hemocrates, accused Tisaphernes at Lacedæmon, and found credit in all that he said; not only upon the testimony of Attyochus, but even for his own words sake : whereupon he returned to Pharnabazus, and without asking, received from him a large sum of money; wherewith having procured men and ships, he returned into his own country, [Xenop. ib. with Diodor. 4 year, Olympiade 92.]

Paratippidas, being condemned to exile at Sparta, because it was conceived, that by his plotting with Tisaphernes, he had procured all that favoured the Lacedæmonian party, in a tumult there raised, to be turned out of the Isle of Thafus : Cratippidas was sent to take charge of the Navy in his room at Chios, [Xenop. ib.]

He with 25 sail of ships, trifled away the time about the coast of Ionia, but did nothing worth the speaking of for a long time; yet afterward, being furnished with monies

nies by those that were banished out of Chios, he brought them home again, and thrust 600 of the contrary faction out; who possessing themselves of Aratæum, a most fortified place in the continent, over against Chios, made daily incursions from thence upon them, [Diod. ib.]

In the 93 Olympiade, wherein Eubotas the Cyrenian won the prize in running, when Archippus was Ephorus at Lacedæmon, and Eustemon, was Prætor, or L. Chancellor at Athens, there was a new game set up, of a race to be run, by a brace of Mules; in a Coach, called Evades, or evades, as Xenophon (Hellen. 1. 2.) of which besides Diod. Sic. lib. 13. and Pausan. lib. 1. Eliae, Julius Africanus also in Catalog. Stadicorum mention, adding moreover, that in the same Olympiade, Polydamantes the Scotian, won the prize at wratling, being the same man, whom Darius Nohus, by expressive messengers, with large gifts and promises drew to him at Susa; where he slew three of the kings guard, which is called the Immortal Guard, of which you may see more in Herod. lib. 7. cap. 83. which all at once ran in upon him, as Pausan. in his later book Eliacor, sheweth, who also in the same book speaketh of Eubotas, (surnamed Stadicarius, who when the Oracle of Ammon had foretold, that he should win the prize at running, he caused his own statue to be made before-hand; and coming afterward intended to win the prize, was proclaimed to have won it, and dedicated his statue in testimony thereof, all in one day.

In this year also, the Medes which had fallen off from Darius the king of Persians, submitted themselves again to him, as Xenophon testifieth, [Hellen. 1. Herodotus also, in the first of his History, cap. 130.] relates, how the Medes revolted from Darius, and that upon an overthrow received, they returned to his subjection : who because he makes mention both of the war at Decelæa, [lib. 9. cap. 71.] which was waged the fifth year before, and of Amyrtas his son reigning after him, [lib. 3. cap. 13.] (of whom I shall speak more in the year following) hence I gather, that he either wrote, or at least revised his History, in the very later end of the Peloponnesian war.

In the beginning of the Summer, Thrasyllus at Athens taking command of the ships committed to his charge, with five thousand seamen, all armed in fashion of targeteers, which he was to joyn with those other targeteers, which were there before, came to Samos, where having staid three days, he put over to the coast of Pyrgæ in Ionia, and having first wasted the country thereabout, he came at last with his army before the wall of the town it self, and when some luckless came from Miletus, and fell upon the Athenians, who were but slightly armed, and busie in gathering the spoile of the country, the rest of the Athenians coming to relieve their fellows, put all the Milesians, (few escaping) to the sword, and having got together, 200 of the bucklers, of them that were slain, erected a trophy of them, and the next day failed to Notium, and there providing themselves of necessaries, went to Colophus, which presently yielded to them. The next night they entered into Lydia, when their corn was almost ripe, and set many villages on fire. But whiles they were scattered here and there, and minded nothing but their boot-haling, Stages a Persian, (the same Stages, as it should seem, which I mentioned before in the year of the World, 3192. out of Thucydides) fell upon them with his horse, and took one prisoner, and slew seven of them, [Xenop. Hellen. l. 1.]

Tisaphernes understanding that Thrasyllus was ready to set sail for Ephesus; to surprise it, gathered together all the strength he could make, and sent about horsemen into all parts, to command men to come in and defend Diana of the Ephesians, Thrasyllus, when he had spent 17 dayes in Lydia, fell sail for Ephesus; landed his coxleers at Coræfius, but his horse, his Targeteers, and other Soldiers all, he set on shoar near to a bog on the other side of the town, and so soon as it was light, drew up to the town in two companies : against whom, they of the town, with such aids as Tisaphernes had sent them; set first upon the coxleers which were at Coræfius : whom when they had routed, and pursued to the sea side, and killed some ten of them they speedily returned, and set upon them which were placed near the bog : where having put the Athenians to flight, and slain 300 of them upon the place, they there erected one Trophy, and another at Coræfius. But of their aids, they highly rewarded the companies of the Syracusians, and Selinuntians, because they had carried themselves of all others most valiantly in that service; promising such of them, as would be denied in their city, freedom from tax and tallage for ever, [Id. ib.] Plutarch also in the life of Alcibiades, maketh mention of a Trophy of brass there set up in corn of the Athenian nation.

The Athenians, having upon a truce received the bodies of their slain, and buried them at Notium, failed away to Lesbos and Hellepont. And when lying at Methymna, a city of Lesbos, they there elyped twenty five sail of the Syracusians, with whom they had had to do at Ephesus, passing by, they set upon them, and took 4 ships, with all the men in them, and routing the rest, pursued them as far as Ephesus. Thrasyllus sent all the prisoners which he had taken to Athens, saving onely one Alcibiades an Athenian, and cousin germain to Alcibiades, and and a banished man also, as the other was, and him he there put to death: and then set sail for Sestus, where the army lay; and from Sestus the whole army put over to Lampacus, and withal, the Winter which they reckon from the beginning of Autumn, came on. But when Alcibiades at Lampacus, would have drawn his whole army of all sorts into one indistinct body, his own old soldiers refused to be ranked and mingled with those who had served under Thrasyllus. We, said they, who have ever been Conquerors, so be forced with those that were beaten and routed but the other day. [Xen. Hellen. 1.]

When Alcibiades and Thrasyllus his companies wintering altogether at Lampacus (Diodorus his copies have it Labdacus) had fortified the places, in a military way; they then went to besiege Abydus: which when Pharnabazus came with a very great army to relieve, he was there fought withal by the Athenians, overcome, and put to flight. And Alcibiades had Pharnabazus himself in chase, with his Horse, and 150. Corslets following him; and gave him not over till late in the night. Upon which victory gotten, the whole army grew friends, and willingly comforted each with other, without distinction: and so returned triumphantly into their Camp whence they set out.

The next day Alcibiades set up a Trophie; and went and wasted Pharnabazus his province, with fire and sword, without any opposition; but all the Priests which he took, he sent away ransom-free. [Plutarch ib.]

The Lacedemonians finding themselves aggrieved with Tissaphernes his delays, and puttings off, sent Bocotus and others with him Ambassadors unto Darius; who easily obtained of him all that ever they demanded. [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. 7.]

In the same Winter, Alcibiades and Thrasyllus; his companies, making their several inroads upon the countries belonging to Darius; in the Continent, made infinite havoc there. [Id. ibid.]

b.

Darius gave his son Cyrus the younger, being then not above 16 years of age; as being born after his father came to be King, (as Ctesias affirmeth, and Plutarch also in the life of Artaxerxes) charge over all the sea coast, with the title of Satrapæ, (i.e.) President or Governour of all those countries: and withal made him Generalissimo of all those, whose Rendezvous or place of assembling was wont to be in the plain of Caltolus in Lydia: with this charge, that he should joyn with the Lacedemonians in making war against the Athenians. [Id. ib. and in Excerpt. Cyri. lib. 1. in initio.] And Justin. lib. 5. cap. 5. out of Trogus, saith, That Darius King of Persia made his younger son Cyrus Governour of all Ionia and Lydia; and that it was he who raised the Lacedemonians to the recovery of their former fortunes. And Diodorus saith expressly, that Darius sent his sonne Cyrus to this very end, that in pursuing the war against the Athenians, he should relieve and set up the Lacedemonians. [1 year of the 93 Olympiade.] and he also very well saith that Cyrus was made, ἡγεμὼν τῶν ἐπὶ θαλάσσης ἐκείνων: (i.e.) Commander over all the Governours by the sea side; 2 year of the 94 Olympiade; and [in the 2 year of the same Olympiade] that he was made, ἐπὶ τῇ θαλάσσει ἀρχηγέτης: (i.e.) He was made Commander in chief, over all the Provinces lying upon the sea coast: For it is manifest, that both Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, though both Satrapes and Governours of their several provinces, yet were both under him and his command.

4307. 407.

We read in Euseb. his Chron. that after Amyrtæus of Saitæ, Nepherties the King of a new Dynastie or Principality, succeeded in the kingdom of Egypt: whereas we find, [in Diodorus, 1 year Olympiade 95.] that next before Nephertæus or Nepherties, Plammitichus (descended of the race of that old Plammitichus; whom Manetho placeth in the 26 Dynastie or Principality, which was also of the Saites) reigned in Egypt. So that a man may well doubt, whether this were not Pausiris the son of Amyrtæus, which by the favour and help of the Persians recovered his fathers kingdom, as [Herod. lib. 3. c. 5. reporteth] but of the number of this and other Egyptia Kings reigns, we have already spoken in our Egyptian Chronology.

In the year when Pantacles was Ephorus in Sparta, and Antigones Prætor or L. Chancellor at Athens, in the beginning of the Spring, next going before their coming into their offices: the Athenians with all the power they could make, sailed into Proconessus: and removing from thence, encamped before Chalcedon. [Xenoph. Hellen. 1.] Diodor, saith that they went to Theramenes, who at that time lay before Chalcedon, with 70 sail of ships, and 5000. men. [1 year 4. Olympiade 91.]

The Inhabitants of Chalcedon, hearing of the approach of the Athenian army, sent away all their goods to the Thracians of Bythinia, their next neighbours. But Alcibiades hearing thereof, went with all his Horse, and a part of his Foot, and demanded all those goods of them; threatening force, if they refused to deliver them: and so having gotten them, made peace with the Bythinians, and returned to his Camp before Chalcedon: and drew a wall of timber-work before the City athwart the neck of land from sea to sea: which when Hippocrates the Lacedemonian Commander saw, he drew out all his forces, and fought with Thrasyllus, upon equal terms for a great while, till till at length, Alcibiades coming in with his forces, both of horse and foot, Hippocrates was laid dead upon the place; and then his men were fain to fly back into the city. But while the fight continued, Pharnabazus, with all his army, coming another way without the timber wall, fought by all means to have broken in, and to have come to the rescue of Hippocrates; but failing thereof, wheeled about, and retired to Heracleum, or the Temple of Hercules, which was in the territory of Chalcedon, where his own camp lay well entrenched, [Xenophon lib. 1. and Plutarch in the Life of Alcibiades.]

d.

After this Alcibiades went into Hellepont, and Cheronefus, to gather moneys: and the rest of the Commanders, (though Diodorus saith, only Theramenes) came to a composition with Pharnabazus, concerning Chalcedon, that he should give them 30 talents, and should convoy the Athenian Ambassadors safely to the kings presence; and by solemn oath they covenanted each with other, that the men of Chalcedon should pay the Athenians the same tribute they did before, with all arrears: and that in the mean time, the Athenians should not offer to molest them of Chalcedon, till the returne of their Ambassadors from the King, and Alcibiades at his returne, sending two Commissioners from Chalcedon, and Pharnabazus two more from Cryopolis, did not only interchangeably swear performance of Covenants on the publick behalf, but they themselves plighted their faith each to other solemnly, upon the same terms, [Xenoph.]

These things thus done, Pharnabazus presently returned; willing the Ambassadors, which were to go to the King to meet him at Cyzicum: now the Ambassadors sent from the Athenians to the king were these, Dorabeus, Philodictæ, Theogenes, Emphylium, and Manitheus, unto whom were added of the Argivans, Cleofratrus, and Pyrolochus: and some Ambassadors also from the Lacedemonians, as Pasipides, and others: all these took their journey to the King; to whom Hermocrates also, who stood now a banished man from Syracula, joyned himself, and Protenus his brother, [Id.]

While Pharnabazus was taking care for the conveying of these Ambassadors, there came unto him from the other side of the water, Clearchus, a Lacedemonian Commander, partly to receive moneys for the pay of their army; and partly that he might gather into a body the ships, which lay scattered, some at Antandrus, some in Hellepont, and some in other places; hoping thereby to work some mischief, upon the confederate places of the Athenians: and in speciall thereby to draw off their forces from before Byzantium. But in his absence from thence, Byzantium was betrayed and given up to the Athenians, [Id.]

As these Athenian Ambassadors were upon their way to the King, there met them the Lacedemonian Ambassadors, Bocotus and the rest returning from the King, and Cyrus himself then going to his charge, as Governour over all the sea coasts of those parts: whom when they saw their chief suit unto him, was, that they might proceed in their journey to the king; if not, that they might returne safe home again: but Cyrus commanded Pharnabazus, either to deliver up those Ambassadors into his hands, or at least to send them home again; as being no ways willing, that the Athenians should come to the knowledge of what was then in hand against them, whereupon Pharnabazus held the Ambassadors still in suspense, sometimes telling them, that he would carry them on their way to the king, sometimes that he would send them home again; and so held them on by the space of three years (or rather, indeed of three months) and in the end, by Cyrus his leave, dismissed them to return to their own home, [Id.]

Alcibiades taking with him 30 ships from Samos, sailed into the Bay of Ceramus in Caria, and having there gathered 100 talents in money, and withal, taking the pillage of no less than 200 vessels, which he had either rifled or sunk, came to Athens; where being declared General of all their armies, with full and absolute power to command, and having received 200 talents, (as Lysias, in his oration, against his son Alcibiades sheweth) out of the treasury of the city, he presently raised an army, of 1500 corslets, and 150 horse, with 100 sail of ships, [Xenophon, Hellen. 1. Diodorus lib. 13. Justin. lib. 5. cap. 4. 5. Plutarch and Emil. Prelopus, in the Life of Alcibiades.]

Satyrus the Son of Spartacus, held the kingdom of Bosphorus Cimmericus, by the space of 14 years, [Diod. year 4. Olympiade 96.]

The Lacedemonians, when Crætespides their Admirall time was out, sent Lysander to succeed him in that charge; He, when he came to Rhodes, having there gathered the fleet together, sailed thitherwith unto the Isle of Cos, and to Miletus, and from thence to Ephesus, with 70 sail of ships, and there stayed, till Cyrus came to Sardes, [Xenoph. Hellen. 1.] And when he found Ephesus pliant to him, and wholly addicted to the Lacedemonian party, and much grieved with the Persians carriage, and fallen to decay, decay, by reason that the Persian Governours lay commonly at Miletus thereby, and drew away all the trade and traffick from them, to that city; he therefore took up his standing quarter there, commanded all merchants to unload there, made sundry Docks, and cauled all ships for the Navy to be there built. By which means he procured in short time, their port to be filled with ships, their exchange with Merchants, and their shops and ware-houses, with all kind of wealth, [Plutarch, in the Life of Lysander.]

and ware-houses, with all kind of wealth, [Plutarch, in the Life of Lyfander.] Lylander being certified, that Cyrus was come to Sardes, went he thither to him, in company with the rest of the Commissioners from Sparta, where he charged Tiffaphernes very heavily; for that, when he had command from the king to support and help the Lacedaemonians what he could: to beat the Aetolians out of the sea, he on the contrary by Alcibiades his procurement, grew traitor, and cold that way, and by keeping back their pay from the mariners, utterly destroyed the Lacedaemonian Navy, and Cyrus of himself was willing enough to receive any information against Tiffaphernes, who had otherwile no goodwills in him; and was ever a back friend to Cyrus himself: and the more Lylander put on the young man to be doing the forwarder was he to promise, that Alcibiades should be done; adding till, that it was his lathers command it should be for; and so he flured him, that there should be no want, neither of paines nor monies on his part; and that for that service he should be paid of the Mariner and sea Soldier, from 3 months pay day to day, he payed the whole army what ever was in arreare: advanced a whole months pay before hand; paying down to Lylander 10000 Daries for that purpose, and by this means put heart and courage, more than ever, into his own fleet, and left the Athenian fleet empty almost of Mariners, for the most part, and them, for greedinesse of better pay, left the Athenians, and went unto Lylander, and those which staid, grew idle and careless in the service, and mutinous and troublesome dayly to their Commanders, [Xenoph. Hellen. 1. Diador. lib. 13. and Plut. in the life Lyfander.]

When the Athenians heard this, with heavy hearts, and by the fecting on of Tisaphernes, they dispatched away ambassadors to Cyrus; but Cyrus refused to admit of them to his presence, though Tisaphernes himself spake for them; and told him, that what he did, was to oppose the advice of Alcibiades, whose counsel it ever had been, to hold the Athenians in a balance, and let neither side overtop the other, but suffer them to continue the war, and thereby to waist and consume one another to nothing, [Id. ibid.] and although the Peloponnesians were thus borne up with the Persian bags, yet the Athenians held it out 3 whole years against them, [Thucyd lib. 2.] And we wonder if as last the Athenian state was weak, and came to naught, seeing that the power of all the East joyned against their destruction.  Lyander, when he was returned to Ephesus, there reited him for a while; and in that time drew up 90 of his Kneph, which were fore bruied; and made them fit again and serviceable for the fa. [Xenoph. Hellen, i.] He sent also for the chieft, and most powerful men out of every adjoining city: made a confederacy with them, and affured them, that if things suited out in this war, as he hoped they would, he would make every one of them a Prince in his own city: whereupon they were to let a gog, that every man was ready to do more, than Lyander himself could with reason require of them; and so came to be abundantly provided of all things necessary for the war in a trice; and sooner than he could have imagined. [Diod, i, 13.]

and (sooner than he could have imagined, [Diod. 4, 13.] When Alcibiades had heard, that Thratylus was gone out of Hellefpontus fortify Phocæa; he fet faile and went unto him: leaving the fleet in the mean time; under the charge of Antiochus with a ftrict command, that he fhould in no wife, offer to flit out, nor fight with Lyfander in his abfence. But Antiochus, with his own veffel, and one other of Notium, as Xenophon and Pintarch fay, (for Diodorus faith, that he drew out ten of the choicelt fhips he had) would needs go himfelf to Ephefus, and there firk along before the very noles of Lyfander's fhips. Then Lyfander put out at flit with a fmall company of fhips, and perfued him; but when more and more came to the help of Antiochus, Lyfander drew out his whole fleet, and the Athenians did the like on their fide, from Notium and other places: but when they came on, and there in a confufed manner, they quickly loft 15 of their beft fhips, and the reft faved themfelves by flight; and Antiochus himfelf was flain in the fight. Lyfander erecting a Trophy at Notium, returned with the fhips which he had taken to Ephefus, and the Athenians that were left, to Samos, where Alcibiades hearing what had paffed, went with his whole fleet before the port of Ephefus; and there ranged it, in battle array. But Lyfander not ftriving (for indeed his number was far inferior to that of the enemies) Alcibiades returned to Samos, from whence he came, [Xenoph. Hellen. 2, Diodor. lib. 13, Plot. in the lives of Alcibiades and Lyfander.]

13. Plut. in the lives of Alcibiades and Lyfander.
Alcibiades putting to sea again from Samos, failed to Cuma: where laying many false calumnies to their charge; he took a multitude of them prisoners, and brought them aboard his own ships: but when the Cumæans ran all presently to arms, and stood stood upon their guard ; and fell withal upon their enemies Alcibiades for a while, bore the brunt of their assault ; but when the country there about came in all to their help, Alcibiades returned the prisoners which he had taken, and was fain to flee to his ships for [safe] guard : yet this defeat sticking in his stomach, he presently sent for more help to Mitylene ; and drew his men forth in bataraion before the walls of Cuma, and dared them to come forth : But when no manfired, he drew his men back to Mitylene having first ravaged and wasted the country round about.

The Cumes then came secretly to Athens, and there brought their action; and put in their bill against him in forme of Law: for that he had waited and spoiled, a confederate city, and country thereabout, which had no wayes offended them. And the waye once opened, sundry other complaints came in against him, of foule misdemeanors in this kind: And some also of the Garifon in Samo, which bore him a gudge, stole over to Athens, and informed against him: and openly charged him before the whole assembly of the people, that he plaide false, and did but collude with the Lacedaemonians; he had private intelligence and correspondence with Pharnabazus, upon a false hope to have him; that if they prevailed, he should become Prince and Sovereign of Athens: [Diod. lib. 83.]

3598. The Cumæans therefore on the one side, and Thracians in the behalf of the armies
 a. on the other, accusing him of many pranks, played by him in his government, there were presently sent away Conon, and nine other Commissioners assistants with him, to succeed Alcibiades in the charge of the Army; which he hearing of, got presently and privately away in a single ship; and went to his own lands and castles, which were in the Cherfonesus of Thrace, [Diodor. lib. Xenoph. Hellen. 2. Pinarich in the life of Alcibi.]

Lyander, sending for such out of the cities adjoining, as he knew to be blades, and had good hearts and head-pieces of their owne, bad them make every man, what friends he could, and set up for himselfe affuring them as before, that as soon as the Athenians were down, he would dissolve the popular governments in all those cities; and that they should be every man a Prince in his own country, [Plut. in the life of Lyander.]

The moon was eclipsed in the evening, [Xenophon Hellen. i.] 15, April, according to the Julian Calendar, about 3 hours after sun set; as the Astronomical. accounts sheweth.

When Pityas was Ephorus at Sparta ; and Callias, Pretor or L. Chancellor in Athens, and Lyfanders year of command was over, Callicratidas was sent to succeed him in the charge of the navie ; and forasmuch as he was a man whom Lyfander feared, he entrusted the ships to him indeed, as he could do no less ; but of the monies which he had received from Cyrus to pay the Navy withal, what was remaining unpaid in his hand, that he all returned to Cyrus again at Sardes, bidding Callicratidas go aske it of Cyrus if he would have it, and see how he could get monies to pay the Navy: whereupon Callicratidas was forced out of pure necessity, to make a journey into Lydia, to Cyrus, and there desired to have pay for the Navie. But being none of the greatest Courtiers, grew quickly impatient of attendance, and that thus he was put and delayed from day to day ; and saying that the Greeks were come to a faire passe, if they must now stand crouching for pay, to a company of barbarians, gave over his suit, and came his way, [Xenoph. Hellen. 1. and Plut. in the life of Lyfander.] came his way, [Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1. and Plut. in the life of Agamemnon.] Callicratidas failing to Miletus, got money of them there, and going from thence to Chio, had the Caffie of Delphium, which was kept by five hundred Athenians, delivered up unto him: which he brake down: and having there gotten about a mark sterling, for every mariner, went to Teos, where slipping into the towne by night, he lacked it; and came to Lesbos, where he took Mithynna the chief City of the Isle: Conon the Athenian made what haste he could to come to their rescue, but came too late; wherefore, finding all lost there, he began to fly away; but Callicratidas with his fleet of one hundred and seventy ships, pursued him, drew him to a fight, and overcame him. In which fight, Conon, having lost 30 Gaile of his ships, fled with the 40 that were left, to Myrleene. But Callicratidas followed him, and there blockt him up by sea and land; and whilst he lay there, moneys came to him, sent after him by Cyrus, [Xenoph. ib. Diod. 4. 13.] Conon, being thus beset and draw forth,

The Athenian Navy conflicting in all, of one hundred and fifty sail, drew forth, to come to the rescue of Mitylene : and Calli-cratis, leaving Ereconicus, with fifty ships to continue the siege, with the other one hundred and twenty, came to the islands called Arginæ, which lie between Mæala, and a bay of Lesbos, and Catanis, a foreland in Asia, and there, manfully fighting, was slain : the Athenians got the victory, but lost twenty and five of their ships in the fight, with all the men aboard them, (save some few, which swam a shore, and the Peloponnesians having lost seventy and seven ships, fled away to Chios; but the greatest part of them retired into the Countreys of Cuma and Phocæa, [Id. ib.] and that this fight at Arginusæ, was made, when Cælius was Prætor, or L. Chancellor at Athens, the third year of the ninety third Olympiade, besides Xenophon and Diodorus, Athenæus also in his fifth book, de symposiis affirmeth.

Cyrus put to death his two own cousin Germans, Autobazæes and Mitreus, the sons of Darius his fathers sister: for that when they met him, they had not pulled in their hands within their sleeves; an honour which was never wont to be done, but to the king himself; which when Hieramenes and his wife, the parents, as it seemeth, of them that were to put to death, heard, they told Darius, that it was a shame for him, to wink at so foule a fact of his son: whereupon Darius sent for his son, to reparaire to his presence, pretending that he was sick, in his Camp at Thameria, in the Countrey of the Medes, whither he was gone with his army against the Cadusians, a bordering Nation, which had newly revolted from him, [Xenophon Hellen. lib. 2.]

The Lacedæmonians which were scattered in the countreys of Eolia and Ionia, met together at Ephelus; and thence sent messengers to Lacedæmon, to let them there know, how things went with them in Asia; and to desire that they might have Lyfander again for their General, a man of whom they had had to good proof, of in the year before: in which request, Cyrus also joyned with them; but because by their Law, the same man could not be twice Ammiral of their fleet, therefore they gave the title of Ammiral to one Aræus, but committed the whole power for the management of the war unto Lyfander, under the name of his Lieutenent. Lyfander therefore coming to Ephelus, sent to Eæconius to come unto him with his ships from Chios; gathering also out of Peloponessus, and other parts, all the ships that ever he could make, and did not only reparaire those which he had, but also built new ones, in the port at Antandrus; [Xenophon, ibid. Diodorus in the third and fourth years of the ninety third Olympiade; and Plutarch in the life of Lyfander.]

Lyfander made a journey to Cyrus, and desired money of him, as before; which having, though with some difficulty, gotten (for Cyrus made it appear unto him, that by reason of his former liberality that way, moneys went very short with him) he forthwith appointed sea captaines over every fighting ship, and payed every mariner his due to a farthing, [Xenoph. Hellen. 2.]

The Carthaginians having taken Gela in Sicily, took the statue of Apollo, which was in his temple in the suburbs of the city, all of brass, and of a vast bignesse, and sent it to Tyrys, [Diod. year 4. Olympiade 93.]

Cyrus, having received his fathers message, as afore said, sent for Lyfander, to come unto him at Sardes, willed him by no means to fight with the Athenians at sea, till he had gotten a far greater fleet of ships than now he had; promising at his return to bring with him a very great Navy, from Phœnicia, Cilicia, and other parts thereabouts, and then committed the care of all the cities of his own Government to Lyfander, and for such tributes as belonged peculiarly to himself, he assigned them all over unto him, and what was left of that, bad him take it to himselfe, [Xenophon Hellenic. 2. Diodorus, year 4. Olympiade 93. Plutarch in the life of Lyfander.]

Then took Cyrus his journey toward his father, taking Tissaphernes, as a friend, along with him, and three hundred Grecians, all Consecraters, commanded by Xenophon of Arcadia, [Xenophon de Expedis. Cyri, lib. 1. pag. 243. and 254.]

When Cyrus was gone, Lyfander having paid his army, a town with his fleet to Ceramium, a bay in Caria; and coming with his army, before a town called Cedreæ, a place confederate with the Athenians, the next day he took and sackt it, and made the inhabitants thereof (who were no better than a kind of half barbarous people) slaves: so doth Xenophon relate this matter in [a Hellenic.] but Diodorus [year 4. Olympiade 93.] thus, Lyfander (saith he) with a great number of ships, setting upon Thasus, a City of Caria, confederate with the Athenians, took it by force, and cut the throats of all the males there, not under age, to the number of eight hundred; and selling the women and children for slaves, laid the City most smooth with the ground; where, instead of Cedrenians, the word Thasians is put; which were the inhabitants of an Isle called Thasus; far off from thence, and who after the defeat of the Athenians at Egus Potamos, and final ruine of that state, were not taken by force, by Lyfander, but surprised by a trick or slight of his, as we may easily learn out of a broken passage of [Emil. Probus, in the life of Lyfander] and the full relation of the things, by [Polyæmus, lib. 1. stratagem.]

At

3409. 401.

At Miletus, certain men, being desirous to abolish the popular government there used, brought it to passe by Lyfanders help, thus. At first, in the Feast of Bacchus, they laid hold on those which were most against their faction in their own houses, so the number of 40, and cut their throats. Afterward again, in a full market, they seized on 300, more of the richest of the people, and cut off their heads: whereupon, some of the principal of the people that were left, fearing what might befall themselves, to the number of a thousand, and no lesse, fled to Pharnabazus, the Persian Governour in those parts; who entertained them very kindly, and giving every one of them, a Stater of gold, gave them Claudia, which is a Castle of Claudia (shall I say of the Island Claudia mentioned At. 27. 163.) for a place to dwell in, [Diodor, year 4. Olympiade 93.]

The Athenians set sail from Samos, and came to Chios and Ephelus; and having waited the Kings countreys thereabouts, prepared themselves now for a sea-fight: mean while Lyfander sailing from Rhodes, and leaving Ionia on the right hand, went up with his Fleet to Hellepont, to see that no shipping should passe that straight; and withal to reduce such Cities as had revolted from them in those parts, [Xenoph. Hellen. 2.]

Lyfander going from Abydus, came with his Fleet to Lampacus, a confederate city with the Athenians; and thither reparaired also the men of Abydus by land, and such others as were under the command of Thora, a Lacedæmonian Captain: and setting upon the city, took it by force, and sackt it, being rich, and full of corn and wine; and all other provisions: but sent away the Athenian Garrison that was there; according to his word, suffered all freemen there to enjoy their liberty, and having given the spoile thereof to his souldiers, he left the place it self entire to the inhabitants, [Plut. in the life of Lyfander.]

The Athenian Navy, which consisted of 180 sail, was wholly surprized and taken by Lyfander at Egus-potamos, in the streight of Hellepont (of all which number, scantely ten escaped) with 3000. souldiers, besides their Commanders, [Id. ibid.]

Cozon their Captain, seeing the Athenian State here utterly lost, and learning the cruelty of his countrey-men, he returned to Athens, came with nine ships only to Abarindærs a Forcell of Lampacus: and taking from thence some principal masters of Lyfanders ships, sailed away to Euagoras King of Cyprus, with whom he was formerly of good acquaintance: sending away nevertheless a Post-barque to Athens, to let them know what had befallen him at Egus-potamos, [Id. ib. with Ilocrat. in his Euagoras: Aristot. lib. 2. Rhetor. Justin lib. 5. cap. 6. and Arisid. in Oratio. Rho diaca.]

Lyfander having rifled their Camp, carried away the ships, and prisoners, and spoils, and all, with the found of Pipe and Flute, and Triumphant Songs, to Lampacus. And the same day sent away Theopompus, who had been a Milesian Pirate, with the news of this victory to Lacedæmon; in a most choice ship with pennants hung out, and streamers, and all other magnificent attire; which journey he went in three dayes, Philochæ the Captain, and the Athenian prisoners to the number of 3000. Adimantus only excepted, had all their throats cut, [Xenoph. Diodor. Plutarch.]

Lyfander, having set all things in order at Lampacus, sailed to Byzantium and Chalcedon, both which opened their gates unto him: sending away the Athenian Garrisons in both places, upon his word. They who had formerly betrayed Byzantium to Alcibiades, getting away, went first into Pontus, and from thence came afterward to Athens, where they were all enkindled. And Lyfander leaving Stenelaus a Lacedæmonian for Governour, both of Byzantium and Chalcedon, returned to Lampacus, there to repair his Navy, [Xen. Hellen. 2.]

Lyfander turning out every City, such as favoured the Athenian party, and destroying every where, Democracies, and all other forms of Government whatsoever; left them only, such as at Sparta were called Harmoste; (i.e.) Moderators; to govern them: and dividing each City into ten Wards or Companies, chose out of them ten special men, to whom he committed the sovereignty over all, into which number he chose none any where but such as either had been formerly obliged to him, or would now take an oath to be his: and having by this means crected a Decemvirate, or a Government of Ten men in every City, held them all at his own devotion: and did all himself, [Plut. and Emil. Probus, in the life of Lyfander.]

Lyfander, having spent some short time in ordering this businesse, sent word to Sparta that he was ready with 200. sail; with which, together with Agis and Paulanias the Spartan Kings, he forthwith came to the siege of Athens, hoping in a short time to take it: but finding that they defended themselves beyond his expectation, he himself returned into Asia; where he abolished all Republicks, or Democracies, and established every where his Decemvirates, or Government by Ten men: putting many to death every where, and making the rest to get them packing into other places. And whereas at Miletus, his friends to whom he had undertaken to assist them in suppressing the Democratic there, had already upon a second advice, fallen to an accord with the adverse faction; he most cunningly, and most perfidiously withal, so wrought the matter, that he delivered no less than 800. of the Democratical party to be murdered by those which stood for an Aristocracy in that city, [Plutarch ib.]

The Athenians being so befieged by sea and land by the Lacedæmonians, obtained at last peace upon certain articles: But upon the 16 day of Munichion the Atticæ month (the 24 of April according to the Julian Calendar) as Plutarch in his life reports, the Lacedæmonians sold the Athenians, that they had broken the articles, in that they had not kept their walls within the ten days limited to them to have done it in: whence it is gathered, that that peace or agreement was made upon the sixth of their month Munichion, (i.e.,) upon our 14 of April: whereupon ended the Peloponnesian war, when it had lasted 27 years: as [Thucydides in his 5 book] telleth us.

Shortly after this peace, Darius King of all Asia, whom he had reigned 19 years died : whole edifice of walls and luccellor, Artaxerxes, reigned 43 years, [Diodor. Sic., year 4, Olympiad 93.] But Crefus who was Phylitian to this Artaxerxes, faith, that when Darius Ochus died at Babylon : there succeeded him Artacuall, Arfaxes, begotten by him self on the body of Parylatiss, before he came to be King : and that coming to the crown, he altered his name to Artaxerxes : who for the greatness of his memory was surnamed Arsenem. To which also, as I conjecture refers that relation of [Athenann, lib. 12. Deipnosoph.] where he faith, that Ochus when he lay a dying, was asked by his eldest son, by what wisdom and policy he had maintained his State so many yeares, to the end, faith he, that having learned by you, I may follow your steps therein : and that his answer to him was, that he had done it, by doing right to God and man. For although Darius Ochus was often urged by his wife Parylatiss, who ever loved her younger son Cyrus more than the elder ; to follow the example of Darius Hyftaspes, and leave him to succeed him in the kingdom, who was first born after he came to be King : and not him that was borne before : yet would he never hearken to her therein : But by his last Will, gave the kingdom to his eldest son Artaxerxes, and to his younger son Cyrus, all those Cities and Territories, which he had at that time under his Government in Asia, [Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes. Justin. lib. 5, cap. 11.] and in particular of

So soon as Artaxerxes came to the Crown, by the perfidious and importunity of Statyra his wife, he took Vadiaſtes, who had murdered Terriuchmes, her own brother, and husband to Amſitres, who was Artaxerxes his own father, and cauſed his tongue to be drawn backward out of his pole, and there to be cut off: and made Miſtridates or Miſtridates his ſon, who had preſerved the city Zaris, to the ſon of Terriuchmes, Satrape or Governour in his room; [ſ. ſ. ſ. ſ.]

When Artaxerxes went to Palagarda, where according to the custom, he was to put off his own Robe, and to put on the Robe which old Cyrus wore, before he came to the Crown; and was there inaugurated according to the ancient Regal Ceremonies by the Priests of Persia: Tillaphernes brought him the Priest, who had instructed his brother Cyrus in his childhood, according to the custom of his country, and taught him the principles of the art Magick, who was in that regard the more easily believed; when he accused Cyrus for having a plot, when Artaxerxes should be putting off his own Robes, to set upon him, and to murder him in the very Temple, [Plut. in the life of Artax.]

Atanaxes heretupon caufed his brother to be laid hold on, purpofing to put him to death; and put him in chains of gold, for the reverence he bare to the Regality of his blood: but when he was to be killed, his mother caught him about the middle; and then cafling her hair about his neck, and tying it to her own, with many teares and lamentations made, at length procured his pardon; and obtained him to be fent again to his command in Lydia, and other fea Towns in Afia, Id. ib. with Xenoph. in Expeditio, Cyri. lib. 1. Justin, lib. 4. cap. 41. and Ctesias.] Id. who commanded all south

Alciabides transferred the power of the Thracians to the Macedonians, who commanded all now by sea and lands, withdrew into that part of the Cættle of Silver and gold; yet left he a far greater quantity of Cættle behind him in the Cættle where he was. But the Thracians there, forsook him, they perceived the wealth which he had brought, deviled how to catch him, and to get his money to themselves: yet him they mifled, for he had conveyed himself secretly away to Pharnabazus in Phrygia: whom he lo caught, and enamoured with his gentle behaviour, that no man was lo inward with him, as Alciabides was: whereupon he gave him the Cættle of Grynyum in Phrygia: whereof he made fifty talents a year in tribute. Plus, and Emil, Prob, in the life of Alciabides.

The Lyfandrian Feast, and Games, were instituted in honour of Lyfander: wherein, when Antimachus and Niceratus, contended in Poetry: Lyfander gave the Garland to Niceratus: and when Antimachus took that so to heart, that he burnt his own Poeme; Plato being then but a youth, cheered him up, and told him, that ignorance hurt only the ignorant themselves, as blindness did the blind, [Plut. in the Life of Ly- sander, with Diodor. 4. year 93, Olympiade, out of Apollodorus.]

In the next Olympiade after the taking of Athens by Lylander, wherein Crocinus a Thessalian, won the prize in running, which is counted the 94, Olymp. Xenophon saith that there was an Eclipse of the Sun, [Hellen 2.] which the Astronomical account sheweth to have fallen upon the 3. of our September in the forenoone.

When Cyrus was gotten back again late into Lydia, remembering how he had been shackled by his brother, he began to chafe about, how he might hereafter keep himself out of his brothers danger, and withal, if it might be, how to make himself king in his room. Therefore he lifted as many Grecian soldiers as possibly he could; and under this and that colour, gathered a great army of several nations, that with them he might come upon his brother as unprovided as might be; [Xenoph. Exped. Cy. lib. 1. Plutarch in the Life of Artaxerxes.] He went also unto Lylander a ship, made all of gold and Ivory, of two cubits high; congratulating him thereby, for the great victory he had gotten by sea, which Lylander laid up in the treasury of Bratidas, and Acanthians, [Plutarch in his Lylander.] And when Lylander came to him at Sardes to deliver him a present from all the confederate cities, of sundry things (among which perhaps was that jewel or neck-lace, which Elian, [Vari. Hist. lib. 12. cap. 1.] saith, was lent unto him from Scopas the younger, out of Theffaly) Cyrus also, to welcome him, fenced him his Orchard, which he had laid out and planted with his own hand, and entertained him with such full discourse of husbandry, as is set forth by Xenophon in his Oeconomies in the person of Socrates.

Among the Persians, Satabarzanes accused Orontes; for keeping company with Parysatis the Kings mother: whereas otherwise he had ever lived in a fair reputation of chastity, therefore was Orontes put to death; and Parysatis grew discontent with her son, and caused Mithridatis, Teriuchnes his son, to be made away by poison, [Cretian.] Alcibiades having learnt, that Cyrus intended to make a war against his brother, and that the Lacedæmonians had a hand therein; he had purposed to hasty away to Antaxerxes, to make him the first discovery of this treason, hoping by this means, both to procure a benefit to himself, as Themistocles had done before him; and withal, by the kings help to free his country of Athens, from their Lacedæmonian bondage. In this mean while, Critias, one of those 30 Tyrants, whom Lylander had set over the Athenians to rule them, gave him notice, that unless he took order, to have Alcibiades made away, all would come to nothing, that he had done at Athens, neither yet did Lylander do any thing hereupon, until a cipher was brought him from Lacedæmon, commanding him expressly, to dispatch him; whereupon Lylander sent to Pharnabazus, to let him know, that unless he forthwith delivered up Alcibiades into his hands alive or dead, the league made between the king and Lacedæmonians could not stand, but all would break out again; and hereupon Pharnabazus sent Sulamitires his Uncle, and Magzus, (whom Emil. Probos calls Bagoas) to murder Alcibiades, whilst he was in a certain place in Phrygia called Melita, situate in the mountain of Elaiphos, and was preparing for his journey toward the king.

The people of the country whom they had hired to do the deed, durst not attempt it by two or three handstrokes: but in the dead of the night, laying a great deal of wood round about the house, wherein he lay a sleep, let it on fire; and when Alcibiades had gotten through it, and was clapping away, they shote their darts and arrows at him and kill'd him, and carried his head to Pharnabazus; the reult of his cowardly a swear-heart of his, wrapped in her own gown, (which a little before he had cast asunder, he was wrapped in) and buried in the same fire which the house was burned with; and thus making him as fair and as honourable a funeral, as the time and place, and her present ability afforded, [Ephorus lib. 17, cited by Diad. year 3.  Clearchus a Lacedæmonian, bearing himself for a Tyrant by Byzantium; and being overcome by his own people, led by Panthodæus, stole away by night, and came into Ionia; where growing into familiarity with Cyrus, whose mind was at that time wholly set upon making a war against his brother, wrought so far upon him, that he was made by him General of all his forces: for finding him a man of a haughty spirit, and a courage apt to embrace any employment; he gave him 100000 darics, with which he raised forces and marching out of Cheloniæus made war upon the Thracians, which he raised northward upon Hellepont: which because it seemed for the advantage of the Grecians, therefore did the cities of Hellepont contribute willingly to the maintenance thereof: so that these forces were maintained under hand for the use and service of Cyrus, [*Xenophon de Expedit. Then this: Jesus was brother to John the High Priest, whom Bagoces much affecting, promised to bestow the High Priesthood on him, when ever it should fall. In confidence whereof, the said Jesus bearing himself bold; first fell into contestation, and afterward into an open bridle with his brother in the very Temple; and thereupon came, and entering the Temple, profaned it; saying that the High Priest had allowed him to be polluted it with his own brothers blood: and for seven years after, vexed the Jews for that murders sake, laying a heavy fine upon them; to wit, that before the offering their daily sacrifice, they should pay (not for every year, as the common translation of Josephus, and out of them Salianus have it) but, for every Lamb, 50 drachmaes. Which punishment continued so long as that Johannes the High Priest, who committed that fact lived, and as it seemeth, ἡμετέρας ἀνα τὰς αὐτῆς ἐκείνης τοῦτο, &c., (i. e.) That the Expedition of Cyrus, which commonly goes with Xenophon's History of the Grecians, and some other Pieces concerning his own country, were all of Xenophon's own writing: For indeed, these books of the Expedition of Cyrus, were heterogeneous with the rest of his Grecian Histories. In the end whereof the plainly says, the writer thereof, was present in all that Action: and therefore the words of which, which is full every where of Xenophon's worthy acts therein, is attributed to him, not only by Plutarch, but long before him by Cicero, Dionysius, Eusebius, Hieronymus, Hermogenes, Laertius, Athenæus, and (not to speak of our Divines, Eusebius, and Jerom) by Arianus of Nicomedia: who also had the surname of New Xenophon, put upon him, as we read in Photus and Suidas: both because he compiled the discourses of his master Epictetus in 4 books, as Xenophon had done those of his master Socrates in the like number: and also, for that as Xenophon had written that Expedition of Cyrus in 7 books, to he had written the Expedition of Alexander in as many: though he in his Anabasis, or Expedition of Alexander did not altogether imitate that former Anabasis or Expedition of Cyrus, because that hath a brief Proem to every book, but none to the book in general, as Laertius hath observed: whereas this in every book, save the sixth, maketh a transition, by way of an epilogue or summary of the precedent books, which becaus Xenophon useth not in his, with some other occurrences in those books which relish not altogether of Xenophon: therefore I rather incline to think, that these books were of Themistogenes his writing; and not of Xenophon's. However, following the authority of those ancient Worthies, I have all along cited him by the name of Xenophon, as they have done before me.

Now of those five heads, mentioned by Xenophon in his said 3 book Hellenic, and said to have been written by Themistogenes, the four first are wholly comprised in the first book of this Anabasis, or Expedition of Cyrus. 1. The gathering of his army. 2. Their marching into the Upper Asia, and coming to the place where they fought. 3. The manner and issue of the fight it self: and 4. The fall of Cyrus in that battel.

For Cyrus moving from Sardes, (where Xenophon met him being sent for at Athens by Proxenus the Boeotian, and there lifted himself for the action, as we find in the 3 book) came to Celeniz in Phrygia, and there stayed 30 dayes: in which time Clearchus, and other Greek Commanders came from divers parts, and by sundry ways unto him: and there upon a general muster, were found enrolled, eleven thousand Cor-porets, and about two thousand Targeters.

From Celene Cyrus came with this army to the bank of Cayster, where he received money from Epixia : Syenefis, the King of Cilicia his wife, (with whom Cyrus was thought formerly to have been too familiar) and withered paid his army (with whom he was then 3 months behind, at Tarchus in Cilicia ; and by her persuasion, he Epixia came five days before Cyrus to Taquisin Cilicia ; and by her persuasion, he and Syenefis, coming thither also to him : gave him a vast summe of money to ward the relief and maintenance of his army : And both Ctefias and Diodorus adde, that Syenefis, like a wife man, supplied Cyrus and Artaxerxes too, with necessaries for the war. For having two sons, he sent one of them to Cyrus with a competent number of men for his service, but had sent away the other privily beforehand to Artaxerxes, to let him know, that having such an army come upon him, he durst not but keep fair with Cyrus, and openly joyne with him, nevertheless that he continued a true servant in heart to Artaxerxes, and would fall over to him so soon as he could piece out his opportunity. Cyrus layed 40 dayes at Tarfus, where the Grecian companies told him plainly, they would march no further. But Clearchus by his wisdom took them off from that mood ; and so they came to Ifsus, which was the utmost city of Cilicia, where Cyrus his Fleet met him, bringing him 700. Diodorus saith 800. Corelecters : which the Lacedemonians had sent him under the command of Chirolophus ; and there also 400. Corelecters, which had formerly served Artaxerxes under their Captain Abrocromus, came into his Camp : but Abrocromus himself, leaving Phenicia with 300. thousand men, marched away to Artaxerxes, though he came not to him till five dayes before the fight : so that by his abandoning the place, Cyrus passed the gates, or streights of Syria, and so came without stop or hindrance to the place where the fight shortly after was ; having made in all from Ephesus to that place, 93 stages or dayes journeyes ; and in them marched 535 Parafanges, which make 16050. furlongs.

The sons of men who fought at Jaffa was, called Cynaxa, as Plurarch laith; and is so plainly from Babylon: from whence, whereas it is laid in the book of the Expedition of Cyrus, that the height was 3600, furlongs from Babylon. Jacobus Capellus, thinks it should be read, from Siga. In the army of Cyrus there were reckoned of the Grecians, upon the point of 13 thousand men (though Jupian, lib. 5, cap. ult. says, there were not above 1 thousand) of which there were 10 thousand 4 hundred Corsileters, 2500. Targaretes; and of other nations 10 thousand, and near upon 3000 hooked chariots. Of Artaxerxes his part; there were 900 thousand men, and 15 hundred hooked chariots:

but Ctesias Cnidius, who was in the barrel, quoted by Plutarch, and Ephorus, cited by Diodorus, lay there were in his army but 400 thousand only. In the fight there died of Artaxerxes his side 15 thousand, as Diodorus laid off the other 3 thousand; but Ctesias in Plutarch affirms, that the number of the slain given in to Artaxerxes, was not above 9 thousand; but that in his judgement, his barrel was fought the 4 year Olympiad lost that day. But whatever the number was, his barrel was fought the 4 year Olympiad 94, when Xenocrates was Pretor or a Chancellor in Athens, one year before Socrates was there put to death; as [Diogenes Laertius reports in the life of Socrates.]

In this fight the two brothers met, and Artaxerxes was first wounded through his coat of armour; which would Ctesias faith that himself did cure. But Cyrus carried on with this good success against his brother, spared for no danger and so was slain by an unknown hand in the battle. Artaxerxes spent his rage upon the dead body of his brother, severing his head from the body of him, and cutting off the hand that had wounded him from his arm, and carried it about in a triumphant manner: which his sorrowful mother, coming her self to Babylon, with much ado got together, and carrying his reliques to Babylon, there bestowed burial on the dead body of him. The two brothers, is more amply delivered by Plutarch, out of Ctesias and Dinon.

The King coming to rife his Camp, there found and took Cyrus his Continuant, a woman so much renowned for her wit and beauty, [Xenoph. Lib. 1. Exped. Cyri.] She was a Phocæan, born in Ionia, the daughter of one Hermotimus, called at first by the name of Mitto : but afterward by Cyrus (because she seemed nothing inferior to Alpefia the Miletian, who was Pericles his Mistress, of whom I spoke before, in the year of the World 3564.) Alpefia. Artaxerxes was wonderfully desirous to get her into his hands; and when she was brought bound unto him, he grew exceedingly wrathful with those which brought her, and laid them in irons for their pains: and ever after that esteemed her above all the Harlots he kept, (which were in number 360. all choise beauties) and most devoted to her, [Plut. in the lives of Pericles and Artaxerxes, Elam. Var. Hist. Lib. 12. cap. 1. Justin. lib. 10. cap. 2.]

The Grecians, on the other side, not knowing what was bettellen to Cyrus; kept on fighting skill, and in their quarter beat Tifaphernes, and all his power; in which quick and bloody action of the Grecians there were not in all, above fix thousand, as Hecatoetes tells us. And in his Panegyric: adding, that they were none of the choicest Grecians neither: but the meekest and least valiant, and such as could no longer live at their own homes: and these now in a strange country, forsaken of their fellows, betrayed by their companies, and bereft of their Captain's valour, they followed to this war. But the King coming with the maine of his army to the rescuement of Tifaphernes, fell upon their Camp and rifled it, which yet they returning from the pursuit of Tifaphernes, recovered and beat the King out of it again; and lodged themselves therein that night, supplerless first book of Cyrus his voyage. The next day before. And here ends Xenophonts first Greece, under the command of Clearchus.

The second book lies forth, how the Grecians under the command of Clearchus their Leader, intended to return home again: and how Tithaerchus promising to convey them back with his own forces: and to be himself their guide on the way: and breaking this promise and league and oath, made unto them, procured Clearchus, with Proxenus, Agias, and Socrates, Colonels, and 20 more Captains of companies, and common soldiers, to be murdered. Ctesias also in his Persian History, (which is the author of this book of the voyage of Cyrus had undoubtedly read) had formerly told us, how cunningly Tithaerchus, by the means of one Menon a Theffalian borderer, and by his juggling, and by his swearing and forswearing had gotten Clearchus, and the Kings mother, did by her means do many good offices to Clearchus, whilst he lay there in prison: and how the King at her lute, had promised and sworn too, that Clearchus should have no harm: and yet nevertheless, how the King afterward by the means and instigation of Statyra his Queen, caused Clearchus and all the rest of the Commanders, Menon onely excepted, to be butchered: and how all the rest of the Grecies were thrown out and devoured by wild beasts and birds, onely the body of Clearchus was covered with a huge and filthy caft up over it by a mighty winde, and preserved. [Ctesias in the Collections of Photus, and Plut. in the life of Artaxerxes.]

d. In the third book, and the four following, is declared how the rest of the Grecians who kept themselves out of Tithaphernes his clutches, returned into their own countries, and how the fouldiers by the perswasion of Xenophon, having lost their old ones, chose them new Captains to command them, of whom X-nophon himself was chosen in the roome of Proxenus and by their conduct, passed thorough to the many Counties of the enemy, and endured to much cold in the Winter season, and infinite other milicies and dangers, and thorough them all came safe home.

at last: the summe whereof is to be found in [Diodorus Siculus, in the History of year 4. Olympiade 94.] to which a man may adde, what is in Ilocrates his Panegyric.

Artaxerxes, for his good service in this war, bestowed upon Tissaphernes all the Governements which his brother Cyrus held, besides what he had before, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3. Diad. year 4. Olympiade, 94.] and having heaped many other large gifts and favours upon him; gave him above all, his own daughter to wife; and used him ever after as his most confident friend and servant, [Diad. ib.]

The Carian, who wounded Cyrus in the thigh, so that thereof he died, Parysatis, the kings mother caused, after ten dayes torment, his eyes pulled out, and boiling lead powred in at his ear-holes, to be done to death. Mithridates, who gave Cyrus his first wound, and in his cups afterward, bragged that he had killed him, was put between two boats, and there lay 17 dayes, and untill he was eaten out with worms: as for Bagabaz, Artaxerxes his Eunuch, who at his command, had cut off Cyrus his head, and right hand, Parysatis wan him of the king at Dice, and having gotten him; caused him to be flead alive; and then his body to be laid athwart three crosses, and his flead skin to be hung up by it; and then Parysatis, at the humble suit of the king her son, left of mourning for Cyrus, [Ctesias, and Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes.]

Parysatis, caused the Queen Statyra, hir daughter in law, to be poisoned in this manner, Statyra had a maid servant about her, which was all in with her, called Gingis or Gigis: whom Dionysius saies to have been a voluntary instrument in her death: Ctesias, that her hand indeed was used in it, but against her will: him which gave the poison, Ctesias calls Bellitara, but Dionysius, Melanas: There is a little bird in Persia, called Rhintaces, or Rhindaces; which hath no excrements at all; but all her gurgers are fully stuit with fat: one of these birds, Parysatis, as the late at table with Statyra, took and cut in two with a knife, which was poisoned on the one side, gave the one halfe, which was toward the poisoned side, to her, and the other she took and ate her self: as Ctesias thinks: But Dionysius saith, that not Parysatis her self, but Melana her maid, carved to her with a poisoned knife; but when the Queen died in extrem torments after it, the king suspected his mother for it, as one who knew well the cruelty and implacable disposition of her nature; and caused her servants and carvers to be questioned, and had to the rack about it. But Parysatis kept Gingis a long time in her own chamber; and though the king required her, yet would he not give her up to justice, till at last, Gingis her self desiring the might steale to her own lodging by night, Artaxerxes took her, and punished her as a poisoner. As for his mother, he neither did, nor said any hurt to her: but when she asked leave to retire her self to Babylon, he gave it her; but told her withal, that while she lived, he would not come there, [Plutarch, ibid.]

Artio, with some others, surpris'd the city of Cyrene: and in the tumult, slew 500 of the principal men of the inhabitants, of the rest, the better sort elap'd by flight. These, associating to them, some 3000 of the Messenians, whom the Lacedemonians at this very time, had turned out of their country, came into the open field, against those, who had possessed themselves of their City. In the fight there was a great slaughter made of the Cyrenians on both sides, as for the Messenians, there were scarce any of them left, yet when the fight was ended, the Cyrenians came to an agreement between themselves; and taking an oath each to other, never after to remember by-past injuries, lived in good correspondence each with other, in the Government of their Commonwealth, [Diad. year 4. Olymp. 94.]

Tissaphernes (for whom Pharnabazus is by error crept into Diodorus) being sent by Artaxerxes, to take charge of all the governments in the lesser Asia, would have drawne into his hands all the cities of Ionia also, [Xenoph. Hellen. l. 3. Diad. year 1. Olymp. 95.]

Now when, upon his coming, all the petty Governors and Cities, who had any ways adhered to Cyrus, grew afraid what would become of them, they all, by their particular messengers, sued to Tissaphernes for his favour; but he that was the chiefest of all, Tamos the Egyptian, of whom I spake a little before, Governor of Ionia, putting himself, with all his treasures, and sons, all save Gaus, (who became afterward the Kings General) a ship-board, went with his fleet into Egypt, to Plammyticus the king there, bearing himself bold, upon the many good offices, which he had formerly done unto him; But Plammyticus, casting off all respects of gratitude, for courtesies received, and pity towards a poore suppliant at that time, butchered him and all his children, onely to possesse himself of the ships and treasure, which he had brought; [Diodorus, ibid.]

The Grecians (of whom I spake before) departing from Trapezus, which was the first city of Grecians, which they came unto, and is situated upon the coast of the Euxine sea, in the country of Colchos, after three dayes march, came to another Greek city, and in the same country of Colchos, and a sea town, as the other was, called Cerauntia, and there they stayed ten dayes, and multered their men, whom they found to be 8600, which were remaining of the 10000, which they carried out; the rest were lost either by the enemy in the battle, or by the snow, or other sicknesse in their return: from thence they went thorough the countries of the Molyneæcor, the Chalyber, and Tybartenians, and came to a Greek town called Catoira, a colony of the Synopiens, eight, or rather, as the order of the history implyeth, five months after the fight in the country of Babylon, having made from thence to this place, 120 stages, or dayes journey, and marched 620 parasanges, 18600 furlongs; and here they staid 45 dayes, [Exped. Cy. lib. 5.]

During their abode here, they made their provision, partly out of the market of Colyora, and partly by such booties, as they got out of the countries adjoining of Paphlagonia; and on the other hand, the Paphlagonians, if they found any of them stragling from the camp, did as much by them; untill at length Corylas, who was governor of the Paphlagonians, let all things straight between them. Afterward these Grecians getting shipping from thole of Heraclea, and Synope, came to Harmone a port town of Synope, where they staid five dayes; and from thence to Heraclea, a plantation of the city of Megara, made in the country of the Myriandens, and came to a Peninsula, or neck of land there, called Acherusia: here they divided themselves into three companies. The Arcadians, and Achæans, which made above 4500 men, all corseletters and foot, having gotten shipping of the Heracleans, put themselves speedily aboard; that coming a waies upon the Thracians which inhabited Bithynia, they might get the greater spoile of them, and landing at the port of Calpe, (which is in the midst of their sea coast) by night, went to the next towns and villages, six mile up into the country. But these Thracians thus provoked, flew upon them, and slew many of them; for one regiment of them, with their Colonel Simicrates, was quite cut off, and of another company of theirs, there were but eight persons, with their captain Hegelandrus that elap'd; the rest were fain to fly to a hill for safeguard; where they were presently close besieged, Chirofophus with 1400 corseletters, and 700 targateers, (which were themselves Thracians, and had followed Clearchus in that voyage), went from Heraclea all along the country on foot, and when at length he came into Bithynia, growing there somewhat sickly, he got shipping, and came with his men late to Calpe. And Xenophon with his brigada, consisting of 17 hundred corseletters, and 800 targateers, and some 40 horse more or lesse, came by sea into a country which parts thole Thracians of Bithynia from the country of the Heracleans; and from thence marching thorough the body of the country, came and besieged those, who were besieged in the hill, by the Thracians; and so at last came all together into a body in the port of Calpe, [ib. lib. 6.]

There died Chirofophus, and in his place, was chosen to succeed, N. of an Asian born; who when he saw his company miserably opprest with hunger and other wants, gathering together, to the number of two thousand men, went a foraging all over the country of Bithynia: these first Pharnabazus set upon with his horse, which he lent to help the Bithynians; and withal, that with their further assistance, he might keep these Grecians from falling upon his government of Phrygia. These horse at first onler, slew of the Grecians no lesse then 500, the rest flying to a hill for safety, were by the coming of Xenophon rescued from the enemy, and so all returned safe to the camp before sun-set. But when Sythiarchus and Rathines, came with more companies to succour the Bithynians, the Grecians obtained there a notable victory of them, and in memory thereof, erected a Trophy upon the place, and then returned to their camp by the sea-side, being distant some 7 or 8 miles from thence. After which victory lo gotten, their enemies provided for their own indemnity, by driving their cattle, and carrying away their families and goods, from thence into remoter parts. But when the Grecians, having passed quite thorough Bithynia, found nothing to relieve themselves withal in the parts where they were, they returned back a day and a nights journey, into Bithynia again, and there found and brought from thence: fore of prisoners, and sheep and other provisions for their own support: and six dayes after came to Chryfopolis, a city of the Chaldeonians, where they stayed seven dayes; and there sold the booty which they had gotten, [ibid.]

Pharnabazus fearing lest these Greeks would make war upon his country, wrought so with Anaxibius, the Lacedemonian Ammiral, that he transported them all out of Asia to Byzantium: And then Anaxibius returning from thence with Xenophon into Asia, had word sent him to Cyzicum from Aristarchus the new Governour of Byzantium, that Polus was appointed Ammiral in his place, and that he was onward of his his way, as far as Hellepont: and therefore failing from thence to Paros, he sent to Pharnabazus, and demanded the money which he had promised him for transporting the Greeks out of Asia: which not obtaining, he dealt with Xenophon in all haste, to carry them back again into Asia. But Pharnabazus prevailed so far with Aristarchus the Governour of Byzantium, that he brake the neck of that design: whereupon Xenophon was fain to put himself in pay under Sentes the King of Thracia: the winter not being yet over, and the cold so violent, that many of the Greeks lost, some their noses, some their ears thereby; [ib. lib. 7.] and Diadma tells us, that part of these Grecians returned into their own country: but that the greatest part of them followed Xenophon into Thracia, to the number almost of 5000. [year 1. Olympiade 95.] where by it appears, that the number is mistaken in him, where he says, that there came to Chrysolis only 3800. men, [year 4. Olympiade 94.]

The Ionian and other Greek cities throughout Asia, partly out of a desire of their own liberty, partly for fear of Tissaphernes, because they had ever preferred Cyrus before him, refused to admit of him; and dispatched away their messengers to the Lacedemonians, praying them, that since they were the Princes and Protectors of all Greece, they would not neglect nor abandon them, being Greeks, though dwelling in Asia: but would take order, that their country might be kept free from devastation and spoil, and themselves enjoy their liberty as others, [Xen. Hellen. li. 3. Diadma. Sic. year 1. Olympiade 95.]

This petition was very welcome to the Lacedemonians, who, according to the manner of men, the more they had, the more they would have; and not content to have doubled their estate by the accession of the Athenian power, affected now nothing less than the sovereignty and dominion of all Asia, [Justin. lib. 6. cap. 1.]

The Lacedemonians therefore, promised them aid at first word: and forthwith sent to Tissaphernes, to pray him not to make war upon the Grecian Cities that were in Asia. But he beginning with the city of Cuma, wasted all the Region belonging thereto, and carried many prisoners from thence, and then came with his army, and fate down before the city it self: but because the Winter coming on, he could not take it for the present, he set a great ransom upon the prisoners, and so for that time brake up his Siege, [Diadma. ib.]

Hereupon was Thimbron sent into Asia with an army; wherein were 1000, new made citizens of Laconia; 4000, of Peloponnesus, and 300, Athenian horse, who had formerly served the 30 tyrants of Athens: such as the City had rather should be wasted away, and spent in foreign services, than be kept at home to do greater mischief. And to these Thimbron, when he came into Asia, added many more taken out of the cities of the country, [Xenoph.] for at Ephesus, what out of the confederate cities, what out of other places, he lifted 2000. and having now an army of 7000, men, he marched some 15 miles further into the country, and at his first assault took Magnesia a city of Tissaphernes his Government. And from thence went to Tralles a city of Ionia, and began to besiege it; but because the situation of it was very strong, he left it, and came back to Magnesia; which was no walled Town: and therefore leaving least to soon as he was gone, Tissaphernes would take it again, he removed it to a hill thereby called Thorax. And then left to wasting of the enemies country, and thereby exceedingly enriched his army. But hearing that Tissaphernes was coming down upon him with an army of Horse, he retired to Ephesus, [Diadma.] For not being able to encounter his horse, he durst not keep the plain; thinking it enough if he were able to keep the countries, where himself was, from being harrowed and wasted by the enemy.

When as now the Grecians under Xenophon had served Sentes three months in Thracia, there came unto them Charnimus and Polyneus sent from Thimbron, to tell them, that he had great need of their help in Asia against Tissaphernes: and that he would give them a Darius every man by the month for his pay: to every Captain of a company, two Darics, and to every Colonel four. But when Xenophon told them, that for his part, he was purposed to be going home into his own country; the chief of all the army came unto him, and humbly and earnestly besought him not to leave them until he had carried them from thence, and delivered them to Lampacus; where he met and conferred with Euclide, the Philasian Poet. Then passing through the territory of Troas, they came to Pergamus; where Xenophon was entertained by Hellas the wife of Gongylus of Eretia, and her two sons, Gorgius and Gongylus: by whose advice and counsel, when he had gone about to entrap and take Asiatides the Persian, but had failed thereof, and not without great danger to himself and all his company: at length by chance his souldiers lighted on him, took him with his wife and children, and horses, and all that ever they had; which was exceeding much: and presently after came Thimbron to them, and received the army from Xenophon's hand; and and mingling them with the rest of the Grecians in his army, he presently led them against Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, [Exped. Cy. l. 7.]

And here was present in this whole Action, and concludeth his book, with this Epilogue. The Kings Commanders in the countreys which we passed through, were these, Arimas of Lydia, Aricamas of Phrygia, Mithridates of Lycania and Cappadocia, Siennesis of Cilicia, Dernes of Phenicia and Arabia, Belesis of Syria and Assyria, Rhodius, Chalybes, the Macrones, the Colchis, the Molynnesis, the Cossians, and the Tybereni had no Governor, but were all free people: Corias was President of Paphlagonia, Pharnabazus of Bithynia, Sentes was King of the Thracians, in Europe side. The whole voyage, going and coming, was 215 stages, 1150 parafangles, and 34255 furlongs, or rather 34500. allowing thirty furlongs to every parafangle, the whole time of their going and coming, εναβανους εναβανους, was one whole year and three months.

Thimbron growing strong with this new access of forces received from Xenophon, durst now pitch down his camp, in the fields, before Tissaphernes his face: and took Pergamus into his hand, upon a voluntary surrender made unto him: so did he Tenthrania and Halicarnassus, which were commanded at that time by Eurytheneus and Procles, the descendants of Demaratus of Lacedemon, Gorgias also and Gongylus, the two brothers before mentioned, had already joyned with him; whereof the one held Gambrius and Palegambrius, the other Myrina, and Grinnum: and Thymbron himself took in other weaker places by plain force, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3.]

Thymbron, when Larissa, a town in Asia called Egyptia, would not open her gates besieged it; but whiles he lay before it to little purpose, there came letters to him from the Ephoriat Sparta, that leaving Larissa, he should march away into Caria: and he was now onward of his way thither as far as Ephesus, when Dercylidas, an excellent Engineer, and for his wit surnamed another Silphus came to succeed him in the charge of the Army. And Thymbron returning to Sparta, was there accused by sundry confederate Cities, for suffering his army to plunder them, and was therefore banished the City, [Id. ib. Diadma. 2 year of the 95 Olympiade.]

Mania a woman of Dardania, but of a manly spirit, and one who after the death of her husband Zenis, had very happily managed the government of Eolia, upon her Pharnabazus, and had taken in sundry sea townes, as Larissa, Hamaxitus and Colonae, was most treacherously murdered by her son in law Midias, when he her self was upward of forty years of age, and her son of the age of seventeen, was murdered with her, and that done, he seized upon the two strong townes, Scepsis and Gergitha, wherein he had principally laid up her treasure, the rest of the townes, the garrisons that were in them held good for Pharnabazus: whereupon Midias sent unto Pharnabazus, his messengers, with great presents, desiring that he might hold the whole government of those parts, upon the same termes, that Mania did: but all in vaine; for Pharnabazus returned him answer, that he should never enjoy himself more, if he left that further of his, committed upon Mania, unrevenged, [Xenoph. ib. with Polystr. l. 8. in Ionia, or Phania, for so by misprinting, is Mania there called.]

Dercylidas, when he saw, that he had to do, with Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes both, two great commanders, and both borne up with mighty armies; but saw withal, that they were at variance between themselves, clofed with Tissaphernes, and made peace with him, [Id. ib. with Justin lib. 6. cap. 1.] where yet Hecylidas is put for Dercylidas.

Dercylidas, having first conferred with Tissaphernes, marched fairly, and without any spoile of the country, into Eolia, which was under Pharnabazus his Government, unto whom he bare also a particular grudge, for an affront received from him, whiles he commanded at Abydos, under Lyander: and in a trice possessed himself of Larissa, Hamaxitus and Colonae, which submitted to him of their own accord (where by the way it is to be noted, that Diadma Siculus, instead of Larissa, hath Arisida, and proceeding on, he took in Neandrus, and Ilium, in the same manner; nor did the Cocylia stand out at all against him: Cebrene also, a very strong and fortified City, for fear of an assault, which they saw ready to be made, yielded to him: whereupon, leaving a good garrison there, he marched forthwith, with the rest of his army to Scepsis and Gergithe; where when Midias, who feared no less the very inhabitants of the place, than he did Pharnabazus, coming forth upon hostages taken, to a parley, and beginning to treat of an association of armes against a common enemy, Dercylidas laid hold on him, and told him plainly, that there was no hope of any friendship between them two, unless he would presently set all the citizens of those places which he held, at liberty, to live each of them according to their own laws. And thereupon marching into Scepsis with him, and there having done sacrifice to Minerva, and turning out Midias his souldiers, he persuaded the inhabitants of the place, to maintain their liberty: now they had a rigging, others upon the stocks, and a Navy of 300, sail providing, put himself aboard the first ship that he found bound for Greece; and coming to Sparta, informed them, what a Fleet was there in providing: but whether bound, or for what purpose he said, he could not tell. The Lacedæmonians were much troubled herat: And Ageilaus, one of their two Kings, being put on by Lytander, offered himself to go in person with an army into Asia against the Persians: and to take with him 30 men of Sparta, whom they should chuse by their advice, to manage that war. The first of whom was Lytander, who hoped by this occasion to restore again the Decemvirates throughout all the cities in Asia, which himself had heretofore set up: and which the Ephori afterward had abolished, commanding every city, to live according to their own laws. So Ageilaus taking with him 2 thousand of the new made Citizens of Sparta, and 6 thousand out of their confederate cities, with as much provision as would serve for six months, loosed from Geræum a Port in Eubœa, with all the Forces that he could there make, and came to Ephesus; and that so speedily, as he landed there before ever Tisaphernes and Pharnabazus heard of his setting forth: whereby it came to passe, that he found them there, all as unprovided, as himself could wish, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3.] and in his Oration, of Ageilaus, with Plutarch and Emil. Prob. in their several lives of Ageilaus, and Pauſa, in Lacomis: who yet sayes, that he landed first at Sardes.

And now having raised 4 thousand soldiers more at Ephesus, he drew into the field with 10 thousand foot, and 4 hundred, or (as the Latine translation hath it) 4 thousand horse: unto which were joynd a rabble of others, which followed the Camp for pillage, being no fewer in number, than the army it selfe, [Diod. year 4. of the 95. Olympiade.]

Tisaphernes hereupon, sent to him to know what was the cause of his coming into Asia: and his answer was, that he came to restore the Grecian cities there to their liberty and freedom. Tisaphernes hereupon desired him to forbear for 3 months, that he might send to the King, bearing him in hand, that he nothing doubted but all should be to his content. Ageilaus hereupon, sent Heripidas, Dercylidas, and Miglialus to him, to take an oath of him, that he meant no guile, but would do what possible he could to procure the peace which he had promised: & they on Ageilaus his behalf took an oath, that Tisaphernes performing on his part, they would inviolably keep the truce on their. But Tisaphernes, not regarding his oath taken, sent to the King to encircle his army. And Ageilaus, though he knew well what he intended, yet kept the truce made on his part, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3. and in his book of Ageilaus; with Plutarch and Emil. Prob. in Agefil.]

Whiles Ageilaus lay still at Ephesus, all things grew to a confusion in the cities; because neither the Democratical government was observed with the Athenians, nor the Decemviral, which Lytander had set up, was observed among them; all became furious to Lytander, a man well known among them, that he would obtain of Ageilaus for them what they desired. Hereupon it was, that Lytander now seemed to be King, and Ageilaus a private man. This was a web in Ageilaus his eye, and therefore he began first to take the administration of matters out of his hand, and to lessen his authority: then sent he him on an errand into Helleſpont, where when Lytander found that Spithridates, a Persian, (Plutarch calls him Mithridates) was over-born by Pharnabazus, he desired to speak with him, and upon conference perswaded him, with his children and such wealth as he had, and 200, horse, to fall off from Pharnabazus; and he presently leaving, what he had late at Cyzicum, with his son, came unto him, and he carried them with him to Ageilaus; who was glad to see him, and by him informed himself to the full, how things stood with Pharnabazus, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and Plut. in the life of Ageilaus and Lytander.]

Tisaphernes having gotten fresh supplies from the King, grew high, and proclaimed open war against Ageilaus; unless he would presently leave Asia. Ageilaus was glad hereof, and bad his men provide themselves presently for the war: and withal sent to the Ionians, Eolians, and them of Helleſpont, to send him to Ephesus all the strength they could make: and Tisaphernes supposing that he would march into Caria, went himself with his army into Phrygia; and falling suddenly upon the cities there, got a vast sum of money and other provisions out of them, and so came safe and without any stop, near to Dalcylum: where his horse, scouring the country before the army, were met with by the horse of Pharnabazus, and routed; and in that encounter lost 12 men, and 2 horses. But when Ageilaus with his foot came to their rescue, the Persians on the other side retired, having lost one of their men, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his Ageilaus; with Plutarch and Emil. Prob. in their Ageilaus & Lytander.]

Ageilaus having spent the greatest part of that Summer in plundering of Phrygia and the countries adjoining, and enriched his army; toward the Autumn returned to Ephesus,

Ephesus, [Diodor. year 1 of the 96 Olympiade:] and there spent that Winter, [Emil. Prob. in his Ageilaus.]

Nepherus, 41. Nepherites reigned in Egypt 6 years. The Lacedæmonians sent to him, to joyne with them in armes against the Persian; but he instead of that, sent them tackle and furniture for 100 ships of war, and 30 thousand bulshells of wheat, for a present, [Diodor. year 1 of the 96 Olympiade.] Justin calls him Hecimion, and so doth Oroſius; treating all along in his steps; and relates the matter in this manner. The Lacedæmonians, faith he, crave help by sea of Hecimion, by their Ambassadors: and received from him 100 ships of war fully furnished, and 600 thousand bulshells of wheat, [Justin lib. 6. cap. 2. and Oroſius lib. 3. cap. 11.]

Pharax, Ammiral of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, setting sail from Rhodes with 120 ships, came to Salanda a Cattle of Caria, distant from Caunus 150 furlongs; and weighing again from thence, set upon the Town of Caunus, and upon Conon the Athenian, who there lay with his 40 ships. But when Antiphanes and Pharnabazus, came with a huge army to the relief of Caunus: Pharax raised his siege, and returned with all his Fleet to Rhodes. After this, Conon got together to the number of 80 ships, and with them sailed toward Cherſoneſus. And at the same time the Rhodians keeping out the Peloponnesian Fleet, revolted from the Lacedæmonian State: and received Conon with all his Fleet, into their Port and City. And it fell out, that the Egyptian Fleet, knowing naught of the alteration there made, came boldly to an anchor under the Island with all their loading of wheat, sent to the Lacedæmonians: where Conon with the Rhodians setting upon them, took and brought them all, with their men and loading, into the Port, and stored the place with corn, [Diodor. year 1 Olympiade 96.] but the soldiery mutined against Conon, because the Kings Officers defrauded them of their pay: who therefore asked their pay the more boldly, because they were employed in so great a service, under so great a Commander as Conon was, [Justin lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Ageilaus, knowing well that there was no dealing with the enemy in a Champion Country without sufficient horse, let himself to raise Troups on all hands; and therefore gave order throughout all the confederate cities, that such of them as were rich and had no mind to serve themselves, should send him in every man a horse, with a rider on him in his stead. And the Spring coming on, commanded all his army to come together at Ephesus: and there trained all sorts, both of horse and foot, with great care and diligence to make them fit and ready for the war. And during such preparation, made the City of Ephesus seem more illustrious than ordinary, as being the very shop, and as it were, the work-house of so great a war, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his Ageilaus: and Plutarch and Emil. Prob. in the same mans life.]

And now a whole year was spent since Ageilaus came from Sparta, and the 30 Commissioners allotted for his Council returned to Sparta; of which Lytander, as I said before, was the prime man, and 30 others were sent in their rooms, of which Heripidas was chief. Of these Ageilaus chose Xenodorus, and one more, to command the Horse, and Scythians to command the Foot of the new made Citizens of Sparta, which were all Cordeliers: and Heripidas to lead them who had served under Cyrus; and Migdon, them which were sent in by the Cities of Asia. And gave it out that he would march out right into the strongest part of the enemies country, to the end they should all arme and prepare their minds for a hot encounter. And Tisaphernes conceiving that he had given this out of purpose to amuse him a second time, and to keep him at home, marched directly into Caria, commanding his Horse to stay behind, and keep in the plain of Mæander: But Ageilaus did indeed, what he had said, and fell on with his whole army into the country of Sardes. And when he had marched 3 days and saw no enemy appear, he gathered there a huge stock of all kind of provisions for his army. On the 4 day the enemies Horse came in fight, and finding the Grecians scattered abroad, and busie about the plunder of the country, fell upon them, and slew a great part of them. To whose rescue when Ageilaus came, and confidered with himself, that the enemies Foot was not yet come up, and that himself was ready at all points, he set upon the enemy near the River Pactolus, and there got a great victory of them: and possessing himself of their Camp, and having all now, both friends and enemies goods in his hands, he found there among other riches, amounting to above 70 talents of money, and all his camels, which he afterward carried with him into Greece. But Tisaphernes lay all this while at Sardes: and was therefore blamed and accused by the Persians, as a defertor, and a plain betrayer of them.

So Xenophon: But Diodorus, sayes, that Tisaphernes was present in the fight with 100 thousand Horse, and 50 thousand Foot: and that Ageilaus, coming down from the hill country of Sipalus, and over-running all the plain about Sardes it self, wasted all, and destroyed among other things a goodly Park or Garden of Tisaphernes his own, enclosed and set with all sorts of trees and other things for pleasure, infinitely lump-sumptuous, and of most exquisite workmanship and beauty. And that turning from thence, he sent Xenochus with 14 thousand men, to lye in ambush midway, between Sardes and Tyburne, to intercept certain Persians, which were to passe that way: and that fighting a second time with the Persians, he overcame them again, and flew upward of six thousand of them; and that after all this done, Tisaphernes fled to Sardes, and Ageilaus returned to the sea side with his army. Paulanias also in his Laconica, writeth, that Ageilaus fought with Tisaphernes in the champion country of Hermus; and there overthrew not only the horse, but also the foot army of the Persians, which was the greatest number that ever they had in one body, next that of Xerxes, with which he passed into Greece, and that other of Darius, which he carried into Scythia. But tis best relying upon Xenophons credit in this point: who was not only Reader to Ageilaus, (as Cicero 3 de Oratore affirmeth,) at leastwise, was very intimate and familiar with him, (as Emil. Pro. says in the Life of Ageilaus, and D. genes Laertius, in the Life of Xenophon reporteth) but was also with him in all this service in Asia; and the next year returned with him into Greece.

Conon, Ammiral of the Persian fleet, having often solicited the king, by his letters for pay for the Navy, and doing no good that way, at the length made a journey to him himself; Pharnabazus also putting him forward to accuse Tisaphernes of treason to the King; wherefore committing the charge of the Navy to Hieronimus and Nicocemus (both of Athens) in his absence; he sailed into Cilicia, and from thence came to Thiapacum in Syria, he put himself into a barge, and lo came down the river Euphrates unto Babylon: There addressing himself as the manner was to Tithraustes the Chiliarch or chief Coronel, who holds as I said before, the first place next the King, he shewed him what he was, and that he desired to speak with the King. But when he could not be admitted to the presence or speech with the King without adoration, (i.e.) prostration first vnto him, he was fain to do his business with him, by entreaty of letters and messengers: whereby yet he so far prevailed, that the king declared Tisaphernes to be a Traitor to him; and bad Conon to take charge of the war against the Lacedemonians, and to make palmarist of the Navy, whom ever he pleased to nominate to that office. And lo being highly rewarded for his service, was dispatched away to the sea-side, with power to command what shipping he thought fit of the Cyprits and Phenicians, for the guard of the sea against the next summer; and Pharnabazus was assigned to him, for an Assistant or Coadjutor, as himself desired, [Diod. year 1. of the 96 Olympiade, Justin lib. 6. cap. 2. Emil. Pro. in the Life of Conon.]

As concerning the Cyprits, it is to be observed; that in the very time, whiles there passed courtships and pretences interchangeably between Artaxerxes and them, the King intended war against them, ten whole years before it came to an end, eight whereof he spent in meer preparations making for it; as we shall shew hereafter, when we come to the fourth year of the 98 Olympiade, out of Diod. Sic. speaking of the issue of that war of 8 years, it seems that six were spent at what time Locates made that his Panegirical oration, whereby speaking of those many vain attempts made upon Euagoras in Artaxerxes, he useth these words; He made faith he war upon Euagoras, who was Lord but of one poor city in Cyprus, and one who had formerly rendered himself unto him, and became his vassal, and lived in an Island, and had suffered a great losse at sea; and had not above three thousand strong men to maintain his state withall; and yet, thus weak as he is, the king hath not been able to have his will of him, though he hath now spent six whole years in a war against him.

Parysatis the Queen-mother, egging the King on against Tisaphernes, for the hatred which she bare him for her son Cyrus his sake, he committed the charge of that war to Tithraustes, giving him letters to the cities and Commanders in those parts, whereby he commanded them all to do what ever Tithraustes commanded, [Diod. year 1. of the 98 Olympiade.]

He gave him also at his departure two several letters to Tisaphernes himself, willing him to go on with the war against the Lacedemonians; and one in speciall to Arius the Commander of Larissa, requiring him to be assisting to Tithraustes, in the making away of Tisaphernes. Those Tithraustes delivered to him lo soon as he came to Colossæ in Phrygia: and Arius having read them, sent presently to Tisaphernes, praying him to come to Colossæ, there to consult about the Kings affairs, especially concerning the war against the Grecians: whereupon he fearing no hurt, left his army at Sardes, and came with all speed to Colossæ, with a troop of 300 Arcadians, and Milesians in his company, and took up his lodging in Arius his house; and there going into a Bath, layed aside his sword: there Arius with his servants seized on him, and clapping him fast into a close Coach, sent him away prisoner to Tithraustes; who carrying him as far as to Celæna, there cut off his head, and sent it to Artaxerxes: and Artaxerxes carry carry it to his mother: who was exceeding glad at the sight thereof; and no lesse were all the Grecian women, whose husbands had followed Cyrus in his war, and were afterward by his treachery cut off, when they heard thereof; [Diod. 16. Polyæus (Strabo, lib. 7. Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his book of Ageilaus, and Plut. in the lives of Arius, and Ageilaus.)]

Tithraustes sent messengers to Ageilaus, to let him know that the Author of this late war, Tisaphernes, had suffered his due punishment for it; and that the King now thought it great reason, that he should withdraw himself with his army, out of Asia: and to leave the cities there, to the use of their own laws, paying the King their former tribute: And when Ageilaus answered him that he could not do so, without the content and order of his country, which had employed him; at length they came to this agreement, that he with his army should withdraw into Pharnabazus his Government, receiving for the entertainment of them, 30 talents, until he could receive an answer from Sparta, what he was to do: (so saith Xenophon lib. 3. Hellen.) Diodorus only writes, that Tithraustes, having drawn Ageilaus to a party, made a truce with him only for 6 months: and Xenophon in his book, written of the praises of Ageilaus, addeth further, that when Tithraustes offered him a great summe of money, if he would withdraw out of the kings territories, Ageilaus answered him in this wise, Tithraustes, said he, we hold it with us, more honour for a General, to enrich his army, rather than himself, and to take spoils from his enemies, rather than rewards.

Whiles Ageilaus was upon his march towards Phrygia, which was of Pharnabazus his command; he received a Scytala, or a letter, from the Magistrates of Sparta, that he should take charge of the Navy, as well as of the land army, and to make Ammiral thereof, whom he thought fit, whereupon, he in a short time, what by the publique contribution of the cities, what by the beneficence of private men, who were desirous to gratifie him in his own person, made up a Navy of 120 saile: and gave the command of them to Pilander, his wives brother, a man delicate indeed of praise and honour, and of courage enough, but not much skilled that way, [Xen. 1. Hellen. Plut. in his Ageilaus, Panjan. in his Laconica.]

Pilander being dispatched away to the Navy, and himself holding on his way into Phrygia. Tithraustes perceiving that Ageilaus had no meaning to leave Asia, but rather conceived great hopes of vanquishing the King there right, sent Timocrates of Rhodes (for so Plutarch also calls him in his Laconica) Apophthegmes, however the name of Hermaerates be crept in, in his life of Artaxerxes into Greece; with gold, amounting to the quantity of 50 talents of silver: whereby it came to passe, that the chief Cities, being bribed, conspired together, and raised a common war on the behalf of the Athenians, against the Lacedemonian party, [Xenoph. lib. 4. Plut. in his Arius, Panjanias in his Laconica and Messenica.]

Ageilaus therefore entering into Phrygia, which was of Pharnabazus his Government, about the beginning of Autumne, burnt and spoiled all that country; taking in all the cities thereof, either by force or volu: tary surrender, and then by the perswasion of Spithridates, marched into Paphlagonia, to move them to a revolt from the Persian: And Cotys the King thereof, who was formerly set for by Artaxerxes, but would not go, now confederated with Ageilaus, and he by Spithridates his perswasion, left there a thousand horse, and two thousand foot to assist him; and he, to recompence Spithridates in some sort, for his service, before he went thence, procured Cotys to take his daughter to wife, [Xenoph. lib. 4. Hellen. and in his Ageilaus: and Plutarch likewise in his.] For Ageilaus was ever very desirous to requite his friends, as appears by that Epistle Laconically written and attributed to him: Nicias ei parvum a hunc dedit; si di adhiberent, non dedit, parvum si a quo, (i.e.) If Nicias hath not done you wrong, forgive him: if he hath, forgive him for my sake; however forgive him. [Plutarch in his Ageilaus, and in his Laconica Apophthegmes.]

Leaving Paphlagonia, he marched to Dalcylum: where Pharnabazus his Palace was; and round about him many townes large and full of all provisions, and there wintered; and partly from thence, partly from other parts adjoining, maintained his army, [Xen. ib.]

Where, when his soldiers went a foraging, and sometimes not so warily as they should have done, concerning their enemy, because hitherto they had never been distressed by them, Pharnabazus by chance fell upon them with two hooked chariots, and some four hundred men, as they were out of order, following their pillage. But the Grecians clyping him, rallied themselves in a body, to the number of 700. Pharnabazus presently putting his hooked chariots in the front, followed them with his horse, and bad them drive in upon the middle of them; and when the chariots had broken in upon, and disordered them, his horse fell on, and slew to the number of one hundred of them: the rest fled back to Ageilaus, who was not far off, with his Coricetes, [Id. ib.]

Three or four dayes after, Spithridates found that Pharnabazus lay with his arm in a spacious bourgade called Caij; about 160 furlongs from thence, and adverted Heripidas, chief of the Council of war, thereof. He presently prayed Agefilas to give him two thousand Corselets, and as many Targateers; and so many hories as would voluntarily go with him, though there were not with him indeed a moiety of any kind. But he, setting out, with those which he had, so soon as it grew dark, came upon Pharnabazus: in the very dawning of the day, and slew the Myrians, who happened that time: to be upon the guard: then the whole army took a fright, and fled, and he entered their camp, and there got a rich booty, together with Pharnabazus his own pavilion, and all his rich furniture and wealth therein; for he for fear of the Grecians, like the Scythian Nomades, removed his camp hither and thither, never staying long in any one place: his chief care being, that the enemy might not know where to find him. And here Heripidas, making too too rigorous an enquiry and search after the spoile which was taken, set commanders with their fouls on work, and strip Spithridates and his Paphlagonians of all that ever they had gotten in the pillage of the camp: upon which abuse, they all the next night, took what was left, and got them away to Sardes, unto Aræus, who had himself formerly revolted from the King, and served against him; nor was there anything in all this journey into Asia, that more troubled Agefilas than this departure of Spithridates, and Megabates his son, whom Agefilas exceedingly loved, and of these Paphlagonian forces, [Diod. l. 4. ibid. and Plutarch in his Agefilas.]

Afterward Agefilas and Pharnabazus, coming to a party, by the means of one Apollonophanes of Cyzicum, who was a common friend to both, they fell to treat of an agreement. Pharnabazus (as Xenophon hath it in his oration concerning Agefilas) openly professed, that unless the king would make him absolute and sole Commander of the army, he would revolt from him: but if he might command all, then he would maintain the war against Agefilas, as long as he could: and Agefilas told him, that he would depart out of his territory, with all the speed that might be, and so long as he could find a work elsewhere, would not trouble him: and so soon as Pharnabazus was gone, his son begotten upon Pharypta came running to Agefilas, and entered into a league of friendship with him, and in assurance thereof, they gave gifts each to other, as pledges of love between them, [Id. ib.]

And now the spring came on, and Agefilas came into the plaines of Thebes, and pitched near the Temple of Diana Althyia, and there gathered exceeding store of wealth on all hands; and provided himself to march into the upper countries; nothing doubting but that all the regions which he left behind him, would fall of from the Persian, [Xenophon, lib. 4. Hellen.] and now the fame of him grew marvelous great in Persia; having spent two full years in that war, [Plutarch, in his Agefilas.]

The Lacedemonians having now gotten certain knowledge, that the Persian monies flew about in Greece, and that the principal cities there, conederated for a common war against them, dispatch away Epicidas to Agefilas to call him home to the defence of his own country. Hereupon Agefilas, though much troubled that he was thus taken off from to great a design, as he had then in hand, yet thought fit to obey their commands, [Id.] and wrote back to the Ephori this Epistle, which Plutarch inserted among his Apophthegms, Agefilas to the Ephori, greeting: we have subdued a great part of Asia, and routed the Barbarians, and provided great store of armes in Ionia. But because you have set me a certain day, within which to return unto you, I will obey your commands, and peradventure be back before that day: for I am King not for my self, but for you, and our confederates: for a King is then a King, when he is commanded by the laws, and Ephori, and the other magistrates of the city.

It is said also that he told his friends merrily, that the king had driven him out of Asia thirty thousand Archers; meaning, that Timocrates his Agent, had bestowed to many thousand golden Darics, which were stamped with Archers upon them, among the leaders of the people in every city, to raise a common war against the Spartans, [Plutarch in his Lacomical Apophthegms, and in his Araxes, &c.]

Agefilas returning, left Enxemus behind him to command in chief; and with him 4000 soldiers: to assist the Ionians if need should be. And to the end he might carry back with him a sure and sufficient army; he made promise of great rewards and honours to those cities and commanders, who should send him in the best horse and foot, and best furnished; and thereby put them into an emulation each with other, who should do best in that kind, [Xenophon, Hellen. 4.]

Xenophon,

Xenophon, when he was to return with Agefilas into Boeotia to make war against the Thebans, left half the gold which he had gotten in his voyage with Cynus at Ephesus, in the hands of one Megabyzus, treasurer of the Temple of Diana there; for he foresaw that going now with Agefilas he should undoubtedly hazard himself in a battle: which accordingly fell out afterward at Coronæa. Wherefore he left order with him, that in case he escaped alive out of that battle, then he should restore him the money deposited in that Temple; but if he miscarried, then he charged him to consecrate it all to the goddess Diana; and of the other half, he sent offerings to Apollo at Delphos, [Expedition, Cy. lib. 5. and Diog. Laertius in his Xenophontes.] But Agefilas himself consecrated a tenth of all that he had gotten in his two years wars in Asia, to Apollo at Delphos; which came to upward of 100 talents, [Xenophon, and Plutarch, in their several lives of Agefilas.]

Agefilas having passed the sea at Hellepont, received news of the victory which the Lacedemonians had gotten near Corinth; and thereupon sent back Dercylidas into Asia to inform the Ionians of it; thereby to hearten them the more, in continuing firm to the Lacedemonian party, [Xenophon, Hellen. 4. and Plut. in his Agefilas.]

About this time it was that that famous sea-fight was made at Cnidus, (and under the hill called Dorius, as Paulus says, [in the a book of his Eliaca] reporteth, when Eubulus, or Eubulus was L. Chancellor at Athens, who began his office there, in the very entrance of 3 year of 96 Olympiade, as Lyfias, a very good Author in his Oration concerning the acts of Aristophanes affirmeth.)

The Commanders of the Persian Fleet lay near to Doryma, in Cheronefus, with more than 90 sail of ships; Pharnabazus commanded the Phoenicians, and Conon the Athenian, the Grecian Squadron of them. But Pilander, (for whom Periarchus is falsely pur, by Diodorus) the Lacedemonian Ammiral, setting sail from Cnidus with 80 ships, came to a place called Phylcus in Cheronefus: and going from thence, lighted upon a part of the Kings Fleet, and at the first encounter had the better of it: but when the rest of the Kings Fleet came in to their rescue, and the friends of the Lacedemonians shifted for themselves, and fled to land, Pilander with his ship fell in upon the thickest of the enemy; slew many of them, but died himself manfully in the fight. Then did Conon with his men pursue the Lacedemonians holly to land, and took no less than fifty of their ships: the rest fled and returned late to Cnidus, [Xenophon, Hellen. 4. Diodorus year 2 of the 96 Olympiade, Justin lib. 6. cap. 3. Emil. Probus in the life of Conon.]

When Agefilas was now ready to invade Boeotia, news was brought him of this great overthrow of the Lacedemonian Fleet, and therein of the death of Pilander his wives brother: and at the very instant, the Sun was eclipsed, and looked like a half-moon, [Xenophon, Hellen. 4. and Plut. in his Agefilas] which fell upon the 14. of our August, as appeareth by the Astronomical accounts, in the year 394 before the birth of Christ.

After this great victory at Cnidus, Pharnabazus and Conon went about, and cast the Lacedemonian Governours and Garrisons out of all the Islands and sea Towns; making them believe, that they would never put any Citadels upon them: but that they should thenceforth live according to their own laws, [Xenophon, lib. 4. Hellen.] and hereupon, first the Cols, then the Nilæus, then the Teians, and those of Chios fell off from the Lacedemonians. Then they of Mytilene, of Ephesus, and Erythrae, did the like: and in an instant, all the rest of the cities fell a madding against the Lacedemonian Government; whereof some casting out the Lacedemonian Garrisons, lay up for themselves, and maintained their own State. Others gave themselves up into Conons hands: and from that time forward, the Lacedemonians lost the sovereignty of the seas, [Diodor. year 2. Olympiade 96.]

Dercylidas, an old enemy of Pharnabazus, being at this time at Abidus, would not out thence, as others did out of their commands; but having made a grave and pithy Oration to the inhabitants, held them firm and constant to the Lacedemonian party: and when other Commanders which were cast out of their several places, repaired thither, they entertained them lovingly there; and such as came not of themselves, they invited to come. And when a multitude of them were come together, Dercylidas put over to Sestus on the other side, and there entertained all such as were driven out of their commands on the European side; and put the like courage into their hearts, as he had done to the rest in Asia: telling them that in Asia it self, which from the beginning belonged to the King, sundry places, as Temnus; no great Town, and Egæ in Eolia, and other places held still their own, and would not stoop to the Kings obedience, [Xenophon, Hellen. 4.]

Pharnabazus purposing to go for Ephesus, delivered over to Conon 40 ships; and bad him meet him at Sestus. He himself sent Minatory letters to both places, telling them, that unless they rid their hands of the Lacedemonians, he would hold them for his enemies. And when they would not, he commanded Conon to block them up by sea; and he himself went and waited all the country about Abydos. But finding that that would not bring them to his bent, he left them, and went his way home. But gave order to Conon to deal with the Cities bordering upon the Hellespont, and to provide the greatest Fleet that possibly they could make against the next Spring; and so this Winter was taken up, in such provisions making.

Winter was taken up, intricate provisions making.

In the beginning of the Spring, having gotten together a mighty Fleet of his own, and hired what else he could besides, Pharnabazus, taking Conon with him, went through the middle of the Islands on the Egean Sea, and came to Melus, one of the Sporades, that from thence, he might the more easily put over, and let root in Laconia the country of the Spartans. And having there spoiled the country, he purposed to return into Asia: but before he went, Conon prevailed with him to leave the Navy with him; for that with it he would go to Athens, and would repair the long walls there, and fortify the Port of Pyreum; which, as he said, would trouble the Lacedæmonians, nothing more. Glad was Pharnabazus of this offer, and furnished him with monies to do that work. So Conon came to Athens with 80 sail of ships, and presently fell in hand with the repairing of the walls both of the City and Port: and having received 50 talents of money from Pharnabazus, bestowed it all among his fellow-citizens. [Id. ibid. Diad. year 2, and 3. of the 66. Olympiad. Plin. in his Agellans, and Laconical Appophorisms. Justin lib. 6, cap. 5. Emil. Prob. in the life of Conon.] Agagelides to Tiribazus the Æneid lib. 6, æp. 5, Emil. Prob. in the life of Conon.] Antalcidas to Tiribazus, another chief Commander of the Kings, residing at Sardes, to make him, if it were possible, their friend, and to mediate a peace between them and them. Whereupon the Athenians also lent Conon, and sundry others unto him: to do all the Boeotians, and Corinthians, and those of Argos. Now when they were all come before Tiribazus, Antalcidas began, and told him, that he was come to sue for a peace between the Kings, and his country-men, such as the Kings own heart could wish; for that the Lacedæmonians would not stand with him for the Grecian cities in Asia; but would be content if all the Islands and other countries out of Asia, might be free and live according to their own laws: But when all the rest of the Legates, there met, disclaimed that motion, all brake off, and every man returned home again. But Tiribazus, though he saw it was not late for him to make a league with the Lacedæmonians, without the law it was not late for him to yet under-hand he furnished Antalcidas with monies to let up their Navy again; that so the Athenians and their confederates might the more easily be wrought to condescend to a peace with the King: and more than that, three Lacedæmonians he sent to prison at Sardes; charging him as guilty of all that ever the Lacedæmonians said of him, and as if he had made use of the Kings soldiers and monies, only to get towns and cities for his country-men the Athenians; and to inform him of Eolia unto them. And that done, made a journey to the King, to inform him of what profits the Lacedæmonians had made unto him; and what he had done to Conon, and upon what grounds, and to know his pleasure upon all. [Xen. Hellen. 4, with Plut. in his Æconomic and Apophthegms. and in his Ægelesus. Diodor. 3 year of the 96. Olympiad: *Emil. reigned 40 years. [Diod. 4 year of 98 Olymptiad.]

 Parysatis the Kings mother, had caused by her trusty servants, certain slips of palm trees to be privily hid in the heopattand and duffs under which Clearchus his body lay, casually buried, as I shewed before; out of these, now after 8 years, there sprang up a wonderful grove of palm trees, which thereupon the King much repented him of, and wrote in his Periplus. [Adding further, that thereupon the King much repented him of his doing him to death, as a man, in the life of Artaxerxes.]
 Excerptions of Photius, and Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes.]

Some write that Conon was carried away prisoner to the King, and by him put to death: and among them, [I]socrates in his Panegyric. But Dinon, an Historian, and of great authority in Persian matters, says that he escaped out of prison; demurring only upon this, whether with or without Tiribazus his privacy and consent. [Emil. Prob. in his Conon.]

2. Whiles Tiribazus was with the King, the King dispatched away Struthas into the lower Asia, to take charge of the sea: whom when the Lacedemonians perceived to bear a rancour and hatred to them, for the many mischiefs which Alcibiades had done against the Persians in thole parts; and to be much inclined to the Athenian party, and their confederates, they presently away Thimbron to make war upon him. Thimbron passing the sea, came to Ephesus, and from thence, and other places, lying upon the Meander, and out of Priene, [Xenoph. Hellens.] Lycophry, and Achillium, plundered the Kings Countreys adjoyning, [Xenoph. Hellens.] for possessing himself of Ioadia, and of Corefus, a mountain distant from Ephesus some 40 furlongs: and having with him 8000

8000 men, which he brought with him, besides those which he raised in Asia, he made often incursions from thence, and spoiled all provinces and places adjoyning; of the Kings subjection, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 97.]

After a while, Struthach, well equipped, company of horse, five thousand Copteleers, and upward of twelve thousand foot soldiers; encamped not far from the Lacedaemonian army; and perceiving that Thimbron kept no good order in drawing out his men upon any service, he sent some horse into the plain country, willing them to make spoil of what ever came to their hand: and when he saw Thimbron to find out forces by handbills, and in no military order, to relieve them that were distressed, then he himself, with the main body of his horse, all in good array, drew out and fell upon them. Thimbron himself, and his dear friend Therander, fell in the very first encounter: which Therander was a singular minstrel, and a very good soldier without: Hercupon, the rest of the Grecians fled, and the Persians following the chase, slew some of them, and others they took alive, few escaped; they which did, came safe to Cnidus, and other cities of the Grecians, [Id. ibid.]

3613. Ecdicius, who was sent by the Lacedæmonians, with 8 ships, to help the Banditæes of Rhodes, came to Cnidus; where finding that the Rhodians were grown very strong by sea and land, and had a fleet twice as bigg as his, he kept himself quiet at Cnidus. [Xenoph. Hellen. 4. Diad. year 2. Olympiade 97.]

In the same fleet also, they sent Diprindas, with charge to land in Asia, and to man all those cities which had adhered to Thibron : and that, gathering together the remainder that was left of his good overthrow, and such other as he could get, he should begin the war a fresh upon Struthas, which he did ; and among other his good hap, it was his fortune to light upon Tigranes, Struthas's son in law upon the way as he was going with his wife to Sardes : but let him go, having wrung a great summe of money from him, which came very opportunely to pay his army, [Xenoph. ibid.]

from him, which came very opportunely to pay his army's wages. Euagoras the King of Salamis in Cyprus, by the endeavors of his son Protargoras, got almost the whole Island into his subjection, [for as in his Euagoras,] and the rest he got into his hand, partly by force, partly by perfluvous words: But they of Amathusa, and of Salos, and the men of Citium, used to pray in aid from Artaxerxes, laying tribute to his charge that he was the cause of the killing of Argyrus, who was, whilst he lived, a confederate of the Persians: and undertook to assist the king in getting the whole Island into his hands. Artaxerxes therefore partly to clip Euagoras his wings, partly out of a desire he had to make Cyprus his own, for the thumping that there was, to assist Amathusa with, gave order to lend aid against Euagoras: and sending away the Embassadors, commanded all his sea towns in Asia to fall a building what ships possibly they could, with tackle and furniture thereunto belonging: and he himself, going through the cities of upper Asia, raised great forces of men. [Disid, year 2, Olympiad 97,] of all which army, he made Antiochus, the Governor of Lydia, General by land; and Hecatonnius the Commander of Caria, Ammiral at sea, [Theopomp, in Biblioth. Historicæ, l. 76.] The latter of which yet, instead of making war against Euagoras, under-hand supplied him with monies, to hire him auxiliaries from other parts, [Disid. ut sup. and an. 3, Olympiad 98.]

3614. When the Lacedaemonians law that Egeicus had not power enough to pleasure their friends; they called home Telentias from the bay of Corinth, and lent him to succeed Egeicus in that charge, with 12 ships: and to support, all he could, the Rhodians who favoured the Lacedaemonian party, and to repress their enemies. Telentias therefore coming to Samos, got some more shipping there: and from thence sailed to Cnidus: and there diffusing Egeus, fired himself with a Navy, consisting in all of 27 ships, well furnished, and with them failed to Rhodes; [Xen. Hellen. 4. with Diodorus year 2. of the 97 Olympiad.]

As he was upon his way to Rhodes, he lighted upon Philocrates, who was sailing from Athens to Cyprus with ten ships, to the relief of King Euagoras: all these Teleniastook, and carrying the spoils of them to Cnidus, there sold it. And so it fell out, that they who were enemies to the King of Persia, spoiled them who were going to make war against him, [Xen. ibid.]

The Athenians perceiving the Lacedæmonians to grow frowny again at sea, sent out Thralybulus with a Fleet of 40 sail against them; and he first falling into Ionia, gathered monies there from their confederates; and because he found all the cities in Asia kind unto him, in requitation of that concordancy which was between the King and himself, he first made a league for Byzantium; and let out the custom of the teeth of every thia that passed that streight to farmers; and then having contracted a league and friendship with them of Chalcædon, he returned out of the Hellespont, [C ibid. with Diodor. year 1. Olymp. vide 97.]

After which, returning into Asia with his fleet, among others he lent and required a supply of Money, from those of Aspendus; lying with his fleet at the mouth mouth of the river Eurymedon, and they contributed, according to his command; but when that notwithstanding some of the company went up into the country, and there plundered their goods: the men of Argos, growing into cholera thereupon, watched their opportunity, and falling upon them, slew many of them, and among the rest, Thyralys himself, as he lay sleeping in his tent, which strook the Athenian cap at ins with such a fear, that they presently gar them aboard, and failed to Rhodes: and the Athenians felt forthwith Argivus to succeed in Thyralys his room. [Xenoph. Hel. c. 4. Diodor. year 3. Olympiad 97.]

4. Diador. year 3, Olympiad 97.]

The Lacedæmonians, though they had little reason to find fault with Dercylidas his doings, yet they sent Anaxibius to succeed him in the government of Abydus, a man, borne up by the favour of the Ephori, and one that promised to do wonders, if he might be furnished with men and money : wherefore they gave him 3 tall ships of war, and money to hire and pay a thousand fee soldiers more. He therefore coming to Abydus, raised land forces with the monies which he brought, and by that means drew off sundry cities of Eolia, from Pharnabazus his party, and wasted the enemies country : and then getting 3 ships more, he annoyed and troubled the Athenians, which yielded upon that coaft, and if he happened to light upon any of their ships fraging, he took them and brought them to Abydus. [Xenoph. Hellen. 4.]

[He was formerly returned from Corinth] with

The Athenians hearing thereof, sent Iphicrates (lately returned from Corinth) with 8000 foot, and 12 hundred targeteers, to maintain what Thrasybulus had gotten, and seduced in those parts, against Anaxibius, and comming into Cheroneus; he for his part, sent Anaxibius for his, let up a company of Pirates, and land robbers, to carry on the war for them, [Id. iv.]

3616. Ænæas with his three brothers, and the rest of the Æneades, was there very kindly received and entertained. And all Corceutes went to Andarus, and was there very kindly received and entertained. Mean while Iphicrates disposed certain ambushments for him, in the passages of the mountains, against he should return from thence to Abdus. The vessels which had wasted him over, in the night season, he caused to row up the Hellepont; that men might conceive him to be abroad there, and that he was then going, as at other times he used to do, to collect monies: wherefore, when the men of Abdus, who led the Van, came into the plains which lieth next to a place called Cremates, (where there are also gold mines) and the rest were coming down the steep of the Hill, and Ænæas himself, with his Laconian companies following them, Iphicrates with all his men, role out of their ambushment, and set upon them. Ænæas finding himself thus entraped, fought manfully and died, and with him 12 other Lacedæmonians, governors of several cities, which were then come unto him: the rest fled, and Iphicrates pursued them to the very gates of Abdus; there perished of the rest some 200, of Abdus it self almost fifty, all Corceutes, and then he returned into Cheritonius, [lib. 4, m. fi.]

4. in. f. 1
Hierax being sent to succeed Teleutias, in the command of the fleet, he returned home; leaving an incredible desire of him in the hearts of the fouldiers, [Xenophon Hellen. 5.]

3617. Shortly after they lent Antalcidas to luccetted Himerax in the chalybeate springs, and there-therein they should exceedingly content and please Tiribazus : and he coming to Ephesus, left Nicholochus his Lieutenant there; and he with Tiribazus went together to the King, to conclude the peace which was then in agitation; [Xen. lib. 5. Hel. died, year 2.
Olympiad 98.]

Nicolochus, to secure Abydus, set sail from Ephesus, and by the way landed at Tenedos, waisted their country, and wrung out of them a large proportion of money, and then went on his journey to Abydus as he intended. Near adjoining the Athenian Captains, which were at Samothrace, Thalus, and other places near byjoyning, haffsted to come to the relief of Tenedos. But finding that Nicolochus was lately arrived at Abydus, they went out of Chersonesus, with 32 saile of ships, and befieged him as he lay at Abydus with 25 ships, [Xenoph. Hellens. 5.]

Chabrias was openly sent by the Athenians to the aide of Euagoras, with 800 Targareans, and ten tall men of war, and left not the place till he had subdued the whole isle; whereby the Athenians got a great reputation in the world, [*Id. ibid. and Emil.
Prob. in the Life of Chabrias.*] of the Embasie sent from the Cypriots to the Athenians for their aide, Lyfias the Orator; in his oration upon Aristophanes, maketh mention,

At these words, who could never before abide a Lacedæmonian, but would ever say, (as Dionysius reports) that they were the most impudent of all men living, yet seeing Antalcidas dance, the Leonidas, and the Callicratidas, before him, fell infinitely in love with him : and as he sat at supper, lent him a garland wrought of roses and lafaron from his own head, dip it all in a most costly ointment, to wear for his sake : whereunto he answered, Sir, faith he, I take, and thank you for this noble gift and favour : but the perfume of the oymment in it, marris the natural sent, and fragrancie of the flowers, [Plus, in his Attaxi, and in his Pelopidas, and in his Sympof. lib. 7. queſ. 8. Athenæus Deipnof. lib. 2. Elia. Varia, Hiftor. lib. 14. c. 39.]

Pharnabazus returned from the king and Antalcidas with him; having made a firm league and association of arms, in case the Athenians and their confederates, would not partake in that peace, which he had propounded. Pharnabazus being sent for, went to the king, being then in the upper Asia, and there he married the king's daughter, [Xenoph. Hellen. 5.]

Antalcidas, presently upon his return, hearing that Iphicrates and Diotimus besieged Nicosiolum in Abidus; with all his fleet, went thither by land, and putting to sea by night, gave it out that he was sent for to Chalcedon, but falling into the port of Persepe, he there lay close: four Captains there were of the Athenian party, who hearing that Antalcidas was gone to Chalcedon, purposed to follow him upon the trade-way to Proconessus. But Antalcidas so soon as they were passed by, came back to Abidus; and by a stratagem, laying 12 principal (wight ship, in an Ambushment, intercepted 8 ships, which Thralybulos the Athenian brought out of Thrace, and thought to have joyncd with the main body of the Attic fleet: [Id. ibid. Polyanius, lib. 2. Stratag. in Antalcida.]

Antalcides having received 20 sail of ships from Syracuse and the parts of Italy, which were brought him by Polyxenus, and others, as well out of Ionia, from Pharnabazus, as out of those parts which belonged to Ariobarzanes, his old friend, had made up a fleet of 80 sail, and was absolute master of the sea: and thereby forced those ships which coming out of Pontus, were bound for Athens, to turne their course to some port or other, of the Lacedæmonian party; and there to discharge, Xenoph. ib.

When Tiribazus had lūmmoned all to come in, that would ſubſcribe to the forme of a peace propounded by Artaxerxes; all the Grecian Cities, by their Embaſſadors readily came in: unto whom he ſhewing the kings ſeals affixed to the inſtrument, he cauſed it to be read as followeth.

Calicut, or Calicut, as you know it.

The King of Cyprus, who is the same year, for the cities which are in Asia, as also the Islands of Cleodonia and Cyprus should be his, and under his command: And all other Cities of Greece, as well small as great, should be free, and live every of them in their own laws, and customs, except Lemnos, and Imbros, and Scyros: which as heretofore, so now also, the Athenians shall hold and possess. And as for them which shall not receive this peace, them will I, together with those who shall embrace it, pursue with an open war, by land and by sea, with ships and with money.

Which when the Embassadors at their returne had reported every of them to his own people, although it grieved them to see the Grecian cities of Asia, for which Agæmilius had so bravely fought, thus forcibly brought into the Kings hand, yet because needs they must, they submitted thereunto, and accepted of the peace: Xen. lib. 10, Isocrates in Panathen. Dial. year 2, Olymp. 98. Plutarch in Agell. and Alexander. and in his Laconic Apophtheg. Arifides in his Lemnic. 1, and 2, which peace was published as [Polyp. lib. 1.] hath observed, 19 years after the sea fight at Egospotamos, and sixteen years before the battell at Leuctra in Beotia.

When this peace was thus made, Agelæus, as Xenophon says, was an earnest man to see it observed, and the Lacedæmonians made themselves very severe guardians, and defenders of it in Greece. And Artaxerxes wrote a particular letter to Alcibiades, which he sent by a Persian in company of one Callias a Lacedæmonian, wherein he offered him both hospitality and friendship. But Alcibiades accepted neither, but bad the Kings messenger tell him this matter, that he needed not trouble himself to write letters to him; for if he continued a good friend to the Lacedæmonians, he would not fail to continue the like to him; but if he endeavoured any ill to them, he should not think that any letters of his, should work him over to his friendship. [Plut. in his Lacedæm. Apophthegmes.]

In those articles of Antalcidas's peace, formerly related out of Xenophon, who could not be ignorant of the particulars thereof, we find that not all the Islands bordering upon Asia, but two of them only, were given up to the King, (though Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes, seems to have been of another mind,) and those were Clazomenae (which as I shewed before, in the year of the World 3504, 3505, was then an Island) and Cyprus: the tenor of this peace, now drew Chabrias from thence; when he had indeed already subdued it wholly, and reduced it to the obedience of Euegrasias I shewed before, in regular warfare, Enagoras armed almost every man in the Isle, and mulctured a huge army against Artaxerxes: and now Artaxerxes having made a final peace with the Grecians, commanded all his forces to provide themselves for the conquest of Cyprus, [Diod. 2 year, Olympiad 98.]

3618. Antaxerxes now drew forth three hundred thousand foote; and furnished withal 300 saile of ships, against Euagoras King of Cyprus: General of his foot he made his son in law Oronces; Ammiral of his fleet, was Tiribazus, who taking each his charge at Phoea and Cuma, sailed first to Cilicia, and from thence, went and landed in Cyprus, where where they very vigorously put on the war against Euagoras: and he for his part procured himself supplies of all kinds from the Egyptians, Tyrians, Arabians, and others, enemies to the Persian State: so that he made up a Fleet of 90 sail; of which number, 20 were from Tyre, the rest were his own: and of his land souldiers 6 thousand of his own, and his auxiliaries from other parts, a far greater number. And so having money enough to pay them, his army grew exceeding great, [Diod. lib. 5. year 3. Olympiade 98.]

Euagoras set on work certain Pirates, of whom he had good store at his command, to fall upon the enemies vessels of loading: of these they took some, sunk others, and the rest durst not put to sea for fear of them. Whence it came that victuals presently failing in the Persian army, some of the hired souldiers killed their Commanders: and a mutiny grew over all the army; so that with much ado could the Colonels at land, and Gaus the chief Officer at sea quiet them: wherefore the whole Navy in a body were faine to let fall for Cilicia, and from thence brought their store of provision for the Camp. But Acoris King of Egypt suffered not Euagoras to want either for corn or money, and all other provisions, as much as he wanted, [Id. ibid.]

Euagoras finding that his Navy was far too weak for the enemies, furnished out 60 ships more of his own, and besides them had fifty more sent him from King Achoris: so that now his Fleet was 200 fighting ships. And at his first encounter by land, had the better of the enemy: and routed them again at sea, falling suddenly upon their Fleet, as they were failing to Citium, sunk some of them, and took others: which he found scattered from the body of the Navy. But when the General of the Persian Navy, and the rest of the Commanders had recollected themselves, the fight then grew hot and fierce between them, wherein Euagoras at the first had again the better of it. But when Gaus fell on with all his might, and fought himself very manfully, Euagoras his men fled, with the losse of many of his ships. The Persians therefore having gotten this victory, assembled both their land and sea Forces together at Citium: where fitting themselves with necessaries, they went joyntly to besiege Salamis it self the chief city, both by land and sea, [Id. ibid.]

Teribazus immediately after the fight, put over into Cilicia, and went to carry Artaxerxes news of the victory: and Euagoras leaving Salamis to be defended by his son Pythagoras, (Protagoras perhaps, of whom I formerly made mention out of Ilocrates, in the year of the World 3613.) and committing the charge of the whole Isle to his charge, got out by night with 10 ships only in his company, and sailed into Egypt. Where he persuaded Acoris, with all the power he had to make a war upon the Persians, [Id. ibid.]

Euagoras returned into Cyprus, but with far lesse store of monies than he expected: and when he there found Salamis Strongly besieged, and himself abandoned by his confederates, he was faine at last to send to Teribazus, and to treat with him about a peace.

Teribazus who commanded over all in chief, made answer, that he would admit of the motion, provided that he would surrender all Cyprus into the Kings hand, save onely Salamis, and pay the King a tribute for that too; and be at his command as a liege vassal ought to be to his Lord and Sovereign. These conditions, as hard as they were, yet was Euagoras faine to submit unto; for he said, he should be subject to him, as one King to another; not as a slave to his master: and yet this would not content Teribazus neither, [Diod. year 4. Olympiade 98.]

But Orontes the other Commander in chief, envying the honour of Teribazus, sending away privily letters to the King, his father in law, among other matters, laid to his charge, that he intended a rebellion; and that under-hand he had confederated with the Lacedemonians, and used all means, to oblige to himself, all the principal Captains and Commanders of the army. To all which the King giving halcy credit: gave Orontes a commission to seize on his person, and to send him to him, [Id. ibid.]

Orontes, fearing Teribazus, seized on him by this wile. There was a house which had a great vault in it: over this vault he set a bed not corded, but covered over with tapestry, and many costly coverlets: then desired Teribazus to come unto him, pretending a conference about some urgent matters: and Teribazus coming in, sat him down upon the bed, and thorough that fell into the vault: and being there caught, was sent away fast bound in chains to the King, [Polyen. stratag. lib. 7.]

Orontes now commanding all in Cyprus, when he saw that Euagoras had taken fresh courage, and endured the siege more stoutly than before; and his souldiers repining at Teribazus his misfortune, received no commands, and left the siege: admitted Euagoras to a peace upon such terms as Teribazus had propounded to him: to wit, that paying a yearly tribute to the king, he should continue King of Salamis, and as a king should be obedient in all things to the king. And so this war of Cyprus, which had lasted ten years, whereof yet the far greatest part was spent in preparation making, and two years only in the war it self came to an end; and the king having consumed 50 thousand thousand talents in it, when all was done, the Euagoras in the same state he was in, when the war began, [Ilocrates in his Euagoras, Dod. year 4. Olympiade 98.]

Gaus, Vice-Amiral of the Navy, and son in law to Teribazus, fearing least, as a man privy to Teribazus his designs, he might perchance be made away for company, be thought himself of falling off, and revolting from the King. And having wealth and souldiers enough, and the chief Captains of the Navy wholly at his devotion, confederated forthwith with Acoris King of Egypt, and the Lacedemonians, to make a war upon Artaxerxes, [Diod. ib.]

Artaxerxes following herein the example of Cambyfes, [Herod. lib. 5. cap. 25. Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 3.] caused certain of his Judges to be dead alive, and their skins to be hung up over the Judgement seats, that they which late therein, knowing what hung over their heads, might be the more careful to do justice unto his people, [Diodorus ibid.]

Artaxerxes leading with him an army of 300 thousand men against the Cadusi a people lying between the Euxine and the Caspian seas, [Diod. Olymp. 98. year 4. Plut. in Artaxerxes.] In this war there fell many a Great man on either side, but among others of that of the kings party, one Camilanes, a Carian born, a stout and a valiant man, whom the King had made Commander of that part of Cilicia, which lies next to Cappadocia, inhabited by the Leucotyrians, and in honour of him, the king made his son Datames governour in his room, who also did the king singular service in this war, [Emil. Prob. in the Life of Datames.]

Artaxerxes with his army in this war, was brought to such extremity, that hardly could a man buy an Asses head for 60 Drachmes: and was relieved by Teribazus, who lived then a poor neglected and contemptible gentleman in the army, in this manner. There were at that time two Kings of the Cadusians, and they held their camps apart. He therefore making the King first acquainted with it, went himself to one of them, and sent his son privily to the other; and each of them deceived his man: perswading him, that the other had underhand sent to Artaxerxes, to make a peace with him for himself, and to leave the other out. Hereupon, each sent his Ambassadors, the one with Teribazus, the other with his son to the King, and he made peace with both, and so the war was ended, [Plut. in Artaxerxes.]

Upon this, the King returned the cognifance of Teribazus his cause to three honorable persons, before whom he made his innocency to appear, and withall his services to the King, to have been so great, that they all absold him, and the King ever after held him in very high esteem, and heaped great honours on him: as for Orontes, he was condemned for a false accuser, thrust out of the kings favour, and held for an ignominious person ever after, [Diod. year 4. Olympiade 98.]

Whiles Gaus was in Cyprus, the Grecians which there served under him, wrote letters against him into Ionia; and to find out who they were, and what they wrote, took this course: he provided a ship, and fitted her with Mariners, and the master gave it out, that he was going for Ionia; and lugged out the time, to get as many letters aboard, as possibly he could, and at last set out: but turning short, came back into a creek, not far from the place whence he went: thither Orontes went on foot; and causing all the letters aboard to be delivered into his hands, read them; and finding who they were that had written against him, he put them all to death with torments, [Polyen. Stratag. lib. 7. in Gaus, in which whereof, it is miswritten, Alos and Glor.]

Gaus, when he had stirred up both the Egyptians and Lacedemonians to engage in a war against the Persian, was killed, I know not how, nor by whom, and so went not on, with what he had intended. But after his death, Tachos, going on upon his grounds, got an army, and built him a town upon a high hill, joyning upon the sea, called Leuca, where also he built a Chappel for Apollo: but he coming also to die shortly after, the Clazomenians, and they of Cuma, fell to strife about the possession of it, and the Clazomenians made the more halt, and got it; and so all rebellions in Asia were laid asleep: the Lacedemonians also, Gaus and Tachos, both being now dead, cast off all care of Asia, and would have no more to do with it, [Diodorus year. 2. Olympiade 94.]

When Pharnosthratus was Lord Chancellor of Athens, in the month Posidicon, in the 366 year of Nabonassars account, on the 26 day of the Egyptian month, That is, in the entry upon the 23 of our Decemb. five hours and an half after midnight, there was a small eclipse of the moon observed at Babylon, [Hipparch. in Ptol. in his great Syntax. lib. 4. cap. ult.]

In the same man time, in the month Scirophorion, and in the same year of Nabonassar, on the 24 day of the month Phamenoth the 18 day of our June, ending 5 hours and one half before midnight, there was another Eclipse of the moon observed in the same place, [Id. ib.] patched away to him Pelopidas of Thebes it self, Antiochus the Pancratiast of Arcadia, Archdamus of Eleus, a Town in Thrace, with one other out of Argos: which coming to the Athenians ears, they dispatched away also their Ambassadors to the King; Timagoras and Leontes. And among them all Pelopidas appeared most gracious in the Kings eye, and next him Timagoras; and were of all others most honourably entreated by him, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

Itmenias of Thebes joyned Commisitioner with Pelopidas in this Embassage, when, being brought by Tithraustes the Chiliarch, to the presence of the king, he was bid to prostrate himself before him: let fall his ring before him; and presently falling all along, took it up again: and to being conceived to have done it to the king, obtained whatever he asked of him, [Plut. in Artax. Elia. Var. Hist. lib. 1. cap. 21.]

Timagoras the Athenian, lent a pair of intelligence at the same time by one Bubaris his Secretary, and had for his pains a thousand Daries; and had moreover a rich supper sent him to his lodging: whereupon the Kings brother Otkanes, said unto him; Remember Timagoras this supper; for it is not sent you, for any small purpose: which sounded rather as anupbraking of some treason to him, than any congratulation of the gift, so sent unto him, [Plut. ib.] It is said also that the king gave him 80 Cowes, which because he was sickly, should afford him milk upon his way homeward: and a costly bed and furniture, with some servants to make it, because the Grecians skilled not of such matters: and moreover, caused him to be carried all along to the sea side in a Lictier, because of his infirmity; giving those which carried him 4 talents for this Timagoras, after his prostration to the king, was used with great honour by him, adds moreover, that the King sent him some dishes from his own table. As for that costly bed and furniture, and men to make it, as if the Grecians knew not how to make a bed: sent by Artaxerxes, he sayes it was to one Timagoras of Crete, or Eutimus of Gortyna in Crete, as Phanius the Peripatetic calls him.

Pelopidas, being so gracious with the king, gat letters from him, wherein the king commanded that Meflene should be exempt from the Lacedemonian jurisdiction: and the Athenians required to draw up their ships: and if they obeyed not, proclaimed open war against them both; and if any city refused to follow him in this war, then that city was first of all others to be made an example. And when Leontes spake openly and said, that it was time for the Athenians to look them out and provide new friends instead of the King: Artaxerxes bad adde, that if the Athenians did not like it, they should come and shew cause, why not, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

When the Ambassadors came home, the Athenians took Timagoras, and for his prostration to the King, struck off his head: raking it amisse that the glavinging slattery of one citizen of theirs, should subject the whole honour of the Athenian State to the dominating power of the Persian: so sayes, [Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 3.] Where I know not by what mistake, Darius is crept into the text instead of Artaxerxes. Otkanes say it was, for his base acceptance of the Kings gifts: of which a man may see more in, [Plutarch in his Artax. and Pelopidas.] But Xenophon sayes, that he was accused by Leontes his colleague: for that he would not so much as keep in one lodging with him, and communicated all his counsels with Pelopidas: which no doubt was the chief cause of his being put to death.

The Thebans summoning all the cities of Greece to hear the Kings letters read, and they being publicly read by the Persian that brought them, who first shewed them the Kings seal, put to them; they required all, who would be friends to the king and the Thebans, to take an oath for the observance of the contents of those letters. But when the Legats first, and afterwards the Cities themselves, refused that oath: all that Embassage to Artaxerxes, and the principality and overreignty of Greece so much affected by Pelopidas and the Thebans came to naught, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

Jubilee 22.

Artaxerxes sending an other Embassage into Greece to require them to put an end to the wars and to make a peace among themselves; in the end, prevailed with them, [Diodor. an. 3. Olymp. 103.]

Eudoxus the Cnidian, surnamed ἄνδρ' Εὐδοξος (i.e. the famous, was in his prime at this time. He going into Egypt with Chrypsippus a Physician, carried with him letters of commendation from Agellus to Nectanabis: and he commended him over to the Priests there: where being upon a time with Iconphi of Heliopolis, (whom Clemens Alexan. in the first book of his stromata, calleth Cumphilis) Apis came, and all to belicked his cloak: whereupon the Priests said presently, that he should grow very famous, but should not be long-lived: as Phavorinus in his Commentaries saith. He having stayed in Egypt one year and four months, shewing himself all over, to his very eye-eye-brows, wrote the Osteois, as some report, of which we in our discourse of the Macedonian and Asiatic year, [cap. ult.] have said somewhat. From thence he is said to have travelled to Cyzicum, and Propontis, and to have spread his philosophy in thole parts, and so to have come to Maufolus, [Diog. Laertius in his Eudoxus.] others say, that this Eudoxus went in company with Plato in Egypt, and they both converted 13 years space, with the Priests there, as we read in Strabo, [lib. 17.]

At Heraclea in Pontus, when the common people there, desired all bills and bonds to be cancelled, (i.e.) all debts to be released, and all lands to be cast into a hotch potch and equally shared among them, the better sort, sent both to Timotheus, Prince of Athens, and also to Epaminondas, of the Thebans for help against them; but failing of their hope, they sent for Clearchus home, whom they had formerly cast n to cage, and prayed his aide to repress them, [Justin lib. 1.6. c. 4.]

Clearchus, supposing the disension of the people, to be a fit occasion for him to attain to the sovereignty of the city, dealt secretly with Mithridates King of Pontus, who was in hostility with his country, and agreed with him; that being called home into his country, he should deliver the city into his hands, and hold it afterward as governor under him. And having let a time, when to deliver the city into Mithridates his hand, took him, when he came about it, and all his friends that came with him prisoners, and wrung a great masse of money out of them, and to let them go: and then, as he made himself an unexpected enemy of a friend to him; so instead of maintaining the rich mens cause against the people, he made himself a patron and leader on of the common sort against them; and did not only incense the people against them, but fell to exercising of acts of tyranny and cruelty upon them. For when the people had put the supremacy, and all power into his hands, he cast 60 of the chief of them (for the rest were fled) into prison, and having first taken away their goods, then put them all to death likewise, [Id. ib.] and setting Dionysius the Tyrant of Syracuse before him for a pattern in all things to follow, he held the place 12 years, [Diodor. year 1. of the 104. Olymp. with the Collections of Photus in his Biblioth. out of Memnon the Historiographer of Heraclea, num. 224.]

Tachos, whom Polyanus [lib. 7. Stratagem.] calls Thamos, Aristotle [lib. 2.] of his Oeconomics Taos, and Julius Africanus, Teos, reigned in Egypt, two years.

With this year Xenophon concludes his 7 books of his Grecian history, and Anaximenes Lampacenus the first part of his, where beginning from Θυρηνία, that is, the generation of the gods, and beginning of man kind, he endeth with the battle of Mandinea, wherein Epaminondas was slain, comprehending in 12 volumes, almost whatever passed among either the Greeks or Barbarians, [Diod. year 2. 104 Olympiad.] and in the second part he sets down all the gifts of Philip of Macedonia and his son, Alexander the great, [Paula. 2. of his Ethica.]

When Mithridates king of Pontus was dead, Ariobarzanes, the Governor of Phrygia under Artaxerxes, seized on the kingdom of Pontus, and held it by the space of 26 years, [Diodorus year 3. Olympiad 104. and year 4. of Olympiad 110.]

Clearchus the Tyrant of Heraclea, when he found that the chief men and Aldermen of Heraclea, which were fled from thence, stirred up all the neighbouring cities and states against him, he manumiled and set at liberty all their servants, and gave them their masters wives and daughters in marriage, threatening those that would not, with death; that hereby he might make those slaves the more sure and trusty to himself, and the more deadly enemies to their masters. But when the women reckoned these dolefull marriages to be worse than death it self, many of them before their marriage, many after, having first murdered their new husbands, slew themselves: at last they came to a battle, where the Tyrant getting the victory took the chief men and Aldermen prisoners, and led them in triumph thorough the city, in sight of all the people, and then laid some of them in irons, others upon the rack, others he put to death, leaving no corner of the city free from fight and sense, of his cruelty, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 5.]

The Lacedemonians fell flat out with Artaxerxes, for that professing himself to be their friend and confederate, he had yet commanded them to part with Meflene out of their hands, and to make the Meflenians a distinct member, in the league and confederacy of Greece, [Xenoph. in his Agellus, and Diod. year 3. Olymp. 104.] and with them joyned Ariobarzanes, the Governour of Phrygia, who, as I said before, upon the decease of Mithridates, had seized on and possed himself of the kingdom of Pontus. [Diodor. ib.]

Autophrades the Governour of Lydia, besieging Ariobarzanes in Aflos, a city of Troas, for fear of Agellus, who being now old, came into Asia, only to raise money for his country, brake up his siege, and fled; and Corts, who lay before Sestus, which which was at that time under Ariobarzanes his command, brake likewise up his flegs, and gat him packing. Maufolus alfo, which befieged Atius, and Seflus, both with an hundred fhips by fea; but thorough fear, but upon perfuafion drew off, and returned home with his Fleet: and furnifhing Agefilaus with monies for his countries ufe, fent him fairly away, [Xenoph. in his Agefilaus.] Of which Ariobarzanes, and of his being befieged by Antiochus in Adramyctium, [Polyenus alfo lib. 7.] maketh mention.

Maulolus, calling his friends together, bare them in hand, that Artaxerxes, unless he satisfied him forthwith with an excessive summe of money, would deprive him of his principality, which he held by inheritance from his father: which they believing, brought him, in an instant, an infinite summe of money, [Polyen. lib. 7. Brasag.] compared with [Aristot. in his Oeconomies :] which having once ingaged, he was so far from giving it to Artaxerxes, that therewith he confederated prelenly with those Governours and Captains which then were up in armes against him; for there rebelled at this time against him, of the Ionian nation, all Lycia, Pfidia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia; and besides these, the Syrians and Phoenicians, and almost all that border upon the Asia-tick sea; Tachos al king of Egypt, proclaimed open war against him, and was busie every where in building of ships and raising of forces; especially out of all parts of Greece, and also the Lacedaemonians themselves to confederate and joyn with him, [Diod. year 2. Olympiade 104.]

All these rebelling at once against Artaxerxes, he lost one half of his revenues coming into his cofers. And the remainder sufficed not for the necessary use of the war, considering that he wasto maintain a war all at once, against the king of Egypt, and all the Grecian cities and countries in Asia; against the Lacedaemonians and their confederates; to wit, all the Lords and Captains which held the Maritime towns and regions in all Asia under their command. [Id. ib.]

The king of Egypt sent for Agelaïus to come unto him, promising to make him General of his army, [Xenoph. in his Agelaïus.] And he being lent thither by his country, laid out the monies which Tachos had lent him for himself, in levying soldiers for his service. And having flocked his ships with men, and taking along with him 30 Spartan Commissioners for his Council of War, went with a thousand Corcetes into Egypt, [Plut. in his Agelaïus: and Diodor. at sup.] When the report of his landing came to the Courtiers eager in Egypt, happy was that could first lend in presents to him; but when they came, and saw no attendance about him, only a decrepit and a wearisome old man, lying along upon the beach, sloven-like, and of a small stature, in a courtly dreabed cloak, they contemned and scorned him; and much more did they loath his lordly and insolent behaviour, when they saw, that of those rich presents and provisions of diet which were sent in to him of all sorts, he would take some meats, and a scale perhaps, or a gudge for himself, and throw away the dainties and sweet meats, and precious ointments to his followers, [Plut. and Emil. Prob. in his Agelaïus.] The King of Egypt himself also, performed not with him, nor made him General of his army, according to his promise, [Xen. in his Agelaïus.] Denying him for the smallness of his stature: and said, that he weened the old Proverb was true, The hills were great with young, and were delivered of a mouse: which when Agelaïus heard, he said in a rage, I will one day send a Lyon unto him. [Athenæ. lib. 14. with Plutarch.]

Charibæus the Athenian, was not sent by public authority, as Alcibiades was, but upon the perfidy of Tachos, served him in some different way for want of money, advised him to take up what monies public he could find, and to use them to the better fort of the country, and promise them payment of the yearly revenues: and by this means, he gathered an infinite sum of money, without wronging any [Polys. frat. lib. 3.] and Aristotle [2. of his Economics], reckons up a great many like shifts that he made for the getting of monies, at this time.

time. They which rebelled in Asia, made Orontes the Governour of Mylia their Commander in chief: who having received monies enough to pay 20 thousand hired foot-soldiers for one whole year; took first those who had contributed these monies and sent them prisoners to Artaxerxes; and then betrayed sundry other cities and castles, and companies of hired foot-soldiers, to such Lieutenants as the King had sent into those parts. [Diodor. year 3, Olymp. 104.] of this was managed by Orontes and Autophradates and other Captains of the Kings, [Polyenus lib. 7. Itraia, maketh also mention.] But for as much as Diodorus assures us, that in the last year of Artaxerxes Mnenon, both Autophradates and Orontes, and other Commanders, fell all off from him; we must of necessity conclude, that Autophradates stood for his son Artaxerxes Ochus; and that it was Orontes which made the war against him.

and 20 thousand foot of mercenaries; but then Mithrabarnazes his father in law, and General of his horse, stole away from him by night with all his horse, and fled to Artabazus; and truly he and they, had their wages well payed them for such their treachery, for it fell out, that they were let upon, and hewed in pieces, by both the armies, both that to which, and that from which they fled: and Diodorus addeth, that Artaxerxes being informed, that Dardanes had brought him this noose, by putting a trick upon him; made all the haste he could to rid his hands of him, and that shortly after, he cauled him privily to be made away: but it appears out of Emil. Prob. that Dardanes lived long after this: Who else actions, as he acknowledges them to have been carried all along in an obscure way, so he faces, that himself was the more inquisitive and diligent in searching out and describing the concavities of them: which he doth in such wise, as a man may easily discern, that what he did was all in Artaxerxes Oculis his time.

Rheomithres was sent by the united Lords into Egypt, where having gotten 500 talents, and 50 tall ships, he returned with them to Leucas in Asia: and having sent for many of the principal of them to come thither to him, he laid hold of them, and sent them all away prisoners to Artaxerxes; and by this act of his, he reconciled himself with the King, who was formerly displeased with him, [Diodorus year 3 Olympiade 104.]

104.] Tachos, having now fitted himself with all things necessary for the war, gave the command of the 10 thousand men, which he had hired out of Greece to Agælaüs, with his fleet consisting of 600 sails, to Chabrias (which with war care and cunning he had furnished with rowers, [Polychæb. Sirratch]) (thewer) and his foot army consisting of 8000 thebes and 10000 greeks, to N. danabius, his, or rather, his brother or sisters son, for the word νεμεξ in the Greek sign fith either; but referred to himself the oversight and general-ship of all. And altho'g Agælaüs: perfwaded him, to carry on this war by his L'evantians, and to stay himself in Egypt; yet he would not, [Diad. ib.] never to himself, Agælaüs, beneath himself and contrary to his own humour, attended him by sea into Phœnicia, [Plutarch in his Agælaüs.]

While the Egyptian fleet, lay in Phenicia, Neftanabus was sent to take in some principal cities of Syria; where having compacted with him whom Tachos had left for Governor of Egypt in his absence, he proclaimed himself King of Egypt; and drew the commanders of the army by large gifts, and the soldiers by no less large promises, to side with him against his father, [Diod. ut su.]

Tachos being now utterly defeated, both by his own subjects, and also by Agellias, whom he had formerly offended by that base jest put upon him, fearing the worst, fled thence to Sidon in Phenicia, and from thence, to the King of Persia, as besides Xenophon and Plutarch, Theopompus and Lyfias of Naucratis, in his affairs of Egypt, both cited by Athenaeus [in his 4 book, 4 chapters], report. Diodorus and Elian say further, that he was very graciously entertained by Artaxerxes, though I cannot believe Di-dorus in this, that Artaxerxes presently made him general of all the forces which he had then raised to make a war upon Egypt, and that with them he returned into Egypt, and was there reenthroned by Agellias, neither yet, [Elianus, l. 5. Var. H. Hist. c. 1.] where he telleth us, that having formerly used to live frugally at home, he now directed with overgorging himself with excess of diet, after the Persian manner, seeing that Lymeneos or Lycenos, whom I mentioned before, teacheth us that his Egyptian diet was far more sumptuous, than that of the Persian was, [cited by Athenaeus, l. 4. cap. 1. c. Deip.]

After this, another let up himself against him in Mendes, with an army of too thousand men, [Plus, in whis Agefallus]. So with him there were now 2 Kings in Egypt. Agefallus followed him whom he law meane to be his Countrey men the Lacedemonians, [Xen. in Agefallus], and so he and Nechtanebus with whom he endured a strong hege in a Castle. Agefallus and Nechtanebus grew impatient of being thus shut up; and would needs break himself upon a battell, Agefallus left him, and stayed behind in the castle, till the whole Castle was quite surrounded with works, and the enemy about them all save a little place, where there was yet a passage left: then fell he out at that narrow passage, and made his way through with a great slaughter of the enemy, having their works at his back, so that they could not enclose him round, [Plus, in Agefallus, Polyd. Istrate, lib. 2, with Diod. year 3. Olymp. 104.] where yet he hath by mistake Tachos, instead of the King of Mendes.

As for the other king, which bore a hatred to the Greek nation, Agellæus overthrew him in a fight, and took him prisoner: but restored the other to his kingdom: and made him a firm friend to the Lacedæmonian State, [Xenophon calls him Agellæus]. Though Emil. Prob. attribute this restitution of the king, to Chabrias: the reason whereof was, because it was indeed done by the joynt force of the Lacedæmonians, and Athenians. Now from this time to the putting of Neætanebus from the kingdom, Diodorus reckons 12 year; which was indeed the true term of his reign.

reign, not 18, as Africans and Eusebius have it.

Nectanebus entreated Aggeilius very earnestly, to spend that winter with him; but he haſted homeward; for that Sparta was then engaged in a war; and he knew they wanted money: and maintained a foreign army: wherefore he diſmiſſed him very honourably: and gave him, beſides all other gifts, 230. or, as Emil Probus hath it, 220 thouſand talents. [Plut. in Agel.]

Aggeilius having ſpent this money, haſted him home, though in the dead of winter; for fear leaſt the Lacedæmonians ſhould ſpend the next ſummer idle, and do nothing againſt their enemies. [Xen. in Aggel.] But being caſt by a tempeſt upon a deſert ſhoare, called Menelaius, (i.) Menelaus his Purſuing, between Cyrene and Egypt, he there fell ſick and died. There his friends for want of wax, made him up with honey and ſo carried him to Sparta, [Plutarch and Emilus Probus, in Aggelian.] and Diodorus ſaith that his body to brought thither, was there entered, in a moſt royal manner, year 3, Olymp. 104.]

Ochus, the lawful ſon of Artaxerxes, becauſe his baſe brother Arſames, was very tenderly beloved of his father, cauſed him to be murdered by Harpates the ſon of Tiribazus; and Artaxerxes hearing what was beſided to his ſo much beloved ſon, took it preſently to heart, and died of grief, [Plut. in Artaxerxes.]

Ochus, knowing that his father while he lived, was by his people, and that himſelf after his death would be nothing regarded, dealt ſo with the Chiliarcs, the Eunuuchs, and others about him, that his death was kept ſecret ſeven months after, and in the mean time diſpatch away letters into all parts in the kings name, with his ſeal to them, requiring every man to receive Ochus for their king, [Polyæ. lib. 7. Strabo.]

Clearchus the Tyrant of Pontus, had a ſon born him at Heraclea, whom he called Dionyſius, who lived 55 years, witneſſe Athenæus lib. 12, and Menemon in the collections of Phoræus, cap. 57.

Ochus, when now all men had acknowledged him for king, and done fealty to him, made it known, that his father was dead, and commanded a publique mourning to be made for him according to the Perſian manner, [Polie. lib. 7.] and took upon him his fathers name, Artaxerxes. [Diodor. Valerius Max.] and then fill'd and ſoild his court with the blood of his kindred and nobles, without reſpect having to kin, ſex, or age, [Juſtin lib. 10. cap. 3.] among which he cauſed his own ſiſter, whole daughter he had married, to be buried alive with her heels upward, and made an Uncle of his, with above 100 children and grand-children defended from him, to be brought into a court, and there ſhot to death with arrows, [Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 2.] which as it ſeemeth, was the father of Siſygambs, the mother of Darius the laſt king of the Perſians, for of her it is that Q. Curtius, lib. 10. cap. 8, reporteth, that her father and 80 brothers were all put to death by Ochus in one day.

The ſeveral ſtates of Chios, Rhodes, Byzantium and Chos, all at once revolting from the Athenians, there grew that war which was called Bellum Sœcæ, (i. e.) the confederates war. When the Athenians began with the ſiege of Chios, beſides their own confederates, Maſolus alſo the petty king of Caria ſent aides unto them, [Demoſthenes in his Oration of Peace, and of the Rhodians liberty, Diod. an. 3. Olympiade, 105.]

In the firſt year of the 106 Olympiade, (as it is rightly read in Eulebius his Chron. out of Fuxius his copy, corrected by Arnaldus Ponticus) was Alexander (who becauſe he conquered all Asia, was afterward ſurnamed The Great) born at Pella, in the country of Macedon: for ſeeing that he lived 32 years, eight months, as Arianus reporteth out of Ariſtobolus, and died in the end of year 1. Olympiade 114. in the laſt, ſave one out of Thargelion, of the Atic account; as we ſhall ſee when we come to that year; it follows, that he muſt be born, in the year aforeſaid, and that in the third year called Boedromon, in the Atic Calendar, (to that as well they, who (as in Eliau Varian Hiſtor. lib. 2. cap. 25.) have ſaid, that he both was born and died, upon the ſixth day of Thargelion, have erred in their account; as Plutarch alſo, who in the life of Alexander ſaies, that he was born in the beginning of the month Hecatombæon, called Lous by the Macedonians, to wit, on the ſixth day thereof. And there was reaſon enough why they, who living at that time, firſt reported it in writing, ſhould ſay, that he was born upon the ſixth day of the month Lous: becauſe at that time the month Lous with the Macedons answered juſt to Metons Boedromian, as appears by King Philip, the father of this Alexander, his Epitile to the Peloponeſians, as we have already ſhewed, in our diſcourſe of the Macedonian and Aſiatic year, in the firſt chapter thereof, which the Hiſtorians and other writers of later times not obſerving, and finding the Syro-Macedon month Lous in Calippus to hit right with the month Boedromion among the Athenians, thought that Alexander had been born upon the ſixth day of that Boedromion.

And from hence grew that error of Plutarch, which he mended afterward by a far greater greater one, where he ſaith, The ſame day that Philp took Pitiada, there came to him three ſeveral tidings; one from Phæromon, that he had given the Illyrians a great overthrow, the ſecond, that he had won the race with his horſe at Olympus, and the third, that his ſon Alexander was born: for we learn out of Demoſthenes, in his oration againſt Leptines, and Diodor, year 3. Olympiade 105. That Polydæa was not taken this year, but two years before, And againſt it had been ſo, that Alexander had been born in the 105 Olymp. and upon the 6 day of Hecatombæon, yet had it been a great wonder, that he ſhould not have had a great deal longer of the birth of his ſon, than he could poſſibly have done of his winning the race of Olympus: for that that race was ever wont to be run on the day of the full moon, and judgement given thereupon, on the 16 day of the lame month, we are taught by the old ſchool of Pindarus, upon his 5 Ode or Hymne of his Illymics, yet Juſtin out of Trogus tells us more clearly, lib. 12. cap. 16, *The ſame day, ſaith he, upon which Alexander was born, news came to him of two ſeveral victories by him gotten, the one upon a battle in Illyria, the other in a race at Olympus; whether he ſent his coach with four horſes to run: Out of which reports, not hanging all of the beſt together, though I grant that it may be not improbably gathered, that Alexanders birth was in the ſummer ſeaſon, of that year, wherein the Olympic games were kept at Olympus in Elis, yet the teſtimony of Ariſtobolus, to whom Alexander himſelf in perſon was ſo well known, is ſo firm and ſtrong an argument to me of the day whereon he was born, that I conceive no doubt to be made, but that Philip the father, was certified of the race won by him at Olympus, before his ſon was born.*

The ſame day that Alexander was born, was the temple of Diana at Epheſus burnt, whence came that poor jeſt, whether of Timæus, as Cicero hath it, or of Hegheſias the Magnæſian, as Plutarch ſaith, That Diana being from home that night, at the trouble of Olympians, could not tend to ſave her own Temple, [Cic. lib. 1. de Natura deorum, and lib. 1. de Divina, and Plut. in his Alexander.] He that put the fire to it, being taken and had to the rack, confeſſed that he did it of purpoſe, that having deſtroyed ſo famous and excellent a work, his name might for it be carried over all the world: whereupon by the common-council of all Asia, it was decreed, that no man ſhould ever after name him, [Valer. Max. lib. 8. cap. 14. Ant. Gell. lib. 2. cap. 6.] which yet Theopompus in his Hiſtory did; whether it were Broſtratus, as we read it [in Strabo lib. 14. and Solinus cap. 4.] or Lygdamis, as Hefheſius, in the word Lygdam.

The Priests, who were at that time in Epheſus apprehending that the burning of this Temple was but the fore-runner of ſome greater miſchief to enſue; ran up and down as if they had been mad, and curſed their faces, ſaying, that ſome great calamity was that day hatched againſt all Asia, [Plut. in Alexan.]

Artabazus, having entered into a rebellion againſt Ochus, joining his forces with thoſe of Chares the Athenian, overthrew an army of the Perſians, conſiſting of 70 thouſand men: and thereupon gave Chares ſuch a maſſe of money, that it enabled him to pay all his army. The King expoſtulated this matter with the Athenians; and they, hearing a rumor, that the King was about to ſend 300 ſail to the relief of their enemies, againſt whom Chares at that time was in arms; clapt up a peace out of hand, and came to an agreement with them; and to that war between them and their confederates, called Bellum Cimmericum, ended, [Diod. year 1. and 2. of the 106. Olymp.]

Lucas, the King of Boſphorus Cimmericus died: unto whom ſucceeded his ſon Spartacus, and reigned 5 years, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 106.]

Artabazus, being ſlain by Chares and the Athenians, had reſcoute to the Thebans; who ſent him Pammenes, with 5 thouſand men. Pammenes with this army putting over into Asia, and there joining with Artabazus, overthrew the Kings forces in two ſeveral great battels, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 106.]

Clearchus the tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, when he went to the celebration of the Feaſt of their god Bacchus, was murdered in the 12 year of his reign, [Id. ib.] Chief author of which murder was one Chion of Heraclea, the ſon of one Matris, a ſcholar of Platoes, and a kinſman of Clearchus; who aſſociated to him Leonides and Anitichus, ſcholars alſo in Philoſophy, as the other was, and one Euxemon, and ſome fifty others of their allies and kindred, whom they diſpoſed privily in places fitting for that purpoſe. Having therefore ſpyed their time when the tyrant was boſie and intentive upon the ſacrifice with the reſt of the people, Chion ran him thorough with his ſword; whereon when he had lain grievouſly tormented with pains, and haunted with the apparitions and ghoſts of thoſe whom he had moſt barbarouſly murdered: the next day he died. But moſt of the conſpirators, if not all, were either preſently cut in pieces by his Guard, though they ſtoutly defended themſelves; or were ſhortly after taken, and put to horrible torments (which they endured with incredible conſtancy and patience) and to died, [Menemon in Excerpt. cap. 2. Juſtin. lib. 6. cap. ult. and Suidas in Clearchus.] See alſo the Epitiles attributed to this Chion, as written by him to his mother Matris.

Satyrus, brother to Clearchus, succeeded him in that Principality and held it 7 years : whereupon he contented not himself with the death of the conspirators themselves : but fell upon all their children, though innocent of their fathers fact ; and being left as Guardian and Protector of the State, he had a wife, whom he loved very dearly : yet for respective of children, he had a son, and a daughter, whom he loved as dearly : yet would he not do with her, whereby to have children of her, lest he might perhaps therein leave an issue, which might in time prove dangerous to his brothers children.

[Merryn in Excerpt. cap. 3.]

In the year of 106 Olymp., met in the 2 year of the 106 Olympiad at Caria, died after having by Pliny lib. 36, c. 5 & 6. Maulous the Dynast, or petty king, of Caria, died after leaving no issue. Diod. and Scribo 1, 14, and the, our of the fervent love which he bare to the memory of him, took his bones after they were burnt, and bearing them to a powder, mingled it with a most precious perfume, and lo put into water and drank it off, being ambitious to be her self the living and breathing tombe of her deceased husband, Gell. lib. 19, c. 38. Valer. Max. lib. 4, c. 6.

362. In the 107 Olympiade (not in the 103; as Suidas in Theodectes hath it) Artemisia proclaimed a Game, for all to come, and shew their wit and art, in praise and honour of her husband deceased. To this game, came in sundry men of excellent parts; Theopompus of Chios, the prime man of all the hearers and scholars of Iocrates, as [Dion. Halicarnassensis in his Epistle to Pompeius, witnesseth of him.] Theodectes of the City of Phaeletis in Lycia, a Tragedian Poet; another Scholar likewise of Iocrates: and Naucreates Erythræus, of Nauarcus in Cyrenia; all mentioned by Photius in his Biblioth. [c. 76 and 260.] some there are also, which say that Iocrates himself, put in for the prize in this Game: of which Plut. is one, [in his life of Iocrates.] but that was not this Iocrates of Athens, but another of the same name, his scholar, and successor in his chairs; as Suidas, out of Callisthenes the Orator, teacheth us. In that contention of wits, Theopompus, as some say, and as others, Theodectes the Tragedian, who left a tragedy, entitled Mausolus, was the prize; [A. Gell. lib. 10. c. 18. Suidas, in Theodectes and Iocrates.] though it would seeme that all went not here with Theopompus to his mind because that thought afterward a history, he therein saies, that Mausolus never spared for any vilany, if he might get money by it: which in all likelihood, he would never have done, if things had sorted out there, according to his expectation. [Suidas in Mausolus.]

But this Theopompus (of whom I have spoken before) who was an Historian, and Theodectes a Tragedian, I may not here let pass, what is reported by Demetrius Phalereus, in Aristiles (and out of him by Josephus, lib. 12. Antiquit. c. 2. and by Ensch. de Præp. Evangeli. lib. 8. c. 3. and 5. in the Synopsis of the Septuagint Interpret. c. 1.) as this, that Theopompus would have inserted some things out of the books of Moses, into his History, but lay thereunder a draught of his wits, by the space of 500 of Moses, into his History, but lay thereunder a draught of his wits, by the space of 500 days; and that in his intervals of that tickle, he earnestly besought God, to reveal unto him the cause, why this great judgement was fallen him: and that in a dream it was told him, that it was because he was wearied to mingle those divine Oracles with his humane studies; and publish them again: and of Theodectes: that when he purposed to be restored to his right wits again, and of Theodectes: that when he purposed to translate some things out of the holy writ into a Tragedie of his, he suddenly grew owlie-eyed, or pore-blind, till having considered, that such his attempt was the cause thereof, he was restored, and was restored to his perfect sight again.

3653. Arctimida, who, to continue the memory of her husband, built that stupendous tomb, for him at Halicarnassus, reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world, and, swayed as he was by grief, (Cicero, Tufnell, Bæuf, list, 3, Strabo, 1, 2, 4, A. G. list, 10, c. 18, &c.) To the making of this so miraculous a frame, the most famous workmen and artificers of the world (set their hands, Scopas, out of the East, Bryaxius, from the North, Timotheus from the South, and Leochares from the West) and albeit it took a full perfection of work was fulfilled, yet they gave it not off till they had brought it to a full perfection, knowing that, by so doing, they should also eternize their own names; and glory in it; (Plin. list, 3, 6, c. 5, with Vitruvius in the Proemio of his book 2) where it was even at Rome, that every vespurguous and magnificent building, was afterward called a Mausoleum; (Panfan, in his Arctimida.)

After her death, her brother Idrieus or Hidrieus, held the Dynasty or Principality of Caria, 7 years. [Diod. year 2, Olymp. 127.] who being the second son of Hecatomnus, married his second daughter Ada, his own sister, according to the law of Caria, [Strabo l. 14. Arianus, of the Gifts of Alexander, l. 1.]

The Thebans, falling into great distress for want of money, in their war against the Phœceans, sent their Embassadors to Ochus, and had of him 300 talents, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 107.]

The Phenicians, especially the inhabitants of Sidon, having been basely abused by

by Ochus revolted from him, and sending to Nectanebus king of Egypt, confederated with him in a war against the Persians, and then having furnished themselves with a great fleet of ships and store of land soldiers, cut down the Kings Garden and Orchard, and burnt the hay that was provided for the Kings stable, and put to death those Persians, that had done them wrong: wherefore the Satraps of Syria, and governor of Cilicia, made war upon them. But Tennes the King of Sidon, having received from the king of Egypt, four thousand Grecian soldiers under the command of Mentor of Rhodes, with the help of them, and his own men together, routed them both, and drove the Persians clean out of all Phœnicia, [Id. ib.]

The petty kings of the cities of Cyprus, which were subject to the king of Persia, following the example of the Phœnicians, fell off from him too, by a general consent among themselves : and fitting every man himself with provisions for a war, made themselves absolute sovereigns, each in his own city. Against these, by the command of Artaxerxes Ochus, Idrieus, newly made king of Caria, and by a tradition received from his Ancestors a true servant of the kings of Persia, and a follower of them, in their wars, lent four sails of ships, and in them 8 thousand mercenary soldiers, under the command of Phocion the Athenian and of Euagoras, who formerly had been a king there, into Cyprus. These began with the best will, and besieged the city Salamis; whereupon these retired to them, out of the parts of Syria and Cilicia : lying over against Cyprus, in hope of a prey, a very great multitude of men; so that Phocion and Euagoras his army grew twice as big as it was at their coming thither, [Ibid.]

Ataxerxes Ochus, having mustered an army of 300 thousand foot, and 30 thousand horse, with 300 fighting ships, and 500 ships of burden, to carry his provisions in, set out from Babylon, toward Phœnicia, and the sea-side. But Mentor, whom the Sidonians had made Commander over the Mercenary Greeks, taking a right at his approach, sent a man called Theffalus to him, offering him first to betray all the Sidonians into his hands, and afterward to do him right good and trusty service in the conquering of Egypt. Theffalus, having delivered his message, and received the Kings promise, and kissed his hand upon it, returned to Mentor, and assured him from the king, undiscovered by the Sidonians, [16.]

Mean while, Ochus sent his Ambassadors into Greece for some aid: from them, against the Egyptians. The Athenians and Lacedaemonians returned him answer, that they would keep the peace made: with him, with all their heart; but send him only such aid as they could give. But the Thebans readily sent him a thousand men, under the command of Lachetes. They of Argos also sent him three thousand men, but appointed no Commander over them of their own; because the king had specially desired to have Nicias to command them; a man of a high spirit, and who in imitation of Hercules, used in fight, always to wear a Lyons skin about him, and bare a club in his hand. The Grecians also dwelling upon the sea-coast of Asia, sent him six thousand men; so that the Grecians in his army were in all, ten thousand men. But before their coming to him, the king was advanced; past Syria, and as far as Phœnicia, and had pitched his camp not far from Sidon. [Ibid.]

Phenice the king of Sidon, combining with Mentor in his treason, assigned him to the guard of a certain quarter in the town, and left him to manage the treason on that side; himself with some few went out of the city, pretending that he would go to the common meeting of the council of Phenicia. Now he had in his company too of the principal members of the city, as councillors about him: all which he gave up to be butchered, as traitors, as the authors of that defect on from him; and shortly after Artaxerxes, when some more of the chief of the Sidonians came to him to crave his mercy in suppliant wile, with Olive branches in their hands, he caused them every man to be struck through with darts, as he had done the former, having understood formerly by Tennes the king, that the city should be absolutely delivered up unto him, and without conditions; and then dealt with the Grecians which he had in pay to open the gates; and to receive the king, and him into the city, and so betrayed it to Artaxerxes: who being once in, and seeing that Tennes could do him no further service, caused his throat to be cut likewise. Ibid.

The Sidonians, who before the Kings coming had fed fire on all their ships, so the end no man should have left any possibility of saving himself by flight that way; but themselves every man up in his own house, with his wife and children, and then for their houses on fire, and consumed all to cinders. Two number of them which perished in this fire, servants and all, amounted by records, to 40 thousand souls. The cinders of the place, with the molten silver and gold among, the King sold for many a Talent. The rest of the cities affrighted herewith, surrendered themselves presently to the King.

From thence the King went and took Jericho by assault: as we find in [Solinus cap. 35.]

and took many along with him out of Judea to serve him in his war in Egypt: as we gather out of Aristeas, in his book of the Septuagint Interpreters; where also, in the Epistle of Ptolemy Philadelphus, to Eleazarus, it is said, that many of the Jews were carried away into Egypt by the Persians, whiles they bare the sway there. Which saying of his, is to be referred to this time of Artaxerxes Ochus; as is also that place in Justin, where he saith, [lib. 36, cap. 3.] if there be any truth in either of them, That Xerxes was the first of the Persians, that subdued the Jews.

While Salamis was besieged by Phocyon and Euagoras, all the rest of the cities submitted to the Persians, onely Protagoras King of Salamis held it out against them, wherein Euagoras his care was, to be restored to his fathers kingdom in Salamis. But some having done him very ill offices, and laid great accusations to his charges with the King, he seeing the King to favour and help Protagoras against him, gave off all hope of prevailing in that sure: and went and cleared himself of all imputations before the King: which he did so well, that the King bestowed a far better Dynasty or Principality upon him in Asia. And Protagoras at last voluntarily submitting to the King, held the kingdom of Salamis quietly ever after. [Diodor. year 3 Olympiade 107.] But this Euagoras of whom we now speak, it seems, was the grandchild of an other Euagoras, who died 24 years before, by his son Nicoteles: for that Euagoras the elder, had a son Nicoteles, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Salamis; and another called Protagoras, appeareth out from his kingdom by Protagoras, which was his Uncle. But having, as was said before, a greater thing than Salamis bestowed on him by this Ochus; by his misbehaviour therein used, he was fain to flee again into Cyprus, where being taken, he was put to death as a malefactor, [as Diodorus sheweth.]

Eucubius in Chron, sheweth that in this 3 year of the 107. Olympiade, Ochus making Nectanebus to flee into Ethiopia, possessed himself of all Egypt: And that in him was destroyed the kingdom of Egypt, and that here was the period of Manethos Commentaries concerning the affairs of Egypt: and in what manner Egypt was taken in by Ochus, Diodorus in this year doth at large deliver: the summe whereof is this.

Ochus after the destruction of Sidon, and when his auxiliary forces were come unto him from Argos and Thebes, and the Grecian Cities in Asia were come unto him, uniting all his forces, he marched to the Lough of Sirbonis: where a great part of his army perished, being swallowed up for want of guides in those bogs there, which are called Baraktra. From thence he marched to Pelusium, the first mouth of the River Nile: held by a Garrison of 5 thousand men, commanded by one Philophron. Here Ochus the Grecians encamped close to the city: the Persians lay 40 furlongs off. Here Ochus divided the Greeks into three brigades; every of which was to have two Commanders, the one a Persian, the other a Grecian. The first brigade was of the Bactrians, commanded by Lachetes a Theban, and Rosaces a Persian, Governor of Ionia and Lydia. The second was of the men of Argos, commanded by Nicotratus a Grecian, and Aristazanes a Persian. The third was by Mentor, who betrayed Sidon, and Bagoas an Eunuch of Persia. To every of which Grecian brigades thus commanded, there were added also sundry companies and troops, and sea Captains with their squadrons of ships; on the other side, Nectanebus had in his army 20 thousand auxiliary Grecians: and as many to his aide out of Lydia; and out of his own country of Egypt, 60 thousand men, called Warriors, with an exceeding great multitude of river boats, fitted to fight in the river Nile, if need should be: when as therefore he had furnished every place with reasonably sufficient Garrisons, himself, with 30 thousand Egyptians, and 5 thousand Grecians, and one half of his Lybians, kept the passages which lay most open and easiest for invasion.

Things therefore thus ordered on both sides, Nicotratus who commanded the Argivians, having gotten for his guides certain Egyptians, whose children and wives were kept for hostages by the Persians, with his part of ships put over one of the ditches or cuts of the Nile, the most out of fight that might be; which the next Garrisons of the Egyptians perceiving, sent no less than 7 thousand men, commanded by Clinius, of the Isle of Cos, to cut them off. In that encounter, the Grecians of the Persian side, slew of the other, upward of 5 thousand men, with their Commander Clinius: which slaughter of his men coming to Nectanebus his eares, he with the army which he had about him retired presently to Memphis to make that sure: mean while Lacrates, whom commanded the first brigade of the Grecians, hastened to set upon Pelusium, and having drained away the water that ran under Pelusium, by a ditch that he cut, and raised a mount upon the very channel of the old River, there planted his batteries. The Grecians within, who had till then manfully maintained the place; hearing now that Nectanebus had left the field, and was retired to Memphis, fell a treating with their enemies enemies about a composition; and when Lacrates had told them; and bound it with an oath, that the town being surrendered, they with such things as they brought out with them should be all sent away into Greece, they gave up the Town unto him.

Mentor who commanded the third brigade, when he saw that all the cities were manned with two sorts of people, Grecians and Egyptians, he caused a brute to be cast abroad, that Artaxerxes his purpose and resolution was to deal most graciously and well with those, who willingly submitted to him; as for the rest, they must look to fare no better than Sidon had done. Whereupon the Grecians and Egyptians: every where strove who should be first and foremost to give up their Towns and places to the Persians. And first Bubastus, then all the rest of the cities, upon such terms as they could get, came all in, and submitted to the Persian.

Mean while Nectanebus being at Memphis, and hearing how all the cities fell off, one after another to the Persian, despairing of better fortune, gathered together what treasure he could, and fled with it to Ethiopia, thus [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 107.] Others report, that having his head, and in a disguised habit, he got him to Pelusium, and from thence as a passenger, went to Philip King of Macedon, at Pella. [see the Excerpta, Barbaro-Latina, published by Scaliger, pag. 58. the Chronicle of Alexandria, at Fausti Siculi, published by Raderns, p. 293. Cedrenus in the Basile Edition, p. 124. and Glycas, p. 195. out of Pseudo-Callisthenes his fabulous history of Alexander.]

Artaxerxes Ochus, having thus possessed himself of all Egypt, dismantled all the principal cities in it, and spoiling their temples, got from thence an infinite mass of treasure: he took away moreover all their records and writings out of their most ancient temples, yet these the Priests bought again, and recovered by a great sum of money given to Bagoas the Eunuch for them, [Diod. ut supra.] Ochus also is said to have derided their ceremonies, and their god, Apis, [Seeverus Sulpicius in his sacred History, lib. 2.] And because the Egyptians, for his dull behaviour and spirit, called him an ass; he violently took their god Apis, and sacrificed him to an ass, [Elian, Varia, Histor. lib. 4. cap. 8.] and not that onely, but he gave order to his Cooks to cut him in pieces, and dresse him for dinner to be eaten, Suidas in Ochus.

After this, Ochus rewarding his Grecians by whom he had brought this great work to passe, with wealth and honour, every man according to his desert, he sent them all away to go every man for his own country and leaving Pherendates for his victory and government of Egypt, he himself, being full of glory and spoils, after to great a conquest made, returned to Babylon with his army, [Diodor. year 3 Olympiade 107.] whither he carried also prisoners a great many of the Jews, sending most of them into Hircania, bordering upon the Caspian sea: For to Georgius Synkelus, out of Julius Africanus reports in this wise: Οχους δ' ἐγγεγονότατος, &c. (i. e.) Ochus the son of Artaxerxes, making a journey into Egypt, led away certain Jews captives: whereof he placed some in Hircania near the Caspian sea, and the rest in Babylon it self, where they continue unto this day, as many Greek writers report.

Hecataeus Abderia also, in his first book, de Judeis, cited by Josephus, in his 1 book contra Apionem, talks of many a ten thousand of Jews, carried away to Babylon, but of their carrying from thence into Hircania, Paulus Orosius writeth in this wise, [lib. 7. c. 7.] Ochus, saith he, who is also called Artaxerxes, after his great and long war in Egypt was ended, carried many of the Jews, and commanded them to inhabit in Hircania, near the Caspian sea; where they continue to this day, in a wonderful increase of their stock and lineage, and, as is thought, will one day break out from thence into some other quarter of the world. Which opinion yet, as it seemeth, had no other ground but that Apocryphal of Esdra's lib. 4. cap. 13. 40.—46. concerning the ten tribes carried away by Salmanasser, and that of the Jews, concerning certain Hebrews that up I know not where, and of a river Sabbation. As for that which Petrus Trecentis in his Scholastical history, [1 Eftb. c. 5.] and out of him Vincentius Bellouacensis in his Specul. Histor. lib. 30. cap. 89.] reports, of those ten tribes, shut up afterward more close than before within the Caspian mountains, these things agree nothing at all with Josephus, whom he alleadgeth for his author; but rather with the writings, of that false or supposititious Gorion, and Methodius, and even with those fictitious relations of the Mahometan Arcoran it self, concerning Alexander.

Ochus having rewarded Mentor of Rhodes, with 100 talents in money, and very rich furniture for a house, made him over and above, Praefect, of all the Asiatic shoure, with full and absolute power to suppress all rebellions which should happen to arise in those parts, which great grace and favour he so well used, that whereas Artabazus and Memnon who had lately made war upon Ochus (of which see before in the year of the world, 1648, 1691.) and being now driven out of Asia, were fled to Philip King of Macedon, and lived with him; he got both their pardons of the king, and sent for them both to come unto him, with all their families: for indeed Artabazus had

Mentor and Memnon's sister, eleven sons and ten daughters: with which so numerous a progeny, Mentor was exceeding much delighted, and raised the sons, every of them, as he grew up, to places of Government in the Army. [Diodorus year 4. Olympiade 107.]

Mentor drew Hermias, Prince, or Tyrant, of Atarne, who was in rebellion against Ochus, and had many strong Cities and Castles under him, to a parley, upon promise made him that he would procure him the Kings pardon, but having once gotten him into his fingers, he laid hold on him, and having gotten his seal ring, dispatched away letters presently in his name, requiring the Captains and Garrisons every where of his dominion, to surrender and give up their several places, to the bearers thereof: which was forthwith done accordingly. [Id. ibid. and Polyanius Strateg. lib. 6.] And in like manner did he with all the other Rebels of the King: partly by force, and partly by tricks and policies, he brought them all into the Kings subjection again; sending the King ever now and then, hired soldiers out of Greece, and ordering all matters committed to his charges with great judgement, valour and fidelity to the King. [Diod. year 3. and 4. Olymp. 107. and Demosthenes in his Oration, contra Aristocratem.]

When Spartacus the King of Bosphorus Cimicius was dead, his Brother Parylades succeeded him in the kingdom, and held it 38 years. [Diod. year 4. of 107. Olympiade.]

In the 1. year of the 108 Olympiade, when Theophilus was L. Chancellor at Athens, Plato the Philosopher, founder of the old Academia, died; as Hermippus in Laertius, Dionysius Halicarnassus, in his Epistle to Ammeus concerning Democritus, and Athenicus, [lib. 5. c. 13.] report, of whom that saying of Numenius the Pythagorean goes, reported of Helvichus the Miletian, (in Numenius) that what ever he said of God and the world, he stole it all out of the books of Moses. But, even long before him, reported, not only by Helvichus, and his follower Suidas, but, even long before them, by Clemens Alexandrinus, [Strom. 1. in peripateticos, etc. for what is Plato, but Moses put into good Greek?] and that he translated many things out of Moses his books into his own writings; Aristobolus the Jew, mentioned before in the year of the world 3479, faith, so that I shall not need for this purpose to vouch the authority of Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Ambrose, Theodoret, Johannes Philoponus, writing upon the Hexameron, and other Christians.

After the decease of Plato, Aristotle the latter up of the Sect of the Peripatetic Philosophers, travelled to Hermias the Eunuch and tyrant of Atarne, of whom I spake in the year going before, with whom he lived and conversed three years, as Laertius out of Apollodorus his Chronicle, and Dionysius in his fore-cited Epistle to Ammeus testify; and Strabo [lib. 11.] tells us, that he lived at Afios, which was under the dominion of Hermias, and of which mention is made, [Ath. 20. 13.] by reason of that affinity which he had contracted with him: for he married Pythiades the adoptive daughter of Hermias, and either his sister, or his brothers natural daughter, I know not whether, though Aristotle the Peripatetic (as we find in Euseb. de Preparat. Evangel. lib. 15.) That for the love which he bare Hermias in his life time, he married her after his death; and whilst he remained in Asia, he conversed with a certain Jew, a man of great learning and temperance withal, which was come from out of the upper Asia to the sea side, and there Aristotle, with sundry others addicted that way, were his auditors, and heard him discoursing in the Greek tongue, as Clearchus of Solos a principal Scholar of Aristotles, cited by Josephus, [lib. 1. contra Apionem.] in his 1. book of Somno, (l. c.) of sleep, reports. So that perhaps in this Jew it is that the Peripatetic Sect of Philosophers owe to many good sayings of theirs, so consonant to the words of Moses and the Prophets: as our Clement of Alexandria affirms they are, out of Aristobolus, afore said, and a great maintainer of that way, [lib. 5. Strom.]

Satyrus, Prince or Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, giving up all into the hands of Timotheus, eldest son to his Brother Clearchus, was shortly after taken with a most grievous and incurable disease, by a Cancer grown in his groin, and which never left eating inward till it had consumed him, after he had lived 65 years, whereof he spent 70 in the Government of Heraclea, [Antonin in Excerpt. c. 3.] and Timotheus forthwith took his younger brother Dionysius into the consorship of his Principality, and designed him withal for his successor in case he should dye, [lib. c. 4.]

Memmon of Rhodes, a commander of the Persians aforementioned, under a colour of friendship, sent for Hermias the Eunuch, Tyrant of Atarne to come unto him; and when he came, seized on him, and sent him prisoner to the King: who presently took and hanged him. But the Philosophers whom he had sent for to be about him, as Aristotle and Xenocrates, a Chalcedonian in Bithynia borne, got away, and escaped out of the Persian dominions, [Strabo lib. 13.] But Aristotle when he had lived with him 3 years, went to Mytilene, what time Eubulus was L. Chancellor at Athens: this infant, year 4. of the Olymp. 108. as Laertius out of Apollodorus his Chronicles reports: as as also Dionysius Halicarnassus in his Epistle to Ammeus aforementioned. There is also extant in Laertius an Epigram of Aristotles, making upon Hermias his Statue at Delphos to this purpose.

*Him did the King of Persia slay
Contrary to Joves law or reason,
Not by force or bloody fray,
But by a friends detested treason.*

Which I therefore thought fit to insert in this place, that no man might gather that Aristotle was any way consenting to his death out of those words of Tertullian, where he faith, Aristotle made his friend Hermias shamefully to leave his place.

Idricus, Prince of Caria (whose wealth is to much celebrated by Isocrates in his Oration to Philip of Macedon) died: unto whom his wife, both wife and sister, Ada succeeded, and held that Principality 4 years. [Strabo lib. 14. Diodor. year 1. Olymp.] For in Asia it was grown an usual thing after the time of Semiramis, for wives to succeed their husbands in their kingdoms. [Aria in Exped. Alex. lib. 2. pag. 24.]

Pexodarus the youngest son of Hecatomnus, turning his sister Ada out, held that Principality 5 years. [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 109.] Leaving her but one only town to live upon, called Alinda.

But Pexodarus sent for Oromobates a Persian Lord to make him his Consort in the Dynasty or Principality of Caria; and gave him his daughter Ada to wife, [Aria. lib. 1. Strabo lib. 14.]

Philippus King of Macedon besieged Perinthus a Town in Thracia, lying upon Propontus with an army of 30 thousand men, thoroughly provided of all sorts of armes and engines of battery, and so incessantly playing upon the wall, that he gave them no time of rest or intermission. The King of Persia growing jealous of this mans daily growth in the World, gave order to his Commanders and Governors in Asia, that they should send to relieve Perinthus, all that possible they could, which accordingly they did, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 109.] which was the thing, that Alexander allied to Darius, as one of the principal causes why he invaded Asia, in his Epistle to him, [Aria. lib. 1. pag. 41.]

Artaxerxes Ochus, having now reigned 33 years, fell sick; which Bagoas the Eunuch and chief man about him, as Chiliarch of the Kingdom, seeing, gave him poison, and rid him out of the way; using therein the help of his Physician, [Diodor. year 3. of the 104. Olympiade: and year 2. of the 111. Olympiade: Severus Sulpicius. Histor. Sacra lib. 2.] For being an Egyptian born, he so hated Ochus, for killing their god Apis, that he not onely revenged that scorn, (as Sulpicius speaketh) put upon his nation, by killing the King; but also when he was dead, cut his flesh all in gobbets, and threw it to the cats to eat, and instead thereof, put I know not what else into the coffin to be buried for him, at the time of his funerals: and of his thigh-bones made beds and handles for swords, thereby representing the propensity of his munde, whilst he lived, to blood and slaughter, [Elian. Varia. Histor. lib. 6. cap. 8.] And (as one that could do all in all in the kingdom,) when the father was dead, he let up his youngest son Arsen, and made him King, and withal, put to death all his brothers, that the young King having none left to help him, might be forced to cleave to the latter, and rely the more upon him, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 109. and year 2. Olymp. 111.]

Timotheus the Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, died 15 years after his father Clearchus, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 110.] This man, for his great goodness sake, was not called any more a Tyrant, but Eusebius and Sextus (i.e.) a gracius Lord and Saviour. His body was honourably enterea by his brother and succellour Dionysius: with jewels, and zillings, and wriftings, and entreaties of all sorts: some of which were performed then presently, as the time would afford; others afterward, but with greater pomp and magnificence than the former, [Antonin in Excerpt. cap. 4.]

At a general assembly of all Greece at Corinth, Philip King of Macedon, was made General of all the Grecian Forces, with absolute power over them, to make war against the king of Persia: whereupon he presently made infinite preparations for it; and having assembled a certain number of soldiers to be levied upon every city returned into Macedon, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 110.]

The next Spring, Philip sent three of his Captains into Asia, Parmenion, Amyntas and Attalus, with a part of his army, to infect the kings countries there, and to let at liberty the cities of the Greeks, [Justin. lib. 9. cap. 5. Diod. year 1. Olymp. 111.]

Bagoas the Eunuch, when he undoubtedly perceived that Arsen meditated revenge upon him, cut off him and all his children, in the 3 year of his reign: And when the kings Race was thus utterly destroyed, so that there was none of them left, then let up Darius, a friend of his own, and the son of one Artamius, which was a brother to Artax-

Bagos, whose hand had been so much used that way, went now about to make away Darius also, by a poisoned potion; but the matter being discovered to him, he sent fairly for him, and when he came, entreated him to drink it off; which when he refused, he caused it to be poured down his throat, (Diodorus year 2, Olympiads 112.) but so told the people that he had slain him in defence of himself, [Q. Curtius lib. 6.]

Darius, in Philips life time, purposed to begin a war upon him in Macedon it self. [Diodor. lib. 17.]

Sanballat a Cuthzan born, from whom the Samaritans had their beginning, was by the King made Governour of Samaria, who gave his daughter in marriage to Nicotus the son of Manafes, brother to Jaddus the high Priest at Hierusalem, hoping by this band of affinity to hold in the better with the nation of the Jews, [Joseph. Antiq. lib. 11, cap. 7.]

Philip, king of Macedonia, while he was celebrating the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander the king of Epirus, at a place called Egasus, was murdered by Paulanias, the Ion of Cerales, of Orestis, a Town and Country in Macedonia, [Diodor. year 3. Olympiad 111. Justin lib. 9. cap. 8. Telsiph lib. 11. cap. 8.] But Alexander in his Epistle to Darius, says, that his father was murdered by Alifanians, let our work, and hired by Darius: thereat, with an infinite sum of money, as in Q. Curti lib. 4. cap. 1. and in Arria lib. 2. pa. 41.

A little before Philip was thus slain, Neoptolimus a Tragedian is reported by Diod. [lib. 6.] to have sung an ominous long before him; which very long was afterward again sung before Caligula the Emperor, the very day wherein he was murdered, as Suetonius in his life reporteth. Mneſter, ſaith he, the Stage-player, ſung and acted thus Sutorius in his life reporteth. Chenisey is a famous Greek Tragedian, that in a play wherein Philip the King very long, which heretofore Nicopolemus the Tragedian, did in a play wherein Philip the King of Macedon was killed: which part of the Latin History, Iosephus as it seemeth, hath not so well understanding, [lib. 19. Antiq. c. 1.] And he had spoken of this Murderer, and the long which he hung, saying ἄνθρωπος ὁποῖον ἄνθρωπος ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ, ὁ δὲ ὅμοιος ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ, which Rufinus renders thus in Latin, and I to this effect in English: That the same Murderer Stage-player danced the fable of Cynarus, wherein both Cynirus himself and his daughter Meliora were both slain: draws it in, as if the killing of them both had fallen out, upon the lame day, thus, ἡμεῖς αὐτοὶ δὲ, Sc. It goes for currant, I think he, that the murder of Colidamus was acted upon the self same day, whereupon, Philip, the son of Amyntas King of Macedon, was slain, by one of his friends, Pasjanias by name, as he was going into the Theatre. And to some men place both these murders upon the 24 day of our January. But the time of Philip's death, will best be known, by the time of Alexander his succeeding him in his kingdom.

After the death of Philip, when Pythodemus, as Ariarius or Pythodoros, [Diodor. Sic. year 1. Olympiade 111.] calls him, was L. Chancellor in Athens, Alexander being then 20 years of age succeeded him, as Plutarch, and our of Trogius, Jaiting, writte. And although Ariarius, in the beginning of his History of Alexander, faith, that was about 20 years old when, after his fathers death, he took his journey into Peloponnesus, which may seem in some fort to abate of the precise number of 30 of his age, yet, to speake nothing of that interval of time, which might passe between his fathers death, and his journey thither) the exact account of his then age, appears from the time of his death: 1 mentioned in the end of the same history, where it is said that he lived 32 years, 8 months, and that of them he reigned 12 years and thole 8 months, for conducting 12 years and 8 months out of the total above mentioned, there remain 20 conducting years; without addition or subtraction either of year or month: 1 and thus it appears that Philip died in the end of the Macedonic month Dæis, by his own Ephemerides (which I shall in due time publish to the view of the world) I therefore gather, and from thence conclude, that Alexander began his reign, about the 8 month before that of the month Dii, and in consequence thereof, that Philip was murdered about the 14 of September, in which month of ours the month Di began, as I have made appear in my discourse of the solar year of the Macedonians and Asiatics, rather than the 24 of December.

3669. Alexander coming to Peloponnes, and treading in his fathers steps, summoned all the cities of Greece to Corinth, & was by the general suffrage of all the Grecians there, saving the Lacedemonians only, made General and Captain in his fathers stead, to go against the Persians, [Justin lib. 11. cap. 2. Diodorus lib. 17. Arrianus lib. 1. pag. 1.]

From thence returning into Macedon, in the very first of the next [spring, he made an inroad through Thrace, upon the Illyrians, and the Thracians, [Arria, lib. 1.] where in a pitched field upon the banks of the Danow, he overthrew Syrmus, the King of the Thracians, [Idem, Alex.] mean while, tidings came to him, that the Athenians, Lacedæmonians and Thebans were all fallen over to the King of Persia's side : and that the Orator thereof was Demosthenes the Orator, having been bribed thereto, by a vast summe of money from the Persians, and that he, in an Oration made, had assured them that Alexander with all his forces, was quite broken and overthrowen by the King of the Thracians, [Justin, lib. 11. cap. 2. with Epichimus in his Oration cons. Ctesiphontem.] And the Athenians hereby, by certain Legates of theirs, and Demosthenes his Epistle by them sent unto him, solicited Attalus, one of the 3 Captains, sent by Philip into Asia, to revolt from Alexander, as the Greeks had done, and made a new Decree, to vacate that former order of theirs, whereby he was made General of Greece, [Diod. year 3. Olym. 111. with Demosth. his Oration for Ctesiphon.]

111. with Demofon, his Orator for Cleophon.
Mermion the Rhodian Commander, being sent into Phrygia with 5 thousand soldiers, passing the hill Ida, fell suddenly upon the city of Cyzicum: but missing of his purpose, wasted their territory all over; and returned loaden with a vast spoil from thence. Diad. ib.

When Pexodarus was dead, his son in law, Orontobates, by the authority of the Persian King, succeeded in the Principality of Caria, [Strabo, lib. 14. Arrian, lib. 1. pag. 24.]

Alexander having defeated those barbarous people, turned himself towards Greece, which was then all in a combustion, and in his way, made the Theſſalonians his friends, and paid the ſtreights of Thermopylae, and won them of Ambracia to him by his kindneſs, then paſſing with his whole army into Boeotia, and camping before Cadmea, which was held by a Garriſon of Macedons, the Athenians ſent their Legates to aſk his pardon, and he gave it them; but when the Thebans reſuſed it, being offered to them, he fell roundly to work, and beſieged their City, very ſtrongly, [Diad. year 2. Q. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. in Alexan.]

He sent also Hecateus, with an army into Asia, to apprehend Attalus; but Attalus, having recollected himself, sent the letter which he had received from Demetrius, to Alexander, with a very exact and serious excuse and justification of himself: Nevertheless Hecateus following his commission, and getting him into his hand, sent him packing into another world; and to the Macedonian army which was in Asia, grew quiet, and free from mutiny any further. (Ibid. ib.)

Parmenio, who stood ever truly affected to Alexander, took Grinnum by force, and fold away all the townsmen thereof for slaves: from thence he went and besieged Pitarane, but Memnon approaching, so frightened the Macedons, that they raised their siege.

Callas, with an army composed of Macedons, and other hired companies, fought with the Persians in the country of Troas, though far inferiour to them in number, and was there beaten, and fain to retire to Rheum, [Ibid.]

Alexander layed Thebes in Boeotia level with the ground, [Dod. year 2. Olymp. 111. in the month of our Octob. which was the time when the Miseries were kept in Athens: whereupon it was, that that great solemnity, which they were then in hand with, was laid aside for that time, [Id. in Alexan. and Arria, lib. 1.] there were slain of the Thebans at the taking of their city, 90 thousand men, and sold for slaves; 30 thousand; all went to pots [aving only the Priests, and his father Philip guests, and Pindarus the Poets house, [Elian, Varia, Hist. lib. 13. c. 7.]

Alexander at a common Council of Greece, being chosen General a second time, against the Persians, went to visit Diogenes the Philosopher there; [Plutarch in Alexan.]

Then returned he into Macedon, [Arria, lib. 1, pag. 111.] where in a town called Dios, as he was wholly taken up with thoughts of subduing Asia: in his sleep the likeness or resemblance of the High Priest of Hierusalem appeared to him, who had him be courageous and bold, and speedily with his army to put over into Asia, and that he would be his conductor in the conquest of the Persian Empire; as he himself reports in [Josephus, lib. 11, of his Antiquities, cap. ult.]

In the very beginning of the Spring, therefore Alexander, setting forth from his own home, after 20 dayes march came to Seltus: and from thence put over with his army into Asia, [Arria, lib. 1.] (Eumenius being then L. Chancellor at Athens) eleven years before he died: as Clement of Alexandria observes out of the most ancient Chronologies, [lib. 1, Strom.] to wit, the third month before Ctesicles, came to be Lord Chancellor or Prator there: in which time, it is, that Diodor. Sic. placeth his passage into Asia; whom Zosimus following as it seemeth without scruple, [lib. 1, Hist.] saith, that he passed not into Asia, till the third year of his reign; when as indeed it was in the second: to wit, [year 2, running Olymp. 111.]

Leaving therefore Antipater, behind him, to look to matters in Europe, with 12 thousand Foot, 11500 Horse, Alexander himself, with 60 sail of ship; put over to Troas, [Diodor, ut. sup.] but gave order to Parmenion, to transport the greatest part of his Foot and Horse from Seltus to Abidus: which accordingly he did, with the help of 160 men of War, and a multitude of other ships of burden, [Arria, lib. 1.]

Concerning the just number of men which he carried with him into Asia, even they who were present at it, do not well agree among themselves. In [Polybius lib. 12, cap. 663, in fi.] Calisthenes is reported to affirm, that he had 4500 Horse, and 30000 Foot. In Plutarch, in that discourse of his of Alexander's fortune, Aristobolus is alleged to say, that of Foot he had 30 thousand, of Horse 4 thousand. Ptolemei the son of Lagos, King afterward of Egypt, agrees to the 30 thousand Foot, but says there were 5 thousand Horse: But Anaximenes of Lampacus, raises the numbers of both; and says, there were 40 thousand Foot, and 5 thousand hundred Horse. In the number of 4 thousand Horse, Livi. [lib. 9.] agreeth with Aristobolus; and Diodorus, [lib. 17.] Justin [lib. 11, cap. 6.] and Orosius, [lib. 3, cap. 16.] all with Calisthenes for the number, 4 thousand 5 hundred Horse, though [Arria, lib. 1.] saith, that he had above 5 thousand; and even in Diodorus himself, the particulars cast up, amount to 5000 one hundred Horse: but in the number of 30000 Foot, he concurs to a hair with Calisthenes, Aristobolus, and Ptolemei. Livi says there were more than 30, Arrianus, that there were not much more than 30000 Foot. To these Justinus and Orosius add 20000 more. But that number of 40000 Foot which Calisthenes and Anaximenes speak of, Julius Frontinus assigneth to his whole army, thus. Alexander of Macedon, with 40 thousand men, all old soldiers, trained up under his father Philip, set upon the whole World; and slew an infinite number of his enemies, [Frontin. Stratag. lib. 4, cap. 2.]

For pay of his army, Aristobolus saith he took with him, but 70 talents of money: Duris saith, but 30 dayes provision: one Sicritus addeth, that he went in debt 200 talents to pay his army, [Plutarch in his life, and in his book of the fortune of Alexander.]

So soon as he touched upon the Continent, Alexander the first of all others, threw a Spear on shore, thereby to take possession, as it were, of all Asia; and leapt on shore, capering and tripping, all armed as he was: and offering sacrifice, he besought the gods, that those lands might willingly receive him for their King: and then went and sacrificed to the ghost of Achilles, from whom he was descended by the mothers side; and of Ajax, and other Worthies of the Greeks who died at the war of Troy, [Diodor, Justin. Arrianus:] commending the great good fortune of Achilles in two respects. First for having to true a friend about him as Patroclus; and such a Trumpet of his praise, as Homer was [Plut. in Alex. Cic. pro. Archia Poeta, & Arria, lib. 1.]

When he came into Ilium, he sacrificed to Pallas of Troy; and hanging up his own arms in her Temple, took from thence in lieu of them, some other arms out of the chancel there, which had remained from the time of the Trojan wars, [Diodor. Arria,] and when among other reliques they shewed him Alexander's or Paris his Lure, or Harp, he said, he would have thanked them, if they could have shewed him that of Achilles his; whereunto he had sung the praises of famous men, [Plut. in Alex. Elia. Variar. Hist. lib. 9, cap. 38.]

From Ilium he went to Arisbe, where his whole army, having passed the sea, was encamped. And the next day, passing by, first Percota, then Lampacus, he came up to a River called, Prosaltum, [Arria, lib. 1.] He had once a purpose utterly to have destroyed

stroyed Lampacus with the inhabitants thereof; for that they had already revolted, or were threwdly suspected of a purpose to revolt to the Persians: And when he saw Anaximenes the Historian, a man very well known to him, and to his father before him, coming to him, and supposing what his errand was, he sware first and said, what ever he desired of him, that he would not do: Then quoth Anaximenes, Sir, I beseech you to destroy Lampacus. And Alexander being to caught in his own net by the wit of the man, though much against his will, yet spared the place, and went his way, [Valer. Max. lib. 7, cap. 3. Pausan. in his Elia, lib. 2. Suidas, in the words, Anaximenes.]

Alexander, having with much difficulty and danger passed the River Granion in Phrygia, fought a pitched battle with the Persians in the plains of Adraftia, Justinus and Orosius say, that there were at that time in the Persian army, 60000 Foot, and 20000 Horse; Arrianus somewhat improbably adds, that there were over and above of hired souldiers, little less than 20000 Foot: But Diodor. is more cautious than so, and says, that his Horse was above 100, and his Foot under 100 thousand men to, of these there fell in that battel 20000 Foot, and 2500 Horse: as Plutarch says; but Diodor. reports, that they lost 10000 Foot, and no less than 2000 Horse, and above 20000 taken prisoners. Arrianus his account is, that there were slain of the Persian Horse in the chase, 1000. but that their foreign and hired souldiers were almost all cut off; and 2000 taken prisoners. Not to speak of Orosius, who out of all reason says, that there were upon the point of 400000 slain, [lib. 4, cap. 1.]

In this fight Alexander who wore that armor which he had taken out of the Temple of Palas at Ilium, had his head-piece cut quite in pieces to his very hair: and of his men were missing, as Plutarch out of Aristobolus, who was in it reports, 25 Horse, and 9 Foot. But Justin and Orosius deliver, that besides those 9 Foot, there were slain 120 Horse. But according to Arrianus, there fell of Alexander's own Troop, at the first encounter about 25, all Macedon's whole Statues were all cast in brass by Lyttipus, and of the others, 60 Horse, and of the Foot, about 30. all which Alexander the day following caused to be entered in their arms, with all Funeral rights and obsequies. This great and memorable victory, and which opened him the way to the Empire of all Asia, was gotten in the month Dæsius with the Macedonians upon the 6 of Thargelion with the Athenians; that is, upon the 20 of our May, [year 2, Olymp. 111, yet running: as we have already delivered in our discourse of the Macedonian and Asiatic Solar year, [cap. 1, pag. 4, 5, 11.]

Alexander, having a little refreshed his army, march forward thorough Lydia, and came to Sardes; which was voluntarily surrendered to him, by Mithrines, or Mithrenes, the Governour, with all the provisions and treasures therein, [Diodorus Arria.]

Then going to Ephesus, he there abolished the Oligarchie which he found there, and instituted a Democratic among them: and assigned all the tributes which were formerly paid to Darius, unto Diana. The Ephesians cryed out for justice against those who had robbed the Temple of Diana, and demolished the Statue of Philip, which was there set up: and drew Syrpaches, and Pelagion his son, and the children of Syrpaches his brother, and stoned them to death, [Arria, lib. 1.] Moreover they enlarged and beauiified the Temple it self which was burnt down by Erostratus upon the night in which Alexander was born: appointing Democrates the Architect to oversee the work; whom Alexander afterward appointed to order the building of Alexandria in Egypt, as Julius Solinus, [cap. 40.] writeth: whereof Artemidion speaketh in [Scribo lib. 14.] saying that Alexander promised to make the Ephesians allowance for the cost they had already been at about it, and to add more thereto if they would suffer himself to be reputed the author and builder of the work: but they refused.

Whiles Alexander stayed at Ephesus, Ambassadors came to him from Magnesia and Tralles, and surrendered their cities to him. And he sent Parmenion, with 2500 Foot of foreigners, and as many of his Macedon's, and 200 Horse of his auxiliaries, to receive them. He sent also Alcimalus the son of Agathocles, to the cities of Eolia and Ionia, which were hitherto held by the Persians, with no less numbers, than he had done with Parmenion; he every where abolished Oligarchical, and set up Democratical Governments in their cities: and gave leave to every of them to live after their own laws, and took off the tributes, which the Persian had imposed on them, [Arria, lib. 1.]

Himself remaining at Ephesus, sacrificed to Diana, and with his whole army all in battel array went in procession to her; and the day after, with the rest of his Foot, and his Archers and Agrians, and Horse of Thrace, and aides of his confederates, and his own Troop, with three other, he went to Miletus, [Id. ibid.] for thither the Persians, which escaped out of the fight at Granicum, were fled with their Generall Memnon. [Diodor.] But three dayes before the re coming thither,

Alexander had sent Nicanor, with 160 ships to possess himself of Lada, an Island lying over against Miletus, and had put into it 4 thousand men, Thracians, and other nations, so that the Persian fleet consisting of 400 sail, coming thither afterward, was fain to get them going to the mount of Micalæ, [Arrianus.]

Alexander falling to work, and besieging Miletus, both by sea and land, and having battered their walls; in the end, they gave up the place and themselves, in all suppliant unto him. Three hundred Mercenary Greeks, which had fled from thence into a little Island thereby; Alexander took and lifted them among his own companies. He gave the Milesians life and liberty: as for the Barbarians there found, either slain, or sold them all for slaves, [Diodorus year 3. Olympiade 112. Arrian, lib. 1.]

Alexander dismissed his fleet of 160 ships (which yet was in all consisting of 182 bottoms, as Justin, lib. 12. cap. 6. says) keeping only one score of the Athenian vessels, to carry his engines of battering in, from place to place, as occasion required, [Id. ibid.]

Memnon of Rhodes, sending his wife and children to Darius, as pledges of his fidelity, was made General of all his army, [Diod. ib.]

Alexander marched away with his army into Caria, and where ever he went, he proclaimed liberty to all cities of the Greeks; every of them to live after their own laws, and tribute free: giving it out every where, that he undertook not this war, but for the liberty of the Greeks, against the Persians, [Id. ibid.]

While he was upon his way, Ada met him, whom Pexodanus his brother had put from the Principality of Caria; and gave up into his hands her city Abinda, the strongest place in all Caria; desiring to be restored to the rest of the forts and cities of that country, thither, to do him service, in taking in the neck of the forts, and adopted the King for her son: in requital whereof, he gave her the keeping of her town Abinda, and proclaimed her Queen of Caria; bad her claim it as her own; and refused not to be called her son: Whereupon all the cities of Caria sent their Legates to him, presenting him with Crowns of gold, and offered him their service, in whatever he should command them, [Id. ibid. Strabo, lib. 14. Arrian, lib. 1. Plut. in Alexander.]

Orontobates a Persian, held Halicarnassus the metropolis of Caria, ever since Pexodanus his father in law his dayes, with whom Memnon of Rhodes the Persian General, had joyned himself with all his forces. Alexander encamping before the walls thereof, began to assault and batter it in a furious and fearful manner: and Ephialtes an Athenian, behaved himself, above all other, bravely in the defence thereof. But when he and others were slain upon the breaches, then Memnon, and certain other Persian Lords and Captains, putting a strong garrison of their stoutest souldiers into the Castle, got shipping and passed over with the rest of the people, and all their chief moveables, into the Isle of Cos, near unto Rhodes. And when they were gone, Alexander casting a trench, and building a strong wall upon it round about the Castle, raised the city itself to the very ground; and leaving Garrisons there, and in other parts of Caria, three thousand souldiers of foreign nations, and two hundred horse, all under the command of Protemius, left the command of that whole province or country of Caria, to his adoptive mother Ada, [Diod. year 3. Olympiade 112. Arrian, lib. 1.]

Alexander gave his Macedons, which had married wives a little before they lifted themselves for this journey, leave to go and spend their winter quarter with them, where they would out of Caria, appointing Protemius the son of Seleucus, one of the squires of his body, to be their Commander, and joyning with themselves also, Polemocrates, and Meleager the son of Neopolemus, because they themselves also, were in the order of the new married men, and gave them in charge; that when they returned, they should not fail to bring again their new married fellows unto him: and withal, to raise and bring with them, as many horse and foot as possibly they could, out of the country, where they wintered, [Arrian, lib. and Q. Curtius in the beginning of his 3 book.]

Alexander sent Parmenion to Sardes, making him Commander over all the horse of his confederates, and bad take with him all the Thessalian horse, and auxiliaries, and all carts and carriages that he could make, and go before him as far as Sardes, whiles himself went into Lycia and Pamphylia; that having taken in all the sea towns, the enemies Navy might prove uselesse to them. And upon his way, he took in Hypanna, a very strong Town, upon his first approach, giving the Mercenary souldiers, which were there in garrison, quarter, and leave to depart with salerie: from thence marching into Lycia, he there procured those of the city Telmessus to submit upon conditions: then passing the river Xanthus, both Pinara, and the city Xanthus, and Patara, rendered themselves unto him; and so did 30 other lesser Towns, [Arrian, lib.]

This

This done, in the midst of winter he went to Mytilas, in Phrygia the greater; there he made a league, with the Ambassador, which came to him from Phaelis, and the lower Lycia, giving up all their cities into his hands: and shortly after, he in person went to Phaelis; and there raised a certain strong fort, which the Pisidians had built, to annoy those of Phaelis with, [Id. ibid.]

Whiles he was in the parts about Phaelis, he received advertisement, that Alexander Acropus, whom he had made Commander of the Thessalian horse, intended his destruction, having entrusted him with that charge: notwithstanding he had been suspected, together with his two brothers Heromenes and Arrobatus, to have had a hand in his fathers death. For Darius having received letters from this Alexander by Amyntas, who fled over to him, sent Asines a Persian to the sea side, under colour of a messenger to Aryties, governor of Phrygia: but indeed, to assure this Alexander, that if he killed Alexander, the kingdom of Macedon should be his, and he would give him a thousand talents of money besides. But Asines being lighted on by Parmenion, and put to the rack, confessed all, and thereupon, was sent away with a sure guard to Alexander. The king looking well into the business, sent Amphotus to Parmenion, with private instructions to him, to seize upon Acropus, and to imprison him, [Id. ibid.] To this it was, that Alexander had respect, when in his letter to Darius, recited by Q. Curtius, (lib. 4. cap. 1.) he thus saith: When having arms of your own, you yet go to cleave your enemies heads; as you of late, being king of so great an army, would hire a man to take away my life, with a thousand talents, see Justin, lib. 11. cap. 7.]

Alexander going from Phaelis, led his army along by the sea side to Pergæ, and from thence came to Alpendus, and besieged it, being seated upon a high and cragged mountain; and had it surrendered to him: then going into Pindia, and having agreed to take in the city Telmessus; but missing of his purpose, and making a league with the Selgians, who were enemies to the Telmessians, he took Salagassa by force, having slain about 500 of the Pisidians, and lost a Captain of his own, called Cleander, with about 20 of his men, from thence he went to take in other cities of Pisidia, and some of their strong places, he took in by force, others upon conditions. After this he came into Phrygia, to the Marble-lands of Alcamia; and at his fifth remove, he arrived at Celenæ, [Arrian, lib. 1.]

The Castle of Celenæ, which a Persian Commander held with a garrison of a thousand Carians, and one hundred hired Grecians, after 60 dayes truce, (within which he expected relief from Darius) was given up into his hands, [Id. ibid. and Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 1.]

Alexander left a garrison of 1500 in Celenæ, and having staid there 10 dayes, he made Antigonus the son of Philippos, governor of Phrygia, and made Balacrus the son of Amyntas, Commander of the auxiliaries in his stead: he himself marched to Gordium, writing to Parmenion, that he should not fail to meet him there, [Arrianus, ibid.]

Parmenion with his army, and the Macedons which had leave to go kisse their new wives, came to Gordium accordingly, and with the army newly raised, which Protemius, and Cenus, and Meleager commanded. That army consisted of one thousand Macedons foot, and 300 horse; of 200 Thessalian horse, and 150 horse of Elis led by Alcias of the same country, [Id. ibid.]

Memnon, whom Darius had made Admiral of his fleet, and chief Commander of all the sea-foote, purposing to carry the war out of Asia into Macedon and Greece, and having rigged up, and manned a navy of 300 sail, took the Isle of Chios by intelligence, and the rest of the cities and places in Lesbos, all save Mytilene, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 112. with Arrian, lib. 2. in prim.]

The Elders of Jerusalem, being offended that Manasses Jaddus, the high Priest his brother, had, contrary to their law, married a wife of a strange nation, required at last, that either he should put away his wife, or not come any more at the altar. And when as hereupon Jaddus was forced to forbid him the altar, he going to Sanballat his father in law, told him, that he loved his daughter very well, but was loth to lose his priesthood for her sake, which was an honour belonging to him by his birth-right, and was very highly esteemed by his country men the Jews. And Sanballat answered him, that he would undertake, in case he would keep his wife, and not part with her, not only to maintain him in his priesthood; but also to make him a high priest, and Prince of all his own province, and build him a Temple on the hill hanging over Samaria, as good as that at Jerusalem, and that he would do all this by the authority of Darius the king: Manasses harted up with these promises, continued with his father in law, hoping to get the priesthood itself, by the gift and power of Darius. Hereupon all the priests, and other Israelites, who had married strange wives revolted to him: Sanballat furnishing them with money, and lands to till, and setting forward the ambition of his son in law, all that possibly he could, [Josephus lib. 11. Antiq. cap. ult.]

Alexander

4381. 333.

Alexander undid the Gordian knot, either by pulling out the pegg or pin in the beame, as Arrianus hath it, or by cutting it in pieces with his sword, as others deliver, [Plutarch in Alexander. Arrianus, lib. 2. Curtius, lib. 3. Justin, lib. 11. cap. 7.]

Alexander, departing from Gordium in Phrigia, went to Ancyra, a city in Galatia: Thither resorted to him, Embassadors from Paphlagonia, and making a league with him, delivered up their country into his hands; and he appointed them one Calas, a Lord of Phrigia to be their Governour: and then having received that new supply out of Macedonia, he marched into Cappadocia: and subdued all the country on this side the river Halys, and some part of the other side likewise [Arria, lib. 1. with Curtius lib. 3. c. 3.]

Memnon dying at the siege of Mitylene, Autophrades, and Pharnabazus the son of Artabazus, (unto whom Memnon in his death bed, had committed that charge, till Darius should otherwise dispose thereof,) took the charge upon them, upon certain agreements made between themselves: so then Autophrades, continued with the body of the Navy, and Pharnabazus with some certain ships, sailed into Lycia, carrying with him some mercenary souldiers, [Arria, l. 2.]

Darius, after the death of Memnon, sent out tickets for the levying of souldiers, commanding them from all parts, to resort to him at Babylon, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 111.] and having set up his standard there, he pitched his camp, and mustered his army, casting up a huge trench round about it, capable of ten hundred thousand armed men: & then, Xerxes like, he went to count the number of them: There were found then upon the account, 100 thousand Persians, of which 30 thousand were horse: of the Medians there were 10 thousand horse, and 50 thousand foot; of the Bactrians, (which were a people bordering upon Hircania, as Stephanus tells us) there were 2 thousand horse, and 10000 foot; from Armenia there came 40000 foot, and 7000 horse; Hircania sent 6000 to serve on horseback, the Derbices brought him with 40000 foot, and 2000 horse from the Caspian sea, there attended him 8 thousand foot, and 2 hundred horse; with these there were others, of petty, ignoble Nations, which might make up two thousand foot, and twice as many horse: unto all which were added 30 thousand Greeks, which served him for pay: so both Curtius summe up this army, [lib. 3. c. 4.] which comes but to 311200 men. But Diodorus says they were 400 thousand foot, and 100 thousand horse: though the former old editions, together with Orosius, who follows him in every point, have only 300 thousand foot, and 100 thousand horse, and both [Arria, l. 2. and Plutarch in Alexander.] make this army of his, in a grosse summe, to have amounted to 600000 men.

Charidemus an Athenian, a man well skilled in military matters, and whom Alexander had thrust out of Athens, went unto Darius, and advised him to withdraw himself, and to leave this army and war to the management of some General, who had given good proof of his ability that way, in former services: telling him further that an army of one hundred thousand men, whereof, one third to be Grecians were enough for this battle, by which fate and good counsel of his, he so far incensed the Lords with envy, and the King with choler, that he was presently had away and put to death for it, [Diod. us. cap. Curtius, l. 3. c. 5.]

Darius lent Thymondas, or Thymodes, Mentors son, a forward young man, to Pharnabazus, to receive from him all the auxiliaries or hired souldiers, which Memnon had under his command, and to bring them to him, for he would use them: and put Pharnabazus himself in Memmons place, [Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 6. Arrianus, lib. 2. in prin.]

Alexander committing the charge of Cappadocia, to Abitenes, as Curtius calls him, or to Sabittas, as Arrianus, marched with his whole army to the gates or streights, which open into Cilicia: and being come to a place, called Cyrus his Camp, (whether from the old Cyrus, as Curtius, or from the younger, as Arrianus thinketh) distant from those gates fifty furlongs, when he there found that they were taken up, and possessed with a strong garrison of the enemy, he left Parmenion there, with his companies of foot, which consisted all of Corslets, and he himself in the first watch of the night, taking with him his targeteers and archers, and his band of Agrians, went to set upon that Garrison which kept those streights, at unawares; which he did; and the Garrison, at the very bruit of his coming, threw away every man his armes, left the place, and fled, and Arrianus the Governour of Cilicia, waiting all the country with fire and sword, that he might thereby disappoint the enemy of provisions, gat him away from Tarsus, to the King, [Arrianus, l. 2. Curtius, lib. 3. c. 8.]

When Alexander, with great speed, was come to Tarsus taking pleasure in the river Cydnus, which ran thorough the city, all hot as he was, he threw off his armor, and lepe into the cold water: thereupon he grew instantly so benumb'd in all the nerves of his his body, that he lost the use of his tongue; and so far was he from hope of recovery in time, that there was nothing but present death expected in him, [Justin, lib. 11. cap. 8.] Curtius adds that it was in the Summer season, and that the heat thereof was encreased by the intensiveness of the Sun in the climate of Cilicia, [lib. 3. cap. 10.] and Aristobolus saith, that he fell into his discale, by over-labouring himself: reported by [Arria, lib. 2.] But one Philip a Physician, gave him a potion, which he took, and it cured him out of hand; though Parmenion had forewarned him, that this Philip was set on work to poison him, [Justin, Curtius, Arria, Plut., and Valer. Max. lib. 3. cap. 8.]

Oiontobates the Persian, which held out the Castle at Halicarnassus, and Myndus, and Cautus, and Thera, and Callipolis, against Alexander, was overthrowen in a fight by Ptolomee and Afander; wherein he lost about 700 Foot, and 50 Horse upon the place; and had no less than 2 thousand of his men taken: and thereupon the Myndians and Caunians, and most of the places thereabouts gave up to Alexander, [Arria, lib. 2. Curtius lib. 3. cap. 11.]

Darius making a bridge over the Euphrates, passed it with his army in five dayes, [Curt. lib. 3.]

Alexander sent Parmenion to possess himself of another strait or passage, like that former of Cilicia; and which divides Cilicia from Asyria, (or Syria) and he following after him from Tarsus, came the first day to Anchialos, [Arria, lib. 2.] Thence he marched to Soli; put a Garrison of his own into the Fort there, and levied 200000 talents of silver upon the Inhabitants; for that they had shewed themselves more inclinable, and well willing to Darius than to him, [Id. ibid. Curt. lib. 3. cap. 11.] From thence he went with 3000 Macedons, all his archers, and Agrians; and set upon the hill country of Cilicia; and within seven dayes space, what by fair means, what by foul, he took them all entirely in, and returned to Soli: where when he had sacrificed to Esculapin, and with his whole army had gone in procession with burning tapers in their hands; and made pastimes of wrestlings, and musicke, and other games, he gave the city leave to enjoy a Democraticke, [Arria, ibid.]

The Grecians souldiers which Thymodes received by appointment from Pharnabazus, being the chief, and almost the only hope, that Darius had, being come unto him, were very earnest with him to retire, and keep himself in the champion country of Melopotamia: or at least, that he would break this vast and numberless army of his into parts, and would not hazard all upon the chance of one battel: But Darius liked not their advice; but as if he could never make haste enough, the Winter (beginning with Autumn) now drawing on, he sent away all his monies, jewels, and precious stuffs, with a reasonable guard to Damafus in Syria; under the command of Copenenes, the son of Artabazus, as Arrianus says, [lib. 2.] and he with the rest of his army marched on to Cilicia. His wife, and mother, and daughter, and little son, according to the fashion of Persia, following after the Camp, [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 13.] leaving his baggage and such people as were unserviceable for the war, at Damafus, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 111.]

Sanaballer, hearing of Darius his coming into those parts, told Manasses, that he would quickly perform what he had promised him of the High Priesthood, so soon as Darius returned with victory over his enemies, whereof those inhabitants of Asia made no doubt at all, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. cap. ult.]

367. Alexander, willing Philotas to reach the Horse thorough the Asian plains in Lycia to the River Pyramus, came with the Foot, and the Kings Troup to Magarus, and sacrificed to Minerva of that place, called Minerva Magarus, [Arria, lib. 2.]

Then making a bridge over the Pyramus, he came to the city Mallos in Cilicia, [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 11.] where he offered to the god of Amphibolus the founder of that place, as to a demy god; and when he found the inhabitants there all in sedition and distracted among themselves, he made them all friends, and released the tribute, which they had formerly payed to Darius, [Id. ibid.]

Whiles he yet remained at Mallos, news was brought him, that Darius with all his army, were encamped at a place called Sochos, two dayes journey distant from those streights, which I even now spake of, that parted Cilicia from Asyria, (or Syria) [Id. ib.]

From Mallos he came to Castabala an other town in Cilicia likewise. There Parmenion met him, whom he had sent to discover the passage thorough a Forest which he was to passe to come to the town of Illos; now Parmenion had withal seized on the passage or streight in that Forest: and leaving a small company to keep it, went forward and took the very town of Illos also; being abandoned by the inhabitants upon his approach. And going yet further, he turned out all those which were set to guard the inner parts of those mountains, and put Garrisons every where of his own in them; and having cleared all those parts, returned to Alexander, and made him a relation of what he had done, in the journey which he had sent him on, [Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 11.]

11. Then came Alexander with his army to Ifios, where putting it to a council of war, whether he should march onward, or stay there and expect the supplies which he knew were coming to him out of Macedonia, Parmenion was of advice, that he could not find a fitter ground to fight on, than that was; for that there, no more could come to fight on the one side, than of the other, by reason of the frightfulness of the place, [Id. ibid.] Now Callisthenes, as he is vouch'd in Polybius, says, that at Alexander's first entrance into Cilicia, there came unto him out of Macedonia, 5000 foot, and 800 horse; [Polyb. lib. 12. pag. 664.]

Darius having passed the freights of the hill Amanus, marched toward Iffus, unwitting that he had left Alexander at the back of him; and having taken it, cruelly tortured and put to death a company of poor souls of the Macedons, which Alexander had left there; as not being able thorough sickness, or other infirmity, to follow the Camp: and the next day, he marched to the river Pinarus, [Arrianus lib. 2.]

[illegible]

When Hephæstion in the morning came to put Alexander in mind of drawing forth into the field, and forgetting himself, had him, ἔπειτα δὲ πάλιν instead of ἐπεὶ οὖν into the field, and forgetting himself, had him, ἔπειτα δὲ πάλιν Sir; whereas all the company there, presently were moved, as if thereby he had meant, that the King had not been well in his wits: and Hephæstion himself grew amazed at his own mistake. Alexander perceiving it, took it up, and said, Μα ῥῆ, I thank him for his good boode; for this tells me, that we shall all by Gods help be able to outstrip that day. This is related by Eumenes Cardianus in his Epistle to Antipater, who was present, when the words were spoken, and fell himself into the like error, as it is in Lucian, in his discourse, [ἔπειτα δὲ πάλιν ἐπεὶ οὖν ἐπεὶ οὖν], (i. e.) of mens mistakes in their speech.

Artianus says, that this fight was fought, when Nicomachus, or as Diodor. hath it, when Micostratus, year 4. of 111. Olympiads, was L. Chancellor of Athens, in the month Marmacterion, whose name fell upon the 28. of our October, and that in the Perlians lost 100 thousand horie; and 90 thousand foot: and with him in the number of horie lost 100 thousand; but concerning the foot, they all vary extremely, some say 100 thousand from him, but each from other also; for Justin says, they were 60, Curtius 70, Curtius 100, Diodorus, 120 thousand. Plutarch says that they lost 120 thousand: Justinus and Orosius add, that there were 40 thousand taken; But of Alexander's side, side, there were of wounded men 504. of the foote there were missing 32. of the horse 150. as we finde in Curtius, with whom in the number of horse, agree Plutarch, Justin, and Orosius, though of the foot, Diodorus saith there were but 300, and the rest, 330 lost.

Protemelos the son of Lagus, who attended upon Alexander in the pursuit of Darius reports, that the squadron, pursuing the enemy, marched all over the slaughtered bodies of the enemy, [Aristot. lib. 2] but there followed not Alexander in the chase of the enemy above one thousand horse, when as yet they flew a huge multitude of the enemy, [Curt. l. 3. c. 22] but the mare, which Darius, when he was thrown out of his coach, got on the back of, remembering her foale at home, ran to fast, that Alexander with his horse could not reach him, [Elianus Historiæ Animalis. l. 6. c. 48].

chap. 48.] Alexander growing weary of the perfidy of Darius, and the night growing on, and he out of hope to overtake him, having rode some 200 furlongs, about midnight returned, and came into Darius his camp, which his men had a little before taken, [Darius, 49. art. 7.] In it was taken Darius his mother, whom Diodorus calls Sisygambis, but Ctesius Syfigambis; as also his wife (who Julian says was his sister too) with his two Ochs, nor yet full six years old, and his two daughters, both marriageable; with certain other Noble mens daughters attending on them, but not many; for the most part of them had sent their wives and daughters to Damafcus, with the baggage; for even Darius himself had sent thither, the greatest part of his treasure, as was said before, and what ever rich furniture the Kings were wont to carry with them into the war: for that in his camp, Alexander found not above; & thousand talents of silver, [Arria.]

[Arria,
Alexander the next morning early, taking Hephæstion with him, went to fee the two Queens; and when Silygambis, by a mistake, fell down at Hephæstion's feet, and then perceiving her error, craved Alexander pardon for it, no harme (said he, smiling) for this is Alexander too [Didor. Curtius. Arrian]. giving half of himselfe, in so few words, away to his friend, as [Valer. Max. lib. 4. c. 7.] saith. As for the two Queens, and the women about them, Alexander caused all their attire, dressing, and ornaments to be entire restored to them, with more of his own bestowing on them; nor suffered he any man to use any incivility toward them, [Idem with Plut. lib. 2. de fort.
Alex.]

Darius in his flight, came to a place called Buchas, (i. e.) as it seems, to Sochos, two days journey from the freighters of Amanus; as we noted before out of Artianus where gathering in a body such of the Persians and others as were fayed out of the battle, he took 4 thousand of them with him to Thuplucus: that he might once have the great river Euphrates, running between him and Alexander; [Curt. lib. 4. c. 1. Artian. lib. 2.]

Amynius the son of Antiochus and Thymodes the son of Mentor, and Aristomedes Pherous, and Bionas of Icarania; all which had formerly fallen over to the Persians, and finding certain vessels newly drawn up into the docks, and which lately came from Lesbos, in they took as many as would serve their turn, to fall away in, and let the rest on fire that they might not be used to pursue them, and in them they fled to Cyprus first, and from thence into Egypt, Arria, ibs. with Diador. year 1. Olymp. 113. and Curtius, l. 4. c. 3.

Alexander, making Balacer, the son of Nicanor, one of the Squires of his body, Governor of Cilicia; made Menes, the son of Dionylus, [quire of the body in his room; and to Polyperchon the son of Simens, he gave the charge of the brigade, which Protonel the son of Seleucus (who was slain in the late battle) had; and he released to the men of Solos in Cilicia 50 talents, which were yet unpaid of that summe which he had formerly fined them at: and restored them their hostages, which he had taken of them, [14, 16d.] and having built 3 altars, one to Jupiter, another to Hercules, and a third to Minerva, upon the banks of the river Pinarus, he marched into Syria; tending before him Parmenion to Damascus, where all Darius his treasure lay, with the Thebalian horde, who had behaved themselves very manfully in the late fight, of purpose to make them rich out of the spoile of that City. [Plut. in Alexan.]

As Parmenion was upon his way thither, he met with letters sent to Alexander from the Governor of Damascus, offering to betray the city to the King: The fourth day he came to Damascus. When presently the Governor, as if he doubted of holding the place, the next morning before sun-rising, took all the Kings treasure (the Persians call it his Gasa) pretending that he would flee away and save it: Darius; by order to deliver it into Parmenions hands, at which instant there had fallen a great snow, and the ground was hard frozen.

Among the women that fled from thence, and were taken, there were 3 virgins, and 4 daughters.

The summe of ready coin there taken, was 2600 talents: in bars of silver, 500 weight: 30 thousand men, 7 thousand camels, bearing burdens on their backs, [Cant. lib. 3, cap. 24.]

lib. 3. cap. 25.] Asfor him that betrayed the place (which , as it fecterneth, was that Cophenes, by whom Darius sent his treasure to Damafcus,) one of his own fellows cut off his head, and carried it to Darius.] Curt. ibid.] Alexander the Great, as Curtius, or Memnon, as Arrianus, Governour of Cappadocia, appointing to him his auxiliary Horis, for the defence of that Province. The Syrians, not yet sufficiently broken with the war, could not brook this new Governour; but being quickly suppressed, they submitted themselves to all commands.] Arria. lib. 2. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 1.] The Persian Fleet, and others that were about Arria, lib. 2, Curt. lib. 4, cap. 1.

Alexander lent Parmenion to seize on the Persian Fleet, and others that were about him to receive the Cities of Asia, which had surrendered to him; for even Darius his own Commanders, after the battle at Issus, gave themselves up, with all their gold and treasure, into his hands. Then marched he away into Syria; where many Kings of the East came in, and submitted to him. These he retained every one according to his desert: some he made league with; others he deprived of their kingdoms; and made new Kings in their rooms. Justin, lib. 1, cap. 10.
The ambitious King of the Island of Aradus, and new kings in their rooms, [Juglin, lib. 11, cap. 10.]

There was one Corotragus, who was at that time King of the Island of Aradus, and the sea coast adjoining, and of some places alloying further off into the land ; which like as other Kings of Cyprus and Phenicia had associated their Fleets with Antiochrades Commander of the Persian Navy, under Darius; His son Strato, Vice-roy of Aradus, in his fathers absence, met Alexander as he was upon his way into Phenicia, and let a Crown of gold upon his head, and surrendered to him the Island it self of Aradus, and Marathus, a rich town and a great, lying over against it in the Continent, and the city Mariamm, and whatever else belonged to his father, [Arria, lib. 2, Curt. lib. 4, cap. 1.]

These things he marched to the city Marathion ; there came lec-

4. cap. 1. Having received him to grace, he marched to the city Marathon; there came letters to him from Darius, to defire him that he might ransom his captive women: to whom Alexander by another letter returned answer, and sent one Therpippus to deliver it. [Justin lib. 11. cap. 12. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 1. Arria lib. 2. Diod. year 4. Olym. 111.] as for the Ambassadors of the Grecians, sent to Darius before the battle at Iflos, when he understood that they were taken at Damalus, he willed them to be sent unto him: of which, when they came, he presently dismissed the two Ambassadors of Thebes, Theaialicus and Dionysiodorus, and Iphicrates of Athens, the son of that famous Iphicrates: But Euthycles the Lacedemonian, he committed first to custody, yet free from irons: but afterward when all things prospered as his hearts desired, sent him away too. [Arria. ibid.]

Alexander removing from Marathon; took in the city Biblus upon conditions; and the Sidonians which had been, not long before, so terribly used by Ochus; sent unto him, and desired to be received by him in hatred of the Persians, and of Darius their King; Id. ibid. Corr. lib. 4. cap. 2. Stratotar that time reigned there: Now because this surrender proceeded not so much from him, as from the people of that place; therefore he took the kingdom from him, and in his room, placed one Abdolominus, who lived by dressing a poor garden thereby, and made him King: and gave him not only the rich furniture of Stratotar's house; but added fundry other rich gifts, out of what himself had taken from the Persians: with all the territories adjoining thereunto. [Corr. ib. Infim. lib. 11. cap. 10.] Plutarch in his discourse of the fortune of Alexander, calls this man Alonymus, and King of Paphos: Diodor. calls him Ballinotmus, and says, that Alexander made him King of Tyre.

Now was all Syria his, so was Phœnicia, & Tyre only excepted: And Alexander with his Camp lay in the Continent: between which and the City, there ran a narrow cut of the sea. The Tyrians had sent a very massive Crown of gold unto him for a present of the sea. The Tyrians had sent a very massive Crown of gold unto him for a present, congratulating him thereby, for his great success, and sent him all store of provisions out of their City. He received their presents, as from his good friends; and using many gracious and kindly words to them that brought it, told them, that he had a great desire to see their city, and there to sacrifice to Hercules; They told him, that he better to offer sacrifice to Hercules upon that, as being the more ancient of the two; whereupon he flait way grew into such a cholera, that he vowed to destroy their city. It fell out, that at the same time, there came certain select men from Carthage, to perform a yearly sacrifice there unto Hercules; for the Tyrians were the founders of Carthage; and the Carthaginians ever honoured them as the fathers that begat them. They therefore exhorted them to stand it out, and to endure the siege like men, afflicting them further of speedy supplies, and aide from Carthage; for at that time, the Carthaginians were very strong at sea, [Cursius lib. 4. cap. 5. and 6. Justin. lib. 11. cap. 10.]

This being reholv for a war, they endured a flege of severa months long [Diod. year 40 Olympiad 112 Josephus Antiqu. lib. 11. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 15. Plutarch]. Their King Azelmus being then absent, and gone to sea with Antiochades, leaving onely his son behind him in the city, [Arrianus lib. 4.] Alexander began with Palæstyna, or old Tyre; and pulled that down to the ground, and sending for all the country thereabout to come in, what by them, what by his own men, took the houses and rubbage of all that city; and threwg into the sea that ran between, thinking to have made a causeway over i; to the city, which lay from the continent, four furlongs, as Diodoras saith; and with him agreeth Curtius [l. b. 4. cap. 5. or full 700 paces, as Pliny will have it, lib. 5. cap. 17. Diod. in sup. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 8.]

Amynas the son of Antiochus, with those 4 thousand Grecians which, as I said before, fled with him out of the battle at Illos, where Sabaces the Persian, and Governor of Egypt died, fled to Cyprus, and from Cyprus to Pelusium, and there seized himself that city, pretending that he came to charge of it, by order from Darius, in Sabaces army, because he was slain in the battle at Illos. From thence he went with his army to Memphis, at the noise whereof, the Egyptians came in out of town and country to assist him against the Persians; by whose help, when the Persians, which lay there in garrison, laid forth upon him, he routed and forced them into the city again: but anon after, by the advice of Malafes their Captain, seeing their enemies scattered about the country, and busie in plundering, he issued forth again, let upon them unawares, and cut both him and all his whole company in pieces. [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 22. and lib. 4. cap. 3.]

Certain other Captains also of Darius, which escaped out of the field at Issos; with such Persians as followed them, with other Cappadocians and Paphlagonians in their company, went about to recover Lydia. But Antigonus, who commanded there in chief for Alexander, routed them in three several fights. And at the same time, the Macedonian fleet, coming out of Greece, let upon Antisthenes, which was sent by Darius to recover the Hellespont, and either sunk or took all his fleet, [Diad. year. 1. Olymp.
112, and Curtius lib. 4. cap. 4.]

112, Antiquities lib. 4, chap. 9.]

While Alexander lay at the siege of Tyrrus, he sent to Jaddus the high priest at Hierusalem, demanding of him, supplies and other provisions; and withal, such tribute, as was formerly paid to Darius. But when Jaddus answered that he was tied by a former oath of allegiance to Darius, and that he could not be free from that oath, lo long as Darius lived, Alexander growing wroth thereat, swore, that as soon as he had taken Tyrrus, he would march against that city, [Josephus lib. 11, Antiquit. cap.

To him also, at the very beginning of the siege of Tyrus, Sanaballat the Cuthæan, and forsaking Darius, came with eight thousand men; and being graciously received by him, he asked him leave to build a temple upon his own land, and thereof to make high priest his son in law, Manafes, brother to Jaddus the high priest at Jerusalem; and having obtained his grant, because he now grew old, he fell presently to work, and build a Temple, and made Manafes high priest of it, thinking hereby to leave a great honour to the posterity of his daughter, [Id. ibid.]

Alexander purposing to make a broader caulway from the continent, for his easier approach to Tyrus, cauled new engines to be made; which being finished, he with his Targateers, and Squadron of Agrians, marched to Sidon, there to gather together, as many ships of war as possibly he could; finding it impossible to take Tyrus, so long as the Tyrians were masters at sea, Arria, lib. 2.

Mean while, Gerontar, the king of Aradus, and Enulus the king of Byblus, finding that all their cities were already taken by Alexander, forsaking Antophradates, and the ships that were with him, came with their fleets to Alexander; and with them certain ships of the Sidonians; so that Alexander had now a navy of 50 sail. At the same time also came to him a fleet from Rhodes, wherein there was one ship called Perseus, and nine other; and three more from Soli and Mallus:

and ten from Lycia : and one out of Macedonia, of 50 oares, whereof was captain, Protes the son of Andronicus : and not long after came to him certain Kings of Cyprus, with 120 sail, into the port at Sidon : and all upon the fame of his victory at Ifsus ; and report that all Phenicia was come in to him : To all these Alexander forgave their by-past errors ; for that of necessity, rather than of their own accord, they had adhered to Darius with their fleets, [Id. Ibid.] And now Azelmicus also himself, the King of Tyrus, leaving Antiochadates, came to his own City Tyrus, while it was thus besieged, and was therein afterward taken, as Arrianus shewes.

In mount Lebanon, whence Alexander made his provision of timber for his shipping, the wilde Arabians, setting suddenly upon the Macedons, whiles they were busie at their work, slew, upon the point, 50 of them, and carried away almost as many prisoners. Alexander leaving Perdicas and Craterus, or as Polyzenus seems to say, Parmenion, to hold on the siege of Tyrus, went himself, with a running camp, into Arabia, [Curius lib. 4. cap. 8.] and that he made an excursion into Arabia, the same Polyzenus sheweth, [lib. 4. Stratag.] which Arrianus more clearly delivers, where he saith, that Alexander, with certain troupes of horse, and light targeteers, and his Squadron of Agrians, went into Arabia, as far as to Anti-Lebanon : and Plutarch, where he tells us that he marched, ἐν τοῖς ἑσπέραις τοῖς ἀντιλεβανῶν (i. e.) against the Arabians which dwell over against Anti-Lebanon.

When he was come to the mountainous country of those parts, he was then faine to leave his horse and march on foot as others did : but the body of his army, was gone a good way before, and the night grew on, and the enemy not far off, and Lysimachus, the instructor of him in his childhoods, being spent in travel, and fainting, and he loath to leave him in that case ; and whiles he stood heaunting him up, and drawing him on before he was aware, he with a very few with him, were fevered from the rest of his company, and was faine to passe that night in the dark, in a bitter cold frost, and in a place void of all relief : nevertheless, he ran to the next fire, and there killing two of the enemies, being of a nimble and active body, he ran to the next fire, and there killing two of the enemies that fate at it, brought away a fine-brand, and therewith kindled a fire for himself, and for the relief of those few Macedons that were about him ; which growing into a great flame, struck such a terror into the enemies hearts, that they durst not stir : and to he and his company lay safe all that night. This Plut. relateth of him, out of Charætes, a mytilenæan born, and one of those who wrote the gests of Alexander.

Having now taken in all that country, partly upon amicable termes, and partly perforce, he returned to Sidon, eleven dayes after he set out from thence, where he found Alexander the son of Polemocrates, newly arrived with 4000 mercenary souldiers out of Greece, [Arria. l. 2.]

His Navy being now rigged and fitted, amounting in all to 190 ships, as Curtius, or to two hundred, as Diodorus saies : Alexander, loosing from Sidon, set sail for Tyre, in very good array. Himself was in the right wing, in a Quinquereme, or ship of five deck : high ; and in that Squadron were also the kings of Cyprus, and the rest of the Phenicians, except only Pintagoras, al. Pythagoras : for he and Craterus commanded the left wing, [Arria. lib. 4. Curt. l. 4. c. 10.]

Thirty Commissioners arriving from Carthage, brought them word, that the Carthaginians, were so embroiled with war at home, that they could not possibly send to help him in this distresse of others ; nor yet did this any way abate or quell the courage of the Tyrians, but they sent away every man his wife and children by them to Carthage, as being by so much the better able to bear what ever should befall them, when they had ridd away the halfe-cadence, and dearest part, every man of himself, out of danger, [Curius lib. 4. cap. 11. with Diodor. year 1. Olympiade 112. Justin lib. 11. cap. 10.]

When Apollo had signified to sundry men in their sleep by dreams, that he would leave the city, the Tyrians, out of a foolish superstition, took good golden chaines, and bound his image fast to the foot of his shrine ; which image of his, was sent thither from Syracusa, as Curtius, or rather from Gela in Sicily, as out of Diodorus we have already observed, in the year of the world 3599. by the Carthaginians : and they fastened the chain to the altar of Hercules, the tutelur God of that city, as if he should hold him by main strength, from going thence, [Curius and Diodorus libid. and Plutarch in Alexander.]

Whiles Alexander lay at the siege of Tyre, there came Embassadors from Darius, to him, offering him 10 thousand (not as in Valer. Max. put to hundred thousand) talents for the ranlome of his mother, wife and children ; with all the countreys lying between the Hellespont and the river Halys : and his daughter withal, in marriage ; which offer of his being taken into deliberation, in a Council of his friends, it is reported that Parmenion should say, That if he were Alexander, he would not refuse those conditions : to to whom he replied, that no more would he, if he were Parmenion. But to Darius he wrote back, That he offered him nothing, but what was his own already ; and therefore willed him to come himself in suppliant wile unto him, and to take such conditions as he would give him, [Arrianus lib. 2. with Justin lib. 11. cap. 12. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 16. Plutarch in his Apophthegmes, and in his Alexander Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 4.]

Tyre was taken, when Anicetes, or rather Nicetes, as Dionys. Halicarnas. in Di-narchus calls him, was L. Chancellor in Athens, in the month Hecatombæon, [Arria. lib. 2. pag. 49.] in the middelt of which month, the 112 Olympiade ended. In Plutarch we find, that it was upon the 30 day of the month Loï, among the Macedonians, the 5 of Hecatombæon among the Athenians, answering to the 24 of our July, as I have shewen, in the end of cap. 5. of my discourse of the Solar years of the Macedonians and Alians.

Justin, [lib. 1. cap. 10.] sayes it was taken by treason, Polyzenus by a stratagem, [lib. 1. stratag.] Diodor. by pure force ; and with him agree, Arria, and Curtius : and that when the enemies had gotten into the town, yet the twofmen maintained the fight, till there were 7 thousand of them cut in pieces, [as Diodorus writeth.]

Arrianus delivers, that there were 8 thousand of the inhabitants there slain, and 2 thousand more after that rage of slaying was over, hung up all along the thory, in cold blood, as Curtius sayes : and Diodorus tells us, that Alexander caused no lesse than 2 thousand, all prime young men to be hanged : Justin sayes, that in remembrance of the old slaughter by them made, he caused all that were taken to be crucified : putting then to this slavish kind of death, because the Tyrian slaves heretofore making a conspiracy against their own masters, had murdered all the freemen of that city, together with their own masters : and made a Common-wealth of themselves, sparing none alive, saving one Strato an old man, and his son ; and upon him and his posterity, they fettered the kingdom.

Of Alexander Justin adds this further : that he saved alive all the descendants of Strato, and restored the kingdom to him and his posterity, (meaning perhaps that Ballonymus, whom Diodorus confounds and makes all one with that Abdolomius, whom Alexander made King of the Sidonians, as a little before,) leaving the City to be re-peopled by the innocent and harmlesse inhabitants thereof, to the end, that having abolished that wicked generation of slaves, he might, in a sort, be the founder of a new and better race there : and by this means it was, that Justin out of Trogus, makes Alexander the restorer and rebuilder of Tyre, [lib. 18. cap. 34.] whereas all others make him not the founder, but the destroyer of it : the prophetic of Esay concurring therewith, [cap. 23. v. 1.] compared with, [Maccabees cap. 1. v. 1.] For if we believe Curtius, Alexander, saving those which fled to the Temples, slew all, and set fire on their houses : if Diodorus, he made slaves of all that were not able to bear arms, together with the femal sex among them : there being such an infinite number of that kind there found, that though the greatest part of them were sent away to Carthage, (as before) yet the remainder was no lesse than 13 thousand heads ; but if Arrianus his word may be taken, he spared all that fled to the Temple of Hercules, and those were the chief of the City, with the King Azelmicus, and the Commissioners which came from Carthage, to offer sacrifice at that season of the year to Hercules, according to an ancient custom there used. The rest he sold away for slaves : the inhabitants and strangers there found, amounting to about 30 thousand persons.

Yet Curtius sayes, that the Sidonians, which brake in with the rest of Alexanders souldiers, not forgetting the community of blood that was between them and the Tyrians ; (for they were all brought thither, with Agenor, as they believed, and he was the founder of both cities) got a ship-board, and there hid and saved 15 thousand of them : and that of them Tyrus rose, and afterward grew to be a City again, [lib. 4. cap. 15.] And Strabo, [lib. 16. pag. 754.] saith, that after this vast calamity brought on them by Alexander, they quickly overcame their misfortunes ; what with their navigation, what with their purple-fishing : and Justin, that by their parcimonie and industry, they quickly recovered strength again, [lib. 18. cap. 4.] and that by too quickly, that in the 18 year from thence, they endured another siege from Antigonus, then Lord of all Asia ; not seven months, as against Alexander, but full 15 months, long, as Diodorus tells us, [lib. 19. year 2. Olymp. 116.] and that they were not now content with their little city, which by Alexanders caultways and other works was joynted to the Continent ; but to enlarged their bounds, that in Plinies time, the very wall of their city took in 22 furlongs, and reckoning Palætyrus or Old Tyre with it, the whole encloure came to no lesse than 19 miles, [Plin. lib. 5. cap. 19.]

Admetus, who first gat upon the wall, and 20 Targeteers with him, were slain at the very first encounter : but in the whole time of the sieges there were lost 400 Macedons, at most, [Arria. lib. 2.]

Alexander

Alexander offered sacrifices to Hercules, and went in procession with his whole host, all in arms to his Temple; he made a show also with his ships, and caused wrestling and other games of activity to be performed by torch-light. And whereasthere was a certain Tyrian ship consecrated to his honour, which he had fet upon and taken, he dedicated the same unto him again, with an Inscription importing as much, [Id. ibid.] Also he took off from Apollon's Image, his golden Chain, and the Robes he was tired with, and gave it a new name, ἡμετέριον, (i. e.) a friend of Alexander's, or Alexander's friend; [Diodor. year 1. Olympiade 11.] And upon the very self same day and howev, that the Carthaginians had taken that image from those of Gida in Sicily, it was, as Timæus reports, that the Grecians offered to him that magnificent and solemn sacrifice, as if by his power and favour they had taken Tyre, [Id. year 4. Olympiade 93.]

Alexander, so soon as he had taken Tyre, marched forth with into Judea, [Euseb. Cron. with Pliny, lib. 12. cap. 25.] and subdued all that part of Syria, which is called Palestine, [Arrian, lib. 2. pag. 50.] going in person against those places that would not of themselves submit, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 17.] But when he was upon his march to Jerusalem, Jaddus the high priest, terrified with his former threats, and now fearing his rage, had recourse to God, by supplications and sacrifices for the common safety; and was by him warned in a dream, that he should make holy-day in the city, and let wide open the gates, and that he and the rest of the priests every one in his his priestly raiment, and the people all clothed in white, should go forth and meet him. Alexander seeing this company coming a far off, went himself all alone to the high priest; and having prostrated himself before that God, whose name he saw engraven in the golden plate of his Miter, he first saluted him: and being demanded the reason of his so doing by Parmenon, answered that whiles he was yet in Macedon, musing with himself of the conquest of Asia, there appeared to him a man like unto this, and thus attired, who invited him into Asia, and assured him of all success in the conquest of it. And the priests going before, he entered into Jerusalem, and going up to the Temple, he there sacrificed to God; as the priests prescribed him; and when they had shewed him the book of the prophet Daniel, wherein was written, that a Grecian should come and destroy the Persians, [Dan. c. 8. 7, 20, 21. and chap. 11. 13.] he made no doubt, but himself was the man designed thereby, and so for that time dismissed the company, [Joseph. lib. 11. cap. ult.]

The day following, he assembled the people, and bad them all what they would of him, and they asking nothing, but that they might live according to the laws of their own country, and that every seventh year, (wherein they were to have no harvest) they might be exempt from paying any tribute, he granted all. And when they asked further, that he would suffer the Jews, which dwell in the countries of Babylon, and Media, to live according to their own rites and laws, he answered, that he would satisfy their desires in that point also, so soon as he should have gotten those countries into his power. And when he told them, that if any of them would follow him in his wars, they should use their own rites where ever they came, many lifted themselves to serve him. And having dispatched, and settled all matters in Jerusalem, he departed and went to the rest of the cities of that country, and was joyfully received every where, [Id. ibid.]

Of Alexander's captains, Callas went and took in Paphlagonia, (which fell off from Alexander after the battle at Issus) Antigonus Lyconia, Balacrus, the city of Miletus, having first overthrown Idarnes, Darius his Captain, in the open field, [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 17.]

Alexander had given the charge of Cilicia to Socrates, willing Philotas the son of Parmenion, to look to the country about Tyre, Creto-Syria was committed to Andronicus by Parmenion, himself having a desire to follow Alexander in the war. The king commanding Hephastion, with the fleet, to scour the coast of Phœnicia; himself with his whole army, went to Gaza, [Id. ibid.] and in the siege thereof, held by a garrison of Persians, he spent two months, [Diod. year 1. Olympiade. 112. Josephus lib. 11. cap. ult.]

Captain of the Garrison there was, as Josephus saies, one Babermes, or, as Curtius and Arrianus call him, Baris an Eunuch, and one very truly to his king: who having hired certain Arabians, and made good provision of corn, and other things, maintained the walls, which were hugely strong, with a small company of men within.

Alexander received two wounds at this siege: whereupon Baris falling alive into his hands, had cords or thongs drawn thorough his ankles, and was there with tied to a Chariot, and drawn at the tail thereof with horses, round about the city: there were slain in that siege, of Persians and Arabians together, about to thousand, nor did the Macedons escape foot-free neither, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 10.] Alexander, selling away for slaves all the women and children there, stored the place with inhabitants out of the neighbouring neighbouring parts, and made that a place of Garrison and Magazin, for himself, [Arrian, lib. 2. in fin.] (so that those words of Strabo, are not simply to be understood, but with reference to the former state of that city, where he saith, [Id. 16. pag. 759.] that Gaza was formerly a glorious City: but being destroyed by Alexander, remained desolate. Unlesse we will say that this was meant of a later Gaza, built in another place; which Jerom in his book, De Locis Hebræicis: (i. e.) of places in Judea, affirmeth in this wise, The question is, saith he, how in one of the Prophets it is said, And Gaza shall be turned into an everlasting heap? which is thus answered, that there are scanty left to be seen, any sign of the old City: and that City of Gaza that now is, was built in another place, instead of that, which was so destroyed.

Alexander having done his pleasure at Gaza, dispatched away Amyntas, the son of Andromon, with 3 tall ships into Macedon, to bring him from thence all the flower of the youth of that country, [Diodor. year 2. Olymp. 112. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 19.]

3673. Alexander from thence marched into Egypt, as he formerly intended; and seven dayes after he left Gaza, came to a place, which from him was in after-time called Alexanders Camp, and to the city Pelusium, [Arrian, lib. 3. in Pri. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 20.] and not back again from Gaza to Jerusalem, as Josephus, inconsiderately enough, affirmeth.

An infinite number of the Egyptians, expecting Alexanders coming, were gathered together at Pelusium: where for the offence taken by them of the Persian pride, avarice, and sacrilege, they willingly received the Macedons at their coming, [Curtius lib. Diodor. an. 2. Olymp. 112.]

Alexander, leaving a Garrison in Pelusium, and giving order for his ships to go up the River to Memphis, himself marched by land to Heliopolis, having the Nile all the way on his right hand; and all cities, where ever he came, opening their gates unto him, he passed the Desert of Egypt, and came at last to Heliopolis, and there passing the River, he marched toward Memphis, [Arrian, lib. 3.] Nor durst the Persians there abide his coming, seeing the general defection of the Egyptians from them. And now he was not far from thence, when Amstraces, who commanded the Garrison there under Darius met him, and delivered into his hand 800 talents, and all his masters Vardrobe, as we read in [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 20.] where yet it seems, that the name of Astaces, is crept in, I know not how, instead of Mazaces: as he himself all, [cap. 4. of the same book.] calleth him: and so doth Arrianus in the beginning of his book, where he tells us, that one Mazaces a Persian, whom Darius had made Governour of Egypt, received Alexander into that Province, and cities thereof, in all friendly wife.

Alexander, having offered his sacrifices at Memphis, and there exhibited all games of wrestling, and other activities and musick, to which resorted the most expert and skillful men of all Greece to put in for the prizes in them, embarked himself, and came down the River to the sea: putting his targeteers and archers, and Agrians, and the Kings Troup, aboard the ships of his confederates, and with them came to Canopus; and there made choice of a place lying between the Egyptian sea and Mareia, or the Lough of Mareotis, and there built a city, which from his own name, he called Alexandria, [Arrian, lib. 3.] and in that part thereof, which lyeth next the sea, and the docks for shipping, there was a street called Racotis, [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 792. Pausanias, in his Eliaca, pag. 169. Tacit. Histor. lib. 4. cap. 84.]

Alexandria was built, not in the seventh, (as Eusebius in Chron. and out of him, Cyril. of Alexandria, lib. 1. contra Julianum. and Cedrenus affirm) but in the fifth year of his reign, and that in the very first year of the 112. Olympiads, as [Solinus hath it cap. 32.] not as [Diodorus in the 2. and much lesse, as Eusebius, in the 3.] As for the certain time when Alexandria was built, the interval of time between the taking of Tyre, and that great fight at Gangamele, and his gests acted in that interim, cannot but undoubtedly assure us of it: from whence, and from the fifth year of Darius and Thoth, in the 417. year of Nabonassars account, which falls in with the 14 day of September according to our Julian Calendar, or year 1. of the Olymp. 112. yet running, Ptolemei of Alexandria, deduceth the years of Alexander, whom in the Preface of his Περὶ τῆς Κωνσταντινῆς (whereof this is one) he, alter the fashion of all Alexandrians, calleth Kivon: (i. e.) his founder.

Dinocrates was the man who laid out the compasse and freers of this city, (whom yet Plutarch both in his life, and also in the 2. book of the fortune of Alexander, calls Stesicrates, and other books call otherwise) Dinocrates, I say, that famous Architect, whose art and industry the Ephesiats used in the re-building of their Temple of Diana, who for the excellency of his workmanship, shewed therein, deserves the second place, after the founders themselves in the memory of the World, [Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 641. Pater. Max. lib. 1. cap. 4. Vitruvius, in the Preamble of his second book. Plin. lib. 5. cap. 10. and lib. 7. cap. 37. Solim. cap. 32. and 40. Ammian. Marcell. lib. 22.]

Alexander having let them on work, and bad them dispart; took a journey to the the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, [Plutarch in his Alexander, with Arria, lib. 3.] out of an ambition, which possessed him, because he was told, that Perseus and Hercules had been there, as Callisthenes, in the History which he wrote of him, affirmeth, cited by Strabo, [lib. 17. pag. 814.]

Wherefore he went as far as Paratonium, along by the sea side, not without finding some fresh water by the way, which lay from Alexandria, 1600 furlongs as Aristobolus wrote, [in Arria, lib. 3. pag. 53.]

About the mid-way, met him Embassadors of the Cyrenians, presenting him with a Crow, and sundry other costly things; among which were 300 horses, trained to the war, and 5 chariots drawn each with 4 horses, the choicest that might be found; which he accepted at their hand, and made amity and friendship with them, [Diodor. Olym. 112. year 2.]

When he went from Paratonium to Melogabas, where the Temple of Hammon was, through dry and thirsty countreys, and wandered over the plains, while the wind blew at south, Callisthenes saith that he was saved from an imminent destruction, partly by a shower of rain that fell, which layd the sand, and partly by a flock of crows, which led him the way, [Strabo as before.] adding further this fable to the story, that the crows oftentimes, when the men wandered out of the way in the dark, would with their cawing, call them into the right way again, [Id. Plut. in his Alex.]

Ptolemaeus the son of Lagos saith, there were two dragons, which went before the company making a noise, and they led them into, and out of the Temple again: But Aristobolus, to whom most writers assent, saith, that there were two crows, which kept on fly flying before the army, and that they were Alexanders guides upon the way thither, [Arria, 53.]

Coming to a lough of bitter waters, as they called them, and having gone 100 furlongs from thence, and passing by the Cities, called after Hammons name, one dayes journey from thence, they came to Jupiter Hammons Grove and Temple, [Diod. in 1st.]

There the Priests of the Temple being suborned before hand and taught their lesson, to fooin as he came to set footing within the Temple doors, came all and saluted him by the name of Hammonson, [Justin lib. 11. c. 11.] so that now we learn by this act of Alexanders, that he the God himself never do deal or dumble, yet it is still, in the power either of the Priest to feigne and lye, what he will, or for him that comes to consult the Oracle, to tell what answer he would there have made unto him, and he shall have it, [Oros. 1. 3. c. 16.]

Callisthenes reports, that it was permitted to none but the King himself, by the Priest to come into the Temple, in his ordinary attire; the rest were all fain to change their vestures, and to hear the Oracle without, and that he informed the king of sundry other things by signes and tokens, once he told him in plain termes, that he was Jupiters son, [Strabo in supra.] yet he himself in a letter to his mother Olympias, saies, that he had received many secret and hidden Oracles there, which he would impart to her alone, at his return, [Plut. in Alex.]

He also in the same, or in some other Epistle to his mother; (which I nothing doubt was meant by Tertullian in his book of Pallio) saith, that he was told by one Leo, a principall Priest among the Egyptians, that the Nations did preserve the memory of their King, and Ancestors, [Ang. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 5. and 27. and de Consen. Evangelist. lib. 1. cap. 23. Mutinus Felix, in Olativ. with Cyrino, in his book de Idolol. vanitate.] And when he in the beginning of his letter, had thus written to his mother, Alexander the King, the son of Jupiter Hammon, [Sendeth greeting to his mother Olympias: the very wittily in her answer thereto, told him in this wise, Now my good son I pray thee be content, and do not accuse me, nor lay ought to my charge before Juno, for she will do some forewarn, if you in your letters make me a cock-queen to her.] [M. Varro in a book of his, entitled Orcib. sylve delania: in Aul. Gellius 1. 13. c. 4.]

Alexander having received such an answer there, as by his own confession, pleaded him very well, returned from thence into Egypt, by the same way as he went, as Aristobolus saies, but as Ptolemaeus, by a shorter way, to Memphis, [Arrianus lib. 3.]

When he was arrived at Memphis, new forces came to him: 400 mercenaries out of Greece, sent him by Antipater, under the command of Menetas the son of Hegesandrus, and about 500 horse out of Thracia, which were led by Alcibiades, and being there, he sacrificed to Jupiter, and made oblations to him, with his whole Host, all in their compleat armour, and exhibited games and pastimes, with wrastlings, and other feats of activity, and musick, [Id. Ibid.]

And moreover, commanding the inhabitants of the neighbouring townes and cities to leave their dwellings, he transplanted them into Alexandria, and stored that place place with a huge multitude of inhabitants, [Curcius lib. 4. c. 21. and Justin lib. 11. cap. 11.] calling thither also, a colony of the Jews: whose vertue and good behaviour, he much approving, and deeming them worthy of special trust, made it a reward of their service in the war, to send them there, and to grant them equal honours, and privileges with the Greeks: inasmuch that their tribe there, went by the name, not of Alexandrians only, but also of the Macedonians themselves, [Joseph. 1. 2. de Bello Jud. c. 36. p. 815. & 1. 2. cont. Ap. p. 163. in the Greek and Latin Edition.]

He also gave lands to Sanabalats soldiers, whom he caused to follow him into Egypt, in the country of Thebais, trusting them with the keeping of that territory in his absence, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. cap. the last.]

Alexander had an itching humour, to go and visit, not only the inward and more remote parts of Egypt, but even Ethiopia it self. But his present war with Darius, put him from thinking of such idle projects: wherefore he made Eiechilus and Peneceites, the Macedon Governours of Egypt, with four thousand soldier for the guard thereof: he commanded Polemon to defend the mouths of the river Nile, with 30 sail of fighting ships, [Curcius lib. 4. cap. 21.] though Arrianus tells us, that he made Peneceites the son of Macartus, and Balacrus the son of Amyntas, Commanders of the fleet which he left there, and Polemon the son of Theramenes, Ammiral of the fleet, to defend the mouths of the river Nile, with all the sea lying upon Egypt: as for the civil government of the whole country, he committed the care thereof to one Doloapes, a native of Egypt, as the same Arrianus intimates.

Curcius further tells us, that he left Apollonius to govern Africa, bordering upon Egypt, and Cleomenes, to gather the tributes both of Atrica and Egypt, and much to the same purpose, Arrianus tells us, that he left Apollonius the son of Charinus, to govern Libya bordering upon the West of Egypt, and Cleomenes Arabia, upon the East thereof, in the city called Urbs Heronum, where it borders upon Arabia Petraea, with command that all his tributes should be paid in to him: but the execution of the laws, he committed to the Presidents and Justices of the Country, as in former times. In the second of Aristotles Oeconomicks is mention made of one Κλεομένης Αλεξανδρείας, ἡγεμὼν τῆς Αἰγύπτου, (i. e. Cleomenes of Alexandria, Governour of Egypt, who is the same, who in 3rd Arria, of the History of Alexander, is called Εὐκράτης, Eucratatus, B. 1st Eucratatus, a man of a quick sent in smelling out such faults, sayes, that in the one it should be, ἡγεμὼν τῆς Αἰγύπτου, or ἡγεμὼν τῆς Αἰγύπτου, (i. e. one of the Naucraticans, or Naucratices, and in the other, Αλεξανδρείας ἡγεμὼν, αὐτοκράτης, (i. e. Commander of Alexandria in Egypt: the rest whereof is, that this Cleomenes Governour of Alexandria was a native of Naucratis, which was a Colony or plantation, anciently made in Egypt, by the Milesians; for that the care and charge of fishing and peopling this city, was committed to him: we may partly gather out of Aristotle, who saies, that Alexander enjoyed him, that he should furnish with inhabitants, a city near unto Pharos (as Alexandria is distant but seven furlongs by sea from thence) and should draw all the trade and traffick from Canopus thither: and partly out of Justin, who, [lib. 13. cap. 1.] expressly saies, that Alexander committed the building of Alexandria to Cleomenes: whereunto may be added, that which Alexander wrote unto him eight years after; wherein he commanded him to build two temples to Hephæstion deceased, the one in Alexandria, the other in Pharos; and that all bills of loading and other contracts of Merchants, should have the name of Hephæstion, inscribed on them, as Arria, [lib. 7. Hist. 1.] saies, adding further, that this Cleomenes, was a most wicked man, and one that did the Egyptians a thousand injuries.

When Alexander was gone down the Nile, Hector, a son of Parmenion, then being in the flower of his youth, and a great favourite of the kings, desirous to overtake him, put himself into a little rascall boat, whereunto also more lepr, than he could carry, and he sunk, and he with her. The king was wonderfully grieved at the losse of him, and having recovered the body, made him a very rich and sumptuous funeral, [Cur. 1. 2. c. 21.]

Upon the neck of this grief, came another, which was the news of Andromachus his death, whom the inhabitants of Samaria had burnt alive: and he march presently away with all the speed he could to take vengeance of them for it, [Id. Ibid.]

Alexander having made bridges over the Nile, and every reach thereof about Memphis, in the first of the spring went from thence toward Phœnicia, [Arria, lib. 3. pag. 55.] Upon his way, those who had so murdered Andromachus, were delivered into his hands, and put to death; and then he put Memnon in his place, [Cur. lib. 4. cap. 21.] And having taken the city of Samaria, he gave it to be inhabited by his Macedonians; as Eusebius in his Cron, and out of him Cedrenus hath it. But the territory to it belonging, he bestowed upon the Jews, for their loyalty to him, without paying him any tribute for it: as Josephus reporteth out of Hecateus of Abdara, [lib. 2. cont. Apion. pag. 1063.] Yet the Temple in the mount Gerizim, escaped, And if any at Jerusalem were were in danger for eating of forbidden meats, or breach of the sabbath, or such like crime, they presently flew over to the Schemites, laying they were falsely accused, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. c. ult.] and the like troubles and quarrels grew between the Jews and Samaritans, not only here, but also in Egypt, at Alexandria, by reason of their different rights and usages, according to their several Temples, as we may see in the same, [Joseph. l. 11. c. 1. and l. 13. c. 6.]

Alexander coming to Tyre, found there his fleet, which he had sent thither before him: and there sacrificed a second time to Hercules, and made entertainments, and exercises of wrestling and music, and the like, [Arrian. lib. 3.] wherein the Kings of the Cyprians, had the charge of providing fit actors for them. Nicocreon, King of Salamis, furnished out Theffalus, a man very much favoured by Alexander himself: Paficrates King of Solo, presented Athenodorus, which carried the prize from all, by the major part of voices, [Plut. in Alex.] now these Cyprian Kings had long before revolted from Darius to Alexander, and sent him shipping, when he besieged Tyre, and he from that time forward always honoured them, as they deserved, [Curt. lib. 4. c. 21.] yet of Nicocreon, it is said, that Anaxarchus of Abdera, the Philosopher, said to Alexander, as he sat at supper (as Laetius hath it in his Life,) that there should also a certain Satrapæe had have been served in there: which saying of his, caused him afterward to be put to a most miserable death.

Alexander made Ceranus of Berrheæ treasurer of Phenicia, for the gathering of his tribute there: and in Asia Philoxenus, to do the like, in the regions beyond the mountain Taurus: and put Harpalus in their room, to take charge of the moneys, which were in his own hamper: into Lydia, he sent Menander one of his confederates, to be Governor there: putting Clearchus in Menanders stead, to oversee the forreigners and in the room of Arimna, he set Aclepiodorus, the son of Eunicius, to be Governour of Syria, [Arrian. lib. 3.]

These things, thus let in order, Alexander offered at Hercules his shrine a great vessel of gold, with thirty dishes in it: and his fingers now itching after Darius, he commanded to set forward toward the Euphrates, [Curt. 4. c. 21.]

When tidings came to Darius, that whithersoever he went, Alexander would follow him, he gave order for all Nations, though never so far off, to repair to him at Babylon: And when his army was now grown halfas bigger again as it was, at Illos in Cilicia, many of them wanted arms; which were out of hand provided for them, [Curt. 4. c. 22.] where the whole number of his horse is said to have been 45 thousand; and his foot, 200 thousand men: whereas it is manifest, that at Illos, his forces in either kind, were far exceeding these in number: nor is there any doubt, but the number found in Justin, [lib. 11. c. 12. and in Orosius, lib. 3. c. 17.] comes far short of what in truth it was: 400, or 404 thousand foot, and 100 thousand horse, [Plutarch in Alex.] saith they were 10 millions; and in his Apophthegmes, 100 millions, (but no doubt false printed) that is, 1000 thousand, and no less than 20 times ten thousand horse; now Arrianus allows to the foot only, as much as Plutarch doth to the whole, both of horse and foot, that is a thousand thousand, adding 40 thousand horse over and above; though some instead of 40 thousand, put there, 400 thousands to the end, both that the number of horse, might be somewhat more proportionable to the foot, as also that the number of horse might not here seeme so far short of what it was at Illos: whereas Curtius, [l. 4. c. 22.] sayes it was far beyond it, besides 200 iron Chariots, and 15 Elephants, which the Indians brought him: whereas all Alexanders army, had not above seven thousand horse, and forty thousand foot in it, [Arrian. lib. 3.]

Darius moving with this vast army from Babylon, came to Ninive, having the river Tigris on his left hand, and Euphrates on his right: his army filled all that huge plain of Mesopotamia, [Diodorus, year 2. Olympiade 112. Curtius, 4. c. 22.] and having passed the river Tigris, when he heard that the enemy was not far off, he sent Sarcapaces, General of his horse, with a thousand choice men, to hinder the passage of the enemy: and gave him order withal, to burne and waste all the coasts through which Alexander was to passe: for he thought want might happily undo him, having naught else but the spoile of the country to supply him: he himself marched to Arabela; and leaving there his bag & baggage, went forward as far as the river Lycus, where he made a bridge, and there passed over his army in 5 days space, and from thence, marching 80 furlongs, he came to the river Bumelus, [Curt. ib.] Arrianus saith that he pitched his camp at Gaugamela, by the river Bumelus, for so he calleth the place, [l. 6. p. 131.] not as in [l. 3. c. 57.] Bumadus; in a plain and open field: for if there were any hilly or uneven ground there, Darius commanded it to be made all level, that it might be the more traversable for his horse, and might lie every way more open to his view, [Arrian. Curt.]

Alexander

Alexander came forward to Thapacus, a great City in Syria, in the month Hecatombeon, when Aristophanes was L. Chancellor at Athens: to wit, [year 2. Olympiade 112.] in the very entrance of that year: here the river Euphrates had a flood, where Alexander found 2 bridges ready made; but not thoroughly finished, nor reaching full out to the other bank. Mazæus, whom Darius had sent to make good that passage, so soon as he heard that Alexander was coming: took him to his heels, with all his army. And when he was gone, Alexander quickly made out the bridges to the other side, and passed his army over in a trice, and then marched on toward Babylon, leaving the Euphrates and the mountains of Armenia on his left hand; but not the fittest way thither: because the other was, though somewhat further about, yet the more commodious for provisions of all kinds for his army, nor the heat there so violent, for them to travel in. On the way, certain Scouts of Darius were intercepted; who informed him, that Darius with all his army, was upon the bank of the river Tigris, to stop him from passing there: and that his forces were far more numerous now, than when he fought with him in Cilicia: But Alexander hereupon going thither, found neither Darius, nor any man else there, [Arrian. lib. 3.]

Alexander therefore passed the river Tigris, and though there was no man to hinder him, yet not without much difficulty and extreme danger, by reason of the violent swiftnesse of the river: yet got he over safe and sound, and lost nothing, save only a small quantity of his stuff and baggage, [l. 6. d. Diod. year 2. Olymp. 112. Curt. 4. c. 23.] Now from the passage over the Euphrates, at Thapacus, to this his passage over the Tigris, Eratosthenes reckons the way to be, 1400 al, 2400 furlongs, [Strabo, lib. 2. pag. 79. and lib. 16. pag. 746.]

Alexander removing his camp, from the bank of Tigris, led his army thorough the country of Assyria: having on his left hand the mountains of Sogdiana, and Tigris on the right. The 4 day after his passage over the Tigris, Mazæus sent out a thousand Horse against him; Alexander sent to encounter him Aristo, who commanded the Horse of Pæonia; who singling out Sarcapaces, the Commander of that T. ran him with his Spear, full in the throat; and when he with that wound fled away, he pursued him thorough the middle of the enemies, and unhorsed him: and so he what he could do for himself, took off his head, and brought it with him, and threw it down at Alexanders foot; and Sir, said he, in our country, such a present worth to be rewarded with a cup of gold; to whom Alexander smiling, answered, yea, with an empty one; but I will give thee one full of wine, [Arrian. lib. 3. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 23. Plutarch in Alexander.]

Alexander camped there 2 dayes, and gave order to remove the next. But the Moon falling into an eclipse in the first watch of the night, at first lost only the brightness of her light; but anon after, all the face of her seemed to be over-cast and covered with a colour like blood: and the whole army considering what they were then going about, began first to be troubled, and afterward terrified at the sight thereof, [Curt. ib. cap. 23. and 24.] Ptolemy hath rightly observed and said, [That the Moon eclipsed at Arabela, in the 2 hour of the night, and was then scorching in Sicily, l. 2. cap. 70.] but Ptolemy in his Geographie, [lib. 1. cap. 4.] not so right, where he sayes, that the eclipse in the 5 hour of the night, and was seen at Carthage at the 2 hour of the night. And rightly also saith Plutarch in Alexan. that the eclipse in the month Boedromion, αὐτὴν τὴν Μηνίαν τὴν τοῦ βοὸρος ἀγῶνα: (i. e.) about the beginning of the mysteries at Athens, to wit, in the full Moon, of the very middle of that month; at which the Great mysteries of Athens begin to be celebrated and continued certain dayes after. As for this Eclipse, the Astronomical account sheweth evidently, that it fell upon the 20 day of our September.

Alexander, to hearten up his soldiers mindes, which appeared much to be dejected at this sight, consulted with the Egyptian Soothsayers there present: and their answer was, That the Sun was the Grecians, or was the Predominant in Greece; and the Moon in Persia; and that therefore as often as the Eclipse, it portended rine and destruction to those nations whose life was [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 24.] Alexander presently offered sacrifices to the Sun, and Moon, and Earth: because they all three concur in the making of an Eclipse of the Moon: And Aristander, who was the Kings Soothsayer, declared openly, that that Eclipse portended all good and happy successe to Alexander, and the Macedons, and that there should be a barefought that very month: and that the sacrifices then offered, did foretell and assuredly promise a victory there-in to Alexander, [Arrian. lib. 3.]

Alexander perceiving the minds of the soldiers raised to a height of hope and confidence; thought fit to use this pang or fit of the rs, whilst it was upon them; and therefore gave order to march on the second watch of the night following, having all the way the Tigris in the right hand, and the Gordian mountains on the left. The next morning, himself with a small Troup of his own, fell upon about a thousand Persian scouts, of which some he slew, and the rest he took prisoners; and then sent some of his own company forward to discover: willing them also to quench the flame of such Towns and Villages, as the country people had set on fire: for they running away from the enemy, had set fire on Barres and Reeks of corn, which taking in the tops, had not yet burnt down to the ground; so that the Macedons hereby saved a great quantity of food for themselves: and Mazens, who before had set fire on what he pleased, all at leisure, the enemies now coming on to fast, fled away at last, and left all standing as it was, for the enemy to take, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 24.]

Alexander understood now, that Darius was not above 50 furlongs off, and therefore having store enough and enough of provision in his Camp, he there staid four days, [Id. ibid.]

3674. During which time he intercepted certain letters of Darius, by him sent to sollicite the Grecians in his army, to murder or otherwise to betray him, [Id. 4. cap. 25.]

Staïra, Darius his wife, weary of this long travail, and vexation of mind, cast the child of which she went, and died; whereat Alexander shed many a tear, and caused a most sumptuous funeral, sparing for no cost, to be made for her, [Id. ibid. Justin. lib. 11. cap. 12. Plutarch in Alex. and lib. 2. de fortis Alex.]

Tirus or Tyriotes an Eunuch, while others were busie about the funeral, stole away, and carried tidings of her death to Darius: who though at first infinitely perplexed and troubled at it, yet when he understood of Alexanders respect, ever had unto her, and chaste behaviour towards her, he lift up his hands to Heaven, and praised the gods; that it were so resolved, and no remedy left for him, yet none might fit in Cyrus his throne, but to just an enemy, so merciful a conqueror, as this Alexander was, [Curt. and Plutarch ibid.]

Darius so overcome with his so great clemency, and chastity used toward his wife, he thought himself again of trying for a peace, and to that purpose senten the most principal men about him, to offer him new conditions; and withall, sent him 30 thousand talents for the ransom of his mother and two daughters: and to offer him his other daughter Septina, or Statupna, or Sartina, or Statyra (for by all these names she goes, in the several editions of Curtius) to wife, [Curt. 4. cap. 16.] and what ever lay between the Hellespont and the Euphrates for a dowry: unto whom Alexander made this answer: That he always found Darius by his moneys, soliciting sometimes his souldiers to revolt from him, sometimes his nearest friends to murder him; and therefore was resolved to pursue him to the death, not any longer as a noble enemy, but as a malefactor and a poisoning murderer: and that whatever he had already lost, or yet remaining in his hands, was but the reward of war, that war should set the bounds of their two kingdoms, and each should have, what to morrow-dayes fortune should allot him, [Curtius. lib. 4. cap. 26. Justin lib. 11. cap. 12. Diodorus year 2. Olympiade 112.]

The Ambassadors thus sent away, told Darius, that he must fight: whereupon he presently dispatched away Mazens before him with 3000 Horse, to stop the passages where the enemy was to come; and with the rest, he marched after in good array 10 furlongs, and there made a stand, and expected the coming of the enemy. Alexander leaving all his luggage within his trenches, with a reasonable guard to keep them, set forward to meet the enemy, [Curt. ib. cap. 26. & 27.]

When at the very instant, a sudden Pannic fear fell upon his army; the reason was, for that the Heaven, (it being then the summer season) seemed to sparkle and shone out like fire, and they imagined that they saw flames of fire issuing out of Darius his Camp. Alexander by sound of trumpet signified to them, that all was well, and gave order to the Antesignary, (i. e.) those that stood next before the standard, in every order to lay down every mans arms before his feet, and should give the word to those that followed them, to do the like: which done, he shewed them there was no cause of fear, and that the enemy was yet a far off: so at length they recovered their spirits, and took up both their arms and courage again; yet for more surety, he thought fit there to make a stand; and to fortify his Camp for that present, [Id. cap. 28. Polystratag. lib. 4.]

Alexander drawing out all his forces by night, set forward about the second watch, purposing to fight, as soon as it was open day, [Arria. lib. 3.]

The next day, Mazens, who had taken up his standing with a choice company of horse, upon the rising of a hill, whence he might take a view of the army of the enemy, left the place, and returned to Darius, and no sooner was he gone, but the Macedons took it, both because of the advantage of ground, and also for that, from thence they might discover and have a full view of all the enemies forces, which were ranged in the plaine, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 29.]

Alexander commanded his Mercenary souldiers of Pæonia to march in front: he drew his Phalanx, or Squadron of Macedons into two wings, both flanked with Horse, [Id. ibid.] the Camps were distant one from the other, about 60 furlongs. And now the army of Alexander was come to certain hillocks, from whence they might discern the enemy; when he advised with his Captains whether his main battell should presently from thence fall on, or make a stand there right, until he had better viewed the ground whereon they were to fight: most were of opinion for the former; Parmenion was for the latter, which Alexander himself approved of, [Arria. lib. 3.] Relieved therefore to encamp upon one of those hillocks; he gave order forthwith to put spade in ground and to entrench there, for the present: which being quickly done, he went into his own pavilion, and from thence took a view of the army of the enemy ranged beneath him in the plain, [Curt. as before.]

Mean while the horse-boyes, and other tag rag, that followed the Camp, fell in sport to skirmish among themselves; Captain of the one side they called Alexander, and Captain of the other, Darius. Which when Alexander heard, he had the rest forbear; and the two Captains only to try it out between themselves. He himself helped Alexander on with armor; and Philotas Darius with his: all the army beheld while they twofought: as upon a prognostick of the event in the fight and war it self. It fell out, that he which played Alexander, foiled and overthrew him which played Darius; and had for a reward, 10 townships, and the honour of wearing a Persian garment bestowed on him, [Eratosthenes in Plut. in his Alexan.]

Alexanders friends came now unto him, and complained of the souldiers, that talking among themselves in their tents, they were resolved to take all the spoile to themselves, and to bring nothing into his Treasury: Whereat Alexander smiled, and said, Very good news, my masters, it is that yebrung me; for I see by this they mean to fight, and not to flee. Many of the common souldiers also in a humor, came unto him, and bad him be of good cheer, and not be afraid of the multitude of his enemies: for that they should not be able to endure the very first noise or shout of them; for that in this place doth year & signify, not the smell of them, or of their arme-pus, as Xyan-der rendered it, [Plut. in his Apophthegmes.]

The eleventh night after the Eclipse of the Moon, and when the two armies lay in fight each of other, Darius kept his men in their arms all night, and took a view of them all by torch-light: to that all the plain lying between the mountain Niphart and the Gordian hills shone with torches. But Alexander, while his army took their rest, was up with his Southlayer Aristander before his pavilion, busie in certain arcane and secret rites and ceremonies, and offered sacrifice to Apollo, [Id. in Alexan.] or as Curtius expresth it, Aristander in a white robe, carrying bunches of Vervin in his hand, and his head covered, mumbled certain prayers, which the King was to say after him, thereby to propitiate Jupiter, Minerva, and Vesta.

When Parmenion and other his friends advised him to let upon Darius in the dead of the night, thereby to concale from his souldiers fight, the terror of the fight in too great a disproportion of numbers in the two armies; his answer was, that he was not come thither, to steal a victory, [Plut. Curt. Arria.] And Darius on the contrary, fearing least some such attempt should be made upon him, and knowing that his Camp was no better rampiered than it should be; kept his men up all night in armes: which for want of sleep the next day when they came to fight, was the chief cause of their overthrow, [Arria.]

Alexander, troubled in his thoughts, with the expectation of what was then in hand, slept not all night, till toward the mornings, and then fell into to deep a sleep; that when it was day all abroad, they could not wake him. And when his friends asked him what made him sleep so soundly, answered, it was Darius, who by gathering all his forces into one place, had eased him of thinking how to follow him into sundry other countries, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 112. Justin lib. 11. cap. 13. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 33. Plut. in Alexan.]

This battel was fought by Alexander, saith Justin, lib. 11. cap. 14. in the 5 year after he came to his Crown: to wit, in the very end thereof, and beginning of the sixteenth year of Jerom upon 11. Daniel, not so considerably writeth, that he overcame and slew Darius in the 7 year of his reign. Arrian saith, this battel was fought, when Aristophanes was L. Chancellor at Athens, in the moneth Pyanepson; and that so the foretelling of Aristander was fulfilled, when he said, that in that very month, wherein the Moon was Eclipsed, Alexander should both fight with Darius, and also overcome him, [Arria. lib. 3. pag. 63.] And truly in that, both he and also Diodorus do say, that it was fought in the year, when Aristophanes was L. Chancellor at Athens, they do well; whereas Dionysius Halycarnass, placeth it in the year following, when Aristophanes was L. Chancellor there, by an calic mistake of the name, as in his Epistle to Ammaeus: nor was Aristander out, when he foretold, that Alexander should gain that great victory over Darius, in that very

Among others who entertained Alexander in this city, were the Chaldeans, who discoursed to him concerning the course and motions of the Stars, and fatal alterations of the times, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 3.] From whom Callisthenes one of Alexander's followers, received the observations of the Heavenly bodies for 1903 years (space) and transmitted them to Aristotle in Greece, as I mentioned before, in the year of the World 1771. out of Porphyrie.

Alexander himself also consulted with the Chaldeans: and by their advice, sacrificed to Belus: and whatever they prescribed him concerning the reparation of the Temples there, that he did. And thereupon, commanded the Babylonians to repair the Temples which Xerxes had formerly demolished; especially that of Belus, seated in the heart of the City: and commanded forthwith the rubble to be carried away, [Arria. lib. 3. pag. 63. and lib. 7. pag. 159.] which it fell was to great a work to do, that it took up 10 thousand mens labour for two whole months, to clear the place where the Temple stood, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 738.] But when Alexander commanded all his army to help to carry away the rubble, the Jews only refused to set hand to that work; for which Hecataeus of Abdera, who was then with Alexander, saith, that they endured many a blow, and many other grievous inconveniences, till Alexander himself hearing their reason, dispensed with them therein, [Josephus cont. Apion, lib. 1. pag. 1049.]

Alexander wondered at nothing more in those parts, than at a hole in the earth in Ecabata, or rather in Batana, as other copies have it (for Batana, which is a city placed by Stephanus Byzantinus near the Euphrates, and not Ecabata, the Metropolis of Media is here meant) where flames of fire continually break forth as out of a fountain, and a living spring of Naptha rising not far from that hole, where the fire breaketh forth; of the effects of which fiery nature here made known to Alexander, [Plutarch, in his life:] speaketh more at large.

Alexander, commanding Bagophanes, (who had surrendered the Castle of Babylon) to follow him, committed the keeping thereof to Agathon, of the town of Pydnam, with 700 Macedons, and 300 Mercenary soldiers: and made Mazzus, who delivered that city to him, Governour of all the Province of Babylon; setting Apollodorus of Amphipolis, and Menetes of Pella in Macedonia, to be Commanders of the Militia in that, and all the other Regions westward, as far as Cilicia: and for that purpose left with them, 2 thousand soldiers, with a thousand talents of silver, to raise Mercenary soldiers with. He appointed Alcibiodes Philotas his son, to gather up his tributes in those parts; and sent Mithrines, who gave up the city Sardes to him, to be Governour in Armenia, [Diodor. Arria. Curtius.]

Out of the monies which he found in Babylon, he gave to every Macedonian Horseman, 6 pound; to every stranger 5 pounds; to every Foot soldier, that was a Macedon, 2 pounds; to every stranger 2 months pay, [Diodor.] An Attic ounce, or pound, contained an hundred Drachmaes; which Curtius confounding with the Roman Denarius, saith, he gave to every Macedonian Horseman 600 Denarii, and to every stranger 500, and to every Foot soldier 200. [lib. 5. cap. 6.]

And now was Alexander upon his way from Babylon, when Amyntas the son of Andromenes, came to him with a supply of men sent him by Antipater Governour of Macedonia; of these there were out of Macedonia it self, 500 Horse, and 6 thousand Foot: out of Thraace, 600 Horse, and 3500 Foot: out of Peloponessus, 4 thousand Foot, and 380 Horse; as Curtius, or little less than a full thousand as Diodorus hath it: and along with them went the children of fifty principal Nobles of Macedonia, to be Squires of the body to the King, [Diodor. and Curtius.]

Alexander having received this supply, went onward of his journey: and in six dayes march, came into a country called Siracene, but by Curtius Savapene; and because this country abounded with all things necessary for the life of man, therefore he made stay there many dayes; where taking an exact trial, of every mans prowess and dexterity in the feats of Chivalry, he gave those eight, which were judged to excell the rest, every man to have the command of a thousand men. Then divided he his whole army into so many Brigades, for before that time, they went by 500 in a company, nor were those places formerly given upon trial made of their virtues, as now. And whereas before, the Horse of every Nation served together, apart from others; now making no difference of Nations, he appointed them Commanders, such as were most expert in the war of what nation soever. And having reformed the martial discipline of his army in many points, so as the whole body thereof fell into a great liking of the Head, and ready in all things to serve at his command: he then put forward and went on upon his intended journey, [Diodor. and Curtius lib. 5. cap. 6.]

And now drawing near to Sufa, there met him on the way, the son of the Governour of Sufa, with a Post, and letters from Philoxenus, whom Alexander immediately after the battel at Arbela, had dispatched away to Sufa: The effect of which letters, was this; that that the inhabitants of Sufa had given up the city to his dispose; and that all the treasure there, was reserved safe for him, [Arria. lib. 3.] and the same was delivered to him by word of mouth by the son of Abulites, the governour of the place, whether of his own accord; or whether, as some would have it, by Darius his command; to the end, that whilst he busied himself there about those money matters, himself might have the more time, to raise a new war against him, [Diodor. and Curtius lib. 5. cap. 7.]

The King entertained the young man with much grace and favour; and using him for his guide, came to the river Idalpes, al. Chotalpes, which runs with a delicate, but violent stream. Here Abulites himself met him, with a princely present, among which were certain Dromedaries, or running Camels, of an incredible swiftnesse, and 13 Elephants, which Darius had sent for out of India, [Curtius lib. 5.]

Upon the day, after he left Babylon, he came to Sufa, and having there made his entry, he received 50 thousand talents of silver, with all other the kings wardrobe, and other furniture, [Arria. lib. 3.] and as much more silver in fows, faith Curtius, but Diodorus reckons upward of 400 thousand talents of silver and gold in fowes and wedges, and 9 thousand talents coined into Daries, there found, Plutarch mentions 40 thousand talents in ready coin, and five thousand talents worth of Hermionice scarlet, which had been laid up there 190 years before, and yet lookt as fresh, as it did the first day it was laid up.

There again did Alexander offer sacrifice, according to the Macedonian manner, by torch-light, and exhibited gymnick paltimes and exercises, [Arrianus.] Then late he him down in the royal throne of Persia, far higher than for the proportion of his body to sit on; and therefore, when his feet would not reach to the step by which he mounted it, one of the pages took the table, whereat Darius used to eat his meat, and put it under, for a footstool unto him: which Philotas perceiving, perswaded him to take it for a signe of good luck unto him, [Diodor. and Curt. lib. 5. cap. 7.]

As for robes, and other purple stuff which was sent him out of Macedon, with those which wrought them, he sent it all to Darius his mother Syngambes, whom he respected in all points, and honoured as a son should do his mother: adding withal in his message to her, that if she liked those works, she should do well to let her young nieces to learn to work them; whereas when he understood that she was not a little troubled in her minde, he went himself, and excused the matter to her, by his ignorance of the Persian manners of doing in that kind, and comforted her again, [Curt. lib. cap. 8.] and so let her, and Darius his two young daughters, and his little son Ochus at Sufa, and departed; leaving some to instruct both her and them in the Macedonians language, [Diodor.]

And so himself went forward toward the utmost bounds of Persia, leaving Archelaus with a garrison of three thousand soldiers to keep the city, and Xenophilus to manne the Castle, and Callicrates to gather up his tributes. But for the civil government of the province of Sufa, he committed it to Abulites, who had given up al unto him, [Curt. lib. cap. 8.] But sent back Menetes to the sea side, and made him governour of Phoenicia, Syria and Cilicia, [Arria. lib. 3.]

Alexander, in four dayes march, came to the river called Pasitigris; and having passed it, with 9 thousand foot, and 3 or 4 thousand horse; went into the country of the Uxians, bordering upon the province of Sufa; and running out into the principal part of Persia, between which and that, there is a narrow passage: Madates was governour of this country, who had married Syngambes her sisters daughter.

Alexander gave Tauron 1500 mercenaries, and upon the point 1000 Agrians, and bad him with them to let forward as soon as it grew dark, and following his guides, to go, by such by-ways and secret passages as they should find them, and advance as far as to the city, which himself purposed to besiege. He then taking with him the squires of his body and his Targateers, and some 8 thousand other soldiers, let forward at the third watch at the same night, and by break of day, came to those streights, which opened into the Uxians country, and having passed them, came and fate down before the city. The Uxians seeing themselves hem'd in on all parts with a siege, sent out of the Castle there 30 men in suppliant wile, to crave his pardon; but that would not doe: yet at length having received letters of request from Syngambes, he did not only pardon Madates her kinsman, but restored all as well prisoners, as those who had voluntarily submitted to him, to their pristline liberty, and left the city untouched, and their land all over tribute free, [Curtius lib. 5. cap. 9.] For Arrianus reports out of Ptolemaeus Lagi, that at Syngambes her entreaty, he left them increased their lands to till, but put a yearly tribute upon them, of 1000 horses, and 500 beasts for carriage, and 3000 sheep; for this whole relation, is diversely made by Diodor, Curtius and Arrianus.

Alexander, having subdued the country of the Uxians, laid it to the Province of Sufia, and parting all his forces between himself and Parmenion, commanded the luggage, and the Thessalian Horse, and confederates and foreign mercenaries, and the cohorts, to go with him through the champion country; but himself taking with him the Macedonian Foot, and the Horse of his confederates, and light Horse, which he feared before him to discover, with the (quadron of Agrians and archers, went by the way of the mountain, which run all along in a ridge as far as unto Persia, (Curvius, lib. 5, cap. 10. Arria, lib. 3.)

Upon the fifth day after, as Diodorus and Curtius say, he came to the streights of Perfia, called the Sulian Pyles, or Gares. These Ariobarzanes the Persian kept with 2 thousand Foot, and 300 Horle, as Diodorus saith; or with near about 4 thousand Foot, and 7 hundred Horle, as Arrianus : And he there repelled Alexander with losse and thame, and made him retreat 30 furlongs off from that passage : But at last, having taken a certain shepherd prisoner, who was borne of a Persian mother, but begotten by a father borne in Lycia ; and being by him guided thorough narrow and craggy by-paths, and over certain snowie mountains, he routed the enemy, and opened a fair and free passage thorough those streights. Yet Ariobarzanes with some 40 Horle, and 5 thousand Foot, brake thorough the army of the Macedons, with a great laughter, as well of them, as of his own men, halting by all means possible, to get into Perter, as well of them, as of his own men, halting by all means possible, to get into Persepolis, which was the Metropolis of the very heeles, he fell back upon them, and in there, and the enemy following him at the very heels, he fell back upon them, and in a second fight, wasby them cut in peeces, with all that followed him : all which is more fully related by Diodor, Curtius, Arrian, Phylarch, and Polyens, lib. 4. strateg.

As his men now marching forward toward Percepilus, letters met him from iton the pedates, Darius his Treasurer in that place, shewing him, that the inhabitants of Percepedates, daring of his approach, were ready to fall upon the Kings treasure, and so to have it among themselves: and deterring him therefore to make all possible haste, to prevent them: He therefore leaving his Foot to come after, travelled all night with his Horse, though already tired with so long a journey, and came by break of day to the river Araxes; and there making a bridge, passed over with his army, [Diador, and Curtius,
lib. 5. cap. 11.]

lib. 5, cap. 11.] And now he was come within two furlongs of the City, when about some 8 hundred (for to Diodorus, Justinus, and Suidas, in the word Alexander, report, not 4 thousand, as Curtius) poor Grecian slaves, following one Euctemon of Eolia, came forth as humble suppliants to meet him. These were such as the former Kings of Persia had taken in the wars, and made slaves of them; and in excess of cruelty, had hitherto kept alive, some their Feet, some their hands, some their ears, and other their noses cut off, branding them all with letters or other marks in their faces, as he law. These brought him, that as he had done Greece, for he would now vouchsafe to deliver them from the slavery of the Persian cruelty: they desired him rather to lay them out, and bestow some lands among them there right; least that, in case they were, they should not prove a comfort, but an abomination to their friends and kinsfolks, at home. The King approving their motion, gave to every of them, 3 thousand Drachmaes, (which Curtius in this place also renders, by the word Denarios) and 5 fures of raiment for a man, and as many for every woman, and two yoke of oxen, and 500 sheep and so bushels of wheat, whereby they might go in hand to till and sow the land, which he had laid out for them: And moreover, exempted their land from paying all manner of tribute, and left them to protect themselves, and to see that no man should wrong them, [Diodor. and Curtius, ib. cap. 12. Justin. lib. 11. cap. 14.]

The next day, calling together all the commanders, and Captain of his army, he declared to them, that this city being the Metropolis of Persia, had ever been molt outrageously bent against the Grecians, and that therefore he was resolved to give the plunder of it to the soldiers, all save the prisoners which they had taken. And this he avowed against a huge flag of traitors, thinking it to be for his honour, that he commanded them, as enemies, to be butchered. Plutarch says, that he found treasure there, equal to that of a Gaul. Diodorus writeth, that coming into the Fort or Citadel, he found therein 120 thousand talents, reckoning the gold after the rate of the Royal; which is the same summe which Curtius bathy, lib. 5. cap. 13.

When Alexander first fat down in Persepolis, upon the Royal Throne under a golden Canopy, Demastus the Corinthian, and an old friend of his, and his fathers before him, is reported to have fallen like an old man a weeping, and to have said withal, That those Grecians lost a great pleasure, who died before that day, and lived not to behold Alexander fitting in Darius his Throne, [Plut. in Alexan.]

Alexander left the keeping of the Citadell or Castle of Persepolis to the keeping of Nicarchides

Nicarhides, with a garrison of 5 thousand Macedons, Tiridates also, who delivered the treasure to him, held the same fate and office, which he had under Darius; and leaving there a great part of his army and stuff, committed the keeping of the city to Parmenion and Craterus himself, with a thousand horse, and light armed foot, went to visit the inner parts of Persia at the rising of the seven stars: and although he was intolerably vexed with storms, and other tempestuous weather upon the way, yet he went through to the place, which he intended: by the way, he came to a place all covered with snow, and frozen over with ice: But he, seeing his soldiers at a stand, leapt off his horse, and went himself on foot over the ice and snow: The country people, which dwell scattered in crests and cabans, when they saw troops and companies of the enemy, fell on killing fuch of their children and others, as were not able to go with them, and fled all to the wild woods and mountains, covered with snow: But some of them, being drawn to a parley, they by little and little, laid a side their trigrit, and submitted to the king, nor did Alexander suffer any hurt to be done unto them; [Curt. 5. c. 14.]

At length, having divided the country of Persia all over, and taken sundry townes thereof, he came into the country of the Mardai; a warlike Nation, and far differing in behaviour from the Persians: which yet Alexander took in, and returned to Persepolis, the thirtieth day after he let out from thence; then he set him to bestow his rewards upon his Nobles and others, to every man according to his deserts: giving away almost what ever he had there gotten. [Id. libid.]

This journey of his, taking, as I laid before, about the rising of the seven stars, Curtius only describes. Whereas Plutarch fails, that, because the winter now grew on, to give his army home call, he therefore spent 4 months in Persia, now Pliny [lib. 18, cap. 31.] tells us, that the Athenians began their winter upon the Ides of November, when the seven stars set: But the course of times, reckoned from the battle at Gaugamela, theft that Alexander could not come to Persepolis before our December: others also calth doubt concerning the Mardi themselves: for Curtius tells us, that he subdued them not till after the death of Darius, [lib. 6, cap. 9.] unless we will distinguish thefe Mardi of Persia (mentioned by Herodotus [lib. 1, cap. 12, 35.] and by Nearchus in Strabo [lib. 11, pag. 524.] and Artianus in his Indica, pag. 146.) from thofe Mardi, which bordered upon Hircania: neither doth that Curtius, where he faith that he gave away almost all that he got at Persepolis: for he speaks exprefly of that, and not of what he got at Palargadia (as we thew before, in the year of the world 3669, out of Jacobus Capellus) well agree, with that which himfelf delivered in the very end of the next precedent chapter, where hee faith, that Alexander commanded Hories and Camels to bee sent from Babylon and Sufa, to carry along thofe one hundred and twenty thousand talents which he found in this city, which we may compare with that of Strabo, [lib. 15, pag. 731.] where he fpeaketh of *the great riches of Sufa, and that he delivered for certain, that what ever he got in Sufa, and in Darius his Camp, and never came into this accain, in Persia it felf, and Babylon, there were found 40 thoufand talents: [fome fay, 50 thoufand, And with that in Diodore; where he faith, that when he was forced to lay out much of the money there gotten, upon the neceffary needs of his wars, and purpofed to fend part of it to Sufa to be laid up there in bank, yet was he fain to get a multitude of horfes, both of draught, and carriage, and 3 thoufand Camels with pack faddles, from Babylon, and out of Adiaepotania: to carry his treasure to appointed place:] and Plut. moreover tells us, [lib. 10.] that his moneys and fuffr from thence taken, wanted 100000 quoy of mules, and 5000 camels, to carry them away* fluffs from thence taken, wanted 10000 yokes of mules, and 5000 camels, Darius, staying while at Ecabate in Media, gathered together, those which were left of the overthrow, and furnish them with arms again, that had left their own in the flight: he sent also for new supplies out of the neighbouring nations of his dominion:

 he also sent to the Governors and Officers in Bactria, and other countries, to commands: he sent firm in their allegiance to him; [Disorder in the 2^d part of his 17 book;] and his purpose was that, if Alexander flood hankering about Susa and Babylon, he would stay in Media, to see whether they who were about him, might not happily raise some new commotions; but if he found that he purposed to pursue him, then to retire to Parthia and Hircania, and even into Bactria if felt: and by wasting all the countries as he went, to leave Alexander no possibility of following him, for want of forage: wherefore he sent away before him, all the women, and other baggage, and carriages whatsoever, to the Caspian Gates, or freights; & himself with such small forces as he had gotten together, staid at Ecabate, in expectation, how things might go, Arria, lib. 3.

Alexander made a fealt for his victories already gotten, and offered magnificent lacrifices to his gods; and fealted his Nobles, with a most lumpsuous banquet; with flore of whores and curtlans among: every one with her ruffian. Among thefe there was one Thais, an Athenian borne, and a sweet-heart to Prolomus Lagi, his fon; at whole drunken motion, Alexander, noleffe far gone in wine than the her self was, commanded all Perfpolis, both City and Caffe, to be fet on a light fire, with caroling, and instruments of musick playing all the while, contrary to the advice of Parmenion, if it might have been heard. It is true, that having slept upon it, it much repented him what he had done, saying, That the Grecians could not have been more revenged of the Persians, if they had been forced to have seen him sitting in Xerxes his throne. [Curt. lib. 5, ca. 15. Diad. Plut. Arria.]

The day after he bestowed 30 talents upon that shepherd of Lycia, who had been his guide and shewed him the way into Persia, [Curt. ibid.]

Alexander after this took Palargada, a city built by Cyrus, and which was now given up to him, by Gobares the Governour thereof, with 6 thousand talents, [Id. cap. 13.] where he visited the sepulchre of Cyrus, as Strabo reports out of Aristobolus, who was present when he went to do it, [lib. 15, pag. 730.]

Then went he and took in the rest of the cities of Persia, some by pure force, others upon their voluntary surrender, [Diad.] which it seemeth was done, at the morning rising of the seven stars, from whence the ancients reckoned the beginning of summer, not at the morning setting of them, and beginning of winter, at which time it was that he took his journey into the heart of Persia, as Curtius seemeth to say.

Alexander made Phraataortes the son of Rheomithris, Governour of Persia, [Arrianus lib. 3.] and then went into Media; where a fresh supply came to him out of Cilicia, consisting of five thousand foot, and one thousand horse, all commanded by one Plato, an Athenian born, and then went forward, to follow after Darius, [Curt. lib. 5, cap. 16.]

Darius was purposed, leaving Ecbatane, to flee into Bactria; but fearing lest Alexander should overtake him upon the way, he changed his purpose. Alexander was at that time 1500 furlongs off from him: but no distance of place seemed enough to prevent his speed in following, and therefore he resolved, instead of flying, to try the fortune of another battle. He had then 30 thousand men about him; of which four thousand were Grecians, under the command of Patran, (all men of approved fidelity toward him) besides 4 thousand archers and slingers; and yet more, 3900 horse, consisting of the most part of Bactrians, commanded by Bessus, Governour of Bactria, [Curt. ib.]

Diodorus reckons them 30 thousand Persians and Mercenary Greeks: Arrianus 3 thousand horse, and 6 thousand foot, and no more; who also says, that Darius carried with him out of Media, no more than 7 thousand talents. But Strabo [lib. 15, pag. 731.] says, that Darius when he fled out of Media, carried with him himself, and Diodorus, which they, who murdered him, rifled and shared among themselves; and Diodorus, [lib. 4, Olympiade 112.] says, that Alexander, when he pursued Darius, had just to many talents from his cash-keepers. And Athenæus [lib. 11, pag. 514, of the Greek and Latin editions] out of Charætes his history of Alexander tells us, that the custom of the Persian Kings was, wherever they went, to have over the Kings bed-chamber, a Garret, with five Chests in it, wherein there were always 5 thousand talents of gold kept, and that they called the Kings pillows, and at the back stairs one other room, where they ever kept three thousand talents, in three chests, and that was called the Kings bench to sit on.

Bessus, the governour of Bactria, and Nabarzaes, commander of 1000 horse, both which followed Darius in his flight, commanded their soldiers to seize on his persons, and to bind him fast, resolving, if Alexander overtook them, to purchase their own peace, by delivering him bound into his hands: but if they could get clear of him, then to set up for themselves, and to renew the war against him in their own names, [Curt. 5, cap. 18, 22, 23. Arria, lib. 3, pag. 67, 68, and 76.] This, saith Justin [lib. 11, cap. 15.] was acted in a certain town in Parthia called Thara, or rather, Dara, so called at 15. was acted in a certain town in Parthia, in remembrance of this villainy there acted upon Darius: adding out of Trogus, that this was done by a kind of fatality, that the Persian Empire, should end in their land, who were pre-ordained to succeed them in the Empire.

The Kings treasure and stuff, of which I speak, was rifled, as if it had all been enemies goods, Bessus and Nabarzaes, together with one Brazas, (al. Barzaenes) governour of the Arachoti, and Drangian took Darius, carried him away prisoner in a Cart: yet to shew some respect, they clapt golden chains upon him; and again, that he might not be known, they covered the Cart, with a bafe dirty tilt made of skins, and let strangers to drive it; who, if any man should ask, could not tell who was in it, and those who were his jailors, came a pretty way behind. The Persians, won thereto by Bessus who were his jailors, came a pretty way behind. The Persians, won thereto by Bessus his large promises, and the rather, because there was no body now left to whom they might apply themselves, joynd with the Bactrians: and now Bessus was made general, in Darius his room, by the Bactrian horse, and other nations, which had accompanied Darius in his flight. But Artabazus and his sons, with those which he commanded, and the Greeks commanded by Patran, kept themselves a part from Bessus, and leaving the rode way, gat up the mountains, and marched away to Parthene, [Curt. lib. 5, cap. 23. Arria, lib. 4, pag. 68.]

Alex-

Alexander bending his course into Media, fell in upon the Paritacæ, and subdued their country, and made Oxoathres, Abuletus his son, governour over them, [Arrian, pag. 66.]

Tabas was a Town in the utmost border of Paritocene, there he was told, by some who had abandoned Darius, and fled to him, that Darius was gone in all haste to Bactria, [Curt. lib. 5, cap. 24.] But coming within three dayes journey of Ecbatane, he was more certainly informed by Bistans, the son of Ochus, who reigned in Persia next before Darius, that Darius was fled from Ecbatane five dayes before, [Arrianus lib. 3.]

Alexander, when he came to Ecbatane, finding the Theffalian and others of the confederate Horse unwilling to accompany him any further, dismissed them to return into their own countries: and at their parting, over and above their full pay, gave 2 thousand talents to be shared among them, [Arria, ibid. Plut. in Alexan.] But Diodorus and Curtius, (speaking of his dismissing the Grecians, as a thing done after the death of Darius, and in a general way without any special mention made of the Theffalian Troups) say, that he gave to every one that served on horseback a talent, or 6 thousand Deniers, as Curtius in lib. 6, cap. 3. expresseth it: counting here, as his manner every where is, a denere, for a drachma. And Diodorus adds, that he gave to every Foot soldier ten mnās; (4. c.) a thousand drachmæ; and provision enough besides: for every man to carry him on his way into his own country: and to every one of them that would continue in his service, he gave 3 talents ready money: and finding that the number of them that stayed was not small, he appointed one Epocilus to convoy the rest to the sea side in Asia; for the Theffalians that returned left their horses with him. And moreover he wrote to Menetes, Governour in those parts, that as soon as they arrived there, he should furnish them forthwith with shipping, and see them transported into Europe side, [Arria.]

For the re-emburment of those great summes bestowed on the soldiers to dismiss, Alexander was fain, for all his haste made in the pursuit of Darius, to levy a vast quantity of monies in the way as he went: of which Diodorus speaking, saith. That he received of Darius his treasurers, 8 thousand talents, over and above that which they of themselves bestowed among his soldiers, with cups, and other rewards which amounted to 13 thousand talents: and yet that which they either stole, or wrung out of mens hands perforce, was reckoned to a great deale more: so saith Diodorus, [pag. 547, in the Greek and Latin Edition] wherewith that of Curtius very well agrees, [lib. 6, cap. 2.] where he saith; That in the next spoile which he made, he raised 26 thousand talents: out of which 12 (Justin hath it 13. lib. 12, cap. 1.) talents were spent in one large feile which he bestowed among his soldiers: and his Exchequer-men censured him of so much more. But we read in Arrianus [page 67.] That now he gave in charge to Parmenion, that he should take all the monies which were brought him out of Persia, and lay them up in Ecbatane, under the keeping of Harpalus, with a guard of 6000 Macedons, and some Horse of his confederates. Now this money so brought, and laid up in Ecbatane, some reckon to have amounted to 180 thousand talents, [Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 731.] among which Diodorus is one, who saith also, that Parmenion had the charge of all that treasure, [page 55.] Justin also, [lib. 12, cap. 1.] saith, that that treasure amounted to 190 thousand talents, and that Parmenion had the keeping of it: wherein they both speak righter, in making Parmenion the keeper of it, than Arrianus doth in naming Harpalus to that office, whom we shewed before, to have been leit at Babylon, to gather up the tribute and other duties of the King in those parts.

But here Arrianus tells us, that Alexander sent away Parmenion with certain Brigades of foreigners, and Thracian Horse and others, all save only the Troup of his own fellow Cavaliers, to march thorough the country of the Cadusians into Hitcania; and that he wrote also to Clitus, Captain of the Kings Troup, that so soon as he came from Susa to Ecbatane, (for he was left behind sick at Susa) he should take such Horse as were there left to guard the monies, and to march away into Parthia, and to meet him there.

Alexander taking with him the Troup of his fellow Cavaliers, and vant courriers, and mercenaries led by Erigylius, and the Macedonian Squadron (saving those which were left at Ecbatane to guard the monies) and the Agrians and archers, went after Darius: And because he made over great haste in his march, it therefore happened that many of his company Men and Horse tired out, and not able to follow, fainted on the way, and perished: Yet Alexander would on, and upon the eleventh day came to the Rages, [Arria, lib. 3.] having in those eleven dayes gone 3300 furlongs. In which long journey, the Horse, though in many places they wanted water, followed him very cheerfully: yet so, as that of that company which set out with him from Ecbatane, there came but 60 with him to his journeyes end, [Plut. in Alex.]

This

This City of Rages (mentioned Tobit, x. v. 14. and 4. v. 1.) is but one dayes journey from the Caspian gates, or streights; to a man that would ride Alexanders pace; But Darius was already palled them; and many of those which let out with him were, in his journey slip away from him; and gone every man to his own home: and many of them also rendred themselves to Alexander upon the way, [Arria, ibid.]

Alexander, growing out of all hopes of overtaking Darius, rested him there right, five dayes; and having refreshed his army, made Oxydates a Perſian born governour of Media, whom formerly Darius had committed to prison in Susa, purposing to have had his head, [Id. ib. with Curt., lib. 6. cap. 2.]

From hence Alexander went with his army into Parthia; and the first day he encamped near the Caspian gates: but the next day he entered the gates or streits themselves, and passing thorough them, came into places, well inhabited. And when he had given order for provisions to be brought into him, (for he was informed that he was to go thorough countries, where no such provision was to be had) he sent Crenus with the horse and some few companies of foot abroad to forrage, [Arria, ib.]

Mean while Bagithenes a great man in Babylon, came out of Darius his Camp to him; by whom he understood for certain, that Darius was not yet laid hold on, but was in great danger, either of death or bonds, [Id. ibid. Curtius lib. 5. cap. 24.]

Alexander hereupon made the more haſt after him: and therefore not ſtaying for Crenus his return from forraging, took along with him his ſellow Cavaliers, and his vaint Courtiers, and the Mercenary horſe-lead by Erigyus, and the Macedon battalion (ſaving ſuch as were left to guard his treasure) with the Agrians and Archers, and leaving Craterus to command the reſt, willed him to come alters by more eaſie journeyes. Travelling therefore all that night, and the next day till noon, he reſted him for a while; and then travelling all night again, early next morning came to that Camp of Darius; from whence Bagithenes came unto him: and thence again ſetting forward, and riding all that night, and the next day till noon, he came to a certain village, where they who had the charge of keeping Darius lay the day before, as Artianus ſayes, or as Curtius hath it, where Bessus laid firſt hold on him.

Having now rode 500 furlongs, from the place where Bagithenes firſt came unto him, he lighted upon one Melon, who was Darius his interpreter. He not able thorough weakneſſe to follow Darius any further; and ſeeing Alexander came on ſo faſt, made as if he had fled over to him from Darius, for fear he ſhould elſe be taken for an enemy: by him Alexander underſtood the truth of matters, how they went. But weary his men were, and reſt they muſt: but himſelf making choice of fix thouſand horſe; he took again out of them 3 hundred Dimachs, (who what they were, you may learn out of Pollux and Helychius) Theſe were heavy Cortelers on their backs, yet rode on horſe-back: but if need were, alighted, and ſerved on foot, ſo ſayes Curtius: but Arianus [lib. 3. cap. 58.] ſays, when he ſaw, that the foot could not poſſibly keep pace with him, running thus on horſe-back, he made about 500, of the horſe-men alight, and commanded the Captains, and prime men of the foot companies, all armed as they were, to get upon them. To Nicanor, who commanded the Targeaters, and Artalus Colonel of the Squadron of Agrians, he gave in charge, to follow on the way, that Bessus was gone with his men, with thoſe, who were lighteſt armed: and the reſt, he commanded to come after in a ſquare battalion.

Whiles Alexander was thus buſie in giving orders, Ocellus and Mithracenes came unto him; who in deteſtation of Bessus his ſowle act, fled over to him, and told him that the Perſians were not above 500 furlongs off: and that they could bring him to them, a nearer way. Taking them therefore for his guides, he ſet out with the firſt of the evening with a ſelect company of horſe; and went the way they led him, commanding the Macedonian Phalanx or Squadron to follow him, as faſt as poſſibly they could; and now he had gone 300 furlongs, when one Brochelus (called by Arrianus cap. 67. Amibelus) the ſon of Mazeus, ſometimes governour of Syria under Darius, met him, and as one flying over to him, informed him that Bessus was not above 200 furlongs before him, and that his army doubting of no danger near, marched they cared not how, and out of all order, that they were bound, as it ſeemed, for Hircania, if he made haſt, he might fall upon them, all ſtragling from their colours, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 24.]

Bessus and his conſorts, finding Alexander to be now upon the back of them, went to Darius, where he was in his poor tilted cart, and deſired him to get to horſe, and ſave himſelf by flight: which when he reſuſed to do, Satibarzenes and Barſacenes, threw each of them his dart at him, and having wounded him in ſundry parts, left him: they alſo houghed the horſes that drew him, that they might go no further; and killed his two ſervants that ſtill attended on him, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 25. with Arria. pag. 69. lib. 3.] only his dog kept with him, [Eliu. Hiſtor. animal. lib. 6. cap. 35.]

This done, Satibarzenes and Barzaentes, with 600 horſe, fled away as faſt as poſſibly they could, [Arrian. pag. 69.] And that they might not be purſued upon one and the ſame track, Nabazzenes fled into Hircania, Bellus into Bactria: The reſt, having loſt their Captains, diſperſed themſelves, ſome here, ſome there: only five hundred of the horſe, kept in a bodie, uncertain what to doe, fight or flee, [Curtius, ut ſupra.]

Alexander, ſeeing in what conſuſion the enemy was, ſent Nicanor to bid them (ſay: himſelf followed after; and having ſlain about 3 thouſand of them that would not yield, drove the reſt before him like ſo many cattle, without hurting them, and gave the word, to kill no more; and haſted forward ſo ſpeedily, that ſcantly 3 thouſand horſe followed him. But all the companies of the enemy that fled, fell into their hands, that came after him; ſo that the number of priſoners, was greater than of thoſe that took them: and ſo far had fear bereft them of their ſenſes, that they never perceived or conſidered, either how many themſelves, or how few their enemies were, [Id. ibid.]

Mean while the horſes which drew Darius his cart, having none to drive them, ſtrayed out of the rode way: and having gone ſome 4 furlongs, ſtood ſtill in a certain valley, fainting, what with the heat of the weather, what with the burns they had received: There was not far off a fountain of water: which one Polytratus a Macedonian born, having learnt out by the country people, all tired out with heat and wounds as he was, went to quench his thirſt at. And as he was taking up water in his head-peece, he ſpied the darts which ſtuck in the bodies of the horſes, that were in the cart, [Id. ibid.] and coming nearer, he ſaw Darius lying in the cart: grievouſly wounded, but not quite dead: And Darius calling to him for a little water, and having drunk it off, deſired him to carry his thanks to Alexander for the favour which he had ſhewed, to his mother; and to his wife and children; craving of him, nothing but an honeſt burial for himſelf; and as for revenge, it concerned not him, ſo much as it did Alexander himſelf, and the common right of Kings; which to neglect, might prove, not only diſhonourable, but alſo dangerous unto him; the one concerning him in point of juſtice, the other, of profit and ſafety to his perſon: in token whereof, he gave him, he ſaid, his right hand, to carry to Alexander; and to giving his hand to Polytratus, he gave up the gholt, [Juſt. l. 11. c. 15. with Plut. in Alex.]

And thus ended Darius his dayes, in the year when Ariſtophamus, was L. Chancellor in Athens, in the moneth Hecatombæon: when he had lived about 50 years, [Arri. lib. 3. pag. 69.] and had reigned 6 years, in the year from the death of Cyruſ, who ſet up the Perſian Empire, 200, in the very beginning of the 3 year of the 115 Olympiade: From whence alſo Calippus (a man renowned by Ariſtotle, who was at that time grown famous in his ſchool at Athens, lib. 12. of his Metaphiſicks) began his Periods, or account of 76 years: as we find by divers Aſtronomical obſervations of Ptolemy, in his great Syntaxis, thereunto applied; for though Strabo, [lib. 6.] ſaith, that Darius loſt his Empire at the battle of Gaugamela, fought nine years before, and Juſtin, in his eleventh book, affirms, that then Alexander took the Empire of Aſia out of his hand, yet all it appeareth, that Darius being murdered by his kinſfolks, loſt both life and kingdom all at once, as Juſtin in the end of his 10 book ſpeaketh: we can no longer doubt, but that Calippus, in memorial of Alexanders Empire, or Monarchy of Aſia, made this the terme or Epocha of his Periods, or calculation of years.

Now to this Monarchie of Alexander, ſidore and Beda out of Eusebius his Chronicle, allow but five years only: Jul. Africa, ſix, and the Chronologer, which wrote in the time of Alexander Severus, leven, [Tomæ 2. Antiquar. Lætiæ. Hen. Gwiſſi, p. 600.] Strabo in the end of his 15 books, ten or eleven. Nicephorus Conſtantinopolitanus in his Chronicle, twelve, and Clemens Alexandrinus, [lib. 1. Stromar.] ſurthirt of all others from the mark, eighteen: ſince it is moſt manifeſt, that from the moneth Hecatombæon, wherein Darius died, when Ariſtophamus departed this life, as we ſhall ſhew anon, and when Hegeliſ was L. Chancellor there, there paſſed only fix years, and ten moneths, in which ſmall ſpace of time, he did ſuch ſo many, and to great fears of armes in the eaſt, that he may well be ſaid to have ſhown, rather than to have marched over all thoſe regions; whence it is, that in Daniel [c. 8. v. 1.] he is deſcribed under the type and figure of a Grate coming from the weſt, over the face of the whole earth, and never ſo much as touching the ground, and [c. 7. v. 6.] to a winged Pard, a beaſt, as Hierome upon that place ſaith, of all others, the wiſeſt and queſtionleſs, (i. e.) impetuous: for as he there addeth, nothing was ſo ſoon diſpatcht, as that conqueſt of his, who from the gulph of Venice, and the Adriatick ſea, to the very Indian Ocean, and the river Ganges, ran through all, not ſo much with battle, as with victory: now what he did after the death of Darius, is all delivered by Diodorus, in the ſecond part of his 17 book; by Juſtin, [lib. 12.] by Curtius, in the five laſt books of his Hiſtory; by Plutarch in his life: and by Arrianus in his 3 book, and the ſcore following: out of all all which I have thought good here to insert the order of his gifts, as followeth.

Darius was no sooner dead, but Alexander taking his horse with him, came to the place where he lay, and seeing the dead body of him, wept to see to unworthy a death befallen so high a person; and took his own coat, and call it over him, and forthwith sent him to his mother, to be buried in a royal manner, with the kings of Persia: he took also his brother Oxathres into the number of his friends and nobles; using him with all honour belonging to his high place and parentage; and presently set himself to pursue Bessus: but for as much as he was gotten an infinite way before him into Bactria, (seeing he could not for the present reach him, he came back again.

While he remained at Hecatompolis which was a City in Parthene, built in former ages by the Grecians, and had there gotten good store of provisions together; there grew a noise which went thorough all the army, as they lay idle in their quarters, that they should all forthwith return into Greece. Alexander, when he had allayed this rumor, and they all bad him lead them whither he would, and they would follow him; alter 3 dayes march thorough the country of Parthene, came into the borders of Hircania, which Nabarzanes had seized on: and there leaving Craterus with such as he commanded, and out of Amyntas his Brigade, six hundred Horse, and as many Archers, to keep Parthene safe from the incursion of the bordering Nations. He commanded Erigyus to look to the carriages, and to follow him thorough the champion country with a considerable company to guard them. Himself, taking with him his Targaters, and the best of the Macedonian Squadron, and some archers, and, having with them marched one hundred furlongs, encamped in a plain near to a small river.

He had now refreshed his army there four dayes, when letters came to him from Nabarzanes, who, together with Bessus, had murdered Darius; by which he rendered himself unto him: from hence Alexander removed 20 furlongs onward, thorough an almost impassable way; yet having no enemy to oppose him, he gat thorough: and having proceeded some 30 furlongs further, Phradapharnes Governour of Hircania, and Parthiabo, met him, and surrendered to him, himself, and all those, who after Darius his death, had fled unto him; all whom he graciously received, and then came to a Town called Arvas. Here Craterus came unto him, who had taken in all the countries which he had passed through by fair means or foul. Erigyus also with the carriages, came to him at the same place. He brought with him to his presence Phradates, al, Autrophadates, Governour of the country of the Tapurins; and him Alexander restored, and sent him back to his Government again.

When Alexander was now come to the first borders of Hircania, Artabazus the Persian, who was an old guest of Philips, what time he was banished by Ochus, and had ever continued most loyal to Darius, and was now 95 years of age, came unto him with Cophenes, and eight other sons of his, borne all of the same mother, being the sister of Mentor and Memnon; and Alexander received them all most graciously; Artabazanes also and Artames, Governours formerly of Darius his appointment, came in and submitted to him.

Alexander invaded now the country of the Mardians, bordering upon Hircania; which possessing themselves of the passages in the mountains, met him there with an army of 8000 men. These set upon, and slew many of them: took more of them prisoners, and made the rest flee into the craggy mountains. Whereupon, at length they sent him home his horse Bucephalus, which they had taken, and craved his pardon, by 50 Ambassadors which they sent unto him. And Alexander, taking hostages of them, made Autrophodates Governour over them, as he had over the Tapurins.

From thence he returned in five dayes to the place from whence he set forth against the Mardians, and thither came to him Andronicus the son of Agerrus, and Artabazus, and by his command, brought with them, 1500 Greeks, who had been in pay with Darius in his life time, and 90 Ambassadors, which had from sundry nations been sent unto Darius. Alexander committed the four Lacedemonian Ambassadors, and Dropis the Athenian to prison: As for Democates the other Athenian Ambassador, because he had ever opposed the Macedonian faction, and therefore departed of all pardon from Alexander, he slew himself. The Ambassadors from Sinope, and Hecraclides, who were sent from Carthage, and other Ambassadors out of Greece, he set all at liberty: he gave the command of such Grecians as stayed in his service unto Andronicus: But Artabazus, having heaped double the honours upon him, of whatever he held under Darius, he sent away to his own home.

Having thus ordered these things, he marched against the greatest City of all Hircania, called Zeudracarta, al, Zadracarta, and there stayed 15 dayes. Here Nabarzanes came unto him, bringing with him infinite presents; among which, one was

Bagoas,

Bagoas, an Eunuch of a rare beauty; who was afterward in great esteem, and could do all in all with Alexander himself.

Here Thalestris, al, Minithaa, Queen of the Amazons, lying between the two rivers, Phasis and Thermodoon, is said to have come unto him, with 3 hundred Ladies leaving the rest of her army upon the borders of Hircania, of purpose to be with child by him; and upon that errand, stayed with him 13 dayes. Curtius in this place contrary to the stream of all Geographers, would needs place these Amazons upon the borders of Hircania, [lib, 6, cap, 10.] whereas Justin says, they bordered upon the Albania, [lib, 42, cap, 3.] Clitarchus saith, that Thalestris came from the Calpian Gates, and the river Thermodoon to Alexander: and that she came 25, al, 35, dayes journey to him, thorough 1 know not how many several nations, [lib, 12, cap, 3.] which way could not be of less than 6 thousand furlongs, [Strabo lib, 11.] This coming of hers to Alexander is reported by Polycrates, Onesicritus, Antigenes, Hifter, and sundry others. But Aristobolus Chares al, al, al, the Reporter, Ptolemus Lagi, Anticles, Philo Thebanus, Philippus, al, al, al, the Reporter, Hecateus Eretienus, Philippus Chalcedensis, and Duris Samius, say all, that it is naught else but a meer fable: to which Alexander himself seems to Agree, who in his Commentaries, writing therein all things exactly to Antigenus saith indeed, that a certain Scythian offered him his daughter to wife; but of an Amazon not a word. It is reported also, that Onesicritus, many years after reading his fourth book, to Lyfimachus then reigning, mentioned, something of an Amazon, that came to Alexander, wherat he smiled; and I pray Sirs, said he, where was I the while? [Plut. in Alex. see Strabo, lib, 11, p, 505, and Arrian, lib, 1, p, 155, & 156.]

Alexander, returning into Parthene, gave over himself there, to all kind of Persian pride and luxury, he commanded also his nobles to take and wear the long Persian robes, of cloth of gold and scarlet, and if any of the common souldiers had a mind to a Persian wench, he suffered him to marry her.

Bessus, wearing now his turbant upright and pointed, and other regal attire, took upon him the title of Artaxerxes, and king of Asia; and gathered into a body all those Persians which were fled into Bactria, and the Bactrians themselves, and his confederates the Scythians, and others inhabiting as far as the bank of the river Tanais, purposing with them to make a war upon Alexander.

Alexander, on the other side, made Aminnapes a Partian born, Governour of Parthia and Hircania under him, for that he with Mazeus, al, Mezaces, had delivered up Egypt formerly into his hands, yet joynted with him, in that charge. Tlepolemus, one of his Nobles, [Arrian, lib, 3, p, 69, though Curtius saies, that he made Arrian, (for so he shortly calls Aminnapes) governour of Hircania, who, being heretofore banished by Ochus, had fled for refuge to his father Philip, [lib, 6, cap, 8.] Justin says, that, having subdued Parthia, he made a certain Noble man of Persia, called Andragoras, Governour thereof: from whom the kings of Parthia, that afterward were, lineally came, seeing that his name, who was afterward put down by Artaces the lesser up, and founder of the Partian kingdom, was also called Andragoras, [Justin, lib, 41, cap, 4.]

Alexander, after this, came to Susa, a city of the Arians, and thither came to him Saubarzanes, governour of the Arians, and to him he restored his government to hold it under him; but joynted Anaxippus, one of his own Nobles to hold it with him, giving him 40 javelins on horse-back to attend him, to dispose of in places where he thought fit to keep the Arians from being plundered or otherwise wronged by the army, as it passed by.

Alexander, being now ready to march against Bessus, when he saw that his army, loaden with the spoile, and furniture of luxury which they had gotten, was scarcely able to stir under it, he commanded first his own, then the stuff and carriages, saving only what was merely necessary for their present use, to be set on fire.

Nicanor, the son of Parmenion, Captain of the Argyraspides, (i. e.) of the silver shields, or Targaters, died suddenly, and was much lamented by all, especially by the King himself, who would fain have staid to be present at his funeral: but want of provisions in that place would not suffer him; wherefore leaving there his brother Philotas with 2000 men to perform his obsequies, he went on his journey, in pursuit of Bessus.

Saribarzanes, to whom Alexander had restored his government over the Arians, as was said before, having murdered Anaxippus, with his 40 javelins on horse-back, gathered all the power he could to the chief city of the Arians, called Chortacana, al, Artacoana, and from thence hearing that Alexander came on, he purposed to go and joyn himself with Bessus, as in a common war against the Macedons.

Alexander, hearing hereof, brake off his journey into Bactra, and having marched 600 furlongs in two dayes, came to Artacoana: whereupon Satibarzanes with 9000 Horle (for he could make no more at that present) fled away into Bactra to Bessus: the rest gat them away all to the mountains. And the King having pursued Satibarzanes a great while, but not able to overtake him, fell upon those who were got into the mountains and took the craggy rocks, whereto 13 thousand of the Arians, all armed, had retired themselves, and so returned to Artacoana: which was in the mean time besieged by Craterus: and he having prepared all things ready for an assault, stayed onely for the return of Alexander: that the honour thereof as reason was, might be his; as Joab did to David, [2 Sam. 6. 12. v. 27, 28.] But the King, when he came and he saw them ready to implore his mercy, did not onely pardon them, and raise his siege, found them ready to every man his own again: and having within 30 dayes taken in all the places of that country, made Arfaces their Governour, and so departed.

Then came fresh supplies unto him: Zolus brought him 500 Horle out of Greece, Antipater lent him 3 thousandouldiers out of Illyrium; Philip the son of Menelaus, brought him certain mercenary Horle out of Media, with 130 of those Theffalians, who when they were all dismissed from Ecbatane to return into their own country, would not go, but continued still in the Kings pay. Out of Lydia also, came to him 2600 Foot, with 300 Horle, commanded, as Ariarnus seems to say, by one Andromachus.

Having thus increased his number, he came to the Drangeans (whom Ariarnus calls Zarangeans) whose Governour was Barzanes, one of those, who with Bessus and Nabarzanes, set upon Darius whilst he was in his flight. He, for fear of punishment from Alexanders hand, got him presently away to the Indians on this side the river Indus.

Alexander had now spent 5 dayes in the chief City of the Drangean country, when some of his own people began to conspire his death: One Dimnus, a Macedonian borne, discovered to Nicomachus his barbas, that three dayes hence, Alexander would be murdered, and that he himself was of counsel with sundry noble personages in that action. Nicomachus, though he had sworn secrecy to Dimnus, yet imparted the businesse to his brother Ceballinus, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith. But Ceballinus, because he could not have access to the King himself, disclosed it to Philotes first; and then, finding him cold in the businesse, and like enough to be bimester of the same plot, went to Metron, a noble young gentleman, and Master of the Artillery, and advised him to acquaint the King with it out of hand. Alexander, hearing thereof, commanded forth with all to be laid hold on. Dimnus, being taken, knew well enough what the matter was, and therefore presently drew his own sword, and fell upon it. Ceballinus, being questioned, protested, that the very hour wherein he heard of it, he disclosed the matter to Philotas, desiring him to acquaint the King with it. Philotas being charged therewith, said 'twas true; but that, not out of any ill meanings, but onely thorough over-sight and heedlesnesse he committed it: and that it seemed to him but a trifle: yet, being afterward had to the wrack, he confessed all, and thereupon with the rest of the conspirators in that action, was put to death.

Then was also called in question before a council of Macedons, one Alexander Lynceffes, for an old conspiracy of his, for which he had already lain in prison 3 years: as Diodorus and Curtius say. This is that Alexander Aneropus, who before the battle at Issus, which was now 4 years past, was committed to prison for praesiding the Kings death: as appears out of Diodorus, Justin, and Ariarnus: see before [Ant. mem. 3. 671.] and that he had been tampering about the Kings death, more than once before, appears by those words of Alexander to his Council of Macedons, in Curtius, [lib. 8. cap. 16.] where he sayes: Alexander Lynceffes, laich he, twice arraigned for two feveral treasons against my life, I have twice taken out of the band of Justice; and being a third time convicted, I reprieved him, and kept him in prison these 3 years (for so it should be according to the true Palatine Manuscript, and not two years, as in the ordinary printed books) and till you now desired, that he might be brought to his deserved punishment. For indeed, being upon this occasion drawn again into question, before the Judges, and there faulting in his answers, he was without more ado, thrust thorough with launces by those which stood about and heard him at the bar.

The body of Lynceffes being carryed out of the place, the King sitting still in judgement, caused Amyntas the son of Andromenes, with Attalus and Symmias his brothers, all most intimate friends of Philotas, to be brought to the bar. For Polemon the youngest of all, when he heard that Philotas was had to the wrack, fled away: but was taken, and brought to judgement too. Yet at last, Alexander acquitted them all, by his own mouth, upon the general intercession of those that then were there present: And then immediately he dispatched away Polydamas, one whom Parmenion loved, no man better, with two Arabians upon Dromedary Camels into Media, that they might might prevent the newes of Philotas his death in those parts, with letters of credence, to Cleander, Sitaces an I Menidas, commanders in the army under him, to make him away; being then Governor of Media, and of greatest repute and authority; next the king, in the army. And by them was Parmenion, being now 70 years of age, whilst having read Alexanders letters, he was reading a second letter, written to him in the name of his son Philotas, stabbed and done to death: Cleander sent his head to the king, and would hardly suffer the rest of his body to be buried. Strabo tells us, that this feat was gone about and finished in eleven dayes space: which ordinarily taketh up 30 or 40 dayes journey, in the very going, [lib. 15. p. 724.]

Alexander fearing least the glory and lustre of all his actions, might be blemished and obscured with a spot of cruelty in such proceedings, did, as Gao formerly [Athenus, 3. 610. ut sup.] did, (i. e.) he gave it forth, that he was to send some friends of his into Macedonia; and advised all men that would, to write to their friends in those parts; as one liketo have the like opportunity in haste again, seeing they were going further eastward: every man therefore wrote; and he took order to have all the packets brought to him: whereby finding what every mans opinion of him and his doings was he calt all those, whom he found either weary of the war, or misliking of his actions, into one company, which he termed, Ανταρκτοι συνη, (i. e.) the unruly company: to be led by Leonidas, formerly an intimate friend of Parmenions, and then dividing his fellow Cavaliers into two Regiments, he assigned the one part to be commanded by Hephaestion, and the other by Clitus.

Having settled matters among the Drangians, he marched toward them, which were called of old, Agrialpe, αλ. Αριμαλπί, but of later times by Cynus, for a benefit by him received from them, furnished Euergete, (i. e.) Benefactors; and was there lovingly received and entertained by them.

After five dayes stay, made in that country, tidings came to him that Satibarzanes with two thousand horle, sent him by Bessus, had made a fresh inroad upon the Arians, and had drawn them away from his allegiance. Against him therefore, he dispatched away six thousand Grecian foote, and fix hundred horle, under the command of Eripiyus and Caranus, or as Diodorus sayes, Strasmon command, together with Artabazus the Persian, and Andronicas, and Phrataphernes, the Governour of Parthia.

He himself remained among the Euergete, and there sacrificed to Apollo, and committed Demetrius, one of the Squires of his body, whom he suspected for a conspirator with Philotas, and put Ptolemie the son of Lagus, into his place. Upon these Euergete he bestowed a large summe of money, and such lands as they desired to be laid unto them, which was not much: and being in like manner welcomed by the Gedrosians, bordering upon the Euergete, he rewarded them also, according to their desires.

Having spent 60 dayes among the Euergete, he left Amendeis, who had been sometime Darius his Secretary, to govern them, as Curtius saies; but as Ariarnus, he leaving them a free state, and Diodorus reports, that he set over the Euergete and Gedrosians both, Teritades, to govern them.

Then removed Alexander from thence, and marched into Bactra again Bessus, (subduing the Drangi and the Dragai as he went; he subdued also Arachofia: and there he met with that part of his army, which was formerly commanded by Parmenion: they were in all 6 thousand Macedons, and 200 men of Honour among them, and 5 thousand Grecians, with a hundred horle, or rather 600: which was, no doubt, the very pich and marrow of all his army: he set Menon to govern the Arachofians, leaving him foure thousand foote, and fix hundred horle, to keepe that Country in order.

Then led Alexander his army into the country of the Paropamisadae; which was about the setting of the seven stars, and beginning of winter, as we gather out of Strabo, [lib. 15. p. 724.] All the country was then covered over with snow, and an obscure shade, rather than any light of heaven, and a plain darknesse lay upon the earth, so that hardly could a man discern any thing near hand, in this vast wilderness, did Alexander army endure and bear out what misery could possibly befall mankind; want, cold, wearinesse, and even despair it self; many died for cold, many mens feet rotted off from their legs: at last yet they came into a country of a better temper, and more plenty, and there the army was relieved, and the whole country quickly brought into subjection.

Then went Alexander to the mountain Caucasus, which some call Paropamyus, which mountain he passed in 16 or 17 daies march: and built a city near the foote thereof, at a place where that mountain opens into Media, which after his own name, he called Alexandria, he built also sundry other cities, each of them distant one dayes journey from that of Alexandria; in these he planted 7 thousand of the Nations thereabout; about ; and three thousand of those, which followed the Camp, and of those who were grown unserviceable in the wars, as many as would, and made governour of all that region Proxexa, a Persian born, and left one of his Nobles Niloxenes, to be an Επίσκοπος (i. e.) an overseer, or ruler over them.

(7.) An overtide, of runic, and of the Macedonians, who commanded the army, when the Macedonians and Arians were in fight, Satibarzanes, who commanded the enemy, came forth between the two armies, and pulling off his helmet, told who he was, and challenged any man that durst, to a single fight or duel. Him Erigyius, General of the Macedon army, undertook, and running his spear through the very body of him, flew him upon the place. The barbarians, who came thither by compulsion rather than for any will they had thereto, seeing their Captain dead, took Erigyius by his word, and laid down their arms; and submitted themselves unto him, and were all slain. Bessus accompanied with those Perfians, which remained with him in seizing on the person of Darius, and about seven thousand men, he forsook the country, bordering upon Caucasus, to the East of the river Tanais, and having waded all the countries which lay between, came to the end thereof ravaging, and laying waste, all the countries which lay between Alexander's troops, nor dare come forward, so fear of starving his army as Alexander snows, and too little victual, which he found upon the way, yet on he went.

H

For winter now drawing to an end, and he having India on the right hand of him, and passed over the mountains into Baetria¹ not a tree to be seen all the way, unless here and there a shrub or turpentine, (Strabo. lib. 15, pag. 734.) they found also by the way some quantity of Indian wheat, out of which the common fouldiers squeezed a kind of juice, which they used for oyl, to chafe their benumbed joints. Now this juice was sold for 240 denarios, a pitcher full, and as much of wine, at 300 denarios; but of bread corn, little or none at all appeared, for want whereof the common fouldier sufficed himself with catching river fish, and such herbs as they could get: but when they came where there was none of that to be had neither; and then they were bid to kill their draught beasts, and eat them: and by that food they lived, till they came into their draught beasts, and eat them: and by that food they lived, till they came into their draught beasts, and eat them:

[Carr. lib. 7, cap. 7.] To which Strabo addeth, that they were fain to eat it raw, for want of fire to seeth or rost it with: but to remedy the crudity which might grow thereof in their stomachs, they had store of sulphurum, or an herb called Benzoinum, which helped their digestion.

Beilus grew afflicted at this speedy death of Alexander, and therefore having first sacrificed to his gods after his country fashion, feasted his friends and Captains : and over their cups, fell to talk and consult of the war in hand, where in lofty terms, as one proud of a kingdom which he had so valiantly gotten, and scanty in his right wits, he said, that Darius his cowardize, had enhanced the fame and glory of the enemy ; that he was resolved to march with his army into Sogdiana, there to have the river Oxus, as a wall between him and Alexander, till aids might come in from other parts unto him. And when all the rest as high flown as himself, cryed excellently well laid, one Cobares, (as Curtius, or Bagodaras, calls him), a Median born, and a wizard or soothsayer by his profession, gave him advice, to look to himself, and in time, to submit to Alexander : whereat Beilus grew so enraged, that he drew his sword, and hardly could they hold him, but he would run him through ; and Cobares then mean while got out of his sight ; and the night following fled away to Alexander.

Upon the fifteenth day after he let out from his new built city, called Alexandria, and his winter quarry, he came to Adrappa, a city of Bactria, as Strabo saies, lib. 15. pag. 725. And removing from Drapaca, faith Arianus, after he had there refreshed his army, he marched to Aornos and Bactra, the two chief cities of all that country of Bactria. And having taken them both at fust assault, he put a garrison into the citadels, or castle of Aornos, and with them put Archelaus, one of his nobles to keep it.

Bessus had seven or eight thousand Bactrians in his army, who, long as they stood, persuaded that Alexander out of doubt would never follow them, into that cold climate: but rather go on his way to India, held their obedience well enough toward Bessus. But when they perceived that Alexander came onward full upon them, every man flunk away to his own home, and left Bessus all alone: so he with a small retinue of his servants and tenants, which flunk close to him, passed the river Oxys by boats; and being over, burnt his boats, that Alexander might not make use of them, and went to a place called Nautaca, in the country of Sogdiana, to raise new forces in thoe parts. And Spitamenes and Oxyartes followed him, having some certain Sogdian horse, and such Dahiæ, as had come to him from the bank of Tanais.

Alexander, making Artabanus governor of Bactria, left there his carriages with a guard to keep them, and with the rest of the army setting out in the night (season), came into the desert of Sogdiana; and when he had gone some 4 hundred furlongs, and and found no water at all by the way, the next day his whole army was sorely distressed with thirst : and when they came afterward, where water was to be had, many of them died with over drinking, and more indeed by many than ever he lost in any battle.

Toward the evening, he came to the river Oxus, where he took up his quarters for that night in great perplexity, expecting the rest of his army to come up unto him.

But before he passed the river, out of such of his Macedons, as either with age or wounds, were grown unserviceable for fight, and of those Tefallians which followed him as volunteers, he chose some 9 hundred, to every of which, if a horseman, he gave two talents, if a footman, three thousand Denarios, or Drachmaes, and willing them to go home and get children, he there dismissed them; thanking the rest, for that they promised to go on with him in the war.

He also sent Stafanor one of his nobles, to the Arians, to seize on Arfaces their governor, because he seemed to intend no good, and appointed Stafanor himself to be governor in his room.

And because the place afforded no timber to make boats of, therefore growing impatient of delay, he caused the hides which covered the souldiers tents, to be taken down, and lethern bags to be stuffed with straw, and to be bowed or tyed together, and so, in five dayes, ferried over his army in these lethern boats.

Spiramenes, whom Bessus most respected and honoured of all the friends he had, so soon as he heard that Alexander was past the river Oxus, having communicated the matter to Dataphernes, and Catenes, whom Bessus principally confided in, laid hold on Bessus, taking off his regal diademe from his head, and rending the robe, which he wore, taken of from the body of Darius, in pieces.

Alexander having passed the river Oxus, marched presently to the place, where Bessus was. Upon the way a message was brought him from Spitamenes and Dataphernes, that if he would be pleased to lend any Captain of his with a sufficient guard, they would deliver Bessus into his hands: he therefore dispatched away Ptolemy the son of Lagus; attended with three companies of horse, and of the foot, that which was Philotas his regiment, and a thousand of the silver Targeteers, and all the squadron of the Agrians, and one half of the Archers: with these Ptolemy, having marched ten ordinary stages or dayes journey in four dayes space, came to the place, where Spitamenes with his army, had camped the day before.

Mean while, Alexander came to a little Town of the Branchids: there were heretofore taken by Xerxes from Miletum, and planted there, in recompence of their pains taken for his sake, in pulling down the Temple of Apollo Didymus: as I shewed before, An. Mun. 3526. This town, as a recompence of traitors, was wholly plundered first, and then totally destroyed; and the inhabitants, men, women, and child, put all to the sword: which execution had it been done upon the traitors themselves, might have seemed an act of justice and not of cruelty; but now the children suffered for their forefathers fault, (such I say, as never saw Miletum, much less could betray it unto Xerxes.) Curt. lib. 7. cap. 11. with Sirabé lib. 11. pag. 117, 118.

As Alexander was upon his march, Bellus was brought unto him; not only haltered, but stark naked, a fight well pleasing to all sorts of men; but the priorer himself was committed to the keeping of Oxetras, Darius's brother, whom Alexander had made one of the squires of his body, that he might cause him to be crucified, having his ears and nose cut off; and then flori thorough and thorough with arrows: and that his body should be watcht, that no bird might come to touch it. Then scourging it with whips, he remanded him into Baetra, but deferred his death, to have it executed in the place, where he had murdered Darius.

Alexander, having re-enforced his army, for he had lost many, what in his passage over mount Caucasus, what in his journey to the river Oxus, and his march from thence, went to the river Tanais, not that which dividing Europe from Asia falls into the Lough of Meotis, and the Euxine sea, but another Tanais, called also Jaxartes, which Plinius [lib. 6. cap. 16.] is by the Scythians termed Sylls, and by the inhabitants thereof Oxvantes, as Aristobolus writeth.

Here certain of the Macedonians were sent to restrain Natives, which fell upon them out of the mountain, and slew many of them, but took more. There were to the number of 30, or as Curtius layes 20 thousand men. Against whom Alexander speedily drew out, with such companies as he had readiest at hand. In this fight, he was shot with an arrow in the thigh; and when the trait was pulled out, the head stuck behind: yet 4 Curtius tells us, that the hill was taken, and of 30 thousand of which he had lost not above 8 thousand. But Curtius tells us, that the next day after he was hurt, those Barbarians voluntarily yielded to him, and sent him home the prisoners which they had taken, and made their peace with him.

Then removing his Camp, himself was carried in an ordinary Lictor, which every man, horse and foot, were forward to put their shoulders to: from hence in 4 days he came to Maracanda, the principal city of all Sogdiana, whose wall is 90 furlongs about: and there leaving a Garrison to keep it, he went and wasted the towns adjoining and set fire on them. A few days after, came Ambassadors to him from the Scythians called Abii; who having lived a free State ever since the death of Cyrus, now rendered themselves to him.

The Barbarians dwelling near the River, took such Macedonian soldiers as were there left in garrison, and slew them, and fell to fortifying of their Cities: Many of the Sogdians joined with them, being induced thereto by those who had taken Bessus his part, and they drew some of the Bactrians to them also. The Sultans and Bactrians together, made 7 thousand horse, and these drew on the reft and when Spitamenes and Caranus, who had delivered Bessus into his hands, were sent by him to repress them, they proved the principal ring-leaders of all that mischief: giving out, that Alexander had sent for all the Bactrian Horse, of purpose to murder them.

Alexander, hearing thereof himself set upon the city Gaza, and sent Craterus against Cyropolis: having taken Gaza, he slew all that were of age therein, the women and children, were sold away for slaves, and the city itself destroyed, that others might take example by them. This and four other cities in those parts, within two days thus taken and served, he marched away to Cyropolis: where into 18 thousand men he put themselves, as a place of greatest strength, and surest refuge: In that siege he both lost the forwardest and prime men of his army, and himself also ran a most extreme danger. For he took such a blow in the neck with a stone, that his eyes dazzled therewith, and he fell all along, and lost his senses for the present. But, being of an invincible courage against such casualties as are to daunt other men, though his wound was not yet thoroughly cured, he fell to assault it more fiercely than before, anger whetting on his natural inclination that way, and so at the first taking of the city, there was slain of the enemy, to the number of 8 thousand, the rest fled into the Castle, whom when Alexander had besieged but one day, they rendered themselves for want of water.

Cyropolis, being, by his command, laid level with the grounds, of 7 Cities which the natives had fortified for themselves, there remained now but one to take; and that he took at the very first assault: or as Ptolemy says, it was given up unto him. But Aristobolus saith, that it was taken by assault, and all that therein were, put to the sword. Ptolemy saith, that the men therein taken, were distributed in the army, and that a kept bound, till Alexander left that country, that none might be left behind, which had a hand in that revolt.

Mean while the Scythians of Asia came with a great army to the bank of the river Tanais: as having heard that the nations on the other side were up in arms against Alexander; purposing, if they were up in any considerable number, then to join with them against him, and to fall upon the Macedons.

But Spitamenes, keeping himself within the walls of Maracanda, besieged the Garrison of Macedons, who were in the Castle there. Against him therefore Alexander sent Menedemus, Andromachus, and Caranus; and with them 60 of his fellow Cavaliers and 800 of his Mercenaries, led by Caranus: and 1500 Foot of Mercenaries; or as Curtius, 3 thousand, giving them Pharamchus for an interpreter, because he spake the Barbarians language, and could therefore best serve to treat with them.

Alexander came back to the bank of the river Tanais, and drew a wall round about his Camp, and made a City of it of 60 furlongs in compass; which he also called after his own name, Alexandria: a work so speedily dispatched, that within 17 days after the walls were up, it was filled with houses also. Curtius, lib. 7. cap. 17. Justin saies, that in 17 days space, he drew a wall about it, six miles round, lib. 32. cap. 5. and Arrianus, that in 20 days space, the City was closed round with a wall. That City he assigned to his Mercenary Greeks to inhabit, with such of the natives thereabouts as would, and certain of his Macedons also who were grown unserviceable for the war. He also put some of his captive prisoners to fill up this new built City; paying their several Masters their ransom, and so made them freemen and citizens of the place; also he removed the inhabitants of three Cities which Cyrus had built, and planted them there.

The King of the Scythians, whose Realm lay beyond the Tanais, conceiving that City to have been built of purpose to lie as a yoke upon his neck, sent his brother Calasir by name, to take and demolish it, and to put off those Macedons from the river side. These rode up and down in Alexander's sight, and let fly both their arrows, and their railing speeches, at him and his Macedons, from the other side of the river after their

their rude manner. Alexander was not yet well recovered of his hurt; his voice failed him, nor could he stand alone, nor sit on horseback, nor in any fort give order for what he would have done.

Spitamenes, taking with him, besides his own men, some six hundred Dalm, and wild Scythian horse, fell upon a part of the army that was sent by Alexander, to relieve them, who were besieged in the castle at Maracanda, and slew them, Aristobolus saies, that when the Macedons were in fight, there suddenly arose out of the gardens adjoining, such a number of Scythians, that they slew the Macedons down right, so that there escaped of them scarcely 40 horse, and 300 foot. Curtius mentions only 2000 foot to have been lost in that defeat, yet that Alexander, to cover the greatness of that loss, charged those who returned into his camp, upon pain of death, not to speak a word of it.

Alexander putting his corseletes, into such coats as he could make, and causing the rest to swim over upon leathern bags stuffed with straw, as well as they could, pailed the river Tanais, with an incredible courage, do the Scythians on the other side what they could to the contrary: and having put them to flight, weak though he was, yet followed he the chase of them 80 furlongs. In this fight there fell of the Macedon horse, to the number of sixty: of the foot, almost one hundred, and a thousand hurt.

Not long after, there came ambassadors to him from the Scythians, to excuse what they had done. That this war was not made upon him by the general consent of the Nations, but by such only, as among them used to live by robbery and spoil; but that the more civil sort of them, would be at his dispose. To these he made a faire answer; and released all such as he had taken prisoners, ransom free; that they being a warlike nation, might see that his contention with them, was out of a desire of honour, not of revenge.

The Saces seeing this, sent their Ambassadors to him, with like tender of their service; and he as graciously dealt with them, and caused Excipius, a young gentleman, whom he loved very dearly, and was to him, as it were another Hephæstion, to keep them company, and to entertain them.

Alexander taking the one half of his fellow Cavaliers, all his Targateers, Archers, and Agrians, and the readiest of all the Macedonian Squadron; marched to Maracanda, whither he was informed that Spitamenes was returned, to besiege them afresh, which kept the castle there; having therefore marched 1500 furlongs in three days space, he came early the next day to the City. Spitamenes, hearing of his approach, raised his siege and fled, and Alexander pursued him with all the speed he could, and in his way came to the place, where the Scythians had slain his Macedons: whose bones he caused to be gathered together and buried; with obsequies, done according to their country manner: and then followed the enemy till he came into the desert.

And by this time Craterus, marching by easy journeys, as he was bidden, came up to him with the greatest part of the army; and therefore now to lay load upon all alike, that had revolted from him; he divided his army into two parts, and gave order not to spare any place from burning, nor any male of age, from killing; and in this manner ran he over all that region which the river called Polytimeneus runneth thorough: for from thence forwards, and where that river lootheth itself, and runneth underground, all the country is nothing but a Desert, void of culture and inhabitants.

Having slain of the Sogdians, as Diodorus saies, [part 2. lib. 1.] 120 thousand persons, there were brought unto him, 30 of the most noble of them, all men of excellent strength of body; whose undaunted courage against death, Alexander wondered at, and gave them their lives, upon their promise to be from thence forward true unto him: nor proved they worse than their words; for returning home, they kept every man his people in due subjection to him, some of them he took to be Squires of the body to himself, nor could any Macedon prove more faithful to him, than they were.

Leaving Pencolaus there with a Garrison of 3 thousand foot (for there needed no more) he came into Bactria; where calling together all that ever were, he commanded Bessus to be brought forth: and there reproaching him with his vile perfidiousness to Darius, caused his nose, and crops of his ears to be cut off: and so sent him to Ecbatane, that he might there be put to death in the sight of the Medes and Persians. Ptolemy saies, that by Alexander's command, his four quarters were tied to two trees, bowd down, and so they being let go again, tare him in pieces, as they returned to their natural posture: and Diodorus writeth, that the brother of Darius, and other his kinsfolks, having spent all manner of railing and reproachful speeches on him, cut his whole body into gobbets, and then put them into flings, and scattered them abroad.

About

asked his two principal foothlairs, Asiftander and Cleomenes the Spartan, what the meaning thereof might be. They told him; it was an abominable figure, and Alexander calling presently his dream to minde, bad them go quickly and offer a sacrifice for him. But Clitus himself came to the feast which the King made, after he had done sacrificing to Castor and Pollux, where when Alexander had well drunk, being otherwise an over-valear of himselfe, he began to speake immoderately of his owne doings, and to undervalue the acts of his father Philip; wherein the greater part of those which fate at table, applauded him: But Clitus on the other side, upheld the gifts of Philip, speaking honourably of his achievements, and fighting the present times, not tickling sometimes to let fall some disgracefull speeches of Alexander himselfe. And when Alexander rofe from his place, all enraged, to kill him, he (as Aristobolus reports) when he was shiffted out of the way at a back doore, and was gotten quite out of the trenches, into the fort, to Ptolomee the son of Lagus, his lodging, would needs come back again to the feast, where he late before; and lighting up on Alexander, as he was calling out for Clitus, here is Clitus fad he, what will you with him; whereupon Alexander ran him through with his spear, and flew him. Which himselfe, the foullesse of this fact, grew as

Alexander, afterward confidering with himfelf, the foulneffe of this fact, grew as mad againft himfelf, as formerly he had done againft Clytus, and refolved to make himfelf away upon it : and therefore shutting himfelf up three whole dayes, refrained both meat and drink, nor took any care at all, what became of him.

When he had now continued fainting to the fourth day, the Squires of his body, brake in upon him; and were along time before they could perfwade him to take meat; and his looth-fayers telling him, that this was befallen him for omitting his facricie to Bacchus, he went presently, and facrificed to him: glad he was to hear that this proceeded from the anger of the gods, rather than from the malice of his heart: and Aristander putting him in mind of his own dream, and of the theepold him that was done, was done by fate, and could not be avoided. Calisthenes the Philosopher, and his school-fellow, sometimes, under Anfitole, and his great familiar, prevailed much with him in this case; but much more did the shamelesse flattery, and foolding of Anaxarchus of Abdera, a buble Sophistler; who from an old laying, that Iustice alwaies sits at Jupiters elbow, would needs conclude; that what ever Kings did, was to be taken for right and iust. And to take him off from this: moode he wasin, all the Macedons, with a general voice, concluded and declared, that Citrus was well enough served, and justly put to death, and would have robbiden him burial, if the king himself, had not com mand it to be done.

had, and junty people to be done.

Having spent ten dayes in quietting his mind hereupon, he then sent Hephæstion with a halfe of his army into Bactria, there to make, and bring in provision for his winter quarters, and gave the Government of Bactria, to which Cidesus was designed, to Aquanages, the son of Nicolaus. And leaving there a quarter of his horseback, with the Bactrian brigade, and 400 of his fellow Cavaliers, and his command, he commanded all to obey Cæsus, and to spend that winter in Scythiana: partly to keep that country in obedience Cæsus, and to spend that winter in Scythiana: if he happened to come for his winter provision, into those parts, [Arria, l. 4.]

Therupon, the other part of his army, which Cidesus upon Scythia, whither

This done, he went with his army to a place called Naura, al. Nantaea: Governor thereof was Sifimithres, who had two sons, gotten upon his own mother: for with them it was lawful for children to couple with their parents. This Sifimithres had taken the gates or streets which open through the mountains into his own country, with a strong party, and had well fortified the passage; which was naturally, and of it self well defended by a most swift and violent river, running under it, and had a huge Rock at the back of it, [Curt. l. 8. c. 62] Ariarnus saith, that this Rock, was at Paracaria, being 20 furlongs high, and almost 60 in compass, and calls the name, as well of the rock it self, as of him that kept it, Chorienes. But Strabo, together with Curtius and Plutarch, calls it Sifimithres his Rock, and placeth it in Bactria, giving it 15 furlongs in height, and 80 in compass, with a large plain on the top of it, all good land, and well able to find 500 men; and saies, that in it (not in that other rock in Sogdiana) one Oxyattes, had his daughter Roxane, whom afterward Alexander made his wife, [Strabo lib. 11. p. 587.] Alexander.

Alexand-

Alexander, though he faw this paffage to be by nature ftrong, and well manned befides, yerbending his Rank of battery againft the works which they had made, quickly made a breach, and with his archers and flingers, eafily drave them off which defended the breach, where it was made; and having gotten within thofe out-works, he prefently made an approach to the Rock it felf: but at the foot of it there was a vault bogg, covered by the rain which fell from the Rock, and had no paffage out; and how to fill it up, upon the fudden he knew not. Meane while, he caufed ftore of beech, which grew in great plenty thereabouts, to be felled, and of them made long ladders, by which his army might at leaft go down into the bog: And all the day long himfelf was prefent, and fet forward the work; but Perdiccas and Leonatus, and Ptolomæus Lagi, principal Squires of his body, dividing the reft of the army into 3 parts, took care of the work by night: nor could they go on more than 20 cubits in a day, and fome-what leffe by night, though all the army inceffantly wrought at it: fo craggy was the rock, fo difficult was the work.

There was at that time with Alexander, one Oxyartes a great man of that country, and a Prince of himself, and the father of Roxane, who being demanded by Alexander, what spirit and courage Siftimithres was of, told him, that he was the most cowardly man that breathed : then replied Alexander ; Surely you have said enough to teach me that the body of this rock is possible to be taken , since you tell me that the head of it is so weak .

And presently he lent the fame Oxyartes to me, to command him forthwith to give up himself, his children, and all that was dear unto him, into his hands: which Sifimithus forthwith did, and then Alexander himself taking with him 5 hundred of his mother's Targaretes, went up into the rock to view the situation and strength thereof: and having offered sacrifices to Minerva and Victoria, left Sifimithes Governor of that Fort, and Country thereabouts, as he found him: giving him hope of a greater Dominion, if he carried himself well and faithfully in this; and upon the fathers request, took along with him his two sons to serve him in the wars.

thens requert, took along with him his two hists to serve him in the wars; Then leaving his Macedonian Squadron, to take in other places which had revolted from him; himself went forward with his Horses: a steep and a rocky way it was that he went; nor had he gone far, but his Horse all grew foundred and tired with his way, and could no further follow him: and his company grew every day thinner than other. Also the young Gallants which were never wont to be from him, lay behind, all save Philip, the brother of Lyfismachus; for he, wearing his corselet and other armes (a thing incredible) yet all on foot as he was, kept company with the King, though he rode, and often changed his horse, by the space of 500 hurlongs: and coming into a Wood, where the enemy lay upon the Kings perfest betwixt, and refusing him out of that danger: and when those Barbarians were routed, and the Wood cleared of them, and they gone; then Philip having over-laboured himself swoned, and falling down between the Kings own hands, there died. Upon the back of this, fell another no small dolor, upon the King; Erigynus was one of his greatest Captains, of whose death he had tidings before he returned into his Camp. He caused both their Funerals to be celebrated, and exequies to be performed, vvith all the honour that might be.

Spitamenes with a crew of three thousand wild Scythians that followed him, came to Gabra, a strong town of the Sogdians, (standing in the middle between the Sogdians and the Massagete: whom he heartily perswaded to joyn with him, and to tall in the defence of their country the Sogdians, And Cenus hearing of his coming, drew out with his army to meet him: and upon an encounter, slew 800 of them upon the place, and therein lost only 25 of his Horle, and 12 of his Foie; whereupon the Sogdians whoe called, with some Bactrians, left him upon the vway, and came into Cenus.

The Maffagretæan Scythians, seeing things fare so ill, pillaged all the carriages of the Bactrians and Sogdians, and accompanied the Scythians into the Delerts of Scythia: But hearing that Alexander came after, with a purpose to follow them into those very Delerts, they took off Spissidanes his head, and sent it to Alexander, hoping hereby to make him desist from any further pursuit after them. [Arria, lib. 4.] But Curtius, [lib. 4. cap. 1.] writes, that when Alexander was not far off, Spissidanes his own wife met him, with her husbands head in her hand; which he seeing, abhorred the sight, and caused her to be turned out of the Camp, lest the feeding of such an act, remaining in the Grecians eyes, might happily work some barbarous effect also in their hearts, and offend their minds more than they were before.

The Dahz, hearing what was become of Spitamenes, took Dataphernes the principal author of that revolt, and delivered him up bound to Alexander, and withal submitted themselves to him; and Cœnus and Craterus, with Phrataphernes, Governor of the Parthians, and Stasanor, President of the Arians, having fully executed what Alexander had set them about, returned to him, where he was at Nauvaca.

Alexander telling his army at Nauvaca, because it was now in the heart of winter, which Arius expressed, by ἡμεῖς τοὺς χειμῶνους, (i. e.) in the strength of winters, let his mind to revenge the soldiers wrong, which they had suffered through the pride and avarice of their officers, or commanders, and thereupon he gave in charge to Phraeternes to look to Hircania, and the countries of the Mardi and Tapuri, and willed him to send him Phradates the Governor there (who had been of late for upon complaints made of him, but never would come) under a sufficient guard.

He removed Arius from the government of the Drangis, and put Stafanor in his room, Arius, as Curtius, Atropates, as Arius calls him, was sent Governor into Media, to take Oxidates from thence, because, as the King thought, he stood not well affected to him. The province of Babylon, upon the death of Mazæus, was committed to Deditamenes, or as Arius calls him, to Stamenes. But Sopolis and Epicolus and Mendas, were dispatched away into Macedonia, to bring him a fresh supply of soldiers from thence.

These things thus ordered, after three months, he drew into the field, to march into a country called Gabaza. But the third day after, as he was upon the way, there fell such a dreadful tempest upon him, with such an extremity of cold, that his whole army was in danger to have perished in it. Curtius in his history, lib. 8. cap. 9. describes it to the life, both the dreadfulness of the tempest itself; and wretchedly, in keeping the army together, and comforting the poor weather-beaten soldiers, in that extremity: which notwithstanding he tells us, that what of the poorer sort of soldiers, what of the scullery and hangers on of the army, there perished no less than a thousand persons, where he addeth further, that which is remembered also by Valerius Maximus, lib. 5. cap. 1. and by Julius Frontinus, lib. 4. Strateg. cap. 6. that whiles Alexander was warming himself at a fire, a common soldier of the Macedons, half starved with cold, and benumbed in his wits, no less than in his limbs, came thrusting to his fire; Alexander took him and let him down in his own chair; telling him that that should be to his good, which in Persia heretofore would have cost a man his life; to wit, to have fate down in the Kings chair.

The next day, calling his Nobles and Captains together, he caused proclamation to be made, that what ever any man had lost in that tempest, he would make it good again unto him; and he performed it to a hair: for example, Simithres had brought along with him many beasts of burden and draught, and two thousand Camels, and whole flocks of sheep and herds of beasts, which being distributed among the army, both repaired their loss sustained, and saved them from the famine, which at that instant lay upon them, whereupon the King, declaring openly how much he was for that curst beholding to Simithres; bad every soldier take eight days victual with him, and then went to take in the Sacæ, who had revolted from him; and having taken all the spoils of that country, gave Simithres out of the spoils, thirty thousand head of cattle.

Alexander then took to wife Roxane, the daughter of Oxyartes, which Simithres reports to have been done, in the Rock or Fort of Simithres, when it was first surrendered to him, lib. 15. and this example of his, moved many of his Macedon Nobles to take them wives also out of the more illustrious families, of foreign nations, as Diodorus in several chapters, of his 17 book at large declareth.

And now bending his thoughts wholly to a war upon India, to the end he might leave all safe and quiet behind him, he caused out of every province some to be lifted for his service, so many as to make up in all 50 thousand men, whom he purposed to carry with him into India, there to serve him both for soldiers against the enemy, and also for pledges of their fidelity whom he left behind him: then moving into Bactria, he sent Craterus with 600 of his fellow Cavaliers, and his own foot companies, as also the regiments under Polyperchon, Antalus and Alceas, to pursue Anisanes Caranes, who only remained of the Rebels of Paratance, between whom and Craterus, there was a great battle fought, wherein Caranes was slain, and Antalus taken prisoner, and brought alive to Alexander, and of their men were slain 1500 horses, & about 1500 foot: which done, Craterus went into Bactria, and Polyperchon reduced the country of Bactriana to the Kings obedience.

And now began Alexander to ask, what he had of long time agitated in his mind, which was, to affirm to himself divine honours; and would no longer be called, only, but also believed to be, Joves son: as if he had the sovereignty over mens hearts, as well as over their tongues, and therefore refused now to be saluted and revered, after the manner of the Macedons, but would be adored with prostration after the fashion of the Persian Kings: nor wanted he court flatterers, to let this wheel a going flatterers, I say, that best of all kings, and by whose tongues, more Kings have perished, than by the sword of their enemies, [Curt. lib. 8. cap. 12.] chief of which about him, were Agis of Argos, the worst Verifier that ever was, next to Charilus, and Cleo of Sicilia, and Anaxarchus, a Sophist: and of them, which opposed him herein, was Calisthenes, a true Philosopher, and a Scholar of Aristotle, which cost him his life, and that which hastened it, was this.

Hermolaus, a gallant youth, and one of the Kings company of Pages, and instructed in the rudiments of Philosophy, by Calisthenes, being upon a time a hunting with the King, slew a Boare, which the King himself had aimed at; whereupon the King commanded him to be had away and wipt: (i. e.) which he taking to heart, fell into a conspiracy, first with Sopater, the son of Amyntas, a youth like himself, and of his own rank and quality, and then with Antipater, the son of Alcibiadotus, Governor of Syria, and others of the same company of Pages, to kill Alexander: which conspiracy coming to light by the discovery of one Epimenos, one of the conspirators, they were all presently put to death. Alexander in his letters to Craterus, Alceas, and Antalus, written at that instant, signified, that they had confessed that the conspiracy grew of themselves alone; without the setting on, or privy of any other. But in another letter, written afterward to Calisthenes, he charges him as the author of it: yea, and he glanceth, that Aristotle himself, whole Cousin Germane was mother to Calisthenes, in this manner, ἡ δὲ μήτηρ, &c. (i. e.) The youths indeed, saith he, were stoned to death by the Macedons: but that Sophist I myself will punish, and those which sent him, and such also as received them that conspire against me, into their towns.

When he had seized upon Calisthenes his person, he kept him in irons seven months, to have him judged and condemned in a Court of Justice, when Aristotle himself should be present. Now Chares the Miletian tells us, that at what time, Alexander was in the country of the Mallians and Oxydracans in India, and lay there of a wound received in a fight, (between which time, and the conspiracy of the Pages, there had passed upward of 17 months) Calisthenes being a fat man, fell there sick of the Philiar, or lowlie disease, and died of it. But Aristobolus and Ptolemei, lay and affirm, that the Pages conspired upon the rack, that Calisthenes had put them upon it, by his persuasions: and again, the same Ptolemei sayes that he was first racked, and afterward hanged, but Aristobolus, that he was carried about with the army in chains, and so dyed: and so we see that these great Authors, and who were themselves present in the army, and attending upon Alexander at the very time when these things were acted, yet cannot agree about a matter, whereof there could be no doubt at all, at the time when it was done.

Amyntas being left in Bactria with 3500 horse, and 10 thousand foot, Alexander, toward the middle of the spring, as Arius tells us, removed with his army from thence toward India: to make the Ocean and utmost border of the east the boundary of his Empire. And to make his whole army in their very accomptments suitable to so great a designe, he made all their targets to be covered over with silver plates, and their horse bridles, to be made all of beaten gold; and their very corslets, he caused to be enriched, some with gold, some with silver, and the number of men, which fo armed, followed him to this Indian war, amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand men.

Alexander having passed the Caucasus in ten days, came to his city of Alexandria, which he had built in Paropamisus; and put out the Governor there for his ill behaviour in the place, and then peopled his new city with more inhabitants, out of the neighbouring countries, and such of his own Macedons as were grown unserviceable for the war, and made Nicanor, one of his, Governor of the place, but made Tryphæpes Commander of the whole region of Paropamisus, and of all that territory, or Province, as far as the river Cophene.

From thence he went to the city of Nicæa, and there offered sacrifice to Minerva, and then marched to the river of Cophene, and sending an herald, commanded Taxiles, and the rest of the Satrapes or Governors of the countries, lying between Cophene, and the river Indus, which is improperly called India, to come unto him.

Taxiles, and other petty Kings, under his government, came forth and met him, and received his commands, telling him, that he was now the third son of Jove, that had come into those parts. That as for father Bacchus and Hercules, they had only heard of them, but that their happiness was to see him now personally present among them, they therefore brought him large presents, promising him withall, to send him 25 Elephants, and he entertained them very graciously, and bad them attend him, purposing to use their help in his passages thorough the country.

But when he saw that the rest came not, he divided his army, and sent Hephæstion and Perdicas, into the country called Pencilotes toward the river Indus; with the armies led by Gorgias, Clitus, and Meleager, and half the company of his fellow Cavaliers, and all the mercenary horse; commanding them, to take in by fait means, or foul, all the towns which they found in their way : and that when they came to the bank of the river Indus, they should there fall to building of ships, whereby to passe over, into further countries, and with them was sent Taxiles, and other Commanders of those parts.

After, the Governour of the country of Peucelaïs offering to revolt, lost both himself and the city which he put himself into : for Hephæstion came and besieged it, and after a monthes time, took and sackt it, and killing him, made one Sanguis Governour of it, who a little before forsaking Astes, had fled over to Taxiles, which made Alexander the more confiding in him ever after.

Alexander, with his Troup of silver Targateers, and the horse of his fellow Cavaliers, Hephæstion, and the Troup of those who were called Assæri, and his Archers, and Agrians, and Lances, marched into the country of the Aprians and Thyrians and Arafocans ; and going on his way to the river Choes (which way was for the most part, all mountainous and rocky) and having at last passed that river, he commanded the whole body of his horse, and eight hundred Macedons, Targateers on horseback, marcht away a great pace, because he heard, that the people of that country were fled, some to the mountains, others to fenced cities, and all to make head against him.

Those which came fourth to oppose him, he easily routed, and beat back into the Town, upon the way wence they came out ; and the townsmen, which stood all in array before their walls, he easily likewise vanquished, and made them take sanctuary within their walls again. And now was Craterus come up with the Foot : and therefore to strike the greater terror into the minds of a nation, which knew not yet, what for the manner of men the Macedons were, he gave order, to spare no flesh, setting fire on the out-works which they had made ; yet as he rode about the walls, an arrow came off, and shot him thorough his armor, into the shoulder, but made there no great wound ; Ptolomei allo, and Leonatas, were both wounded at the same time : then Alexander, spying a place where the wall was weakest, pitched his Camp just against it, and the next day early in the morning, took the vanguard, which was of no great strength, with no great adoe ; at the inner wall, the inhabitants made some resistance : But when the Macedons had once scaled the walls and the townsmen felt the arrows showing down about their ears, the souldiers within, brake out of the gates, and ran every man his way to the mountains, which were not far off, and thither many of them elcaped, and saved themselves there ; but the Macedons following after, overtook and slew the greater part of them : but the Townsmen that were left behind, were slain every man of them, and the city it self, laid level with the ground.

Then, having subdued another poor bafe nation, he went forward, and came to the city Nisa, situate at the foot of a hill called Meros, and built in old times, as was said by Bacchus ; but at the entreary of Acuphis, the chief man of the place, who was sent unto him, with 30 other prime men, he spared the inhabitants of Nisa, and they were onely commanded to furnish him with 300 horse : which done, he restored them to their natural freedom, and suffered them to live after their own laws, and made Acuphis himself, taking along with him his son and grandchild for hostages, governour of the city it self, with all the whole province of Nisa ; moreover he sacrificed there to Bacchus by the name of Dionysius, and made merry, and feasted his Nobles, and all his Macedons, and wearing garlands of Ivy on their heads, sang praise to Dionysius, with all his titles and appellations, Bacchumque vocant, &c.

*Calling him Bacchus, Bromius, and Lyæus,
Born of the fire, Twice born, and not like others:
But the only one that ever had two mothers.*

As Ovid speaks of him, upon the like, though a different occasion, 4 Metamorph. see also Philostratus in Vita Apollonii, lib. 2. cap. 4. to the same purpose.

From whence he went to a country called Dadala, but all the inhabitants were gone and fled to the woods and mountains, wherefore he passed over Acadra, a country deserted by the inhabitants as the other was.

The city Ardacena being taken in upon surrender, he left Craterus there, with other Commanders of the Foot, to force such places, as voluntarily would not submit, and to order matters there, as he saw fittest for the present.

Himself, with his silver Targateers, and his Squadron of Agrians, and Cæus and Artaeus their Brigades, and the body of his own Horse, and at most four companies of his fellow Cavaliers, and the one half of his Archers on horseback, went to the river of Euaspla, where the Governour of the Aprians lay, and upon a great journey taken, the second day he came with his army to a city called Arizæum. But the inhabitants, (so soon as they heard he was coming, let their city on fire, and fled to the mountains ; but the Macedons followed after, and slew a vast number of them ; and Ptolomei slew the Captain of them, hand to hand, and brought of his armour with him.

And now Alexander was come up with his Foot, which rode on horse-back, and they allighting, set upon the natives, and with much adoe, made them at last, flee for refuge to the mountains : and then came Craterus to him with the main body of the army ; having done the errand which he was sent on, to the full : Him Alexander commanded to see Arizæum, which the inhabitants themselves had burnt, repaired : and to recompire it, with the inhabitants, of places near adjoining, such as would, &c. with such Macedons, as were grown unserviceable for his wars. But himself went on, to the place whither he heard the natives were fled, and coming to the foot of a mountain, he there pitched his Camp.

Mean while Ptolomei, who was sent a foraging, went further off, with a small Troup, to discover, and sent back word to Alexander, that there seemed to be more fires, in the enemy's Camp, than there were in all his : whereupon Alexander leaving a part of his army in the Camp, went with the rest to take a view of those fires himself : and having considered well of them, he cast the company which he brought with him, into three parts ; one he gave to Leonatus, one of the Squires of his body, giving him the brigade of Artaeus and Balacrus to attend him, the second he commanded Ptolomei to take charge of ; and to him assigned a third part, of his own Argyraspides, or silver Targateers ; and the brigade of Philip and Philares, with two thousand archers, and all the Agrians, and one half of the whole Cavalrie. The third part he took to himself, and led them to a place, where he saw the greatest throng of the enemy to be. And they on the other side, confiding in their multitude, & supposing the Macedons to be but few in number, left the mountain, and came down into the plain, where after a bloody field fought, the Macedons gat the victory : Ptolomei, who led one of the three Brigades of Macedons, reporteth, that there were taken in that fight, upward of 40 thousand prisoners ; and of cattle, above 230 thousand head, out of which, Alexander was purposed, to have called out the principall of all kinds, because they were exceeding fair, and to have sent them into Macedon, to make a breed there, for the tillage of the ground.

From thence Alexander went into the country of the Assaceniens, who were said to have mustred a thousand Horse, 3 thousand Foot, and 30 Elephants, to encounter him. It was said also, that Assacenus, (which as it seems, was the common name which all their Kings went by) being lately dead, his mother Cleopis, commanded all at that present.

Craterus, having finished the city, as he was commanded, brought all his consorts to Alexander, with engines of battery and other instruments for a siege if need should be. Then set Alexander forward with the Horse of his fellow Cavaliers, and his Darters on horseback, with Cæus and Polyperchons companies, with a thousand Agrians, and Archers toward the Assaceniens : marching thorough the country of the Gortæans, and was much troubled in the passage of the river Gortæus there. The natives hearing of his coming, durst not abide him in a body, but brake up their army, and dispersed themselves, every one as he could into several cities, purposing there to stand upon their guard.

Alexander went first with his army to Massaga the greatest City of the Assacenic country, and enclosed with a wall of 35 furlongs in compass : there were 30 thousand men within to defend the walls, of which number there were 7 thousand mercenaries, out of the inner parts of India : These coming to a fight at the foot of a hill distant from the river Gortæus some seven furlongs ; were fain to flee back into their city, having lost about 2 hundred in their flight. Alexander presently drew up his maine battel of Macedons before the gates thereof, and took a Dart into his thigh from off the wall ; and when it pained him, he cryed out, that they told him, he was Joves son, but that when he was wounded, he felt the pain of it like another man : adding withal, (as Plutarch in his book of Alexanders fortune writeth) when he saw the blood running down his body : a saying out of Homer in his 5 book of his Iliads, that this was blood indeed, but not Such blood as from the blessed gods doth flow.

By nine dayes end the besieged, seeing his works, the incessant labour and travel of the besiegers, what vast valleys they filled up, what towers they built, and how they made them run upon wheels, they began to consider of it : but when their Captain was shot thorough with a Dart coming out of an engine of battery, from the Works without, their courage failed, and despairing of any longer holding out, retired into their Castle,

Castle, and from thence sent Messengers to crave pardon, and submitted. Cleopis also to the Queen with a great multitude of noble Ladies, all pouring wine into golden basins, came forth unto him: and the Queen laying her young son at his feet, obtained not only his pardon, but also to be restored to her fathers estate, and pristine fortune of his House: for which yet it was thought the more beholding to her own beauty, than to his bounty: for men commonly said, that all that was but the fee of a nights lodging: and that she got her kingdom again, by her allurements, which she could not do with all the strength she had: whence it was, that among the Indians, she went afterward by the name of the Kings whore. In all which siege yet Alexander lost not above 25 men.

The Indians which were there hired out of the inner parts of Indie, and in the siege, had annoyed Alexander more than all the rest: being according to the articles suffered to depart with their arms, encamped themselves about 8 hundred furlongs off from thence, whereof Alexander being advertised, grew into an implacable rage against them: and set upon them, saying, that he indeed suffered them to depart with their arms, but not that they should ever after use them against the Macedons: and they, nothing terrified with the greatness of their danger, lockt themselves close together, and casting themselves into a ring, took their wives and children into the midst of them: And so when the enemy came on, they withstood them in very manly wife: and the women themselves, as any of the men were slain, took up their arms, and with them went and served among the men: yet at last overcome by the numbers of the enemy, they all died in the place: And Alexander bestowed the women and the rest of the rascality which were left, upon his Troup of Horse; which act of his, blemished his glory, and stuck as a spot upon all his former noble actions in his wars.

Alexander sent Cœnus to a strong and rich City called Bazira, supposing that the inhabitants there, hearing what passed at Affacens, would have submitted, as the Affacens had done: which yet they refused to do: but he sent Alcatas, and Antalus, and Demetrius General of the Horse, to the City Ora and willed them to draw a wall round about it, and do no more till he came. The inhabitants made a salley upon Alcatas his quarter: but the Macedons easily put them back, and quickly mured them up on that side. And when as Alexander heard, that Abisarus would privily put in there, more of the natives to defend it; he presently sent word to Cœnus, to build a strong castle upon it, and leaving a good garrison in it, which might be able, to hinder the Tillage of their ground, to returne to him with the residue of the army.

They of Bazira, seeing Cœnus gone with the greatest part of his army, contemning those that were left in the Castle, drew out into the open field: where having lost 500 upon the place, and 70 more taken prisoners, the rest which returned into the city were closer shut up, and freightened than before, and not suffered to peep out of the Gates.

Alexander took the city Ora at the first assault, and took such Elephants as he found therein: which when the inhabitant of Bazira heard, fearing to be taken, they all in the dead of the night, fled out of the gates, and got up into a Rock, called Aornus, and the rest of the cities thereabout, did the like, every man with his arms: and Alexander having put Garrisons in Ora and Massaga, built up the walls of Bazira, and seized on the townes, which the Inhabitants had left.

Taxiles being dead, his son Omphis or Mophis, who had perswaded his father to submit to Alexander, sent unto him to know his pleasure, whether he should take the kingdom presently upon him, or live a private man till his coming: and though word was returned him that he should reigne, yet he forbore for the present: mean while, when Hephæstion and Perdicas being sent to make a bridge over the river Indus, came that way, he received them with all honour, and furnished them with provisions gratis: but went not out to meet them upon the way, lest he should seem to depend on any man for favour, but Alexander himself.

Alexander coming to Embolyma, a city not far distant from the Rock Aornus, left Craterus with a part of the army there, and gave him order to make provision of corne and other necessities, for a long time, if occasion should beto stay at the siege of Aornus, and in case he should not be able to take it at the first. Himself, taking with him his Agrians and Archers, and Cœnus his brigade, and out of the Macedonian Squadron, such as were of the nimblest sort, and with all best armed, and 200 of his Cavaliers, and archers on horseback too, marched to the Rock.

The same went that Hercules heretofore, when he was in those parts, tried to take that place, but could not, and that he was put off thence by an earthquake, which let Alexander the more on fire to take it, that therein he might be seen to out-do Hercules. The compass of the Rock, was an hundred furlongs, and the height thereof sixteen, if we believe Diodor. for Arrianus says, that the compass of it was 2 hundred furlongs: and the height thereof, where it was lowest, eleven; at the foot of it toward the South, ran the River Indus, not far from the head where it riseth, as [Sirabo, lib. 15.] telleth us, the rest is taken up with vast bogs, and inaccessible crags: in one of which there dwelt a poor old man, with his two sons, in a place wherein there were three beds, cut out of the Rock. Alexander promised him 80 talents, if he would shew him a way up into the Rock: whereupon he told him there was but one way: and shewed him where it was. Alexander finding there was no way but that, manned that place so strongly, that they could not possibly receive any the least relief, from without. And then letting his army to work, he cast up a mount of earth, and rubble to high, that now he could come at least to fight with them at a small distance, and to assault them, which assault lasted nine whole dayes and nights together, without cessation. Alexander having lost many of his men, what in fighting, what in climbing the rocks (among which were Chares, and one Alexander) though he had no hope to take it, yet he made shew, as if he would not off from the siege, leaving yet the passage which led into the Rock open, for them to flee out there that would: which they perceiving, and being adawed at his constancy and resolution, took the advantage of a darke night, and fled every man of them, by that way out of the rock.

The King, seeing no stirring there the next day, sent Balacrus to see what the matter was: and he brought word, that the enemy was all gone. Then he taking with him certain Squires of the body, and 700 of his silver Targateers, went himself first up into the rock, and then the rest of the Macedons, lending one another a hand, to climb up, as well as they could; and then giving the word, to pursue the enemy, they did, and flew many of them in the chafe: many of them also, flying over the Rocks fell and burst themselves in pieces. Alexander having conquered the places rather than the men that dwelt therein: offered yet many sacrifices, and built Altars to Minerva and Victoria, in that Rock: and leaving a Garrison there, made one Sitisopus, of Silocostus, Governour of that place, and country thereabouts: which Silocostus, came formerly out of India to Bessus in Bactria, and when Alexander had subdued it, he came in with his men unto him, and ever after served him faithfully.

Alexander removed from Aornus, and went into the country of the Affacens: for he was told that the brother of Affacens, the last King, with a number of Elephants, and no small company of the Inhabitants, and bordering Nations, were fled to the mountains in those parts: and when he came to the city Drita, he found no creature there, nor in the country thereabouts.

The next day he sent out Nearchus and Antiochus, each of them commanding a thousand silver Targateers: and to Nearchus he assigned certain light armed Agrians: to the other, besides the thousand silver Targateers which he commanded, he added 2 thousand more of the same sort. These he sent out to scour about, and to see if they could light upon any of the natives, of whom they might enquire among other things, especially concerning the Elephants.

Himself marched forward to the bank of the River Indus, sending an army before him to mend the wayes, without which it had been impossible for him to have got through them. But when he found, that the freights and narrow passages thereof were taken up by one Erix, he left Cœnus to bring after the main body of the army, by easie journeys; but himself going forward with his slingers and archers, cleared the Forre, and made a safe way for the army that came after. Diodorus calls this Indian Aphricus, and says, he had with him 20 thousand men, and 15 Elephants: But the Indians, whether out of a hatred to this Erix or Aphricus, or whether to ingratiate themselves with Alexander, flew him, and brought both his head and armes to Alexander: He pardoned them, but thanked them not, for example sake.

From hence, in sixteen dayes march, he came to the River Indus side; and took in the city Penelictos, not far from thence, upon the river side: and leaving there a Garrison of Macedons, he left Philippus to command them. He subdued also a multitude of lesser townes standing upon that River, Cophesus, and Affagates, the Governours of that country attending on him from place to place. He understood also by some of the natives, which he had taken prisoners, that the men of that country were all gone, to Baniades, (perhaps Abisarus) and that the Elephants were left a grazing, upon the bank of Indus: whereupon he commanded them to shew him the way to the place where the Elephants were. In catching of them, two fell over the Rocks and perished: the rest were taken, and being handled, and made fit for service, were taken into his army: And having found there a wood of timber-trees, he caused it to be felled, and ships to be built thereof: which being lanchied, he went in them to the bridge of Boates, which Hephæstion and Perdicas had built for him. And they, foreseeing that they should have more Rivers than one to passe, made their ships or boats so as they might take them alunder at their pleasure, and carry them in carts, as occasion was, and then put them together again, besides which they built two others, of 30 oars a piece, and many more of a lesser sort.

Alexander stayed there 30 dayes to rest his army, and in that time offered magnificent sacrifices to his gods, and made palm-tree and hews, both with Horfe and Foot, by the river side; and then made one of his Nobles, Nicanor, Governour of all that region on this side Indus. Afterward he passed the river, by the bridge that was made at Pencolaites (as Sirabo saith, lib. 15.) with his army, and there sacrificed again to his gods, after his own country manner. Now that Alexander came into the Region which lies between the Indus, and the river Hydaspes, in the beginning of the spring, is testified by Aristobolus, who was then with him, vouched by Sirabo [lib. 15. pag. 691.]

And now, was Alexander 30 furlongs off, when Omphis the son of Taxiles, with an army all in arms, and Elephants disposed by equal distances among the companies, met him, and at first Alexander, not well knowing whether he came as a friend or a foe, prepared for a fight; but Omphis, finding Alexanders error, caused his army to make a stand, set spurs to his horse, and went all alone to Alexanders presence, and rendered both himself and kingdom, (which yet was not much bigger than Egypt) into his hands. And when Alexander asked him, whether he had most labourers or soldiers in his kingdom, he answered, that having a war to maintain against two Kings, he must of necessity keep more soldiers, than labourers in his kingdom. Those enemies of his, were Abilarus and Porus, who reigned on the other side of the river Hydaspes; Omphis upon Alexanders permission, took upon him the title and habit of a King, and withal, after the manner of his country, the name of Taxiles, for that name goes with the kingdom, whoever gets it.

The city Taxila, from whence the King takes his name, is the greatest of all other, lying between the rivers of Indus and Hydaspes: all the inhabitants whereof, as well as himself, entertained Alexander very joyfully. Upon the fourth day after his arrival there, Omphis let him know what corn he furnished Hephaestion with all for his army, and presented both him and all his Nobles, with Crowns of pure gold, and moreover upon Alexander himself, he bestowed 30, as Arrianus, or 56 Elephants, as Curtius saith, and with a multitude of goodly cattle, three thousand Oxen, and upwards of ten thousand sheep. Arrianus addeth, that he sent him also seven hundred Indian Horse, and 200 talents of silver, whereas Curtius mentions only 80 talents of silver in fowes.

Alexander was infinitely taken with this entertainment of his, and sent him back his 200 talents of silver again, with a thousand talents more of his own, and many a cupboard of plate for his table besides, both of gold and silver, with a great deal of Persian attire, and 30 Horses which were for his own saddle, and furniture of his own, therunto belonging: which liberality of his, as is much pleased and obliged Omphis, so it infinitely offended his nobles, among which Meleager, sitting at supper, and being somewhat high flown with wine, told him, that he was very glad, to see that he found a man here in India, whom he thought worthy of a thousand talents, and Alexander remembering what penance he had done for Cleitus, forbore revenge, only he said, That envious men were none but else but their own tormentors.

The next day, Abilarus, King of the Indian mountaineers, sent his own brother to him, with other Ambassadors, to present him with monies, and Elephants, and to submit both him and all that he had to his disposing and pleasure, and Alexander having made a firm league with him, sent them back again unto him, Ambassadors also came to him from Dioxareus, a Governour in those parts, with presents from him.

In the country of Taxila, Alexander again offered his usual sacrifices, and made hews and games of exercises both by Horse and Foot, And, leaving Philippus the son of Machates, Governour in those parts, and a Garrison in the city and country of Taxila, left there also such other of his army, as through any infirmity were grown unserviceable, and then removed toward the river Hydaspes.

And now supposing that Porus upon the fame of his name might easily be drawn to submit unto him, sent a message to him by Cleochares, to require tribute of him, and to command him to meet him at the border of his kingdom. Porus answered, that the one of these two things he would not fail to do, which was, to meet him at the first entrance of his kingdom, but it should be, in warlike manner.

There was another Porus, King also of a neighboring nation of India, his nephew, who for the hatred which he bare to his Uncle, sent Ambassadors to Alexander, and offered himself and all his kingdom to do him service.

Alexander sent back Cæmus to the river Indus, with charge, to take in pieces, the ships that were there made, and to bring them over land in Carts unto him, to the lesser fort of them, were divided into two parts, and the greater into three, and all to be brought to the river Hydaspes.

Here putting them together again, and lanching them, he with his army returned to Taxila, and there having gotten five thousand Indians, which Taxiles and others had brought him, he returned to the bank of Hydaspes. And upon the way, Barzantes, sometimes Governour of the Drangians, and procurer of the revolt of the Arachosians, being taken prisoner, together with 30 Elephants of his, was delivered into his hands. This price fell pay, for his war against the Indians, who trusted more in their beasts, for the most part, than in their men. Gamaxus also, a petty King in those parts, and a confederate of Barzantes, was taken, and brought bound unto him. Both were committed, and the Elephants taken into his service, and delivered to Taxiles, at Omphis, and then he went forwards, and came to Hydaspes, where he caused Barzantes, for his old treason against his master Darius, to be put to death, as we find by Arrianus [lib. 3. pag. 72.]

Porus lay encamped on the other side of the river Hydaspes, to stop Alexanders passage, a man of a huge stature, and a mind answerable thereunto, for it is said, that he was five cubits high, and vantage: though Plutarch say, that he was four cubits high: and a hand breadth: but to thick in the bulk, that his coat of armour was twice as big as any other mans. He rode upon an Elephant, higher than all the rest, on which he sat, like an ordinary man on Horse-back. Curtius saies, that in the forefront of his battle, he placed 80 huge Elephants: whereas Diodorus saies, he had 13, and Arrianus, that he had upwards of 200. Chariots he had 300, and 3000 Foot, in his army. Diodorus reports, that he had above 1000 Chariots, and 5000 thousand Foot: though Plutarch gives him but 2000, or then he allows him 2000 Horse, Diodorus, 3000, and Arrianus 4000, by him brought into the field. The river Hydaspes ran between the two armies, and Porus with his Elephants, appearing always in the head of his army, lay ready to hinder the passage of Alexander, and Alexander caused noises dayly to be made in his army, to make the like noises, from the Barbarians more usual, and therefore less terrible to his men, and after a while, in a tempestuous dark night, he put over certain of his Foot, and choicest Horse, a great way up the river, into a small Island, whence in the midst of a tempest of rain, and thunder, and lightning, and whirl-winds, though he saw sundry of his men strook dead in the place, and others fore hurt there with, yet over he would, and land he hid on the other side. The river, swollen with the rain, lounded, and brake down the banks in many places, with the swiftnesse of his course, and the water withal brake in between. Alexander got on land, where he could hardly stand, for the slabbiness of the ground, and gulls, occasioned by the breaking in of the river, between which the Macedons perceiving, they also forced themselves to land, being up to the very arme pits in water.

Having passed the water, he with the Horse, gave some 20 furlongs before the Foot, and there put to flight a thousand of the enemies Horse, and 60 Chariots, which he lighted on: The Chariots he took every one, with 400 of their Horse. Now Porus finding that Alexander was gotten over, fell upon him with all his army, save only such as he left to attend the body of the Macedonian army, where they stood ready to pass. Alexander fearing the multitude of the enemy, and their Elephants, tell himself upon the one wing of them, and commanded the rest to do the like upon the other. And when the natives being hard laid to any where, retired always in a body to the Elephants, as to a place of refuge, the fight grew confused every where, and scarcely could he rout and make them turn their backs and fly, till two a clock in the after noon: and this is the relation of this fight made by Alexander in his own letters.

The former of these two fights, wherein he slew 400 horse, and took 60 Chariots, Aristobolus saies, was with Porus his son, adding, that he was slain in that encounter. But Ptolemy makes the forces which were sent out with Porus his son, to have been twice as many, as Alexander in his letter mentions; for he saies, that he came out at that time, with two thousand Horse, and 120 Chariots, as for the latter, which was fought with Porus himself, and concerning the number slain in both the battles, he thus writeth. There were slain (saith he) of the Indian Foot, little less than twenty thousand, and of their Horse three thousand, all their Chariots were scattered, two of Porus his sons slain. Spitharches also, who commanded all that region of India, and all the Captains, both of the Elephants and Chariots, and of his Horse and Foot, died in the battle: and the Elephants, which were not killed in the fight, were all taken of Alexanders foot, which were to the number of 6000, in the first encounter, there were lost but 80 at the most, of the archers on horse-back, which gave the first onset, there were slain 10, of his fellow Cavaliers 20, and of the rest of the horse 200 with which we may compare the account which Diodorus makes: there died, faith he, of the Indians, upward of 10000, and among them, Porus his two sons; and all the chief Commanders of his army, and bravest Captains that he had: But prisoners there were taken 90000, and 80 Elephants. Of the Macedon Horse were slain 2800, and somewhat more than 700 Foot.

When Porus was taken, Alexander asked him how he lookt to be used, and he answered, Like a King. Alexander asked him again, whether he would ought else, and his answer was, that word, Like a King, comprehends all, whereupon Alexander, seeing his noble and royal disposition, used him accordingly, and took him into the number of those whom he called his friends, and restored him to his kingdom again, which, reaching from Hydaspes to the bank of the river Acesines, contained in it 300 cities; witnesseth [Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 698.]

Arrianus sheweth, that these things fell out, ἑκατὼν: (i. e. in that season of the year, when the sun declined from the summer solstice: at which season, the greatest rains usually fall in India, and swell the river Hydaspes, which in the midst of winter a man may wade over, [lib. 5, pag. 107.] with which Jacobus Capellus compares another place of his, [lib. 7, pag. 163.] where he writes the like of the River Euphrates: saying, that it is fordable in the winter; but ἑκατὼν: (i. e. when the spring approaches, and much more, when the sun returns from his summer tropic, it grows deep, and runs all over his banks. For whereas the Grecians call the four Seasons of the years by the common name of ἔτη, or conversions, or Tropics; well may they which divide the year but into two parts, to wit, Summer and Winter, reckon their Summer conversion from the vernal, and their Winter one, from the autumnal equinoctial: Whereupon it is, that Arrianus, speaking after the Eastern manner, faith, ἑκατὼν: (i. e. the Spring approaching; and much more after the equinoctial, which is the entrance with them, into the summer season, the rain there began to fall, and the waters to rise. Now concerning those Indian Regions, Aristobolus, was an eye-witness of them, (as being at that present with Alexander at the River Hydaspes) ἑκατὼν: (i. e. that at the beginning of the Spring, the rains began to fall, and so grow stronger from day to day: as we read in [Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 114.]

And that this battle was fought between the vernal equinoctial, and the summer solstice, Arrianus plainly shewes, where he says, ἑκατὼν: (i. e. This was the end of the battle, fought by Alexander against Porus and his Indians, on the other side of the river Hydaspes, in the year when Hegemon was L. Chancellor of Athens, in the month Marchion: which in that year answered almost entirely to our month of May, according to the Julian Calendar: for that the summer solstice, was not till Alexander came to the river Acesines, I shall hereafter shew out of Nearchus.

Alexander was glad of this victory, which opened him the way to the utmost borders of the East, and thereupon, caused all his men that fell in the battle to be honourably interred; sacrificed to the Sun, as a giver of this victory, and made games and enterludes, both on foot and horseback at the river Hydaspes, near the place where he first put over: and because there was in that place, exceeding store of all manner of provisions, therefore he stayed there 30 days, to rest his wearied companies: And moreover, to hearten up his soldiers for the remainder of this war, he called them together, and in an harangue unto them, commended their prowess and valour, and told them, that all the force of India was equal to by that one dayes work of theirs, that all the rest, was but a rich spoile for them to take; he gave the chief commanders of his army crowns to wear; and to every one of them 1000 pieces of gold, honouring and rewarding every one of the rest according to his place, desert, and quality in the army. And as concerning the Trophy which he there erected, you may see, [Philos. 12, and Apollon. c. ult.]

Now because Alexander had a purpose, so soon as he should set foot upon Indian ground, to go see the Ocean Sea, he therefore went in hand here, to fort his shipwights on work, the rather, for that in the Emodian hills adjoining, there was abundance of tall Fir trees, with some store of Cedar and Pine trees among, and other timber, all fit for shipping: but when they went to felling, they found there Serpents, great store, of an exorbitant bignesse, and some of them 16 cubits long: There were also found in those woody mountains, Rhinoceroses, a rare beast to be found in other countries: with sundry kinds of Apes, infinite in number, and of an unusual bignesse of body; whereof the Macedons upon a time clypping a multitude, ranged on the side of a hill, in a kind of array like soldiers, thought at first that they had been an enemy, and thereupon cried out, arme, arme; and for themselves in a posture to fall upon them: Till Taxiles, who was then with Alexander, told them what they were, and so that fray ended, [Strabo, l. 15, p. 698, 699.]

Alexander built here two Cities, on each side the Hydaspes: the one on this side the river, at the place where hee passed; the second on the other side, where where hee fought the battle: This from the victory there gotten against the Indians, he called by a Greek name, Nica. The other he called Bucephalia, or Bucephalia, from his horse Bucephalus, for he died there, not of any wound received in the fight (as some, and among the rest, A. Gellius [lib. 5, cap. 2.] would have it) but spent with travel and very ages, for he was then 30 years old: as besides Arrianus, one Sicritus himself, cited by Plutarch, testifieth: And the King made him a solemn funeral, and a Monument; and there built a City round about it; faith Pliny, [lib. 8, cap. 42.] Near to which Cities it was, as Strabo noteth, that he built his Navy for the Ocean, [lib. 15, pag. 698.] upon the Hydaspes, which ran between the two kingdoms of Porus and Taxiles, both whose help and great industry, he used in building this fleet, as Curtius, [1.9. c. 7.] observeth.

Alexander leaving Craterus there, with a part of his army, to finish the buildings of these two Cities, and to wall them, went further into India, against those, who bordered upon Porus his kingdom, which by Aristobolus are called Glaucianae, but by Ptolemaeus, Glasia; taking one half of his fellow Cavaliers along with him, and the choicest men out of every Squadron, with all his Archers on Horseback, and his Squadron of Agrians, and other Archers. In this voyage, 37 Cities gave themselves up into his hands; the least of which, had 50 thousand inhabitants in it, and many 100, besides a multitude of townes and villages, which were no lesse populous than the Cities themselves: all which he laid to Porus his kingdom; and having made Taxiles and him good friends, sent Taxiles back into his own kingdom again.

At the same time came Ambassadors from Abibarus to Alexander; promising to be wholly at his command, provided that he would not command him to yield up his person to him: for that he would neither live without a kingdom, nor reign if he were enslaved to another man: whereupon Alexander sent him back word, that seeing he would not come to Alexander, Alexander with his army would take the pains to go to him, to his great cost. There came also Ambassadors to him from those Indians which lived as free States, and from an other Porus, King of Indians likewise.

Phrataphernes, Governour of Parthia and Hircania, came at this time to Alexander, with such Thracians, as he had left with him: there came also messengers to him from Sicius Governour of the Afscenians, to tell him, that they having murdered his L. President, had revolted from him. Against these he dispatched away Philippus and Tyrtius with an army, willing them to suppress the rebellion of the Afscenians, and keep that Province in order. About which time also, Cleopis the Queen of the Afscenians bare Alexander a son, which bare his name, and was afterward King of that country, [Justin, lib. 12, cap. 7. with Curtius, lib. 8, cap. 20.]

That other Porus, nephew to him whom Alexander had overcome; for very fear, nor so much of Alexander, as of his Uncle Porus, left his kingdom, and fled into the country of the Gangaride; taking with him as many as he could get to follow him, that were fit to bear arms.

Alexander with his army put over Acesines, a violent River, and which was 15 furlongs broad, they who had bladders made of skins, to use, did well enough: but they which put over in boats, dashing many times upon the rocks in the way, brake them, and lost themselves: as Arrianus out of Ptolemaei reports, [lib. 5, pag. 115.] But Alexander left Cœnus with his Brigade, on the higher side, to provide for the passage of such as were making provisions of corn and other things for the army, against they should come thither.

Nearchus, who was then himself in the army, says, (cited by Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 692.) that whereas Alexander had first encamped by the River side, he was faine to remove his Camp afterward to a higher ground, for the overflowing of the water; and that this happened about the summer solstice: and Arrianus confirms as much, in his [Indica, pag. 172.] where he faith, that Alexander's army ran away from the River Acesines, when the water thereof, at Midsummer came and overflowed all the country.

Here were Woods of a vast extent, and shady trees, of a wondrous bulk, and strange height: some 70 cubits high; and so thick, that 4 men could hardly fathom them, and cast a shadow, 3 acres, or 300 foot off: their limbs, for the most part, like huge beams bowing downward to the ground, grew from thence up again, not as from the same bough, but as if it were out of a new root: of which kind we may read more in [Ptolemy, lib. 12, cap. 5, and Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 694.] where he faith out of Aristobolus, that under one of these trees, 50 men might fit at dinner.

Here also was great store of Serpents, which were but small of body, but of divers and curious colours, and so deadly biting, that it caused sudden death to any that was bitten by them. The Macedons therefore, to prevent this danger, hung their beds from the limbs of the trees, and so slept above ground, what they could sleep, which was but little, till at length they learnt a remedy of it, from the country people, which was a root, which they shewed them to take, if any man happened to be bitten.

From hence Alexander dismissed Porus, to return into his own kingdom, with charge to return, with an army of the choicest and ablest Indians, that he could make, and with such Elephants, as he had; and then passed the deserts, and came with his army, to the river Hyarotis, al. Hydrates; another river of India, as broad as the Acesines, but not so violent altogether, as that is, leaving garrisons every where, as he went, in convenient places, that so Craterus and Cæus might safely come unto him, with corn which they were to take up, in all places where they came; and both his own, and Demetrius his Corners of Horle, and half his Archers, sent them into the country of that Porus, which was fled away, and bad him assign it over to his friend King Porus; and if he found any other Indian nation, bordering upon the river Hyarotis, which lived as free states, he should lay them all to Porus his kingdom, himself passed the Hyarotis, but with lesse trouble, than he had done the Acesines.

To this river there was adjoining a grove of shade trees, not usually seen in other parts, and wild Peacocks, flying up and down therein. But the King going still forward, took in sundry other nations, some upon surrender, and some by force; others he was fain to run after, and overtake, and make them yield unto him.

Mean while, Alexander was told, that there were other Indian states, and a people called the Cathæans, who intended to bid him battle, if he came into their coats; and they dealt with other free states of India likewise, to confederate with them in this action: as also another nation of those parts called Oxidracans, and the Mallians, against whom, a little before, Asitarus and Porus with their joynt armies, and many other confederate Indians, went, but could do no good upon them, and so returned: but the place where they purposed to abide his coming, was said to be Sangala, a city of the Cathæans, and a great one too, as in these parts; and compassed about, not only with Cathæans, but also with a bog. These Cathæans are by Polyæus [lib. 4. stratag.] called Calthæ, and by Diodorus, Cathari, who says that it was made a law, by the common consent of all these nations, that if the husband died, the wife should be buried with his Corps; which very thing is observed by Strabo, of the Cathæans, [lib. 15. pag. 699.]

Alexander, going into these parts, came the second night to a city called Pimprama. That nation of the Indians are called Adraista, and by Diodorus Andraista, who presently came in and yielded upon conditions.

Alexander, resting his soldiers there the next day, on the third day, marched to Sangala, where the Cathæans, and their fellows, expecting his coming, stood all ranged in battle array upon the rising of a hill before the city, having instead of a trench, placed before them, three rows of Chariots locked close together. But their Chariots being quickly dispersed by Alexander, they all presently fled back into the city, where Alexander forthwith sent to besiege them, and cast up a double trench round about the city, save where the bog hindered them. And there he set Ptolemei, with three thousand of the silver Targeteers, all the Squadron of Agrians, and one company of Archers, to guard that quarter: moreover he set all the Chariots which he had taken athwart that passage, to hinder them from flying. The inhabitants endeavouring, in the fourth watch of the night, to flee away, fell upon those Chariots, and were beaten back by Ptolemei, who slew 500 of them, and made them retreat within their gates again. Mean while Porus came to him, with the rest of his Elephants, and five thousand Indians; and now his Engines of battery were fitted, and approached to the wall. The Macedons therefore not having quite battered the inner wall, but only undermined a vaumure made of bricks, and reared their ladders round about, took the city by assault, wherein were slain 17 thousand souls, and taken 70 thousand more, three hundred Chariots, five hundred Horses, Alexander lost in all this siege, not passing 100 men, but there were hurt, some 1500 more, among which was Lylimachus, one of the squires of the body.

Alexander, burying his dead after the Macedonian manner, sent Perdiccas with a sufficient company to ravage and plunder all the country thereabout, but sent Eumenes the secretary, (to wit, that Eumenes, secretary sometime to King Philip, and whole life, Plutarch and Probus have both written) with 300 Horle, to two cities, which he had confederated with those of Sangala; that, offering them pardon, he should receive them to mercy; but the townsmen, hearing what was done at Sangala, were fled all out of the town, before he came: whereupon as many as were notable, thorough out of the town, to follow the rest, were by him taken and slain, to the number of five hundred, but Alexander despairing to overtake the rest, returned to Sangala, and utterly destroyed it.

Then

Then went he to besiege another strong town, into which a multitude of people, out of other weaker places were gathered: but when they within, craved his mercy, and opened him their gates, he pardoned them; and taking hostages of them, he marched away to the next town, which was a very great one, and full of people. There he caused the hostages which he received to be presented before the walls; which when they within knew, (as being neighbours children, they could not but know them) they desired to speak with them; and the hostages telling them what a merciful man Alexander was, and how dreadfully withal to his enemies, easily persuaded them to yield unto him: and now the report that was cast abroad of Alexander, that he went about, more like a robber, than a Conqueror, was altered; and the rest of the cities, gave up themselves, without holding up either sword or buckler against him! [Curt. lib. 9. cap. 2. Polyæ. Stratag. lib. 4. in Alexan. self. 30.]

From hence he went into the kingdom of Sophites, who was of a goodly stature, above all the men of those parts; for he was more than 4 cubits high: and coming out of his chief City, with his two sons, both of full age, he delivered up into Alexander's hand, his golden rod, all set with B. rills: and resigned to him, himself, his children, and all his kingdom. And having received his kingdom again from his hand, a few days after he feasted Alexander and all his army in a sumptuous maner. And having presented Alexander himself with many great and costly gifts; he gave him also 150 Indian dogs, which were, as was said, of a mixt kind, between dogs and tigers, and of a wonderful strength and courage: for proof whereof, there were four of them presented upon an exceeding great Lion, [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 700. Elia. Hister. Annal. lib. 8. cap. 1.]

Mean while Hephæstion, returned to him, with such companies as he carried out; having subdued countries of the Indians far and near where ever he came: and Alexander thereupon spared not to honour him with all deserved praises, before the army.

Leaving Sophites in his kingdom as he found him, Alexander went forward still to the next nation, where Phlegus was King, and when all the inhabitants there welcomed the Macedons, and Phlegus himself, went out to meet Alexander with gifts and presents; submitting himself wholly to his pleasure: Alexander re-established him in his kingdom, and being royally entertained with all his army, stayed there two whole dayes.

Upon the third day he departed from thence, and came to the River Hypaphis, al. Hypanis, which is 7 furlongs over, and 6 fathom deep: and being besides very rocky under water, was very difficult to passe; and being informed by Phlegus of such things as he desired, he found that on the other side the river, there was a vast Desert of 11 or 12 dayes journey: and at the end thereof, the River Ganges, the greatest of all India: that beyond that there dwelt sundry nations; The Gangaridæ, al. Gonganizæ, and Prasiani, al. Præsidiani, al. Præziæans, al. Pharrarians, al. Tabararians, for by all these different names they go. That the King was called Aggramme; (Diodorus calls him Xaggrames), that his army was 20000 Horse, and 20000 Foot, and 2000 Chariots, and 3 or (as Diodorus saith) 4000 Elephants, all trained up and fitted for the war.

When these things seemed incredible to Alexander, he had further speech with Porus about it: Porus told him, that the force and power of that King and kingdom was indeed very great, and no lesse than was spoken of: But that the King that now there was, was a base-born thing, and no better than a poor barbarous, belated and scorned by his subjects. And one Androcottus, who was then but a youth, and had not only seen Alexander, but also for a certain saucy prank played with him, was commanded to be put to death, and had died for it, had he not took himself to his heels: as Justin, [lib. 15. cap. 4.] tells us, was wont afterward to say, That Alexander mist but a little of getting all that country into his hands, for that the King there at that time, was so wretched, so base, so hated, and so much scorned of his people.

Here Alexander began to consider with himself, that his soldiers were all tired out and spent with the length of the war; and that now every man began to look for an end of these dangers, with a reward and fruit of all their labours: for they had now been eight whole years (for so long it was since he came first to be King) in a continual perilous and laborious war. And it then fell out withal, that for 70 dayes together, there poured down from heaven, nothing but fearful forms of rain, with lightning, and thunders upon them; as we read in Diodorus: whereupon, as the same Diodorus saith, to pacifie the soldiers' minds, he gave them leave to plunder a most rich and plentiful country of the enemies, and to take all to themselves. And whilst they were busie at this work, he called together their wives and children and made there an ordinance, that the wives should receive their monthly allowance in corn, and their children the same wages, that their fathers did.

When

When the souldiers were returned home laden with wealth and riches, the King called them all together, unto whom he made almost a free speech, to request them to accompany him cheerfully to the conquest of the Gangarida, unto whom Cæsus the son of Polémocrates, made an answer in the name of the whole army, and concluded, that they all desired an end of the war. And when the Macedons would in no wise listen to his desires, yet as Ptolemy reports, he went on, and offered sacrifice for a passage over: and when the entrailes portended all dreadful things, if he proceeded, he then called together his friends, and such as were the ancientest, and of greatest familiarity with him, and told them first, and afterward declared to all, the army that since all things seemed to be adverse to his proceeding any farther, he was now content and resolved to return.

Yet Pliny, very improbably, will needs have it, that notwithstanding all this, he passed the river Hypanis, and erected altars on the other side thereof, [lib. 6. c. 17.] for that which follows in the same place; to wit, that the Kings own letters do confirm as much, I conceive that those words refer not to his passing over the river Hypanis or Hypafis, but to that which went before, concerning the order and distance of his removals and journeys from place to place, described and set down by Diogenes and Baton, his two principal Harbengers, and Camp-masters: For who can believe that Alexander alone, without his army, and without any purpose of going any farther, would offer to pass such a dangerous river as that was, or if he would that the enemy which attended him on the other side, would not have let upon him, and hindered him in his way, especially, seeing that Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 700.] notes, that he went no further Eastward, to wit, because he was forbidden to pass the river Hypanis or Hypafis, and Plutarch also tells us, that in his time, the Kings of the Præstians or Pratiens, passing the river westward, worshipped those Altars, which Alexander then set up, and did Sacrifice upon them, after the Grecian manner.

Wherefore manifest it is, that Alexander, dividing his army into several companies, caused 30 altars to be built all of square stone on the latter side of the river Hypanis, and not on the further; each of which altars was 50 cubits high, and like to 10 many great towers, and of a greater bulk than towers lie to be of, upon which, having offered sacrifices after the Grecian mode to his gods, he presented them also with games of all sorts, wrestling, and dancing, and sports on horseback: Then made he his Camp three times greater in every respect than it was ever wont to be: his trenches 50 foot broad and 10 foot deep, and of the earth cast up out of the ditch, drew a reasonable wall also, round about the trench: He commanded his foot also, that in their several tents they should set up two bedsteads, each of them 5 cubits high: and the horsemen, that they, besides such beds, should also in their tents make mangers for their horses, as bigge again as at other times; with arms, and horse bits, and other furniture belonging to them, after the same proportion, and to hang them up, and leave them behind them, to abuse posterity, with an imaginary belief of his greatness: concerning the inscriptions and titles of his altars, we may see more in [Philoftratus, his life of Apollonius.]

These things thus done, he returned by the same way he came to the river Hydrantes: which having passed, he came back to Acænes.

There found he this City ready built, by Hephestion, whom he left to do it, and thither he drew such of the neighbouring places as would, and of his mercenary souldiers, as many as were grown unfit for the war, to store it with inhabitants.

Araces, who ruled all in the province, bordering upon the kingdom of Abifarus, and the brother of Abifarus, and his associates came to Alexander; and brought him presents, such as were of greatest esteeme in those parts, and 30 Elephants sent from Abifarus; telling him Abifarus would have come to him, had it not been for a sickness which then held him: and when such messengers as Alexander sent to him, at their returne affirmed as much, and that he was sick indeed, he was easily persuaded of the truth of his excuses; and thereupon made Abifarus Governour under himself of that province, and made Araces subject unto him: and appointing what tributes they should pay, offered sacrifice again at the river Acænes.

Having passed the Acænes, he came to Hydapes, where he repaired, by the help of his souldiers, what ever the overflowing of that unruly river had demolished in his two Cities lately there built, Nicæa, and Bucephalis: for because that from the time that he went from thence, till his now return thither again, it had done nothing else but raine, especially the Etesian or yearly winds at that season blowing, as Aristobolus saith, cited by Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 691.] And so it fell out, that together with that rain, which continued for 70 dayes space, there fell also horrible tempests of thunders and lightnings, as I shewed before out of Diodorus.

Alexander, when he had caused a multitude of ships, what of two, what of three stages high, to be built, and rigged, upon the Hydapes, besides others, for the passage of his Horse and Foot over the river, he resolved to fall down from thence, into the southern Ocean; and for that purpose gathered all the Phænicians, Cypriots, Carians, and Egyptians which followed his Camp together, and put them aboard his ships.

At the same time died Coenus, one of his best, and bolom friends, whose death he much lamented, and caused him to be entered with all honour and sumptuousness, which that time and place afforded, yet not forgetting the speech which he made in the armies behalf, for a return, gave him this biting taunt. That had he known how short a time he had to live, he would never have made so long an oration to that purpose.

Then came to him new supplies out of Greece, as well auxiliaries, as mercenary souldiers, under their severall Commanders, to wit, 30 thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse: bringing with them besides, rich arms, for 25 thousand Foot, and 100 talents in Apothecary stuff for medicines, as Diodorus notes; and Cæsius [lib. 2. cap. 5.] Memnon also brought him out of Thracia, six thousand horse, besides those which came from Harpalus, and seven thousand Foot, and 25 thousand arms, in-laid with silver and gold, which he caused to be distributed in the army, and the old ones to be burnt.

Now that Harpalus, which Curius tells us, sent a supply unto him, was none other, but he, whom Alexander had trusted with the keeping of his treasures and treasure in the city and province of Babylon, and whom he had left, inapud, (his) his overseer, and Procurator, or L. Steward of all that country, as Plutarch in Alexander, writeth, yet left he the rule and government of it to Mazæus, who had delivered it up into his hand; and when he died, Dittamenes succeeded him in that charge. Though Diodorus calls this Harpalus, the President of that province, in his History of [year 2. 113 Olympiade] upon which now we are: where he further tells us, that he, hoping that Alexander would never return alive out of India, gave himself over to all kind of intemperance and luxury, sparing for no cost. And first, saith he, he fell to committing of all manner of whordom and luxury with the women kind of that country, and then laying it on, upon all other sorts of uncleanly and unseasonable delights and pleasures: he made havock of the Kings monies, committed to his charge; and took order for sundry sort of filth to be brought unto him, from as far off as the red sea, and was so lavish in his feasting, and usual diet, that every man cried shame of him, for it, and sent for a noted trumpeter, Pythonice by name, from as far as Athens, and when he died, for another from the same place, called Glycera: whereof Theopompus complained in a letter of his to Alexander, telling him, he spent above 200 talents, in making two tombs for Pythonice, when she died, one at Athens, and another at Babylon it self, and that he dedicated a Grove, and an Alter, and a Temple to Pythonice, by the name and title of Venus Pythonice, and that he set up Glyceras statue in brass, at Tarsus in Syria, and gave her leave to have her habitation in the Kings own palace, commanded the people to call her by the title of, and reverence her as a Queen, [Athenæus lib. 13. cap. 23.]

The like did Cleander, Sitacles, and Heracon, in Media, all hoping that Alexander would never return alive out of India, and in assurance thereof, fell to plundering of private men estates, and pulling down of Temples, ravishing the young virgins, of the noblest families, with many other kinds of villanies upon the goods and persons of the subject; inasmuch, that the very name of a Macedon grew odious to all nations, for their avarice and luxury in all kinds. But above all, Cleander, who having first ravished a noble Virgin himself, gave her afterward to his slave for his whore, [Cur. lib. 10. cap. 1. Arrian, lib. 6. pag. 147.]

Alexander, preparing for his voyage into the Ocean, and seeing old grudges kindling afresh between Porus and Taxiles, made them friends again, and linked them together by bonds of affinity, which he procured to be made between them before he went, and then sent them away each to his own kingdom. And for Porus, he not only made him king of all the countries lying between Hydapes and Acænes, as before, but also, of all the free states, which he had subdued between the rivers of Acænes, and Hypanis, which were several nations, and in them, cities above two thousand, as in Arrian, [lib. 6. pag. 124.] others reckon in that space 15 several nations, and in them, great cities, to the number of 5000, besides towne and villages to them belonging, as Plutarch in Alexander. And the truth is, that the region lying between Hydapes and Hypanis, containeth now more than nine nations, but there were therein 5000 cities, every one of them as big as Coos, in Meropis, as Strabo, out of Apollodorus, who wrote of the affairs of Parthia, reports, [lib. 15. pag. 586.] who yet in his own opinion thinks, that in this reckoning, he did overlaish; saying, ποῦν δὲ (i.e.) it seemeth, that this number is but a little Hyperbolically, and therefore Pliny draws this number to the cities, which he

he subdued in all India, [lib. 6. cap. 17.] in these words. These who were with Alexander in his voyage report, that in that tract of India which he subdued, there were 5 thousand towns and cities, every one of them as big as Coos, in the compass of 9 nations. Philippos, one of his company of Nobles attending him, and who was by him made Lord and Governor of a Country beyond the River Indus.

The Horse of the City Nisæa, were sent back : Craterus and Hephæstion, were commanded to march before him into the capital City of Sophites his kingdom, and thence to attend the coming of the Fleet : Craterus held on, upon the right hand of the Hydaspes with a part of the Horse and Foot, and Hephæstion on the left, with the remainder and far greater part of the whole army, and a hundred Elephants. The whole army at this time consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men, with those which he brought from the sea coast. And now they returned to him also, whom he sent to levy fresh companies, bringing with them men of divers nations, and diversely armed, [Arrian, lib. 6. and in his Indica, pag. 181.] and Plutarch says that at this time he had : 20 thousand Foot, and 5 thousand Horse.

Curtius says, that this Navy was one thousand ships, of which Diodorus says, 200 were open, the rest were of the nature of Row-barges, as Diodorus saith. Arrianus, in his Indica, saith he had but 8 hundred in all, some for carriage of horses, the rest of loading for corn and other provisions, but of all sorts, amounting to little less than two thousand.

Amiral of this fleet, was Nearchus, born in Crete, and Euagoras of Corinth Purser to it; but of Alexander's own ship wherein he went, was Master or Steward, one Oniceticus, an Asiatic born, and Arrianus in his Indica, sets down the Master of every particular Ship.

This done, Alexander sacrificed to his country gods, and (such other as the Priests advised him to : and among the rest, to Neptune, and to Amphitrite, and to the Nereides or sea Nymphs ; and above all to the Ocean it self, and to the River Hydaspes from whence he set forth ; as also to the River Acesines, into which the Hydaspes falls, and to the river Indus, which receives them both. Also he proclaimed several sorts of Games, of Muffick, and Wrestling, and the like, with Prizes, for such as would put in for them; distributing beasts, for every company to sacrifice by themselves.

In the morning, the army went aboard, to wit, the silver Targateers, and Archers, and such of the Horsemen as were called his nobles or friends, amounting to the number of 8 thousand, not many days before the setting of the Pleiades, as [Strabo, lib. 15.] out of Aristobolus sheweth ; which salutes much about the end of our Octob. Alexander himself coming aboard, poured out a golden viol of wine from the prow of the ship into the River, calling upon Acesines, Hydaspes, and Indus, all at once. Afterward when he offered to his Progenitor Hercules, and to Ammon, and the rest of the gods, according to his accustomed manner, the trumpet sounded, at his command, to draw down the ships into the water, and to be going, whereupon every man did accordingly : for order was given, how far every barge, how far every horse-lighter, how far every thing of war should fleet off from each other, for fear lest any should perchance fall off of any other in their course, and that one should not strive to out sail, or out row another ; but keep every one in his rank and order wherein he set forth.

Alexander, going on in this order, came on the third day to the place where he appointed Craterus and Hephæstion to attend him : there he stayed two days, that Philip might there overtake him, with the rest of the army ; for he had sent him to the River Acesines, commanding him to march down by the bank thereof : and sent away Craterus and Hephæstion again with directions, what course to hold in their march by land.

He, holding on his course upon the River Hydaspes, which was every where 20 furlongs over at the least, landed his souldiers and went to Sibarus, or country of the Sogdians. Thence, they say, were of the posterity of them, who with Hercules heretofore besieged the Rock of Aornus ; and when they could not take it, were left here by him when they were not able to march with him any further : their cloths were nothing but skins of wild beasts, and their weapons nothing but clubs : and although the Grecian manners and fashions were worn out, yet might a man easily perceive some traces and marks of their original among them ; But when Alexander pitched his Camp near unto the chiefest City of their country, the principal men of them came forth unto him, and being admitted to his presence, they put him in mind of their first origin, and what reverence they had to the nation of the Greeks, and offered him their service, in what ever his pleasure was, as became men of the same blood with him and his Grecians, testifying as much, by the no ordinary presents which they gave unto him. Alexander received them very graciously, and made them a free State, to live according to their own laws.

From

From thence he made a rode further into the country some 250 furlongs, and having walled all the field, came and besieged the chief City of that country.

The Agalassians opposed him, with 4000 Foot, and 3000 Horse, upon the bank of a River : but he passing the River, quickly disfiled and routed them, and having slain the most part, made the rest run into the towns, which having taken, he slew them that were of age, and sold the rest for slaves.

Other inhabitants there were which would needs take up arms too, and were gathered together into one city, to the number of 20 thousand : Into this city also, he brake by pure force ; but when they barricaded their streets, and fought upon them from the battlements of their houses, he was forced to get out again, and left many of his Macedons dead behind him, wherefore in a rage he set fire on the houses, and burnt both it, and most of the people therein, with fire. Three thousand there were which got into the castle ; they sued for pardon and had it.

And then returning a shipboard with his nobles, he went with all speed into the countries of the Mallians and Oxydracans : because he was informed of them, that they were two very populous and warlike Nations, and that having carried their wives and children into fenced places, they purposed to abide him in the field, and he made the more haste, to the end he might fall upon them, whilst they were but in their preparatives, and not fully yet provided for him.

Upon the 5 day, falling still down the river, he came to the confluence of the two rivers, Acesines and Hydaspes : where they both meet and make one river, but in a very narrow Channel : and by that means, runs with a most violent and rapid current, and maketh strange whirlpools with all : whereupon many of their ships were bigged, and two of the greatest of them falling towle each of other, split in sunder, and perished with those who were therein. Alexander's own ship, falling into one of these whirlpools, was in extreme danger to have been lost, and he in her. But having gotten a little lower, where the Channel openeth somewhat wider, the stream grew calmer, and the ships coming to the bank on the right hand, found a safe harbour to ride in, under a bank which running out into the river, brake the violence of it, and so had they leisure to draw their ships on land.

The King set up altars upon the banks side, and sacrificed to his gods for escaping so grand a danger : and then marched 30 furlongs further, into the country, and falling upon the natives, that would not submit unto him, he charged them onely, not to help the Mallians, and so returned to his ships again ; and there found Craterus, Hephæstion, and Philippos came with their several Armies, and ready to attend him.

The countries of the Oxydracans and Mallians lie between the place where the Hydaspes falls into the Acesines, and that where they both together fall into the river Indus, as Arrianus in his Indica teacheth us ; [pag. 171.] These were wont to be always in war, each against other ; but now Alexander, a common enemy to both, coming on, made them friends : for a further confirmation whereof, they gave ten thousand virgins each to other to be cross-married ; their foot were in all 80 thousand ; their horse, 10 thousand ; besides 7 hundred chariots ; Curtius saith 9 hundred, [Justin, lib. 12. cap. 9.] and Orosius [lib. 3. cap. 19.] give unto these Mandri or Ambri, and Sabracans, and Subagrans, and Sugambrians, for by all these names, the Malli and Oxydracans (who in Diodorus are also corruptly written Syracusians) in divers editions go, 60 thousand horse.

The Macedons, who thought they had been past all dangers, and lookt for no more fighting business, when they now saw themselves engaged in a new war, with more fierce and warlike Nations, than any they had hitherto met withal in any part of India struck (as they were) with a sudden fear, began a fresh to murmur and mutiny against Alexander ; but he by a faire Oration which he made unto them, pacified them, and made all well again.

Commander in chief of all this army of the Natives, was a man of approved valour, chosen out of the Oxydracans : and he pitched his camp at the foot of a hill, making store of fires that he might make his army thereby seeme the greater, and making it waies great shouts and noises, after their country manner to terrifie the Macedons, if it might have been. But the next morning Alexander, full of hope, and all assurance of victory, encouraged his souldiers, and took the field against them : when upon the sudden, the enemies, whether for fear, or whether upon some falling out among themselves, ran all away, left the field, and betook themselves to the mountains and woods, which because the Macedons could not overtake, they therefore fell to the rifling of their Camp.

Alexander having rigged his Navie, sent Nearchus with it, down the river into the country of the Mallians, charging him to be there 3 daies before the army, and passing the Hydaspes, commanded Craterus, who was on the right hand of the Hydaspes, to take take charge of the Elephants, and of Polyperchons Brigade, and his Archers on horseback, and of Philips Regiment. He would also Hephæstion to go 5 days march before him; and Ptolemei, to come 3 days journey behind him: that whosoever escaped Hephæstion, might be sure to fall into the hands of one of them two. But commanded them that went foremost, when they came to the confluence of Acefines and Hydræotes, which was the utmost bound of the Mallians, as the confluence of Acefines and Hydaspes was of the Oxydracans, there to stay and attend his coming, and till Craterus and Ptolemies armies were come in and joyned to him.

Himself taking with him his Regiment of silver Targeteers, and his Squadron of Agrians, and Python's brigade, and all his Archers on Horseback, and one half of his fellow Cavaliers, went through a landy thirly country into the Region of the Mallians, to set upon them, before either the Oxydracans could come to help them, or they the Oxydracans.

Now the first day he encamped near a little river, distant from the Acefines, some 100 furlongs, where, having rested himself a while, and his army, he commanded every man to fill what bottles he had, with water, and then put on again; and in the remainder of that day, and the night following, marched 400 furlongs, and in the morning, lighted upon a great many of the Mallians, who, because they conceived, that surely he would never come over that dry and thirly wilderness, were walking abroad idly with out the city. The most of them he flew, the rest ran into the gates, and there lockt them up; then caused he his Horse to surround the walls, instead of a trench, till his Foot came up.

But so soon as they were come, he presently dispatched away Perdicas, with his own, and Citius his Horse, and with the Agrians, to besige another town of the Mallians, where he understood, that many of the Indians were gathered together, willing them to keep them in, but not to make any assault, till he came onely to take care that none gat out, to carry news into other parts, that he was come into the country, and then began he to make his approaches, and to assault the city, which he say be-fore.

Having slain many of them in the assault, the rest left the walls, and fled to the Castle, and that being also taken, he flew therein two thousand men.

Perdicas, coming to the city, which he was commanded to besige, found all the birds flown; and because he found that they were but newly gone, he followed after them, with all the speed he could make: all he overtook he flew: the rest escaped into the bogs, and fenzie places, and there saved themselves.

Alexander, having rested and retired both himself and his army, a while, removed in the first watch of the night: and having made a long march that night, at break of day came to the river Hydræotes, where he found that many of the Mallians, were already passed over; the rest he set upon, as they were passing, and flew them every man: then himself passed the river with his army, and overtook such as were gone before; and of them he flew many, and took other prisoners: Nevertheless, most of them got away into a city, very strongly situate, and well fenced with works.

But when his foot came up, Alexander sent Python against them, with his own, and two other Regiments of Horse, who at first onset, scared them into the Town, and took it; and made all that had fled thither, and were not slain in the taking of it, slaves: which done, Python returned to the Camp.

Then led Alexander his army against a City of the Brachmanni, whither he understood too, that the Mallians were fled: and as soon as he came, besieged it round with his Squadrons very thick. The souldiers forthwith left the walls, and fled to the Castles, which taken, the inhabitants, some set their own houses on fire, and threw themselves into it: others would sell their skins, as dear as they could, and died fighting: there died in all five thousand of them, few came alive into the enemies hand.

Alexander stayed there one day, to give his souldiers breath, and the next day he marched against other Towns of the Mallians: all which he found, to have left their cities, and fled to the woods and mountains: there also he spent one day.

The next day he sent Python, and Demetrius, Captain of a Regiment of Horse, back to the river side, to whom he joyned also, certain other Troups, and Companies, requisite for the service he employed them in, willing them, if by the way, they chanced to light upon any of those, who were fled to the woods, if they submitted not, to kill them; whereupon they flew a very great many, as they passed.

Himself

Himself marcht against the Capital City of the Mallians, to which, as he understood, many others had retired themselves. But even this great city also, hearing of his coming, abandoned the place, and fled, &c. flying over the river Hydræotes, there put themselves in battle array, upon the high cliffs of that river, as if they would there stop his passage. Alexander followed them instantly with his Horse, commanding his Foot to come after; but when he was in the midst of the river, the Indians forsook the place, and though in good array, yet ran away: whereas yet they were not fewer in number than 50 thousand, and Alexander seeing them in a strong compacted body, yet having no Foot come up to him, offered here and there, and every where to charge upon them; but thought it no discretion to engage in a fight against them.

But so soon as the Agrians, and other well-ordered Squadrons, and the Archers came, and the main battel of the Foot, were now in sight, the Indians took them to their heels, and ran away all to the next fenced City. Them Alexander pursued, and slew a many of them; and when they were there, Alexander presently surrounded the City with his Horse before the Foot came up.

Demophon a Southlayer, having speech with Alexander, told him, by certain signs and prodigies by him observed, that there was some great danger towards him, and withal desired him to forbear, at least to defer the siege thereof. The King reviling him with threwd words, for disheartening the souldiers whilst they were in action; and dividing his army in two parts, took one to himself, and gave the other to Perdicas, and both together went to scale the wall: which brunt the Indians not enduring, left their stations on the wall, and fled all to the Castle. Alexander with those about him, brake open the first gate himself, and got into the City, and began to set ladders against the Castle wall: And when he saw his Macedons not come on so roundly, as he wished, he took a ladder himself and set against the wall, and gat upon the top of it. Penciltes, bearing the target, which he borrowed out of the Temple of Minerva in Troy, and which in all encounters he ever caused to be born before him, followed, and after him Leonatus, one of the Squires of his body, upon the same ladder, and Abreas (one of the Διπολῆ or Dupliarians: (i.e.) of that order of Knights or Esquiers, who had double pay or allowance) upon another. And then the silver Targeteers, hearing of the danger the King was in, strove to set up the ladders so thick, that they brack, and to all came tumbling to the ground, and thereby both lost themselves, and hindered others from getting up that would, [See Appianus toward the end, lib. 2, Bell. Civil.]

Alexander, who was shot at on every hand, from the towres, adjoining (for no man durst come to handy-blows with him upon the wall) leapt off the wall down into the Castle yard, and setting his back to a wall there, flew sundry that came to assault him, with his own hand; and among the rest, the Captain himself of the Indians, which came boldly on upon him: so that afterward none other durst come near him; but all set themselves to shoot him a far off.

Mean while Penciltes, Leonatus, and Abreas leapt down the wall into the yard after him, and came to his rescue; of which Abreas, shot thorough the face into the head, died upon the place. And Alexander himself (as Ptolemei reporteth) received to great a wound in the breast, that his very breath came forth at it together with his blood. Penciltes, who interposed, with Minerva's buckler in his hand, and Leonatus, who took in his own body the blows which were meant to him, were likewise fore wounded: and little wanted it, but that Alexander himself, had there poured forth his soul, together with his blood. And all agree, that Penciltes defended him with his Palladian buckler: whence Pliny call him, [lib. 34, cap. 8.] the preserver of Alexander the Great. Concerning Leonatus, and Abreas, the Dupliarian; all do not agree: but that Ptolemei the son of Lagos, was at the rescue of him, Citarchus and Timogenes, and Pausanias in his Attica, do affirm: which yet himself denies, and says, he was not; and that all that while he was in fight with the enemy alewhere: So great saith Cicero, was the carelesse of those old Historians in writing, or which is as bad, carelesse in believing.

The Macedons at last breaking into the Castle, put every man therein to the sword, not sparing man or woman, old or young, and brought the King out upon their targets, living or dead, they knew not well whether. The cure of his wounds was more grievous, than the wounds themselves: but enduring the paine, he came at last to have hope of life again: which yet the army could hardly be brought to believe, it having been once bruited abroad that he was dead of his wounds. Wherefore so soon as possibly he could, he caused himself to be carried to the River side, from thence to fall down in a Barge to the place where his army lay, which was at the confluence of the Hydræotes with the Acefines, where Hephæstion was, commanding the army, and Nearchus the Navy; so soon as he came on land, he admitted the souldiery to kiss his hand, hand, and refusing his liſtier, gaſt upon his Horſe, to be ſeen of all, and then alighted and went a foot to his pavilion.

The King having his wounds cured in ſeven dayes ſpace, though not yet healed, hearing that the Indians were perſwaded of his death, cauſed two Barges to be joyned together, and upon them his Tent Royal to be ſpread; open on every ſide, to be ſeen of all thereby, to ſtay the report, that went among his enemies, that he was dead; and from thence went down the river, giving order, that none ſhould come near the barge he was in, for fear of hogging his weak body, with the beating of the Oares: and ſo on the fourth day, came to a country, deſerted indeed, by the inhabitants, but plentifully ſtored, with all manner of proviſions, both corn and cattle, wherefore that place pleaſed him well, to ſtay at, and reſeſh both himſelf and his army in.

Nearchus the Ammiral, reporteth, that his Nobles blamed him, for doing the office of a ſouldier, rather than a King or Captain in the army, and when he grew angry thereat, and ſhewed his diſlike by his looks; a certain old Baotian pleaſed him again, by reciting an old ſambick verſe, to this purpoſe, That he who would do any great thing reaſon was, he ſhould ſuffer ſomething too. And indeed, Curſus [lib. 9. cap. 12.] mentions an oration uttered to him by Craterus, in the name of his Nobles, to the ſame purpoſe, with his answer thereunto: wherein, ſhewing that a man can never want matter to win glory by: After the ninth year, (ſaith he) of my reign, and twentieth of my ages, do ye think it poſſible for me to be wanting, to my ſelf in advancing my glory, which I have ever addiſted and devoted my ſelf unto? for to Curſus brings him in ſpeaking, whereas yet in true point of Chronology, this was the tenth year of his reign (which agreeeth well enough with this ſaying) though the 30 of his age.

While the King ſtayed here many dayes, all which he ſpent in the full curing of his wounds, and in increaſing the number of his ſhips; the Grecian ſouldiers which he had planted in certain Cities of Baſtria, and Sogdiana, which himſelf had there built, to the number of about 3000 men, partly becauſe they took courage, upon the news of Alexander's death, fell off from the Macedon government; and having killed ſome of the chief of their own country men, began to take arms; and ſeizing on the Caſtle of the City Baſtra, which was not ſo carefully kept, as it ſhould have been, drew the inhabitants to joyn with them in this revolt; chief in this conſpiracy, was one Athenodorus, who alſo aſſumed to himſelf the Title of a King, not ſo much out of a deſire of any ſovereignty, as out of a purpoſe he had, to draw men thereby to follow him in his return to Greece. But there was one Biton or Bicon, a Grecian likewiſe, who out of a grudge and envy, which he bare him hereupon, invited him to a banquet, and there, by the hand of one Boxus, ſlew him. The next day this Biton called a company together, and there perſwaded ſome, that Athenodorus would have killed him: others there were, who thought it was nought elfe but a meer roguesy of Bitons, and they quickly drew others to their belief: whereupon they all took up arms, ready to have ſlain him, if they could; but the chief among them perſwaded the reſt, and ſo all grew quiet again.

Biton, having got out of theſe bryers, fell to praſtiſe the deſtruction of thoſe who had ſaved his life; which they perceiving, laid hold on him, and Boxus both. But Boxus they put inſtantly to death: Biton they purpoſed to have ſiſt to the Rack; and now they were ready to fall to work with him: when upon the ſudden, the Grecians, like men out of their wits, roſe all in arms, no man knew why; whereupon they forbore Biton, for fear of a reſcue by the multitude; and he all naked as he was, fled to the Grecians: and they ſeeing what caſe he was in, and ready to be racked, changed their minds, and reſcued him from the danger he was in.

Mean while, the Mallians, that were left, ſent their meſſengers to Alexander, to yield up all the nation to his mercy; and in like manner from the Oxydracans, came the Captaines themſelves, and chief men of every City; and with them, one hundred and fifty of the principall of the whole nation, giving up the whole Country into his hands, Alexander willed them to ſend him one thouſand of their principall men. Curſus ſaith, 2500 horſe, which he might keep by him, either as hoſtages, or as ſouldiers to ſerve him, till he had ended his war with the Indians.

Then invited he all the principall men, and petty Kings of theſe nations, to a feaſt, where he cauſed one hundred golden Beds to be ſet, at a reaſonable diſtance each from other: every of thoſe beds was encloſed with Curtains wrought of ſcarlet and gold: in which feaſt was ſet out to be ſeen, what ever the old luxury of the Perſians, or new flagellies of the Macedons, both jumbled together, could afford.

Dioxippus the Athenian was at this feaſt; of whom Pliny, [lib. 35. cap. 11. Atbenæna, lib. 6. Eliaſ, lib. 10. cap. 22. and lib. 12. cap. 58. and Plut. in his book of Chariotries] make mention: Dioxippus, ſay, a famous Champion, and out whom the King, for for his great ſtrength of body, and courage of ſpirit, made very much of: and one Chorasus Macedon, a man of mighty ſtrength likewiſe, and who had, in many a fight, given great teſtimony of his worth. This Chorasus being in drink, would needs challenge Dioxippus to a ſingle fight. And the next day Dioxippus ſtark naked, and all over anointed with oyl, came into the liſt, having nothing but a truncheon, and a cloak for his armes, and there cloſed with the Macedon, who came in armed, with ſword and buckler, and pike, and javelin, and laid him at his foot.

The Macedons, and Alexander himſelf, took this for a fowle ſcur and diſgrace, put upon the Macedons nation, in the fight of theſe Barbarians, and repined at it: and ſhortly after, at another feaſt, there was a golden cup miſsing, and the ſuſpition of ſtealth thereof laid upon Dioxippus; the indignity whereof, wrought ſo far upon him, that returning to his lodging, he there wrote, and left a letter for Alexander, and then ſlew himſelf.

Alexander ſhipped his horſes, and of his fellow Cavaliers ſome 1700, and of others, as many, and 20 thouſand foot, and went not far upon the Hydracotes, before he came to the confluence of it, and the Aceſines: and then falling down upon the Aceſines, came at length to the confluence of the Aceſines with the river Indus, and there he ſtayed with his Navie, till Perdicas came to him with the body of the army: having by the wayes he came, ſubdued the Abaſſenians, who were a free ſtate among thoſe Indians.

While he there ſtayed, there came to him, other ſhips of 30 Oares a piece, and certain ſhips of burthen, which had been newly built in the country of the Xathri, another free ſtate in thoſe parts: and Embaſſadors alſo, from the Oſadians, a free ſtate likewiſe, all ſubmitting to him.

Likewiſe the meſſengers of the Oxydracans and Mallians, returned to him with preſents, among which, beſides ſome ſmall quantity of linnen cloath, there were 1000 Indian targets, and 100 talents of ſteele, and Lions of a vaſt bigneſſe, and Tigers, all brought to hand, and tame: As alſo the ſkins of huge Lizards, and Tortaiſe ſhells: There were alſo 200 Chariots, and 1030 horſes to draw them: ſoure for every Chariot, as we read in Curſus, [4. 9. c. 15.] Arrianus ſaith alſo, that they ſent him 3 thouſand men for hoſtages; the bravest and goodlieſt men they could find among them; with 500 chariots, and men in them to fight, over and above what Alexander had required at their hands; adding, that Alexander accepted their Chariots, and returned their hoſtages home again.

Alexander commanded them to pay him ſuch tribute as they formerly paid to the Arachothians, and let Philip to be their Sarrapa or Governor, his government to extend to the confluence of the 2 rivers, Indus and Aceſines, and no further: ſo that we can hardly believe Plutarch, where he ſaith that the extent of this Philip's government was thrice as bigg as Porus his kingdom, eſpecially if it were ſo bigg, as he himſelf delivers it to have been. But Alexander left unto him, for a guard of that Province, all the Thracian horſe, and ſuch companies of foot as he thought fit and requiſite for that purpoſe. Moreover he cauſed a City to be built at the confluence of thoſe two rivers; ſuppoſing it would quickly grow very populous, and of great renown, and therefore cauſed Docks, for the building of Ships, to be there made, in great number.

At that time came to him Oxyartes, father unto Roxane, whom Alexander had married, and was by him acquitted from all ſuſpition of having any hand in the revolt of the Grecians that were in Baſtria.

Afterward Polyſperchon waſt to Babylon with an army, as in Juſtin, [lib. 12. cap. 10.] and Craterus was commanded with a great part of the army that was left, and the Elephants, to march down on the left hand of the bank of the river Indus, becauſe that ſeemed the eaſieſt way for the Corſelesters to go, and the bordering Nations were no ſurer to him, than need was; and then himſelf, with ſome choiſe companies, took ſhip, and ſet forward toward his ſo long intended journey to the Ocean: and it is ſaid that he went never a day leſſe than 600 furlongs: and yet was full five months in going with ſome odd dayes over and above, [Plin. l. 6. c. 17.]

In this voiage of his down the river, he firſt came to the country of the Sabracans, or Sambethans: This was a Nation; inferior to none of all India, both for number, and warlikeſſe of men: and was governed by a popular State, throughout all their Cities. Theſe, hearing of the coming of the Macedons, preſently armed 60 thouſand foot, and fix, or (as Curſus ſaith) eight thouſand horſe, with five hundred Chariots; and ſet over them, to command, three moſt expert Captains. But the Navy coming upon them (of which more is to be ſeen, beſides Curſus, [lib. 9. cap. 15.] in Pliny, [lib. 19. cap. 3.] they took a fright at the ſtrangeſſe of the fight, and caſting withal in their minds, the ſame and invincible glory of the Macedons, took advice of the old men among them, who for the avoiding of ſo imminent a danger, adviſed them to ſubmit wherewhercupon they sent messengers; and gave themselves up wholly into his hands: whom he graciously received: and they again bestowed on him, besides other gifts, honours also bestowing a demy God.

Four dayes after he came to a Nation, which lay on both sides the River, which were called, Sodrans (or Sogdians, asin Arianius,) and Massanians: and received them likewise to grace and favour as he had done the former. And here, upon the bank of the River Indus, he built another Alexandria: and chose out a thousand men to people it, and made havens for Merchants, and docks for shipping; and there he cured such of his ships as had any wayes been bruised: And made Oxyartes, his father in law, and Pithon, Governours of all the country from the confuence of the Acelines and Indus to the sea: adding thereto also, all the sea coast. But himself falling still down the River, came to speedily into the country of King Musicanus, that he was there, before Musicanus ever heard that he was coming: wherefore not knowing what else to do, he forthwith went out to meet him, presenting him with the choicest gifts that India did afford, and in special, with all his Elephants: and gave up himself and all his whole kingdom into his hands, craving pardon for that he had done it no looner. Alexander pardoned him that offence; and wondering both at the country itself, and the city there: of which we may see more in Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 694. and pag. 701. which he collected out of Aristobolus, and Onesimarus, restored him to his kingdom, as he was before.

Here he heard the complaints brought against Tiriole, al. Tiryeste, whom he had made Governour over the Parapamida, with his aculeus face to face: and finding him guilty of many acts of cruelty and avarice committed by him, he put him there to death; and gave that Government to his father in law, Oxyartes.

He commanded Craterus to build a Citadel or Fort, upon the City of Musicanus: which was dispatched before he went from thence, because he saw that plat fit to serve for a bridle in the mouths of the neighbouring nations, to keep them in order with.

From thence, with his Archers and Agrians, and all the Horse, which he had a ship-board, he came to another Nation of the Indians, called Praestans, and marched against their King Porticanus, al. Oxyanus, because he neither came himself, nor sent Ambassadors unto him: and took two of the greatest Cities that he had in his Dominions: Porticanus himself was in one of them, which Alexander took the third day of his siege thereof. But Porticanus flying into the Castle, sent Ambassadors to treat of conditions: but ere ever they came to his presence, two great panes of the wall fell flat down to the ground; by the breaches whereof the Macedons flew into the Castle, and when Porticanus with those few which were with him stood still upon their guard, they were all presently put to the sword: The Castle was pulled down; all in the town were sold away for slaves: the spoile thereof given to the souldier, only the Elephants Alexander took, and carried away for himself.

Diodorus sayes, that Alexander first gave those Cities to be spoiled by his souldiers, and then let fire on them, and after that went and took in all the rest of his Cities and Towns and destroyed them: and thereby struck a terror into all the neighbouring Nations; and that the rest of the countries hearkned of his approach onely, presently sent, and yielded themselves unto him, without the least resistance, as Arianius writeth.

After this, he entered the country of the Brachmanes, where Sambus, al. Sabus, or Samus, as Curtius, al. Sabbas, as Plutarch, al. Ambigerus, as Justin, al. Ambiras, as Orosius calleth him, was King: of whom Alexander had been told that he was fled away: but when he came near his chief City, called Sindomana, al. Sindonalia, he found the gates set wide open to him, and Sambo his servants came forth to meet him with money and Elephants to present unto him, telling him vvidhal, that Sambus was fled indeed; not out of hostility to him, but for fear of Musicanus, whom Alexander had let go and pardoned, and for that there was mortal enmity between them two.

Alexander having taken in, this and many other places, went and by force took another City which had fallen off and revolted from him; and put to death many of the Brachmanes who had been the occasion and authors of it. For by their instigation it was that Sambus, who had but lately submitted to him, and the Cities of his subjection, had revolted from him. Curtius sayes, that Alexander took the City, by undermining the wall; and that the natives stood amazed to see men rise out of the ground in the midst of their City.

Citarchus, cited by Curtius, saith, that there were eight, or rather (as Diodorus with others have it) 80000 men slain in that country: and a multitude of others sold away for slaves. These plagues therefore the Brachmanes suffered: the rest, which simply submitted to him, and craved his pardon, had no harme: And King Sambus, getting getting away as farre off as he could, with thirty Elephants, saved himself.

Alexander got into his hand, to the number of ten, of those which were called Gymnopolitae, who had principally perswaded Sambus to flee away: and had caused much trouble to him and his Macedons; to these he propounded certain hard and obscure questions, threatening to hang them every man if they did not resolve him; those questions of his, with their answers upon them, Plutarch sets down in the life of Alexander, where he also tells us, that having heard them, he dismissed them, with many honours beaped upon them for their pains.

Musicanus in this interim revolted, and Pithon with an army, was sent against him: who setting upon the cities of his subjection, destroyed some, others he put Garrisons in, and built citadels or Castles, for a yoke upon them. And having taken Musicanus, and brought him alive to Alexander, he caused him forthwith to be crucified in his own kingdom, and as many of the Brachmanes as had put him on to that revolt.

Alexander, coming back to the river Indus, where he had commanded his Navy to attend him, fell down the river again, and came to a City called Harmatelia, belonging to Sambus and the Brachmanes: And when the inhabitants (trusting in their own strength, and situation of their city) shut gates against him, Alexander commanded 500 of his Agrians, to go close under the walls, with their arms; and if the towlmen sallied out upon them, to retreat: Three thousand fell out upon the 500, who according to direction, fled back, as if they had been afraid, and the enemies pursuing them, tell unawares upon other companies, which were laid of purpose for them; and where Alexander himself in person was: there were they forced to fall to a new fight, where in there were 6 hundred of them slain upon the place, and 1000 taken, the rest fled, and kept them close within the walls: But of the Kings side there were many grievously wounded, and in danger of death therewith: for the Indians had poisoned the heads of their weapons, with a deadly poyson; and whereas among other, Ptolomei the son of Lagos, was in like manner wounded, and was ready instantly to die thereof, it is said that Alexander in his sleep saw an herbe, which was a present remedy for that kind of poyson, and that herbe squeezed into drink and taken, presently recovered him: whereupon others also made use of that medicinale herbe, and recovered. It is most likely; that some or other, who knew the virtue of the herbe, acquainted Alexander with it; and then flattery made up the rest of the fable, for his honours sake, saith Strabo, [lib. 5. pag. 723.] who yet relates this as done among the Orizae, of whom we shall speak anon.

When as therefore, Alexander now let himself to besiege Harmatelia, being a strong and well fenced city, the inhabitants came all forth to him, and humbly begged his pardon, submitting themselves and their city, and all to his mercy, whercupon he pardoned them.

Morris King of Pattalena, the next bordering country thereunto, coming to Alexander, put himself and kingdom wholly into his hands: when Alexander had freely restored to his state again, he gave order withal to have all things necessary provided for his army.

Alexander commanded Craterus to take with him the Regiments of Attalus, and Meleager, and Antigens, and some of his Archers, and some also of his allies, and Macedons, which were grown unserviceable, and to carry them into Macedon, by the way of Caramania, through the countreys of the Aracotti, and Zarangi, or Drangi: the rest of the army, some were led by Hephastion on the one side of the river Indus and the darters on horseback, and the Agrians, by Pithon on the other: who had also in charge, to provide inhabitants, for the cities which he had built, and that if any new commotions were raised in those parts, he should settle matters there, and that done, should come and joyne with the rest of the army at Pattala.

And when Alexander had now failed down the river three dayes journey, word was brought him, that Morris, and a great company of the Patalenians with him, had left the city, and were fled to the mountains and woods: whercupon he made all the haste thither, that possibly he could.

Strabo, [lib. 5. pag. 691.] tells us out of Aristobolus, that Alexander came into Pattalene, about the rising of the dog-star; having then spent full ten months in his navigation, for that he set not forth but very few dayes before the rising of the seven stars: so that Alexander arrived in Pattala, about the end of our July, having been in this navigation, ever since the beginning of the tenth month before, hereby it appears, that going still down the water, along the Hydaspes, Acelines and Indus, he had spent full nine months, as appeareth by the known rising and setting of these stars: whereby we find that Plutarchs account in this point was not very exact, where he tells us, that ἡ δὲ πλοὺς αὐτοῦ ἐν τῇ θαλάσσῃ ἡμερῶν, κατὰ τὴν ἑξῆς χρόνον ἀνέστη (i. e.) His passing down the Rivers to the sea took him up seven months time.

Alexander coming to Parala, found the city and country thereabout void of all inhabitants, though he there found great flocks of flocks and herds of cattle, and corn in great abundance left. But he presently disparted away the nimble soldiers which he had to overtake those, who were fled away; and ever as they took any, they sent them away to overtake the rest, and to perwade them to return; promising them all security, and fruition of their estates in manner as before, both in City and Country.

Then commanded he Hephæstion to build a fort or citadel upon Patara: others he sent into a Region of theirs which was altogether destitute of water, to dig wells, thereby to make it more habitable: but some of the natives fell upon them, and slew many of them; yet having lost many of their own also in the fight, the rest fled all away to the Woods and Mountains: and Alexander, hearing of what had befallen his men, sent more to join with the former, and so to go thorough with the work begun.

Alexander dealt with Neavarchus his Ammiral, to chuse some fit fealon of the year, to let out from the mouth of the River Indus, and to coast along till he came to the Persian gulf, and from thence to the mouth of the river Euphrates and Tigris: as Arrianus in his Indica, reports of Neavarchus his own writing, [pag. 182.] Making, [saith Plutarch, Neavarchus,] his Ammiral of the Fleet, and Onesicritus chief Pilot of it. Whence it is that Onesicritus himself in his story Gayes of himself, that he was Navarchus: (i. e.) Pilot, as Arrianus: [lib. 6. pag. 124.] relates him, and Pliny [lib. 6. cap. 2.] renders him, Præfektum clasfis: (i. e.) Commander of the Fleet, But Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 781.] more rightly terms him Ἀρχιπλοῦτης: (i. e.) chief Pilot: See [Arria, lib. 7. pag. 163. and in his Indica, pag. 191.]

[illegible]

Alexander, purposing to loe down to the sea, by the right hand channel, made choice of the twelfth fifts he had, all of two decks high; and all his galleies of 30 oares a peece, and some nimble bargues, and such guides as best knew the River, and so let forward; willing Leonaus, with a thousand Horfe, and some 8 thousand Foot, to keep along with him, by the bank of the River.

The morrow after that he let forth, there arose a mighty tempest, and the wind and tide coming crossle each to other, raised a huge billow upon the River, so that his ships fell foul each of other; whereby most of them were bilged, and many of the 30 oares a piece were quite split therewith, before ever they could get to an Island, which lieth in the middlest of the channel.

There was Alexander forced to stay a long while, both to build him new vessels instead of them that were lost, as also for that those which were taken in, as guides upon the River, were all run away : And when he sent to get others, he could find none ; and so they were faine to go and do as well as they could without them. And now they had gone four hundred furlongs, when the Pilots all agreed, and told Alexander that they found a fent of the sea ; and that therefore certainly the Ocean could not be far off. He thereupon sent some to go a land, and to take up some of the country people ; out of whom he thought something might be learned. They searched their creets and cottages so long, that at last, they found some people in them ; whom they asked, how far they were from the sea : and they answered, that they knew not what the sea was, nor ever had heard of any such thing ; but, that, if they went on, in three dayes journey they should come to salt water, which married the fresh.

ney they should come to late water, which barred the land.

Arrianus tells us, that certain Macedons, being let a land, lighted upon some Indians, whom Alexander from thence forward used for his guides upon the River. But when they came where the river opened to the breadth of 400 furlongs, (which is the greatest breadth thereof) and the wind blew very strong off the sea, they were fain again to thrust into a creek, and harbour, which his guides directed him to. But Curtius says, that when upon the third day he came, as he was foretold he should to brackish water, he there found an other Island in the River, where they observed that the ships wear not so fast, as they were wont to do, because the tide met them, and turned back the River upon them.

Whiles they lay there at anchor, and some went a forraging, they fell into a new danger, for there came in upon them a mighty tide (which to this day is usual in Cambay, where this river of Indus emptieth it self into the sea) and overflowed all the Country thereabout, onely the top of some Hillocks, like so many little Isles, appearing above water:

Water:

water : to which leaving their Boats, they for safe-guard betook themselves ; and when the sea was gone out again, and the land left dry, as it was before, then their hips, as it fell out, some fell forward upon their noses, others fiddling, from the side of a bank, where they stuck: and when the next tide came in, those hips which stood upright upon their heels, in the mud, roared presently, with the rising of the water, and had no hurt; but such as lighting on hard ground, when the sea was gone out, were fallen all along; thole, upon the returne of the tide, were there right driven one against the other, or beaten and broken all together upon the shore.

All which being repaired, as the time and place would permit, Alexander fent away two Barques down the river to view the place, which the guides had told him, he much rich as if he would sail out into the Ocean, That Island the natives called Cil-lex, Alexander himself, Sculthinn, and others Philitinn. And when they brought him back word, that the Island was large, and had in it, very commodious ports, and store of fresh water, he commanded the whole navy, to make for that Island, himself with some choice vessels, went further, to discover whether at the mouth of the river, there were no bar, but a safe passage out into the open Ocean ; and having now gone some two hundred furlongs, he espied yet another Island, lying further out in the open Ocean.

Then returned he to the former Island lying in the mouth of the Riber, and coming on shore, at a certain foreland thereof, he there offered sacrifice, to certain gods, such as, I say, Jupiter Ammon commanded me to sacrifice unto. And the next day he sailed to another Island, lying out in the fame Ocean, and there offered other sacrifices, to other gods, and in another form and fashion, than formerly he had done; laying still, that what he did, was by the direction and command of Jupiter Ammon, and he failed quite and quite out of the mouth of the river Indus, into the vast Ocean, and there having sacrificed certain Oxen, on shipboard to Neptune, threw them overboard into the sea: whereunto he addeth also, a drink offering, and having powred that first into the sea, he threw a golden vial, and sundry golden goblets after it, with thanksgiving, into the Ocean; and praying that, whereas he had a purpose to send Nearchus into the gulf of Persia, he might safely there arrive, [Arians lib. 6, pag. 136.]

130. Justin [lib. 12. cap. 10.] reports, that having returned with a faire sde, to the mouth of the River Indus, he there, in memory thereof, built a new City called Barce; and erected certain Altars upon the place, and Curius [lib. 9. cap. 16.] faith, that at midnight, he put forth with a small company of ships, with the first of the Eb, and went quite out of the mouth of the River Indus, four hundred furlongs into the open Ocean; and so, having done there what he intended, and sacrificed to the gods of those seas, and land adjoyning, returned to the reft of his Navy: and Diodorus Siculus, that he went with some of his familiar friends, out into the main Ocean; and lighting up in two little fleets, offered there a magnificent sacrifice to the gods: and that withall, he cast a multitude of golden cups, and of a great price, with drink offerings into the sea: and in the end, having there erected certain altars, in honour of Tethys, and Oceanus, supposing that now he had finished his intended voyage into the East, returned with his navy up the River, and that in his returne, he came to a goodly and famous City, called Hyala, whose government was much alike to, or rather, all one, with that of Lacedæmon.

For there were in it, two Kings of two several families, succeeding always in a line and had the administration of the wars, but the chief ordering of civil affairs, was in the Senate, and supreme council of state.

Alexander returning to the Patala against the stream, found there the Caffie, or Citadel, ready built, according to his directions given; and Pithon returned with his army, having done all that he went about: and whereas he purposed to leave a part of his navy, at Patara, (which city retains the fame name, among the Indians of Cambais, to this very day) where the River Indus severs it felt into two channels, he gave Hephæstion, the charge of making there the ports, and docks fit to receive it.

Mean while he made another journey to the Ocean, by the channel on the left hand of the lame River, to try which of the two channels, was the best, and easiest to pass in a small Boat, and when he had tried both, he returned again : and when he was now almost come to the very outlet of this second channel, he found a certain lough in it, which is made either by this River diffusing it self, into a larger space, or by waters which fall in there, from other parts, and make the River more spacious there, than in other parts; and to look like an arm of the sea : there he left Leonatus with most of his army, and with all his lesser sort of ships; and himself went forward, with his ships of 30 oars a piece, and of two tire of oars : and having gotten quite out of the River on that side aloft, failed again out into the vast Ocean, and found by experience, that that was the more common dious channel of the two, to drive a trade by, to Patala. And then going a shoar with certain Horse, he made three dayes journey along the sea coast, and having considered of the coast all along, where he had failed, he caused wells to be digged in sundry places, for fresh water for his Navy, in case should be, [Arrian, lib. 6. pag. 137.]

The next day after his return out of the Ocean, Curus layes, that he came up the River, to a certain lough of salt water: which put sundry of them to a great inconvenience, whilst they went into it, not knowing the nature of it: for it drew a scab upon them, and the same infectious also unto others; yet they quickly found an oyl, which cured it: which if it were the same lough, which I mentioned before out of Arrianus, then is all this History to be referred to Alexanders latter return from the Ocean, which no author mentions, save only Arrianus.

Alexander at his second return to Patala, sent a part of his army to dig those wells by the sea side: charging them withal, as soon as they had done, to return to Patala: and he sailing again into the lough, made there new Ports, and other Docks for his shipping: and leaving a Garrison there, laid up likewise provision of corn for four months, and other necessaries for the use of navigation, [Arrian, ut sup.] Now it seems, that at this lake it was, that he built the City called Porana: to the end he might have a fit Port for his shipping, in that part of the Ocean: as we gather out of Diodorus, [lib. 3. pag. 181.] in the Greek and Latin edition, compared with Agatharchides, his Experiences in Photius, [Cod. 250. cap. 51.] and with this place in Arrianus, Curius lib. 9. cap. 16. & 17. writes, that Alexander with his army, layed in the Island of Patatene, expecting the coming on of the Spring; and that during that time, he built many cities there, and that the Winter quarter drawing now to an end, he set fire on his ships which were grown unseaworthy, and marched away by land: and [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 721.] signifies, that towards the Summer season, (which atter their account, begins ever with the Spring) he left India: with him I conceive, he would not have laid, had he better considered, of what he himself a little after affirmeth out of Nearchus, who was Ammiral in it, concerning this voyage; where he saith, That when the King was now upon his way, he himself began his voyage in Autumn when the Pleiades or seven Stars began to appear in the evening.

Wherefore plain it is, that Alexander in September, having sent Leonatus before him, to cause wells to be digged in convenient places for the use of the army in their march overland, thorough a dry and thirsty country, and set fire on his ships, which were leaky; removed from Patala, and came with all his army, to the bank of the River Arbis or Arabius: which River parts the Arbites, or the Arabites, (whom Diodorus Periegetes, calls Aribes, and others call Arbite), and with them India it self between the River Indus, and the River Arbis, by the space of a thousand furlongs in length, as Nearchus saith, [in Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 720. and Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 185. in fo.] and these are the utmost people of the Indians westward, as appears out of [Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 184.] and out of [Plin. lib. 7. cap. 2.] and next to the Oritans, as faith [Pliny, lib. 6. cap. 23. and Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 185.] and which speak in a language of their own, and not that of the Indians.

These Arbites or Arabites, being a free State, or people, living under their own laws, neither strong enough to withstand Alexander, nor willing to submit unto him, so soon as they heard of his coming, fled away to the Woods, and Wildernesses.

Alexander, delivering the rest of his army into the hands, took with him one half of his silver Targaretts, and a part of his archers, and some certain Regiments of those who were called Affiers, and a Troup of his fellow Cavaliers; and out of every Regiment of Horse one Troup, and all his archers on horseback, and turned his course on the left hand toward the Ocean; and commanded a multitude of wells to be digged along the sea side, to relieve his Navy with fresh water, as they passed by, on their way to the Gulf of Persia.

No sooner had Alexander his back turned, but the Patatians, taking fresh courage, and desirous of liberty, set upon Nearchus with the army that was left with him, and sent him packing with his Fleet, when he had yet no wind to carry him: as Strabo reports out of Nearchus himself, [lib. 15. pag. 721.] for before the beginning of Winter, which began, together with the setting of the Pleiades in the month of our November, in those parts, was no time fit for Navigation, [Arrian, lib. 6. pag. 137.]

So loon, therefore, as the Crestian, or trade winds, (which blowing all summer long from the sea to land-ward, put a stop upon all navigation in that coast) were ended, Nearchus having sacrificed to Jove the deliverer, and having performed certain Gymic games, let sail from thence, in the eleventh year of Alexanders reign, when Cephidorus was L. Chancellor of Athens, the 20 day of the month Boedromion, or the first of October, according to the Julian Calendar, as I have already shewed in my discourse of the Solar year among the Macedonians, [cap. 2.] out of Arrianus his Indica. Now we meet with the name of this Cephidorus, not only 40 years before this viz. year 3. of the 103 Olympiade, but also 3 years after this; to wit, year 2. of the 114 Olympiade, which was the next year after Alexanders death; as we find in the Rowls or Tables, of the Chancellors of Athens: so that if this name be rightly set down by Arrianus in this place, and there be no scruple to be made of two Cephidori, by reason of the vicinity of the times, then there will fall out in the 4 years of 113 Olympiade, this difference ensuing in the ordering of the Chancellors of Athens, between Diodor, Sic, Dionysii, Halic, and Arrianus, as followeth.

Pliny tells us, that Alexander built a City, at the place; from whence Nearchus and Onecritus set forth upon their intended voyage; and that is the same which we find called, Xulinopolis, [lib. 6. cap. 23.] of which yet it is a wonder, that in the same place he should add, That no man can tell, where, or upon what River it was built: For where should it be, but in the Isle of Patatene, where they were left by Alexander, to attend the season fit to begin their voyage: or upon what River, but upon the Indus, where the Navy rode; and along which that fleet passed, when it fell down into the Ocean, as Arrianus teacheth us, out of Nearchus himself, in his Indica, pag. 183.]

The first day after they set forth from the port of Xulinopolis, to go down the River Indus, they came to a wonderful deep channel, called Sura, distant from the port, one hundred furlongs; and there lay at anchor, two dayes.

The third day, they removed; and came to another channel, 30 furlongs lower; where they found the water a little brackish, for the tide coming up so far, and there mingling with the fresh water, leaves a taint of salt in the place, even at low water: and when the tide is gone out, and that place was called Canaan.

From thence they parted, and came to a place lower upon the river, 20 furlongs, called Coraes.

And then weighing again, they had not gone far, but they kenned a Rock, just at the place where the Indus opens and falls into the sea, and bears upon the shoars, which was it self very rocky: but where it began to be soft ground, and better bedding for ships, there they put in with the tide, and drew a ditch of five furlongs long, before them.

And falling down again, 150 furlongs farther, they came to a sandy Island called Crocala, and stayed there one other day, near to which upon the main land inhabited, an Indian nation, called the Arabii, from the River Arabius, which divides them, as was said before, from the Oritans.

Their journey forward, is at large described by Arrianus out of Nearchus himself, as he witnesseth, [lib. 6. pag. 143.] and after him by Jo. Ramusius, in his Navigations, [vol. 1. fol. 169.] a brief of which voyage, is also delivered by Pliny [lib. 6. cap. 23.] gathered out of Onecritus by King Juba: as those words in him shew right well, where he saith, It is fit I should here set down, what Onecritus delivereth, of this navigation, wherein himself was by the command of Alexander, out of India, into the very mediterranean sea, and out of him again related by King Juba: out of which we may also gather the meaning of those other words of Pliny next following, (i. e.) That voyage of Nearchus and Onecritus, hath neither names of places, where they touched by the way, nor distances from one place to another; to wit, as it is described by Juba, or Onecritus himself, for that both were delivered by Nearchus, appears by Arrianus, who out of him, hath delivered both the one and the other, particularly.

But that we may returne to Alexander, he having put over the river Arbis or Arabius, and having the very night following marched thorough a great part of the sandy Country, came the next morning into good array, took the Horse with himself, cast into several Troups, and Squadrons, in very good order, but so wide spread, that they might take up and drive all the Country before them, and so let upon the Oritans, of which a great part, which took up arms, were slain, and many were taken prisoners, and then coming to a final river side; he there encamped,

Then dividing his company into three brigades, he gave one to Ptolemei, to lead along by the coast; the second to Leonatus, to pass through the middle of the country, and champaign part thereof; and the third he took to himself; and with it marched into the hill country of that region, and mountainous parts thereof, with the places adjoining, and spoiled and wasted all that came in his way, whence the soldiers enriched themselves, and slew many a ten thousand of men withal.

But when Hephæstion, who had the greater part of the whole army under his command, was come up unto him; Alexander went forward to Rambacia, which was the principal division of all that country, where, when he found a place by the sea side, late from all wind and weather, he presently gave order to Hephæstion, to build a city there, which being finished, and called by the name of Alexandria, he made there a plantation of the Aracholians, to dwell therein.

And then again, taking with him one half of his silver Targeters and Agrians, and a Squadron of horse, and Archers on horseback, marched away to the borders of the Oritans and Gedrosians, where he was told there was a narrow passage, which parted the two countreys: and that both nations with their several armies were encamped there, to keep that passage against him: But no sooner came the news unto them of his approach, but the most part of them abandoned the place and fled: whereupon the chief of the Oritans, went unto him, and submitted themselves and their whole country to him: and the only charge which he laid upon them was, to call home their country men, every one to his own place, assuring them, that in so doing, all should be well with them; and they receive no harm.

Then made he Apollonphanes Governor of the Oritans, joyning Leonatus, a Squire of the body with him: with whom he left all his Agrians, and some of his Archers, and Horse, and other companies of his foot, and mercenaries out of Greece, in the country of the Oritans, giving them in charge to attend the coming of the fleet into those parts; and in the mean time to go in hand with the building of a new city, and to order all matters there for the benefit of the people.

Then set he forward with a great part of his army (for now was Hephæstion again come up unto him) and marcht into the country of the Gedrosians, which was for the most part abandoned by the Inhabitants. In which desert, as Aristobolus saies, the Phœnicians which followed the army, to buy what was there to be sold, loaded their camels with mirrh, and spikenard, for of such spicery and Apothecary ware, there was infinite store growing in those parts: so as the whole army used it for coverings, and beds to lie upon: and of the spikenard which they trode under their feet, a most sweet smell diffused it self far off. [Arrian, lib. 6, pag. 138, and Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 721.]

He sent Craterus before him with a part of the army, into the mid-land countreys, both to subdue Arimania (under which name, all the Regions to the west of India, properly so called, even as far as Carmania, go) and so to go from thence forward into those places, which himself purposed to come unto: But Craterus marching through the countreys of the Aracotti, and the Drange, subdued by force the country of Chorina, which refused to submit themselves, [Strabo, ut supra, pag. 721.] And whereas Ozines (whom Arrianus calls Ordones) and Tariatpes two noble men of Persia, endeavour'd a revolt in Persia, he subdued them by force, and laid them in irons, [Curt. 9, c. 18.]

Himself with another part of the army, going through the country of Gedrosia, some 500 furlongs distant from the sea, and yet sometimes quartering near to the sea, he self, marched through a barren, craggy, dry, and desolate country: for his desire was to visit the sea coast, all along, that he might discover, what places there were in those parts fit to make ports of: and there to make provision for his fleet, which was to come that way by his appointment, and for that purpose, to cause wells to be digged, and markers to be kept, and ports to be made, fit to receive them when they came, [Strabo, ut supra, p. 721, and Arrian, lib. 6, p. 139.]

To this purpose, he sent before him one Thoaetes, with a competent company of Horse, to scour about the sea coast; and to see whether there were any place for landing there, or fresh water near the shore; or other fitting provisions for them: who returning brought him word, that he found there certain poor fishermen; and that they had to dwell in, a kind of little cottages, built up and covered over with shells of fishes, and the back-bones of them serving for rafters; and that the men used little water, and that it self, such as they digged out of the sand; and that not very sweet neither.

Alexander, coming at length into a country of the Gedrosians, where was store of corne, he seized it all into his own hand, and sealing up the sacks, wherein it was, with his own signet, and laying it upon carriages, sent it all away to the sea side. But while he went to the next ports, the soldiers, for all the seals, brake up the sacks, and took out the corn, and spent it, for very hunger; in which action, they were the foremost, who were principally trusted with the keeping of it: and Alexander, understanding that what was done, was for pure hunger, winked at it. And sent about all the country over to take up more corn, and sent that away by one Cretheus, to the sea side, to relieve the Fleet, with the army in it, which at that very time came to land in those parts: commanding also the natives, to go farther up into the country, & from thence to bring as much corn ready ground, and dates, and cattle, as possibly they could; and carry it to be sold at the sea side, to the army; and withal, dispatch away Telephus one of his Nobles, to make further provision of corne ready ground, whereof he found some quantity, though not much; and carried it to another Port, according to directions.

Mean while some of the Oritans, dwelling in the mountains set upon Leonatus his Brigade, and slew a great number of them, and then retired into their fastness again: as Diadorus saith: and then the whole nation of the Oritans, joyning with other neighbouring countreys, made a body of some 8000 Foot, and 400 Horse, and made a general revolt. But Leonatus meeting with them, cut off 6 thousand of their Foot, and all their Leaders: and lost of his own men, but 15 Horse, and some few Foot: but withal, there died in that fight, Apollonphanes, Governour, as was said before, appointed by Alexander, of that whole country, [Curt. lib. 9, cap. 18, Arria, lib. 7, pag. 149, and in his India, pag. 184.]

Nearchus coming a float at this place with his Fleet, took in provision of corn, provided by Alexander, to serve his army aboard for ten dayes: repaired his ships, that were any wayes leaky, and left such of his Mariners as he found not fit for sea, with Leonatus to serve at land, and took others in their room, out of his companies, [Arria, in his India, pag. 185.]

Philippus, whom Alexander had made Governour over the Oxydracans and Malians, was set upon by his own mercenary companies, and by them murdered; and the murderers presently were set upon by the Macedons which were of his guard; and either then present, or immediately after, taken and hewed in pieces for their pains.

It is said, that Alexander endured many a hard brunt, and suffered more losses, in the country of the Gedrosians, than in all Asia besides: so that of all that army, which he carried with him into India, he brought scanty a fourth part out of Gedrosia: what with greivous diseases, ill diet, burning heats, deep lands, want of waters, and famine, which he suffered in those parts. But Nearchus saies, that Alexander, though he were not ignorant of the incommunities of this way, yet out of a fellwill'd ambition, which reigned, or rather raged in him, he would needs force his way thorough it forsooth; because some had told him that Semiramis, and Cyrus both, had gone that way into India; and therefore he would needs return the same way out of it: though it was told him withal, that she was faine to save her self by flight from thence, with 20 men only in her company; and Cyrus with seven, thinking it would prove a great glory for him, if, when they suffered so much there, he should be able to come off with his army safe and sound: wherefore partly out of this ambition, partly to favour and relieve his Navy, which he had appointed to meet him in those parts, it was, that Nearchus saies, he would needs return homeward thorough that country. When his guides, missing their way thorough those vast lands, by reason the wind had confounded and covered all the tracks, which lead thorough them; Alexander guessing out of his own mother wit, that the way must needs lie on the left hand, took a small company of Horse with him, and went to see whether he could recover the sea shore or no: but their horses being all spent to five, with the length and toiridness of the way, lay behind, and he with those five only in his company, came at length to the sea side, where digging a while, and finding fresh water to drink, he presently sent back for his whole army to come thither to him: and when they were come, he marched forward seven dayes journey, along the sea coast, and found plenty of fresh water all the way; and then his guides having found the way again, led him up into the midland countreys as he desired, [Strabo, ibid. pag. 722, Arria, pag. 142.]

At two months end therefore, after he parted from the country of the Oritans afore-said, he came to the chief city of the Gedrosians, called Pura, and there he rested his army; and refreshed them with feedings, as was very fitting, and high time for him to do, [Strabo, ut supra, pag. 723, Arria, pag. 140, and 142, and Plut. in Alexan.]

From thence he dispatched away the swiftest couriers that possible he could finde, to Phrataphernes, whom he had left Governour of Parthia, and to the two Presidents of the Provinces of Drangia and Aria, lying at the foot of the mount Taurus, with commands to them, that they should forthwith get together as many Camels, Dromedaries, and others, with all sort of beasts of draught or carriage, as possibly they could, and load them all with victuals, of all sorts, and send them in all haste to meet him at his

his first entry into the country of Carmania; These letters speedily carried, and duly executed on all hands, caused, that when he came into Carmania, he found there all kind of provisions necessary, ready to receive him and his army, at the place appointed.

Menon, the Governor of the Arachosians, being lately dead, Alexander made one Sibyrtius, Governor of Arachofia and Gedrosia, both.

As Alexander was upon his march towards Carmania, news was brought him of the death of Philippos, Governor of the Oxycradians and Mallians: whereupon he presently wrote away to Eudemus and Taxilas, and by his letters, commended the charge and care of those two Provinces unto them, until he should send a Governor to succeed in Philips room.

So soon as he set foot in Carmania, Atafes the Satrape of that province, met him, of whom there was a suspicion that he would have revolted from him, whiles he was in India, Alexander concealing the grudge which thereupon he bare him, received him very graciously, and used him according to his ranke and quality, whiles in the mean time, he sought by all means possible to find out whether the suspicion that was raised of him were true or false.

Here Craterus came unto him, with the rest of the army, and the Elephants, and bringing with him Ordones, Al, Ozines, and Zariaspes, whom he had taken into custody, for having endeavoured a revolt in Persia. And thither came also Stafanor, Governor of the Provinces of Parthia and Hircania; and with them, the Captains and Commanders of all those forces which he had formerly left with Parmenion, in the Province of Media, to wit, Cleander and Sitalces, and Heracon and Agetho, which brought him 5 thousand foot, with a thousand horse.

Now the several Governors and Presidents in the parts of India, sent him in hereafter infinite number of horses and other beasts of draught and carriage, some for pack saddles, and some for panniers, out of every country of his dominions in India, some, Stafanor also, and Phrataphernes, brought him a huge number of draught Horses, and Camels. And Alexander presently distributed them all among those that wanted them to carry their goods upon, some he bestowed upon particular Captains, the rest he distributed among the soldiers, by troops and companies, as he saw cause; He also new armed his soldiers with as much bravery as ever: for why? they now drew near unto Persia, a country full, not onely of peace, but also of all manner of plenty and wealth.

Here Alexander (as Arrianus reports out of Aristobolus) offered a sacrifice of thanksgiving to his gods for his victory over the Indians, and for the safe coming of his army out of Gedrosia: and withal, entertained his armies with sports of musick and wrestling, and such like: and moreover took Penceses, who covered him with his target in the country of the Mallians, to be the chief Squire of his body, an honour, which at that time, even only men had borne; Leonatus, Hephæstion, Lysimachus, Aristonius (all born in Pella) Perdiccas of the country of Macedonia; Ptolomei the son of Lagus, and Pithon, and the 8 was Penceses, for his brave behaviour in saving the King from the Mallians. Others, and among them, Diodore, and Curtius, and Plutarch, say, that Alexander, whether in imitation or emulation of Bacchus, but in a drunken manner, spent seven days with his army, in his passage through Carmania, [Diodor, and Plutarch in the life of Alexander, and in the book of his good fortune; and Curtius, lib. 9. c. 18. lib. 3. ib. c. 24. & lib. 8. c. 19.] which Arrianus therefore holds for very improbable, because that neither Ptolomeus, Aristobolus, nor any other credible Author in this kind, make any mention of it.

Atafes the Governour of Carmania, was put to death, and Tiepolemus made Governor in his room, [Curt. lib. 9. cap. ult. Arria. lib. 6. pag. 142. and again in his Indica, pag. 193.]

Cleander and Sitalces, who slew Parmenion, by Alexanders command, were accused to him for many villanies (which I mentioned before) by them committed both by the Provincials, and also by the army it self: nor could that slaughter by them committed, how acceptable soever it was to the King, expiate in his mind such a multitude of villanies and grosse misbehaviours, as were laid to their charge: wherefore he put them forthwith in chains, to be done to death when he thought fit: but seven hundred private soldiers, whom they had used as executioners of their villanies, he caused there presently to be executed, and at the same time also was execution done upon Ozines and Zariaspes, whom Craterus had brought prisoners, for endeavouring a rebellion in Persia as was laid before.

Mean while Nearchus, having sailed along the coast of the Arabii, the Oritans, the Gedrosians, and the Ichthyophagians (so called because they lived onely upon fish,) arrived in the Gulf of Persia, and came to Harmozia, Al, Armusia (which is now called Ormus, or Ormusa) and there drew up his ships, and went over land with a small retinue tinue to Alexander, who as he heard by a Grecian, which came from the army, was not above five dayes journey off, and found him in a certain sea Town, called Salomutes, busie in making stage-places there, and sitting himself on the open theatre.

Alexander also offered sacrifice there, to Jupiter, by the name of a deliverer, and to Hercules and Apollo, by the name of Apollo, Amelæus, (i. e.) the deliverer from evil, and Neptune for bringing his army safe out of the Ocean. He also made sports and games of Musick, and other Gymnick exercises; and made a pageant, which was led in by Nearchus, all the army setting themselves on work, to get flowers and garlands to strow upon him.

Alexander, having fully heard the relation which he made of his whole voyage, sent him back to the fleet, with a small army to convoy him, because the whole country, which he was to passe, was, as he thought, friend, and would him to saile up as far as the very mouths of the Euphrates, and to be in a readinesse from thence to row up to Babylon, when order should be given.

Tiepolemus was scanty warm in his Satrapie or Government of Carmania, when the natives all rose, and possessed themselves of the principal and strongest places, of that country: these also let upon Nearchus in his return, in sundry places, so that he was often put to it, and forced to fight twice or thrice in a day: yet with much ado, he came at length safe to the sea side, where he sacrificed to Jupiter his deliverer, and made games of dancing, running, wrestling, and the like: then looting from Ormulé, he kept along by the shoare of the Persian gulf; and by such stages, as Arrianus in his India, out of Nearchus himself delivereth, came to the mouth of the River Euphrates.

Alexander, understanding by letters from Porus and Taxiles, that Abilarus was dead, gave his kingdom to his son. He sent away also Eudemus, an Eudemus, who was commander of the Thracians, to succed Philip, slain, as a forelaid, in the government of the Oxycradians and Mallians.

He sent Hephæstion with the greater part of the army, and with the carriages and Elephants, to go out of Carmania into Persia by sea for that the Persian sea in the winter season is always calm, and there was great store of provision in those parts.

Stafanor being sent back to his Government, Alexander himself, with the choicest of his Foot, and with the Horse of his confederates, and a part of his Archers, marched to Pargagadas in Persia, where he gave money among the women, as the fashion of the Persian Kings was, when ever they came into Persia, to give unto every woman there, a piece of gold.

At his very entrance into Persia Orsines, Al, Orsines met him: He it was, who after the death of Phraortes the Governour there, (Alexander, being then a far off in India) by his authority kept the Persians in their due subjection and allegiance to him, till he gave order for another Governour to succeed in the deceaseds room. He was descended from one of the seven Princes of Persia and deduced his pedigree from Cyrus himself, and now came, and met Alexander, and presented not him alone, but all his nobles also, with rich gifts, only he gave nothing to Bagoas the Eunuch, and the Kings barbarichy: which proved afterward the cause of his destruction, [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 27. and lib. 10. cap. 3. Arrianus lib. 6.]

While he was at Pargagadas there came unto him Atropates, the Governour of Media, bringing with him prisoner Baryaxes a Median, who had worn his Turban upright, and called himself king of Medes and Persians; him therefore he brought prisoner to the King, and all those, who had been partakers with him in that action. All which Alexander caused forthwith to be put to death.

But he was most of all offended at that villany committed upon Cyrus, his monument, which he found all broken down and spoiled, and the precious things which he had formerly seen there, all save a lidder, and a golden urn, wherein his body was put, spoiled, and that also was broken, and the covering of the urn taken off, and his very body tumbled out of it by those sacrilegious thieves, and they had also gone about to heave in pieces, and batter the urn or coffin it self, the better to carry it away, by pieces, if it might have been; which because they could not, therefore they left it behind them. But Alexander presently gave order to Aristobolus, to rebuild his sepulchre in such form as it was before, and for those parts of his body which were left, to put them into the urn again, and to make a new cover for it; and to reform what was defaced, and to embellish it in all points, as formerly it was: and moreover, to mure up the dore, which led into the Chappell, where the body lay, with lime and stone, and to put the impression of the Kings seal upon it. All this Strabo reports, out of Aristobolus himself, lib. 5. pag. 173.] And Arrianus, at the end of his 6 book.

After this, Alexander commanded the Magi or Priests, which had the keeping of the Sepulchre, to be taken and had to the rack, to make them confesse the authors of this sacrilege, who yet could never be drawn to confesse any thing, either against themselves, or any other person, and thereupon were discharged: yet Plutarch saies, that Polymachus, though no mean person, and a Pellean borne, was put to death by Alexander, onely for opening and looking into the Sepulchre.

From Palargada, Alexander marcht to Persepolis, the Royal Seat of the Kings of Persia, which he himself had set on fire, and burnt to the very ground; but now at his return thither, he blamed himself for so doing. Here were many foul matters laid to Orxnes his charge: as, That he had spoiled and robbed the Kings houses, and sepulchres of the dead, and done many of the Nobility of Persia to death. But in particular, Bigasas the Eunuch put it into the Kings head, that perhaps it was he, that had robbed the sepulchre of Cyrus too: wherein, said he, I have heard Darius say, there were 3000 talents layed up; and wrought to far with the King, that he forthwith caused the Noblest person of all the Persian Nation, and to him a most affectionate servant, to be crucified.

At the same time also, Phradates, who had formerly been Governour of the Hircanians, and Mardians, and Tapyrians, being now drawn into suspicion of making himself a King, was put to death, [Curt. lib. 8, cap. 8, and lib. 10, cap. 4.]

Alexander now made Penceiles, (of whose worth in all kinds he had had so good proof, especially in that danger of his among the Mallians) Governour of Persia. And he presently, and onely of all the Macedons, put himself into the Median attire, and fell a learning of the Persian tongue: and began withal to order matters all after the Persian garb; for which Alexander much commended him, and the Persians were glad at heart, to see him use the Persian, rather than the Macedon attire.

And now a royl took Alexander again in the head; and he would needs fall down the Euphrates, and Tigris, and see the Persian sea, and how those Rivers fell into the Ocean there, as formerly he had done, at the River Indus, and the sea which that falls into. Also, he had a purpose to sail round the coast of Arabia first, and then of all Africa; and so to return into the Mediterraen Sea, and to Macedon by the way of Hercules his pillars, [Arria, lib. 7.] And being in this mood, he gave order to the Governours of Melopotamia, to fell timber in Lebanon, and to carry it to Thapclus a City in Syria, and to make keeles for huge ships to be built thereon: not all of seven tie high, as Curtius hath it; but some of one size, some of another, as we shall see anon out of Aristobulus, and all to be brought overland to Babylon: and order was given to the Kings of Cyprus to provide, brasse, and towre, and sailors for this Fleet, [Curt. lib. 10, cap. 2.]

Nearchus, and Onesicritus, coming with the Fleet to the mouth of the Euphrates, anchored at Diridosis, which is the chief Mart Town of the whole Province of Babylon; and where the Merchants of Arabia, with their frankincense and spicery, use to discharge; And there hearing that Alexander would go to Sufa, they fell back; and went to the mouth of the River Pafitigris; and rowing up that River, they came to a country well inhabited, and plentifully stored with all provisions; and having rowed 50 furlongs, they there came to an anchor again; attending the return of them whom Nearchus had sent to bring him word where the King was. Mean while Nearchus there again sacrificed to the gods his deliverers, and made Games; so that the whole Sea-army, gave themselves wholly to pastime and merriment, [Arria, in his Indica.].

Calanus an Indian borne, and a Gymnopsist, or of the sect of Philosophers, which went naked in those parts; having now attained the 73 year of his age, and had never in all that time felt ach in his bones, or other sicknesse or distemper in his body; happened now to fall into his first sicknesse at Palargadas; wherefore finding some feeblenesse in his parts, and them to grow weaker every day more than other, when he came to the borders of the territory of Sufa, (for there it was that this fell out, as Diodorus saith; and not in a suburbs of the City of Babylon, as Elian, lib. 5, Varia. Histor. cap. 6, will have it) he petitioned Alexander, that he would cause some of his servants to be made, and that when he was got up upon it, he would cause some of his servants to put fire to it. The King at first endeavoured to dissuade him from his purpose; but when he could not, and the man told him, that if not that, he would die by one other way: Alexander commanded a pile of wood to be dressed as he desired, and bad Prolemei the son of Lagus, to take care for it, [Diodor. lib. 17, Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 686, & 717, & Arria, lib. 7.] But as he was going to the Pile of wood, he saluted and kissed the hands, and bad farewell to all the rest of his friends: but Alexanders hand he would not kisse; saying, that he should meet with him time enough at Babylon, to kisse it there; meaning, that he should die there, [Arria, lib. 7, pag. 160, Plut. in Alex. Cic. lib. 1, De divinat. Faler. Max. lib. 1, cap. 8.]

Now

Now Nearchus tells us, that so soon as the fire was put to the pile of wood, the trumpets sounded, for so Alexander had appointed; and the whole army there present gave a shout, as if they had been ready to joyn in a battle: the Elephants also at the same time made a noise, such as they use when they enter a fight in the field; as if all had conspired to honour the funeral of Calanus, [Arrianus.]

[Chares of Mytilene, addeth further, that Alexander, to honour his funeral, caused a prize of Musicians and Wrestlers to be proclaimed: and that, desirous herein to gratifie the Indian Nation, he made one match of drinking, a thing usual among them; and that he appointed a talent for him that could drink most, and 30 pounds for the second, and ten for the third: and when he had called many of his Nobles and Captains to that feast, he that drank most, was one Promachus, who drank off lower gallons and one pottle, and having received his talent for his prize, lived three days after, and then died; the rest, 35 finding a starke chillineffe coming on them by the surfeit which they took instantly, and six others of them, shortly after, were found dead in their tents, [Athenaeus, lib. 10, cap. 12. Plutarch in Alexander. Elian, Varia. Histor. lib. 2, cap. 42.]

Nearchus, and Onesicritus, with their Navale army; continuing their course up the River Pafitigris came to a bridge newly made, over which Alexander with his army was to passe, to come to Sufa; and there they anchored, [Arria, in his Indica, pag. 197. Plut. lib. 6, cap. 23.] [saith, they found him at Sufa, keeping holiday seven months after he left them at Patala, and in the 3 month after they set sail from thence: or rather in the sixth month, seeing we have already made it appear that they set out from Patalene, the very next month after he parted from them at the City Patala.]

Now when both armies both of land and sea, were come together, Alexander offered sacrifice yet again, for his Navy and Army both, to be preserved, and made playes and games for it: and whereever Nearchus went through the spaces of the camp, every man throwed flowers, and cast garlands on him, [Arria, ut sup.]

Alexander, having sent away Atropates to his Government, marcht to sufa: where when Abulites, who had made no provision at all for his entertainment, onely presented him with 3 thousand talents of silver, he bade him lay it before his horses, and when they would none of it; for what purpose then, said he, is this money? Plutarch saith that Alexander laid Abulites in irons, and struck his son Oxathares, Oxartares through with the javelin: Arrianus saith, that he put both the father and son to death, for their ill behaviour, in their government at Sufa.

Many of the Nations, which he had conquered, came in and complained of their Governours who little dreaming of Alexanders ever returning out of India, committed many and monstrous outrages, both upon the temples of their gods, and upon the sepulchres of the dead, and also upon the persons and fortunes of the subject: all which Alexander commanded to be executed in the view of those who came to complain against them, without all respect of nobility, favour or service, which otherwise they might have done; and now also Cleander and Sitaces, whom he had condemned whilst he was yet in Carmania, he caused to be executed for company, as guilty of the like disorders. Heracon also, who hitherto had escaped scot free, but was now accused by the men of Sufa, for robbing and ransacking their temple, and thereof convicted, suffered according to his delerts. And now Alexander grew ready to hearken to every slight accusation, upon triviall matters, and to punish with death and torment, every small offence, conceiving with himself, that they who acted small matters, intended greater in their minds.

And when the fame of such his severity against his officers in their several places flew abroad, many considering what themselves had done, began to fear what might come thereof: some of which picking up what moneys they had gotten, fled away into unknown parts, others who commanded over mercenary companies, openly revolted from him: whereupon letters were presently dispatched away to all the Governours and Presidents of countreys throughout all Asia, to disband and send away all mercenary companies, [Diodor. per 2. Olymp. 113.]

No sooner then, was this order put in execution; but forthwith many strangers, finding themselves calthered, went straggling over all Asia, and for want of pay, lived upon the spoile of the countrey, till at length they all came into one body, at Tenarus in Laconia: and so likewise all the Commanders and Governours of the Persians which were left, gathering together what men and moneys they could make, came all to Tenarus, and there joyned their forces together, [Id. year 3. Olymp. 113. and year 2. Olymp. 114.]

Alexander now took to wife, Statira, the eldest daughter of Darius, and besides her another, as Aristobulus tells us, called Parysatis, the youngest daughter of Ochus; and gave Drypates the youngest daughter of Darius, and his own wives sister in marriage to

to Hephæstion, to Craterus, he gave Amestris, the daughter of Oxyartes, al. Oxathra, a daughter of Oxathres the brother of Darius. Perdicas married the daughter of Atropates the governour of Media. Nearchus had given him to wife the daughter of Spitamenes the Bactrian; to Ptolemæus the son of Lagos, the squire of his body, and to Eumenes, were given the two daughters of Artabazus, and sisters unto Barina, by whom, though not in lawful wedlock: Alexander himself had a son, called Hercules. Ptolemæus his wife, was called Arracama, al. Apama; but the whom Eumenes married, Artonis: where we must note by the way, that the name of Barine in Arrianus, [lib. 7. pag. 148.] is put for Statira: But in Plutarch, in the beginning of the Life of Eumenes, where he nameth his wife it is, I know not how, crept in for Artonis.

Upon all the rest of his Nobles likewise, Alexander bestowed wives, of the most illustrious families that were of the Medes and Persians, in all to the number of 80, as Arrianus, or 90, as Elian, 92 as Chares, 100 as Plutarch, in his discourse of the Fortune of Alexander affirmeth. Now these marriages of Alexander and his Nobles were all made and solemnized, at one and the self same time; the King bestowing a dowry with every one of them; and for five dayes together, celebrated these marriages, with that pomp and magnificence of feasting, and Mascarades, as is set down by Elian, [lib. 8. cap. 7. Var. Hist. and by Athenæus, Deipnosoph. lib. 12. cap. 18. out of Chares of Mytilene, lib. 10. of his History of Alexander.] To every one of the guests, who amounted in all to the number of nine thousand; it is said, that he gave a golden vial to sacrifice a drink offering withall. To the rest of the Macedons, who had formerly married wives out of Asia, which amounted to above ten thousand men, he gave them every man wedding gifts.

Moreover, he thought it fitting at this time, to pay every one of the souldiers debts out of his own store: and when he had given order that every one should give in a ticket of what he owed, that thereupon they might receive every man his money, at the first very few gave in their tickets, fearing that this was but a device of the Kings to find out who they were, that could not live of their pay, by reason of their riotous expences. But among those, who did give in their names, there was one Antigènes, with one eye, and who had lost the other under Philip, at the siege of Perinthus, with the hurt of a dart from the wall. He feigning himself to be more in debt than indeed he was, brought one to the pay-master; who affirmed to him, that he had lent the said Antigènes so much money: whereupon Antigènes received it. But the King being afterward informed of this abuse of his, grew wroth thereat, and forbade him ever after to come within his court, and took from him an office, which he had; which brand of ignominy, he took to heart, that he thought thereupon to kill himself; which Alexander perceiving, remitted his displeasure, and suffered him to enjoy his money.

But when he heard that many, who were truly in debt, would not yet give in their names, but would keep their own counsel, and would not be know what they ought, he then openly blamed them for being so distrustful of him, saying, that a King should be no other than true to his subjects, nor the subjects have other opinion of their King, but that he would be in all things true unto them. And then he caused tables to be set out in sundry places of the Camp, with monies on them; and whoever brought in his ticket of what he owed, received presently his money, without being asked so much as what his name was, and then they began to believe that Alexander was Alexander, and a man of his word, indeed.

That largesse of his among his souldiers, amounted, as Justin and Arrianus report, to upward of 20 thousand talents, whereas Diodorus more probably saith, that it came to little less than ten thousand, for Curtius and Plutarch say, that of 10 thousand talents brought forth, there were, 130 talent paid, with this leniency over and above of Curtius. So that, saith he, that army, conqueror of so many nations, brought yet more honour and glory, then spoil and riches out of Asia.

Sundry other gifts did Alexander at that time bestow upon several men in the army, either according to degree and quality, or in regard of some memorable services which they had done, and upon those which excelled in this kind, he bestowed over and above Crowns of gold to wear: as first, upon Penteles, who covered him with his Target against the Mallians, and next him upon Leonatus, who at the same time also fought most manfully in his defence, and had upon sundry occasions behaved himself bravely in the country of the Oritans, and thirdly upon Nearchus, who had brought his Navy and army therein safe out of Indie thorough the Ocean into those parts: and in the fourth place Onesicritus, the Pilot of the Kings ships, and then Hephæstion, and other squires of his body.

Mean while, there came unto him the Governours of sundry Cities, which he had built, and divers Provinces, by him subdued, bringing with them to Sufa 30 thousand souldiers out of Persia and other Nations (of which I spake formerly in the year of the World 3676.) all young men, and of an age, goodly persons all, to look on, and of great great performance. These being thus selected by the Kings command, and trained and martialled after the Macedonian manner and discipline in feates of armes, and all gloriously armed, encamped before the walls of Sufa; where when they had given a proof of their readinesse and good adresse in Marthal Discipline before the King, the King highly rewarded them every man, and gave them the name of Epigoni; that is, of an after brood, growing up in their room, who in feates of Chivalry, and Conquering the World, had gone before them.

Alexander, having delivered over the greater part of his land army to Hephæstion, to be led to the coast of the Persian Gulf, and given order to his Navy to come to the country of Sufa; took shipping there with his liver Targeteers and his Phalanx or Main Squadron, and part of his fellow Cavalleers, and fell down by the River Ulay, into the Gulf of Persia. But before he came at it, left many of his ships, which were any ways bilged and leaky, and with the rest went forward and came about from the mouth of that River by sea, to the River Tigris: the rest he sent up the channel or cut, by which the Tigris is drawn into the Ulay, and so they also came into the River it self of Tigris.

Alexander, compassing about all the shoar of the Persian Gulf, which lieth between the two mouths, that of the River Ulay, and that other of Tigris, came to his Camp; where Hephæstion with the army attended his coming. Then returned he again to Opis, a City seated upon the bank of the Tigris; and as he went on, caused all the dams, locks, and sluices, which the Persians had made upon that River, to hinder the access of any enemy by sea to Babylon, to be taken away; saying, That they were but shifts and devices of those, who were of little worth in themselves, [Arrian, lib. 7. with Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 740.]

But loon as he came to Opis, he called all his army together, and declared to them that his purpose was, to discharge all such, as thorough age, or otherwise, found themselves grown unserviceable for the war, and to give them free leave to return every man to his own home: but for such as were able and would stay, he promised to make their condition such, and to bestow such largesse upon them, as should make their eyes ake, that lay idling at home; and should encourage the rest of the Macedons to come and share with them in their fortunes.

This he did with a purpose to gratifie the Macedons: But they took it, as if thereby he went about to disgrace them, and held them for no better than a company of useless men for his wars; and champing upon this bit, called to mind all other grievances, and occasions of discontent by him formerly given them in any kind: as that he went attired in a Median Robe; and that all those goodly marriages that he made, were all solemnized forsooth, after the Persian fashion: that Penteles his Governour of Persia, was turned altogether Persian, both in attire and language, and that Alexander himself delighted, but too much, in these new fangles, and outlandish fashions. That the Bactrians, Sogdians, Aracholans, Zarangians, Arians, Parthians, and those Persian Horfe, which were called Enaces, were mixed with and reckoned among his fellow Cavalleers. That now there was a fifth Brigade of Horfe set up; nor altogether indeed consisting of foregn nations; but yet that encreasing the number of his Horfe, there were taken into them, Cophes the son of Artabazus, Hydaves, and Artoboles the two sons of Mazæus, Icanes the son of Oxyartes, and brother to Roxane, Alexanders wife, Agobares, and his brother Mitrobraus; and that he had made Hydaspes a Bactrian by birth, Commander over that Regiment: and that instead of the Macedonian Spear, they used a Javelin, after the manner of foregn nations. That he had created a new company of young foregners, calling them Epigoni, and armed them after the Macedonian manner. And lastly, that in all things they despised and scorned the Macedonian Discipline and Customs, and the Macedons themselves: wherefore one and all cryed out, and desired to be discharged, and to serve no longer in the wars: bidding him and his father Hammon, go fight hereafter if they would, seeing he grew weary of, and cared no more for his own souldiers, who had hitherto fought for him.

In this combustion, Alexander enraged as he was, leapt off the place, where he stood speaking to them, and with such Captains as were about him, and flew in among them, and took thirteen of the principal murmurers, and which stirred up this sedition among the rest; and delivered them to the Sergeants, to be bound hand and foot and thrown into the Tigris: to great was either the dread of the King upon them in making them take their death so patiently as they did, or the resolution of the King himself, in doing them to death, according to Marthal Discipline: and then attended onely with his Nobles and Squires of his body, he went to his lodging; and there neither eat nor slept, nor suffered any man to have access to his presence all that day, no nor yet the next.

Upon the third day, he called his foregn souldiers together, commanding the Maced-

Macedons, not to bugle out of their Tents; and when they came, he spake to them by an interpreter, and commanded their perpetual loyalty to himself, and to their former Kings, and withal reckoned up, and put them in mind of the many favours and honours, which he had conferred upon them, how he had never used them as conquered persons, but as fellow soldiers and partakers, of all his conquests, and had mingled the conquered with the conquerors, by mutual affinities & enermarryings, the one with the other: Wherefore, saith he, reckon not your clothes, as made, but born, my soldiers: The kingdoms of Asia and Europe are become all one; what was newly before, is now grown natural by long use and custom, and you are no less my country men, then you are my soldiers. And presently he chose out of them a thousand tall young men, and appointed them for a guard of his person, the chief commands of the army, he bestowed among the Persians, and called the several Troups and Companies, by Macedonian names, and these he also called his Cousins and Nobles, and gave them only the privilege, to be admitted to kiss his hand, [see Polyanius Strateg. 4. in Alexander nm 7.]

When the Macedons saw the King come abroad guarded onely with Persians, and that out of them, all Serjeants, and other attendants were taken, and they promoted to all places of dignity and honour, about his person, and themselves cast off, with scorn and infamy; their courage abated, and conferring a while among themselves, ran all together to the Kings lodging, and calling off all their cloths to their very wait-coats, threw down their armets at the Court gates; and standing themselves without, lift up a pitiful cry, and desired to be admitted, offering to give up every author of that mutiny, and desired the King to satiate himself with their deaths, rather than their disgraces. But he, though his choler were down, yet would not admit them: and they on the contrary would not away, but continued their crying and howling two whole dayes and nights, and calling upon him, by the name of their Lord and master, protesting never to leave his gate, until he had mercy on them: wherefore upon the third day he came forth unto them, and seeing their humiliation, and dejection before him, with their forlorn sorrow, and hearing their pitiful complaint and lamentation which they made, was moved to compassion of them; and wept a long time over them: and when he stood a good while, as if he would speak unto them, but could not; and they continued all that time upon their knees before him.

Then one Callines by name, a man venerable for his age, and of no mean esteem in the regiment of his fellow Cavaleers, spake thus unto him. This is that, saith he, O King, which grieves thy Macedons, that now thou hast made some of the Persians, thy Cousins, and these thou hast received to kiss thy hand, and hast deprived thy Macedons of this honour, and when he would have proceeded, Alexander interrupted him, and said, I now make you all my Cousins, and from henceforward, will call you by that name. This said, Callines slept out, and wept and kissed his hand, and so did as many else, as had a mind to it, and then taking every man up his arms again, they all returned with joy and triumph into the Camp.

Then went the King and sacrificed to the gods, as he was wont to do, and made a general feast for all the army; sitting down himself, first with his Macedons, and then the Persians, and after them the rest, according to their several ranks and qualities in the Army. Then took Alexander a bowl, and drank, and so it went round among the Macedons. The Grecian Prophets, and Persian Priests; pouring forth their prayers, and among all other prophecies, and favours from their gods, desired of them, to grant a concord and unity of Empire between the Macedons and Persians, and both Kingdoms. It is said, that there were nine thousand guests, which late at this feast, and that they all pledged this health, and sang the same Pæana, or Song of joy and gladness unto Apollo, as they used to do, when they returned from a victory into their Camp.

Alexander, passing over the Tigris, encamped in a country, called Cares, and then having passed the region called Sitacene in four dayes march, he came to Sambana; where he camped seven dayes: and then after three dayes journey, he arrived at Celozæ, where Xerxes heretofore had made a plantation, of those, which he brought out of Bœotia, and then turning a little out of the right way, leading to Babylon, he went to see Bagisthenes, a country, abounding with fruit, and all other commodities, belonging either to the pleasure or profit of mans life.

Mean while, Harpalus a Macedon born, chief Baron and Treasurer, of all the Kings monies in Babylon, and revenues of that whole province, being privy to himself of his wastfulness, and other ill behaviour there, and knowing what Alexander had done, to many other Governors, upon complaints made of them, by the provincials, got together five thousand talents of silver, and six thousand hired soldiers, and fled quite out of all Asia, and coming with them to Tarnarus in Laconia, left them there: (Whither, others also, which could not well stay in Asia, had already retired themselves, as I said said before) and came himself to Athens, in suppliant wife: But when Antipater and Olympias demanded him out of their hands, he dealt with the people of Athens, by seeing Demosthenes, and other Orators there, that he escaped, and returned safe to his company at Tenarus. [Diodor. year 2. Olymp. 113. Pausanias in his Antica, Plutarch in the Lives of Demosthenes and Phocion.] In Arrianus there is a blank left, [lib. 7. pag. 155.] in which place this flight of Harpalus from Babylon, should have been joynted to that journey of Alexanders thitherward, [as appears by Photius in his Bibliotheca, cap. 91.] and that there was an action brought against this Harpalus, mei d'uros, (i. e.) of bribes received by him, Dionysius Halicarnassæus, in the end of his Epistle to Ammeus concerning Demosthenes, when Amicles was L. Chancellor at Athens, which was, as I said before, in this 4 year of the 113 Olympiade, according to his account, plainly sheweth.

A contention falling between Hephæstion and Eumenes, concerning a certain gift, whatever it was, and wherein many foul words passed between them, Alexander composed the difference and made them friends, much against Hephæstions will, and not without some threatening speeches used by Alexander to him; but much to the content of Eumenes, [Plut. in Eumenes. Arrian. 7. p. 155.]

Alexander from hence came into a country, where great herds of the kings of Persias horses fed, for in this place, called the Mæan Country, there were wont to be kept 150 or 160 thousand horses of the kings, though Alexander at his coming thither found not, as Arrianus saith, above fifty thousand, and at most sixty, as Diodorus hath it.

When Alexander had encamped here 30 dayes, he set forward again, and upon the 7 day after, came to Ecbatane, the chief city of all Media: the circumference whereof was [said to be] 50 furlongs, where, as his manner was, after any good success, he offered sacrifices, and made games of musick, and gymnastic sports, and exercises in honour of his gods; and feasted himself with his nobles; and then having ordered all matters in that kind, he returned again to see his stage-players, and Anticks at their parts, and moreover, instituted certain set feasts and clubbings, because there were newly come unto him out of Greece, 3 thousand Cooks, and other ministers, and artificers of that kind.

Apollodorus of Amphipolis, a noble man about Alexander, and whom he had made General of that army, which he had left with Mazæus, when he made him Governour of the City and province of Babylon, hearing what course he took with such Governor or chief officers as he had set over the several regions of his dominion, took a fright, as his fellow Harpalus had done before him, and having a brother called Pythagora, who was a kind of a toothpayer, consulted him by his letters, to know what was like to become of him: And Pythagoras by his letters bade again to him, desired to know for fear of whom it was that he would have his fortune told? and he answered, it was for fear of Alexander and Hephæstion: whereupon he first looked into the entrails of a beast for Hephæstion, and when he found that the liver of it had no fillets, he wrote back again to his brother from Babylon to Ecbatane, and bade him never fear Hephæstion, for that he should shortly depart this life himself: which letter, Aristobolus reports, was written the very day before Hephæstion died. [Arrian. l. 7. with Apollon, toward the end of his second book De Bell. Civ.]

For Hephæstion being overmuch given to wine, fell thereby into a fever: and being a young man and a soldier, would keep no diet, which was prescribed him, but whilst his Philition Glaucius, al. Glaucias, was a little away, fell to his dinner as at other times, and eating of a roasted dunghill cock, & taking a huge draught of frigidated wine after it, fell himself presently not well, and upon the seventh day after, died of it.

Upon the same day there were certain game games, exercised before the King, by the boys, or pages of the Court, from which he suddenly arose, and went to see Hephæstion, but when he came, found him dead, whereupon he restrained all eating for 3 dayes space; nor took any care of himself; but lay all that while, either fully or slently, or impatiently lamenting the losse of his Hephæstion: Afterward he changed his attire, and caused not only himself and his soldiers, but even very horses and mules, to be all shorn: and caused the pinnacles of Ecbatane, and all other cities and towns thereabouts, to be taken down from their walls, to the end that they looking in a worse, and more deformed fashion than they did before, might seem in a sort, to lament and bewail his death; and withal crucified his poor Python that could not resist: & commanded there should no sound of pipe or flute be heard in all the camp, gave order for a general mourning among all Nations to be made for him. [Diodorus, year 3. Olymp. 113. Plut. in his Alex. and Pelopidæ. Arrian. l. 7. and upon Epistemon, l. a. c. 22. Elzan Var. Hist. l. 7. c. 8.]

He gave his body to Perdicas, to be carried to Babylon; for that there he intended to be flow bestow on him a most magnificent funeral, and had often speech with the principal architects about him, of making a most sumptuous monument for him, especially, with Statificrates, who made profession of new and rare inventions, in devising and erecting vast and exccesse buildings.

Now Eumenes, fearing left Alexander might conceive that he was glad of Hephæstion's death, put him on the more upon this project, and suggested to him new devices, as pertaining much to the honour of Hephæstion, devoting both himself and his armes to Hephæstion, and sundry other of the Nobles, following Eumenes his example, did the like. [Ptoemarch in the Life of Eumenes, and Arrianus lb. 7.]

And moreover, whereas Hephæſtion was Colonel of the Regiment of the Kings fellow Cavaleers, he put none to ſucceed him in that place, left happily the name of Hephæſtion ſhould be forgotten among them, but cauſed that Regiment to go by the name of Hephæſtions Regiment. And the Cornet which he gave to be born ſtill before them, when ever they went to fight.

At last, to put himself out of this melancholly fit, he would needs go and make a needless war, and parting his army with Polomei, made a hunting of men, and to drive the country as he would drive a forest for wild beasts; and fell upon the Colossians, people bordering upon the Uxians, and inhabiting the mountainous parts of Media: which all the Persian Monarchic could never bring under their subjection; nor were in all these wars ever daunted in courage, or thought the Macedons such bugbears, as to be afraid of them. But he first took the palls leading thorough the mountains into their country, and waited their borders: and going further on, routed them in sundry conflicts, and destroyed them wherever he came without mercy, and called that, Hephæstions funeral feast. Now as well Nearchus, as Arrianus, tell us, that he thus set upon these Colossians in the depth of Winter, when they little dream of any enemy to come upon them. [Sirrabo, lib. 11, pag. 524. Arria, lib. 7, pag. 157.
 and in his Indica, pag. 196. See also Polyæn, Sirrab, lib. 4, in Alexan, m. 38.]

The Coffians, seeing they had evn the worst of it, and grieved to see what multitudes of them were taken prisoners, were fain at length to redeem their fellows lives, with their own slavery; and giving themselves up wholly to Alexanders will and pleasure, had peace granted them, upon these terms, That they should be obedient in all things, to the King, and do whatever he commanded. So Alexander having subdued all that nation within 40 dayes space, and built sundry Cities upon the most difficult passages of the country, returned with his army.

Alexander sent one Heraclides, with certain Shipwrights into Hircania, to fell timber there, for the building of ships, all men of War, some with decks some without, after the Grecian manner; for he had a great desire to be acquainted also with the Caspian sea, and to know to whom it belonged.

When he had passed with his army over the Tigris, then marched he strait forward to Babylon; yet lo as he made divers encampings by the way, and rested his army in sundry places to refresh them; and when he removed at any time, made eafie marches. And now he was come within 300 furlongs of Babylon, when the Chaldean Priests, and Prophets, lent unto him, by one of their own company, called Beliphantes, advising him by no means to come to Babylon; for that if he did, it would prove fatal to him.

Alexander, when he had understood by Nearchus, (for himself durst not have speech with Bellephantes) what these Chaldeans errand was, he sent many of his Nobles thither; but himself turned aside from it, and would not go into it, but encamped some 200 furlongs off from it, at a place called Burfa, which perhaps is the same which Ptolemy calls Berita. A City long since destroyed and there stayed.

There was he perfwaded by Anaxarchus, and other Grecians, and their philosophical reasons, not to regard thole predictions of the Priests and Magicians, but rather to reject and despise them, as vain and false. Whereupon he brake out with thar famous Verse of Euripides,

Μάντις δ' ἀρίστος, ὅστις καὶ Ζηναλῶς: (i. e.)
Who best can guess, he the best Prophet is.

Then the Chaldees desired him, that if he would needs enter that City, yet at least he would not enter by his face toward the West: but take the pains to go about, and come into it, being toward the East. And Aristobolus tells us, that he was content to hearken to them in that point; and therefore the first day he marched as far as to the River Euphrates: but the next day, having the River on his right hand, he marched along the bank thereof, as desirous to passe by that part of the City which looked toward the West, that so he might come in looking toward the East: but when

when he found that way slabby, and full of slowes and fens, and cumberfome for his army to paffe, he neglected that very point of their counsel allo, and entered it, with his face toward the West, [See Appian, toward the end of his second book, De Bello Civili, and Senece, Sua[re]. 4.]

When he came to the walls of the City, he lookt and beheld a flock of Crows, fighting and killing one another : whereof some fell down dead hard by him. And when Apollodorus told him, that he had a brother in that City called Pythagoras, who was verie in the skill of footplayng, by looking into the bowels of beasts offered in sacrifice, and that he had already consulted the gods that way concerning him, he forthwith lent for him, and asked him what he found concerning him : Sir, said he, I found the liver of the beast without fringes or fillets : without fringes? (quoth Alexander) what means that? The meaning, Sir, is, quoth Pythagoras, that some great mischief hangs over your head : or as Appian, that you shall shortly die ; for which so far was it off, that Alexander, grew offended with him, that from thence forward, he made the more of him ; becaule of his free and clear dealing with him in the way of his profession : And thus much Aristobolus relates, that he learnt from Pythagoras himself.

When the Babylonians had entertained his army in all courteous manner, as at his former being there, they did, all betook themselves to ease and luxury, for that there was no want of any thing that the heart of man could wish in that place, [Diodor.]

While Alexander resided at Babylon, there came in Ambassadors to him from all the parts and nations of the world; for besides those that came out of Asia, from Cities, and Princes and Countries there, there came also sundry others, out of Europe and Affric: out of Affric, from the Ethiopians dwelling about the Temple of Hammon, and from the Carthaginians, and other Punic nations, bordering all along the sea coast, as far as Hercules his pillars, and the western sea, out of Europe, from the several Cities of Greece, and out of Macedon it self, as also from the Thracians, Illyrians, Scythians, and out of Italy, from the Brutians, Lucanians, and Hetrurians, with the Islands of Sicily, and Sardinia, and from Spain and France, whose very names and habits the Macedons never knew nor had heard of before.

the Alexander, calling for a lift of them, appointed, which of them should have audience first, and to forward, till he should have heard them all; and he relolved to give audience first of all to such as came about any matter concerning religion: and in the second place, to such as came to him with pretens, in the third, to them, who came about differences, or wars, which they had with their neighbouring nations. In the fourth, to them which came about their particular and private interests. And in the last place, those, who came to these caule, why they did not refore any Grecians, whom they had banished out of their cities or countries, to their homes and estates again; for the hearing of all which, he cauled a throne of gold to be set up in the garden there, and seats for his nobles, all born up with feet or frames of silver; whereon taking his place with his Nobles, he purposed to give them audience, as Athenaeus [lib. 12. cap. 18.] reports out of one Epilpinus Olynthus: wherein his chief purpose and care was, upon hearing of the caule, to give such answers, as might give all content, and send every man away satisfied and well pleased therewith.

The first which he gave audience to, were they, which came from the City Elis; then to those, which came from the Temple and City of Ammon, from Delphos, from Corinth, Epidaurus and others, hearing of every of them in order, according to the dignity and fame of the Temples, rather than of the cities from whence they came.

When he had heard the Ambassadors from Epidaurus, and granted their suit, he sent recover a preſent and oblation by them to their God Eſculapius; but with theſe words, That Eſculapius had dealt too unſparingly with him, in taking lately away from him, a friend, whom he loved as his own life: and then look what Statues lovelye of illuſtrious perſons, or Images of the gods, or any other conſecrated thing Xerxes had heretofore taken and brought out of Greece, and ſet them up, or otherwiſe beſtowed them in Babylon, Suſa, Palargada, or elſewhere in all Aſia; thoſe he gave order to the Ambassadors of Greece, to take and carry them home again with them, and among the reſt, he now cauſed the brazen ſtatues of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, to be returned to Athens, with the Image of Diana Cerceſa.

But as concerning the restitution of the banditotes of Greece, he sent this short Epistle, by Nicanor, a native of the city Sargis, to be read and proclaimed, at the next Olympian games to be held, in this way, βασιλεῦς Ἀλεξάνδρῳ καὶ, &c. (i.) King Alexander, to the Banditotes of Greece, lengthy greeting. We were not in fault that you were banished, but we will take care, to see you restored to your former estates, all save such as are banished for outrageous crimes, of which things we have written to Antipater, requiring him to proceed by way of force, against all such as shall oppose your restitution, [Diod. lib. 17. year 2. Olymp. 113. and lib. 18. year 2. Olymp. 114.]

Having dispatched this matter of Embassies, he let himself to take care of Hephæstion's funeral, commanding the Cities thereabout to contribute what they possibly could, to the adornment thereof. And moreover sent an expresse command to all the Cities and nations of Asia to put out the fire, which among the Persians, is called Hely fire, till the exequies of this Funeral were fully finished, as was wont to be done, in the Funerals of the Kings of Persia: which was taken for an ill bode to the king himself, and as a portender of his death.

Whereupon all his chief Commanders and Nobles, for themselves, for the Kings pleasure, to make Medailes, or Portraitsures of Hephæstion, graven in Ivory, or cast in gold, or other costly metal: Himself called together the most exquisite workmen, that were to be had, and a great number of them, and brake down the wall of Babylon, ten furlongs long; and took the brick of it, and first levelling the place, built thereon a four square pile, each square taking up a furlong in length, and 130 cubits high, whereon the body was to be burnt. This work of his Diodorus describeth at large, summing up the particulars, of the cost of this sumptuous Funeral; because the Mourners, the Souldiers, Ambassadors, and Natives of the Country, strowe a view, who should give most toward the charge thereof, amounting in all to above 12 thousand talents: which very summe, Justin also hath, [lib. 12. cap. 12.] Though Plutarch and Arrianus, have but 10 thousand.

Alexander, throwing his armes first into the fire, threw in also gold and silver to be burned with him; with a Robe, of a great value and esteem among the Persians, [Eliæ. Var. Histor. lib. 7. cap. 8.] and besides he made Gymnick Games, and of music, far beyond all that ever he had made before; both for number of the Prizes, and value of the Prizes themselves, to those, which won them; for it is said, that there were no less than three thousand, which put in for the Prizes in all kinds, [Arrian. lib. 7.]

And then also it so fell out, that Philip, one of the Kings Nobles, returned to him from the Temple of Hammon, whither he had been sent, and brought word from the Oracle there, that Hephæstion might well be sacrificed to, as to a demy god: whereat Alexander was infinitely glad; and first of all offered to him upon that title: and then sacrificing to the number of 10 thousand beasts of all kinds, he made a Magnificent Feast to all the multitude, [Diod. year 1. Olymp. 114. compared with Arrian. lib. 7. pag. 157. 164.] He gave in charge also to Cleomenes the Governour of Egypt (as we have noted formerly in the year of the World 3671. A.) a Jewd man, to erect Temples to his name; and generally no contract in writing to be good or valid, if Hephæstion's name were not subscribed to it: adding this also in the letter which he wrote unto him about this matter: Ἐγὼ γὰρ νῦν ἀναστὰς ὑμῶν τῷ ὀνόματι, &c. (i. e.) For if I shall find that thou shalt have duly erected Temples to Hephæstion in Egypt as to a demy god; I will not only pardon thee all thy past offences which in thy government thou hast committed; but whatever thou shalt hereafter commit in any kind, shall never be laid to thy charge by me. Whereupon many Cities presently fell in hand with building of Temples and Chapels to Hephæstion, erecting altars, offering sacrifices, and enjoying Holidays, to be kept in his name: and the most religious oath that a man could make, was if he swore by Hephæstion, it is true or false: And death it was for any man to fault or fail in his devotion unto him: many dreames were said to have been of him, and that his ghost appeared to many; and of words which his ghost should utter, and answers which it made.

To conclude, sacrifices were offered to him, as to a tutelar god, and a Revenger of all evil. Wherefore Alexander at the very first was wonderfully pleased with such phancies in other men; but after a while, he began to believe them himself; and spared not to brag and boast, that he was not only himself Joves son, but also that he could make gods of other men. At which time also, one Agathocles a Samian borne, and one of Alexanders prime Captains, was in extreme danger of his life, for being accused, that passing by Hephæstion's Tomb, he was seen to weep; and had undoubtedly died for it, had not Perdicas holpen him out by a lye of his own making, &c. (swore it too) by Hephæstion himself, that Hephæstion appeared to him as he was a hunting, and told him, that Agathocles, did weep for him indeed, but not as for one that was dead, and now vainly called upon, and worshipped as a god; but wept only in a due remembrance of the former intimacy and familiarity that was between them two: but for which tale, Agathocles a great Souldier, and ever well deserving of the King, had without peradventure lost his life, for being to kind to his deceased friend, [Lucian. in his book ὑπερὶ διακρίσεως: (i. e.) of false accusing.]

The 114. Olympiade was celebrated at Elis, in which year all agree, that Alexander died: as [Josephus says, lib. 1. cont. Apio.] when Hægeias, al. Hegesias, was L. Chancellor at Athens: as [Diodor. lib. 17. says,] and Arrianus in [his 7 book] of the Gifts

Gifts of Alexander, confirms, to wit, toward the end of his year of Chancelorship: and in this very Olympic year, as that chitones appear by the month wherein he died.

In that general assembly of all Greece, at the Olympic games, was that letter of Alexander, for the restoring of all bandages, or on lawer persons, to their homes as cities again, read openly by him whole office: it was to proclaim him that had won the prize in any kind of those games: nevertheless, the Athenians and Eleans protested against it, [Diodorus, year 2. Olymp. 113. Justin, lib. 13. c. 5.]

Whiles he was at Babylon, he received, as Antiochus reports, his fleet, which partly went out of the Euphrates, into the Persian sea, under the command of Nearchus; and partly had been built in Phœnicia and Cyprus: of the Phœnician ships, there were two, each of them of five tire of Oars, and three, of four tire, of three tire high, twelve: and 30 vessels, of 30 Oars a peece: all which had been taken in pieces, and carried overland to the city Thaplast, and there put together again, and came by the Euphrates unto Babylon, Alexander caused certain ships also to be built at Babylon, of those Cypresse trees which he found in their gardens there, for as for other timber fit for shipping, there was none to be found in those parts. And moreover there was brought unto him, lying at Babylon, all other provisions for shipping, out of Phœnicia, and other cities, lying along the sea coasts in Asia, and wrights, and mariners of all sorts, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 741. Arrian. lib. 7. pag. 162. out of Aristobulus.]

Moreover Alexander caused a Port to be made among the Babilonians, big enough to receive a thousand sail of ships of war, adding galleries and docks thereto, and sent Micallus a Clazomenian born, with 500 talents into Phœnicia and Syria, to perfwade or hire as many seamen as possibly he could, to come and serve him: for he had a purpose to make several pantacons upon the Persian gulf, assuring them that those would be as rich to dwell in, as any places in Phœnicia were, [Arrianus, ibid.]

All which preparation by sea, was to set upon the Arabians, under this colour, that among all other nations, they only had never sent any Embassadors unto him; nor shewed any duty or respect unto him: whereas indeed, it was out of an immoderate desire he had to be sovereign over all alike, and whereas he had heard that they worshipped two gods only, Jove or Heavens, and Bacchus, he thought himself not unworthy to be worshipped as a third God among them; if he could overcome them, and restore to them, as he had done to the Indians, their pristline liberty, [Strabo and Arrian, sup.]

And whereas he had heard say that Arabia, lying upon the sea coast, was of as large an extent as all India, and had many Islands lying upon their coast, he sent Archias, and Androthenes, to wit, that Androthenes of Thalus, (of whom Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 766. and Theophrastus, lib. 2. of Plants, cap. 7. maketh mention,) and Hieron of Solos, with three ships of 30 Oars apiece from Babylon, with charge, that failing round about that Cherlonie, or the Peninsula of Arabia, they should discover and inform themselves of the ports of all the region: of these, Archias brought him word, that there were two Islands which lay out in the sea, at the mouth of the river Euphrates, the one a lesser, consecrated to Diana, one hundred and twenty furlongs off from the land (which Alexander, as Aristobulus saith, caused to be called Icarus: the other a greater once a day, and a nights sail off from the shore, in the same latitude, called Tylos: But Hieron, which went further than any of the rest, brought him word that the Cherlonie was of a vast extent, and had a foreland which ran far out into the Ocean: which they also who came with Nearchus by sea, out of India, declared to be not far off, before they stood in for the mouth of the Euphrates, [Arrianus, lib. 7. and in the end also of his Indica.]

Whiles his ships of war were in building, and the haven a digging in Babylon, Alexander himself fell down the Euphrates to the mouth of the river Pallacopa: distant from Babylon, some 800 furlongs, where rowing up and down, and as Aristobulus saith, steering sometimes his own boat himself, he espied some certain ditches, which he caused to be scoured by such as were in his company; damming up the mouths of some, and opening others of them: And clysing one dike among the rests, in the Arabian side, toward the fenny and moory places thereof, having an outlet, hard to be stooped up, by reason of the rottenness of the soile, he opened a new mouth, 30 furlongs off from the other, in somewhat a more firme and hard ground, and forced the water court that way: He saw there also many monuments of old Assyrian Kings and Princes, which lay buried in that fenny Country, and midst of those loughs, [Strabo, lib. 16. p. 741. Arrian, sup.]

And failing through those loughs into the body of Arabia, he there built a city, and a wall about it, planting there a colony of mercenary Greeks, and volunteers, and such as through age or otherwise, were grown unserviceable for the war, [Arrian, ibid.]

And now he began to laugh and scoff at the Chaldeans, and their predictions, for that he had both entered Babylon, and was come safe out of it, with his fleet; and therefore sailed the more boldly thorough those loughs of Arabia, having Babylon still on his left hand, [Id. ibid. Appian, toward the end, lib. 2. D: Bell. Civil.]

And when at last a part of his army wandered up and down in those parts, they knew not whether, for want of a Pilot, he sent them one, which brought them into the tight chaps again: then there arose a mighty wind, which severed the ship where it was himself, from the rest of the fleet, and hurled the Kings hood or bonnet from his head into the water: but his Turbant or Diadem, which was fastned to it, was rent from it, and driven by the wind upon a great reed, which grew up close to a sepulchre, of one of the Kings, which there lay buried, as I said before; which one of the mariners spying, (wam unto it, and took it up, and in his return for fear of wetting it, clapt it upon his own head, Aristobolus saith that the mariner which did it, was a Phœnician born, and that he was well scoured for presuming to put the Kings Diadem or Turbant upon his head: yet Alexander upon this accident, consulted a wizard about it, and was by him advised to offer a magnificent sacrifice to the gods, and to be very diligent and devout therein, [Diodor. see Appian, in his Syriacæ, pag. 124. in the Greek and Latin edition.]

When it was told Alexander, that the Athenians and Erolians would not obey his edict, concerning the restoring of their banditoe, he presently gave order for a thousand tall men of war to be built, with which he purposed to make a war in the west, and to begin it with the destruction of Athens it self, which yet never took effect, [Justin lib. 13. cap. 5. see Curtius lib. 10. cap. 4.]

3681. Alexander returning to Babylon, he gave himself over to ease and company keeping; so addicted to gluttony and drunkenness, that in the Diaries kept by Eumenes Cardianus, and Diodorus Erythræus, it is often found, such and such a day or night, Alexander was carried drunk to bed, Athens, lib. 10, cap. 11, with Philinus in Plut. lib. Symph. cap. 6, one example whereof, Eliau, lib. 3, Var. Histor. lib. 23, reciteth out of the said Eumenes, which I thought good here to insert, to the end it may appear, that some use may be made of my treatise of the Macedonian year, comparing therewith, the days of our Julian Calendar, mending thirst that place in Elian, where it is written Διό, without all fence, and making it mensis Sept. nomine, (1, c.) of the month called Dios, as thus: On the fifth of the month Dios; (our Septemb. 28,) he drank drunks, at Eumenes his house; 1. nor did any thing all that day, but rise and give order to his Captains, whither they should march to morrow, and telling, he would be going very early. And upon the seventh day (our Septemb. 30,) he dined with Perdicas, and there he fell to drinking again: and on the eighth, (our Octob. 1,) he slept all day, and upon the 15 of the same month (our Octob. 8,) he felt a drinking again, and the day following (our Octob. 9,) he slept it out all day according to his wonted fashion. Upon the 24, (our Octob. 17,) he lapped at Bagas his lodging, which was 10. furlongs off from the Kings palace, and then upon the third (or rather the fifth) he slept it out again.

Alexander, seeing Babylon to excel, both in greatness, and all other things, purposed to embellish it all that might be, and to make it the place of his residence, for ever after [Stra. lib. 5, s. pag. 731.] and resolved to rebuild the Temple of Belus, and raise it out of its old dust; and as some say, to make it more magnificent than ever it was before: and when in his absence the Babylonians went on more flowly in the work than he would have had them, he sent his army to take up a great deal of labour and much time, therefore he was not able to go thorough with it, as he desired, for he was taken forth by death [Id. lib. 6, pag. 738. with Arrianus lib. 6, pag. 159.]

Alexander dreamt, that Cassander killed him, whereas he had never seen the man in all his life; and shortly after, when he happened to see him; he called to mind his dream, with a great deal of horror at the first: but then again understanding that he was a son of Antipater, he cast off all such fear of any hurt from him, especially of poison, which yet was at that time ready prepared for him, merrily uttering certain Greek verse, purporting, that so many dreams, so many lies, or to that effect.

When Cassander saw the outlandish people prostrating themselves, when they came unto him, having never seen the like done before, he fell a whickering; whereas Alexander grew into such a cholour, that wrapping both his hands in his long hair, he beat his head against the wall. [Plut. in Alexand.]

As there went a report that Antipater had sent a poison by Cassander to deliver it to his brother Iolus Cup-bearing to the King, and by him infused into the last draught that he ever took, so was it said also, that at the same time, Alexander had sent Craterus with a company of old soldiers to make away Antipater. [Chr. lib. 10. cap. ult.] Concerning the poison, of which Alexander is said to have died, see Andræus Schottus, and his collections thereupon made out of sundry authors, in the Comparison which he makes of the lives of Aristotle and Demofthene, [to the first year of the 114 Olympiad, under Alexander the Great, upon Currius, lib. 10, cap. 7.] As for Craterus and his old foul-ter sent away with him into Macedonia, together Jullian, and Arian, and Plurarch, report this passage, as of a thing done before the death of Hephæstion; yet that it ought to be referred to this time, and not to that, appears, as by many other arguments, especially by this; for that at the time of Alexander's death, Craterus with his old named foul-ter was not come into Macedonia, but was still in Cilicia,

Those that would the Macedons, which found themselves disabled thorough age, or other impotency of body to follow the war any longer, were dismissed by Alexander, to return into their own country : and the number of them at this time, camas Asdrub. lib. 7. year 2. Olymp. a. 13. says to 10 thousand; or as [Justin. lib. 12. cap. 12.] to 11 thousand: to every of which, he not only gave their full pay for the time past, but also money in their purses, to carry them home withal : And if any of them had children, begotten of wives which they had married out of Asia, he willed them to be left with him, fearing least that mungrell kind might happily in time stir up some rebellion in Macedon, in contending with the wives and children which were left there : and promised that when they were grown up, and trained in Marhal Discipline after the Macedonian manner, they should have them again lent home unto them. Justin faith, that such as returned, had their full pay continued to them, as before, during their life, Ptoirarch, that the children of the deceased, succeeded in their fathers pay : adding further, that Alexander wrote to Antipater, that they which returned, should have the prime places assigned them in the Theaters, and should there sit with Garlands upon their heads ; and that at their parting, they all wept, and so did the King himself.

Together with these, were diffused also, fundry of the Nobility, upon the same occasions, as Clytus, Gorgias, Polydamas, Adamas, Antigene, and the principal of all Craterus, who was assigned as a Captain to conduct them, as a man of all others most loyal, and most dear unto the King, and next unto him Polyperchon; least if Craterus should happen to die by the way, as he was at that time but weak and sickly, they should want a noble Commander to conduct them. Then commanded he Craterus to take the charge of Macedon, Thrace, Theffaly, and of the liberty of Greece, in Antipater's room, lending for Antipater to repair to him; and to bring with him an army of young lusty Macedons, in lieu of thefe old ones which he had sent home unto him.

Craterus, when he was sent to carry home certain old decayed soldiers into Cilicia, he received some instructions and commands from Alexander in writing, the chief heads whereof, Diodorus Siculus, out of the Kings own Commentaries relate to be these, That he should cause a thousand tall ships somewhat bigger than the ordinary sort, of 3 iure of oars, to be built in Phoenicia, Syria, Cilicia, and Cyprus for his wars against the Carthaginians, and others bordering upon the sea coasts of Africa and Spain, and Islands adjoining as far as Sicily: To take order, that his way along the sea coast of Africa, as far as Hercules his Pillars, might be ready for him; to lay out 1500 talents, upon six magnificent Temples to be built: And that he should make Ports in several places fit to receive a great Fleet. That he should transplant new cities out of Europe into Asia, and likewise out of Asia into Europe, to inhabit such new countries as he should build in either of them, to the end that by inter-marriages and mutual affinities, he might establish a peace and concord between the two main Continents of the World. These were his then designs, of which Lucan speaks in this manner: (lib. 10.)

— Oceano classes inferre paravat : (i. e.)

His purpose was th' Atlantic Seato fail;
Nor fire, nor water, nor the Lybian land,
Nor Ammons Syrts could bound his vast desires,
He would into the Western Climate have gone,
Where the Sun stoops to fall in Tethis lap;
And to have marcht quite round about the Poles
And drunk Nile's water, where it first doth rise,
Had not death met him, and his journey stayd,
Nothing but nature could a period bring,
To the vast projects of this mad-cap King.

A little before his death, came Ambassadors to him out of Greece, to acknowledge him for a god, and they wearing Crowns themselves, set all Crowns of gold upon his head.

And Pancestes, returning out of Persia, with about 20 thousand Persians, brought also a great company of Cossians, and Tapurians along with them to Babylon for his service, because these nations bordering upon Persia, were reckoned the most warlike of any other. To him also came Philoxenus, bringing an army out of Caria, and Menander with another out of Lydia, and Menidas with an army of Horfe: Alexander commended the forwardness of the Persian nation, and especially Pencetes for his just discreet government among them, and ranked both them, and also those which came from the sea side with Philoxenus and Menander, with his Macedon Squadrons. Also he caused his navy to be often exercised; and whereas there were often sea fights made in the river of Euphrates, between the Tirmenes, and the Quadrimenes, (i.e.) between the ships of three, and those of four of tire of oars, upon the River Euphrate, and as well the Marineres, as the Commanders in them laboured hard to outdoe their adverse party, he ever bestowed Crowns, and honoured them that did best therein.

When upon a time, as he was bestowing those companies which came with Philoxenus and Menander, among his Macedon Squadrons, he happened to be a thirft; as Arrianus reports out of Aristobulus, and went a little aside, from the throne whereon he sat, and some also of his Nobles which sat on either hand of his throne, left their seats also and attended him, it fell out, that a certain mean party, (some say one that was committed to custody, but without reason upon him) came through the middle of all the bed-chamber-men, and other Officers, which stood thick about the throne, and fath himself down upon the Kings feet: and when the Bed-chamber-men, durst not pull him out, because there was a Persian law to the contrary, they rent every man his cloaths, and beat their faces, and thump their breasts, as at a thing exceeding ominous to the King; which when Alexander heard, he caused the fellow to be had presently to the rack, to know whether he had done it upon any designe or compact with others or no, and for what purpose: But when he answered that what he had done was only out of a light humor, and toy which came in his heart, the wildards told him that it was by so much the worse fault; and Diodorus faith, that by their advice, the poor fellow was presently killed for his labour; to the end, that if there were any ill luck in it, it might all fall upon his own head: The same also, faith Plutarch, adding, that upon the rack, being asked who he was, answered that his name was Dionysius, a Macedonian born, with some other answers which he made them.

Some few dayes after, when the King had sacrificed to his gods, in thanksgiving for his good successes; and had added thereto something more than ordinary by the advice of the Priests or Wildards, he fell a feasting with his Nobles; and late up at it, till late in the night: he also distributed beafts for sacrifices among the souldiers, and gave wine among them to be drunk. And when he was now breaking up, and going away one Medius a Thessalian, had prepared a banquet, and invited him and all his company to it; at the banquet there fate twenty guests; to every of which, Alexander drank a severall health, and they the like to him again, as Athenæus reports out of certain memorials, commonly attributed to Nicobulus, [lib. 10. cap. 11. & lib. 12. cap. 18.]

Now when Alexander had called for a cup, containing two gallons and an odd quart, as Epihiippus Olynthius, in a book which he wrote of the deaths and burials of Alexander and Hephæstion, reported by Athenæus, [lib. 10. cap. 11.] and commanded Proteas a Macedon, to pledge him; Proteas cried, let come, and having in many words spoken much honour of the King, took the cup, and drank it off with such a grace, that all the table commended him highly for it: a while after, Proteas called for the same cup again, and drank it off to the King; and Alexander took and pledged him a great draught, but could not drink it off, but let the cup fall out of his hand, and lay along upon the cushions, and presently fell sick and dyed, and this was that Herculean fatal cup to Alexander, of which besides Diodore, and Plutarch, Seneca also in his 83 Epistles maketh mention; with which we may compare also, what Athenæus faith, [l. 11. c. 17. and Macrobius, l. 5. Saturnal. c. 21.]

Aristobulus faith, that when he grew light headed with his fever, and withal very thirft, he called for a draught of wine, and that cast him into a phrensie; and upon the 30 day of the month Dæsius, that is, upon the 24 of our May, departed. Others say that he dyed upon the 6 day of the month Thargelion, which the Athenians, as Elian hath it, [lib. 2. Var. Hist. cap. 29.] which answers to our 18 of May: In the Daries or Day books, kept of the Kings actions, it is said that he died the 28 of the month Dæsius, or 22 of our May: wherefore sure it is, that dye he did in the month Dæsius, according to the Macedon account, and in the month of May with us: though upon what day of the month, Authors do not agree.

Out of the said Diaries, what things fell out in the time of his sickness, Arrianus and Plutarch do very particularly declare, but who was the true author of those Daries, or daily remembrances of what he did or said, neither of them tells us; whether Eumenes Cardianus, or Diódorus Erythreus, or else Strattis Olynthius: for he also wrote a Diary of his actions in four books, and one particular book of his death, as Suidas teacheth us: But whose soever Diaries they were, forasmuch as we can have nothing more plainly or more assuredly delivered, than what we find in them, therefore have I thought it good here to set down what I find in Plutarch, delivered out of them, comparing all along, the dayes of the Macedonian Dæsius and our month of May, together, out of my own discourse of the Macedonian year.

Οὐκ ἔστιν ἀδύνατον Λαοῖς πιστεῖν, &c. (i.e.) the eighteenth day of the month Dæsius (May 12.) he slept in a bath for his fever. The next day (May 13.) having washed, he went to his chamber, and spent that day there at dice with Medius, then washing again, toward the evening, and having been at his devotions, he ate his supper somewhat greedily, and the night following had a sore fit of a fever. Upon the 20 day (May 14.) having washed, he offered sacrifice very solemnly again, and lying along in a bath, he heard Nearchus while he related to him such things as had happened in his voyage; and what wonders he had seen in the Ocean, (αἰ δὲ πύλας θύοντες) (i.e.) (our May 15.) when he awoke the like, his fever increased upon him. The day after (May 16.) his fever grew very sharp upon him, and he was carried to lie in a Chamber near the great pool, or swimming place, where he had speech with his Commanders, of putting approved men in places of office, when they happened to fall void, ἡ δὲ πύλας θύοντες (i.e.) upon the 24. (May 18.) finding his sickness to increase upon him, he offered sacrifice, to which he was carried, and commanded the chief Commanders and Captains which were then in Court, to stay with him; but the Centurions and Corporals, to attend without and watch. Being carried into the innermost lodgings of the Court, (αἰ δὲ πύλας θύοντες) Upon the 25 day (May 19.) he had a little ease, but his fever left him not. But when the Captains came to him, he spake not at all unto them, οὐκ ἔστιν ἀδύνατον, and likewise upon the 26, (May 20.) whereupon the Macedons, thinking that he had been dead, came flocking with a great noise to the Chamber door, and threatened the Nobles which were there, if they would not let them in. The door hereupon being set open, every common souldier passed by his bed side. The same day, Thibon and Seleucus, who were sent to Serapis his temple, to know whether Alexander should be removed thither or no, brought answer back from the Oracle, that he should stay where he was, μέγα σῆμα (σὺν τῷ) πρὸς δὲ τῷ αὐτῷ, (i.e.) Upon the twenty eighth day, (May 22.) in the evening he died.

Now whereas I said, that the Macedons all passed by the Kings bed side, it is to be understood, that they came in at one door, and went out at another, [Lucian in Ψευδομ.] And albeit he was grown weak and faint with the violence of his sickness, yet he raised himself upon his elbow, and gave every one of them his hand to kiss as he passed by, [Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 1.] and which is more, and may seem incredible in itself, look in what posture he put himself, at their first coming in, in the same he continued, till every man to the very last, of all that army, had kissed his hand, [Chr. lib. 10. c. 7.]

When the souldiers were gone, he then turned him to his Nobles, and demanded of them, whether they thought they should find them a King like to himself or no? and when no man answered him to that question: then again he said, that as he could not tell that himself, so that one thing he foresaw, and could foretell, how much Macedon blood would be shed, before this controversy should receive an end, and with what vast slaughter, and effusion of blood, they would solemnise his funeral, and sacrifice to his ghost, when he was gone; and to gave order for his body to be carried to the Temple of Ammon, and there buried, [Justin l. 12. c. 15.] And when his Nobles asked him to whom he would leave his kingdom, his answer was, fortissimo, (i.e.) to the strongest, and withall, took off his signet, and gave it to Perdicas: whereby they all conceived, that his meaning was, to commend the government of his kingdom to his care and trust, till his children should come to age, [Emil. Probus in Eumene.] And again, when Perdicas asked him, when he would have Divine Honours performed to him? his answer was, When they were all grown happy.

Eratosthenes in his Canons, (mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus lib. 1. Strom. laith) that 12 years passed between the death of Philip, and the change, (i.e.) the deceale of Alexander, which is the very number given him, [lib. 1. Maccab. cap. 1. 8. and in both the Chronicles of the Jews, as also in Irenæus, lib. cont. Judæos, cap. 8. in Porphyrie, cited by Euseb. pag. 124. in Scaliger's Greek edition of him. In Rufinus, In Josephus, his Antiquities, lib. 12. cap. 2. in Orosius, lib. 2. in Irenæus and Theodoret upon Daniel cap. 11.] though A. Gellius, [lib. 17. cap. 21.] giveth him but 11 years, Julius Africanus, and out of him Eusebius, 12 years and six months, [Diod. Sic.] 12 years and seven months, Livie, and after him Emil. Probus in Eumene allow him 13 years.

Not is there any little difference among Authors, concerning the years of his life, than there is of his reign. Whereof Cicero in his fifth Philippic speaking, faith, What shall I speak of Alexander the Macedon, when he set himself upon great achievements from his very youth, was he not taken off by death in the 33 year of his age, which is less by ten years, than then with us a man can by law, be made a Consul. Justin [in the last chap. of his 12 book,] saith that he died at the age of 33 years and one month: yet [Philostrophus, lib. 2, de Vit. Sophist. in Herodes, Eul. in Chron. and in his first book, de Vita Constanti, and Jerome, upon c. 8, and c. 11, upon Daniel,] and sundry other writers following Eusebius, [in Chron.] allow him to have lived no more than 32 years: All which are nevertheless to be reduced to that rule delivered by Arrianus, [lib. 7, pag. 167.] ἔβη δὲ οὗ ἑξακοσμίαν, &c. (i.e.) He lived 32 years, and took up 8 months of the 33 year: as Aristobolus saith; But he reigned twelve years, and his 8 months over.

Immediately upon Alexanders decease, there arose such a difference and dispute between the Hord and Foot Companies of the army, for the settling of the present State of things, that they were ready to fall all in pieces, and to take up arms about it. Yet by the advice of the Nobles and Commanders, it was at length accorded, that the Supreme authority, or rather a bare name and shadow thereof, should be committed to Arideus, brother to Alexander, and son to his father Philip, begotten upon one Philina of Larissa, a common dancer; as [Athenaeus, lib. 13, cap. 13,] reports out of one Ptolemaeus, son of Agelarchus, in his History of Philopater, and a whore to boot, [as Justin, lib. 13, cap. 2, and Plutarch in the end of his Alexan.] say. And having by common consent proclaimed him King, they called him by the name of Philip; to whom also was joyed, the son that Roxane then went withal, for he was eight months gone with child, begotten by Alexander, as Justin in the place aforesaid hath it, or fix, as Curtius, [lib. 10, cap. 10,] saies. As for his son Hercules, who then lived at Pergamus, because he was gotten upon Basine, who was never married to Alexander; therefore was there no regard had of him in this settlement of the kingdom. And because Arideus himself was but a weak spirited man, nor thorough any natural infirmity of his own, as Plutarch noteth in the end of the life of Alexander; but by such flatteries, and drugs as Olympias had procured to be given him, therefore was Perdicas, to whom Alexander delivered his Signet at the hour of his death, made Regni Protector, (i.e.) Lord Protector, or Steward, and in effect absolute King it self. The charge of the army, and of all affairs, was committed to Meleager, the son of Neoptolemus, with or under Perdicas. The command of the Horse, which was the most Honourable charge in all the army, and which after Hephastions death was given to Perdicas, was now assigned to Seleucus, the son of Antiochus, yet withour under Perdicas, as the other was. The oversight also of the kingdom and treasure thereof, was committed to Craterus his trust, [Diod. in the beginning of his 18 book, Justin, lib. 13, cap. 1, 2, 3, 4, Curt. lib. 10, cap. 10, 11, 12, Plutarch, in Eumene & Alexan. Dextippus and Arrian, in their books; written of what passed after the death of Alexander, in Phot. Biblioth. cod. 82, & 92, Appian, in his Syriac, pag. 120, 124.]

Centurius in his discourse, De die natali, notes, that the years of Philip, are to be reckoned from the death of Alexander, taking always the rise therein from the first day of that month, which with the Egyptians is called Thoth. For the Egyptian Altronomers applying this computation of times for more exact reckoning sake, to their own account, make the head thereof to be the first day of Thoth, in the beginning of the 425. year of Nabonassar; to wit, upon the 12 of November, according to the Julian account, 4390, in the seventh month before the true time of Alexanders death. And from the beginning of that month Thoth it is, that Ptolemy in his Manual Canons of Altronomy (not yet published) deducteth the Epochs or risings of all the Stars, of which he in his Preface Ad Syrus, saith, Συναρτάριον αἰώνιον, &c. Here are fixed the Epochs, or heads of all accounts, according to the Meridian of Alexandria, which is in Egypt, from the first day of the Egyptian month Thoth, of the first year of Philip, who succeeded Alexander, the Founder of this City. Not of Philip the father of Alexander, (as some have imagined) but of Philip, brother and next successor unto Alexander; whom the Alexandrians for Honour sake, call, as indeed he was, their Founder: adding, ἄναξ ἀρχηγός, &c. (i.e.) For from the first day of his (meaning Philipus Arideus) reign, the times of the Annual Canons of Ptolemy, (who in them followeth the common account, or Calendar of the Egyptians) being taken, and according to the rectifying of the Egyptian year (reduced to the Alexandrian account, which Theon also used in his Canon) are reckoned; as we find also, in the Greek Collections published by Scaliger, in his Eusebian Fragments, [pag. 48.] Whence it is also, that in the Epistle to Apollonphanes (falsely attributed to Dionysius Areopagita: found in Hilduinus, in his Areopagica) these Altronomical Tables are called, The Canon of Philipus Arideus.

And now had the dead body of Alexander lain seven dayes, as Justin saies, (for Elian saies 30.) Ver. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 64,] upon his Throne, whiles all mens thoughts were taken about the settling of the present State, and could not heed, what belonged to the solemn Obsequies belonging to the deceased: and yet was there not in all that time found any purification, or the least discolouring of the flesh upon his body: but the very vigor of his countenance, which is the proper effect of the spirit that is in a man, man, continued still the same; wherefore the Chaldeans and Egyptians, were commanded from thence forward to take care of the body; and they when they came about it, durst not at first approach to touch him, as if he had been still living: but anon after, gaying their prayers, that it might be so to him unto them being but mortals to lay their hands upon: so divine a body, they fell to work, and dislected him: and the golden Throne wherein he lay, was stuffed all with Spices, and hung about with Pennants and Banners, and other emblems of his high State and Fortune, [Curt. lib. 10, in f.]

The care of his funeral, and providing a chariot to carry the body into the Temple of Ammon, was committed to Arideus, whether the King, as Justin hath it, [lib. 13, cap. 4,] and Dextippus, as we find in Scaligers Greek fragments of Eusebius, [pag. 84,] or rather to some other Arideus, of whom we shall see more anon, out of Diodorus, year 2, Olymp. 114,] in which provision making, he spent two whole years, [Diod. year 3, Olymp. 114,] and Olympias seeing him lie so long unburied, in great grief of heart, cried out, and uttered these words: O my son (said he) thou that wouldst needs be counted among the gods, and keptst such a do about it, canst not now have that which every poor man hath, a little earth and burial, Elian, Varia. Hektor, lib. 13, c. 320.]

Mean while Silygambes the mother of Darius, hearing of his death, sunk under the burthen of her sorrow for it; and covering her self with mourning attire, with her niece and nephew, Drypetis and Oxathres, came and fell at her knees, the look away from them, and would neither eat nor see the light any more, and to the fifth day after, dyed of hunger, [Diod. 17, in f. Curt. lib. 10, cap. 8.]

Roxane being great with child, and seeing her self therefore, courted by the Macedonian army, grew into emulation with Statira, eldest daughter to Darius, and one of Alexanders wives, as her self was: and by her letters invited and requested her to come unto her: but as soon as she came, she caused both her and her sister Drypetis Hephastions Relict, to be murdered; and threw both their carcases into a well, and cast earth upon them: not without the privy and assistance of Perdicas, as Plut. [in the end of the life of Alexander,] saies.

Roxane was a while after, delivered of a son, whom they named Alexander: and the common soldiers proclaimed him King, [Arrian, in Biblioth. Phot., ca. 92,] with Paulianus in his Attica, and Dextippus, in Scaligers Greek fragments of Eusebius, [pag. 48.]

Perdicas gave order for the purification or cleansing of the whole army by a solemn sacrifice, because of the death of the King, and great dillention taken among them thereupon. Now the Macedonian manner of cleansing the army was this: They cut a dogg in two: and laid the one half on the one side, and the other, on the other of the field, where the army was to come, and to make them passe solemnly, and as it were, in procession between them: Now as the army passed, Perdicas caused some 300 soldiers, which followed Meleager, when in the first assembly of the Macedons, after the decease of Alexander, he arose, and in a mutinous manner left them, and threw them among the Elephants, to be trod in pieces by them: all which he did in the open field of the army, and in the presence of Arideus himself, whom (nothing differing from a very Innocent) Meleager had caused to be, as it were, wrapt in purple clouds like a child, and put into the Royal Throne, as Plutarch [lib. 2, de fortuna Alexandri,] saith. And Meleager for the present, because no violence was offered to his own person, fired not: but presently after, seeing his life was sought, fled to a Sanctuary, and there was taken and slain; [Justin, lib. 13, cap. 4, Curt. lib. 10, cap. 12, Arrianus in Photius.]

D. odorus [lib. 2, year 4, Olymp. 118.] affirmeth that Alexander made his last Will and Testament, and left it to be kept at Rhodes; and Ammian, [Marcellinus, lib. 23,] seems to say, that therein his will was, to leave all in the hands and power of one man: as Q. Curtius, some, saith he, have been of opinion, that a distribution of the Provinces was made by Alexander, in his last Will and Testament: but we have found, that that was but an idle report, though delivered by sundry Authors, [lib. 10, c. 13.] Nevertheless, the Author of the first book of Machabees, seemeth to follow that first opinion, as delivered and believed by so many Authors, as it was; and saith that Alexander in his own life time, parted his kingdom among his most illustrious and noble officers. And the Chronologer of Alexandria (out of whom, those barbarous and broken Latin fragments published by Scaliger, pag. 58, and 59, are taken) affirmeth, that, that division of the Provinces, which Justin [lib. 13, cap. 4, Curtius lib. 10, cap. 13, Arrianus in Photi Biblioth., ca. 92, Dextippus lib. ca. 82,] and other writers report to have been made by Perdicas, was none other than that which was compiled in that will: which, as may be gathered out of them all, comparing one with another, was in this manner.

In Europe all Thrace, with the Cherfonele and other nations bordering upon Thracia as far as Salmydessus, a city standing upon the Euxine Sea, was committed to Lytimachus, the son of Agathocles, a Pelican born: but that Region which lay beyond Thrace, Thrace, belonging to the Illyrians, Triballi, and Agrians, and Macedonia it self, and Epirot, stretching as far as the Ceraunian mountains, with all Greece, was assigned to Antipater, and Craterus: and so much for Europe.

In Africa, all Egypt, and what ever else Alexander had gotten, in Cirenica, or Lybia, with all that part of Arabia which borders upon Egypt, was allotted to Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, who, as Paulanias in his Attica says, was by the Rhodians, honoured with the surname of Σωτήρ, (i. e.) a Deliverer. The truth is, that the Macedons ever held Ptolemy for a base son of Philip, Alexander's father: for his mother Astinoe, being great with child by Philip, was by him put off, and married to a poor fellow of Macedonia, called Lagos: whereupon it was, that when after a while, (as Plutarch in a discourse of his, De ira cobibenda: (i. e.) of suppressing a man's choler, faith, Ptolemy to put a jeer upon a poor school-master, would needs ask him, who was Pelus his father: he asked him again, and I pray Sir, said he, who was Lagos his father? intimating thereby the baseness of his birth by the fathers side, [See Curium, lib. 9. cap. 2. Paulanias in his Attica, pag. 5. in the Greek edition of him at Exeter, and Suidas in the word Lagos.]

But, to return to where we left, Cleomenes, who was left by Alexander, to gather up the tributes and other incomes of those parts, was commanded to deliver over that Province unto him, and to hold his office, as under him: and because Ptolemy presently upon the death of Alexander entered upon that Province, and died not till full 40 years after; thence it is that Lucian, in Mausolus: (i. e.) in his discourse of long-lived men) add in the fragments of Eusebius, published by Scaliger, [pag. 49. and Porphyrus, ibid, pag. 225. and Clemens Alexan. Stromat. 1. and Euseb. in Chron. and Epiphanius in his books of weights and measures:] and others say, that he reigned 40 years in Egypt, after whom his posterity down to Cleopatra, held that kingdom, under the title and name, and common notion, of Ptolemies.

In the lesser Asia, all Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, and all the Regions lying upon the Euxine Sea, as far as Trapezus, a Colony of the Sinoepens, which Alexander, being taken up with the more weighty war against Darius, had not leisure to subdue as he went, were assigned to Eumenes Cardianus; with a charge to make war upon Ariarathes, who only ever stood out against Alexander. As for Antigonus, he was made Governour of Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycania, and Phrygia the Great. The lesser Phrygia, which lies upon the Hellespont, was committed to Leonatus. The government of Lydia, not only of the inland country, but also along the sea coast, taking in Eolia and Ionia, was given to Mæander; who had it formerly by grant from Alexander himself, [as Arrianus, lib. 3. pag. 56. faith,] for whom, the name of Meleager, is mis-put by Diodorus. Caria was given to Cassander the son of Antipater, and Cilicia, and Iauria, to Philotas.

In the upper and greater Asia, all Syria, and Phœnicia, was committed to Laomedon a Mitylenian borne. The petty Kings of the Isle of Cyprus, for a while held every man his State, as they had it granted to them respectively by Alexander. Neoptolemus was set over Armenia, Artabanes over Mesopotamia, Archon over the Province of Babylonia; Atropates, father in law to Perdiccas, was left Governour of Media by Alexander himself. In this passage making, [Justin lib. 3. cap. 4. and Orosius lib. 3. cap. 23.] say that Atropates was made Governour of Media the greater, and Perdiccas his father in law, of the lesser; not remembering that Atropates, and Perdiccas his father in law were all one man. But having afterward better considered of the matter, in a second distribution made by Antipater in Tripardolis, he acknowledged that Media was assigned to Piton, [lib. 15. pag. 660.] Nor is it likely, that the son in law would any way diminish the authority of his father. The Rule and Government of the hither Bactria and Sogdiana, was put into the hands of Philipus: yet so, as that Orpatus was joined with him in the Sarrapie of Sogdiana, who yet, as Dexippus faith, when he had received that kingdom of Alexander's bounty, was put from it again for treason: But in the Government of Persia, Pencestes of Hircania, and Parthia, (for they went together, as Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 514. witnesseth) was Phrataphernes, in Carmania, Tlepolemus, in the further Bactria and Parapamitus, Oxartes, or Oxathres, the father of Roxane, Alexander's wife, in Aria and Drangiana, bordering upon Taurus, Stasanor of Solos, in the Province of Sufa, Scynus, in Atacholia and Gedrosia, S-byrtius, as they were there placed by Alexander, so were they now suffered to continue in them. All the coast of India from Paropamitus, and from the place where the Acetines and Indus meet, down to the very Ocean, was committed to the charge of Piton the son of Agenor, as that of the Oxycardians and Mallians to Eudemus, id, Eudemus, Commander of the Thracian companies: and the rest of India, to King Pours, and Taxiles, and to the son of Abilarus, who, as appears by what hath been said before, were all placed in those charges, by Alexander himself in his life time.

When

When, upon this division fo made, everyman had his share, as it were allotted him from heaven, they hence took occasion to encrease their power, at their pleasure for the most part: for not long after, as if they had not had governments, but kingdoms given them, so they bare themselves not as Deputies, but as absolute and loving Kings and did not only acquire great matters to themselves, but also left the fame to their posterities after them, [Justin lib. 13. cap. 4.] and so that vast Empire and name of the Macedons, immediately upon the death of Alexander, came to be rent and torn into several kingdoms; [Livy lib. 45.] yet no man took upon him the title of a King, so long as any of his children, survived, so respective were they of him, that though they had every of them the power of a King in his hand, yet they willingly refrained the title, so long as he had a lawful heir of his body living, to succeed him, [Justin lib. 15. cap. 2.] All which was long before foretold by the Holy Ghost, [Daniel 11. 4.]

Concerning the instructions given by Alexander to Craterus, Perdiccas referred the consideration of them, to the general assembly of the Macedons; which though they could not mislike, yet because they were exceeding high, and difficult beyond measure, to be brought to passe, therefore they ordered by a general consent, that none of them should be gone in hand withall, [Diodorus year 2. Olympiade 114.]

The old Greek souldiers, which Alexander had left and planted in garrisons and colonies in the upper Asia, and several provinces thereof, being toucht with a desire of returning home, and seeing their native Country the rather for that they saw themselves, as it were ejected and cast out into a far remote corner of the World, joynd in an association, and revolted from the Macedonian state, chusing for a head of this conspiracy, one Philo an Eolian borne; and now they were gotten to the number of 20 thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse together, all old tried and expert souldiers. Against these, Perdiccas dispatched away Piton, who had been one of the squires of the body to Alexander, and a man of a high spirit, and long versed in the mystrie of war, with three thousand Macedon Foot, and eight hundred Horse, drawn out by lot, with letters and instructions to the governours in all those parts, to furnish him with 10 thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse more. Now Piton purposed to win unto him by all fair means possible, those old Grecians, that to joyning them with such other forces as he had of his own, he might be the better able to set up for himself, and reduce all those upper provinces under his own subjection: which Perdiccas perceiving, to crosse his purpose therein, gave him expresse order; that having overcome those Rebels, he should put them every man to the sword, and divide the Spoil of them among his souldiers. But Piton, having by intelligence, with one Lipodorus, who commanded a brigade of three thousand men among the Rebels, gotten the victory of them, went no further, but upon capitulation, licensed them to repair every man to his own home: which notwithstanding the rest of the Macedons, remembering the order given them by Perdiccas, fell upon them, and slew every man of them, and shamed what they had among themselves. So Piton, failing of his ends, returned with his Macedons to Perdiccas, [Diod. ibid, Prolog. Trogii, lib. 13.]

As for Ptolemy, he, having quietly gotten into the possession of Egypt, demeaned himself fairly in all things toward the people of the land; and possesting himself there of eight thousand talents, got an army together, of such as would serve for pay, (sundry others also, for pure love, seeing his fair and impartial distribution of justice in a right place, came into him. And being duly informed that Perdiccas had a purpose, to wrest Egypt out of his hand, he leagued himself firmly with Antipater, [Diod. ut, sup.] and by good turns and gratifications, obliged the neighbouring Kings and Princes to his devotion, [Justin lib. 13. cap. 16.] and finding that Cleomenes, whom Perdiccas had put to him for a Lieutenant, was no better than a spie upon him, cut his throat, and placed strong garrisons of his own, over all the land of Egypt, [Pausan. in Attic, pag. 5. in the Greek and Latin edition.]

Leonatus and Antigonus, were commanded to put Ermenes by strong hand into the possession of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia. But Antigonus, out of the haughtiness of his spirit, and presuming of himself, refused to obey Perdiccas his command herein. But Leonatus, coming with his army down out of the upper provinces, promised Eumenes to undertake the service for him. Nevertheless, when Hecataeus, Tyrant of the Cardians, coming to Leonatus, advised him rather for the present to go and aide Antipater, and relieve the Macedons, which were besieged in Lamia; he relolved forthwith to crosse the sea, and to put over into Macedonia; and moved Eumenes himself, to go along with him, and to make an end with Hecataeus. But when Eumenes would not, and alledged withall, that he stood in some fear of Antipater, Leonatus belived him, and kept nothing from him, of all that was in his heart: yet finding that he could not draw him over to his party, went about privily to murder him, and had done it, had not Eumenes, perceiving his purpose, got him privily out of his quarters, for he stole away by night, with his carriages, having only 300 Horse in his company, and 200 of his guard; and five thousand talents in gold, after the rate of silver. And so coming to Perdiccas, disclosed all Leonatus his counsels to him; whereupon Perdiccas took him in for a bold friend, and (wrote him of the Council, [Plut. and Emil. Pro. in Eumenes.])

Leonatus, coming to help Antipater, was there slain in a fight by the Grecians, [Diodorus year 2. Olymp. 214. Justin, lib. 23. cap. 5. Plutarch in Phocion, Arrianus in Phocion.]

Thimbro, having caught Harpalus in Crete by a slight (which Harpalus had, as I shewed before, fled thither out of Asia, and carried all the Kings money with him) slew him, and got into his own hands all that treasure & with his army and fleet, left Cydonia, a city in Crete, and with 6,000 (as Diodorus hath it) 7 thousand men, sailed to the country of Cyrene, being invited thither by the banditti of the Cyrenians, and the Barcenles, [Diodorus & Arrianus, ut supra. Strabo, lib. 17. cap. 837.]

There, in a fight against the Cyrenians, Thimbro made a great slaughter of them, and took many prisoners; then seizing of their Port, and ready to take the City it self; he drew them to a composition, upon these terms, That they should pay him down five thousand talents ready money, and deliver into his hand, half their chariots: ready furnished for a service: He sent Embassadors also to other neighbouring cities to joyn with him, pretending that he would make war upon Libya, and subdue it: and moreover he laid hold on all the Merchants goods, that were in the Port, and gave them to the souldiers, to scramble for, thereby to make them the forwarder in his service, [Diodorus.]

Mnasicles, a man of Crete, one of Thimbrons Captains, but of a turbulent disposition, fell off from him to the Cyrenians, and by declaiming against Thimbrons cruelty and perfidiousness, persuaded them to break covenant with him, and to stand for their former liberties and freedom; whereupon, when they had paid only fix hundred of the five thousand talents, they would pay no more. And Thimbron, to cry quittance with them, seized on 800 of their men, whom he found in the Port: and coming with his own men and the Barcenles, and Hesperians, all which joyned with him before the walls of the City, did what he could to take it; but failing of his purpose, retired to the Port, [Id.]

The Cyrenians, leaving a sufficient guard to keep the town, drew out the rest, and went a foraging into the neighbouring parts, and when these sent to Thimbro for help, he presently went with all the strength that he could make to relieve them against the Cyrenians: Mnasicles, seying this opportunity, and that there were few or no souldiers left in the Port, moved those who were left in the City, to fall on; and set upon the Port: and they being quickly periwaded, followed him, and fell upon it; and by reason of Thimbrons absence with his men, easily took it: and such goods as they there found in specie, belonging to the Merchants, restored it all faithfully to the owners; and Mnasicles fell presently to work, and fortified the Port against Thimbron, if he should return: This went ill on Thimbrons side, for that he had not only lost the place, but with it, all his Provisions that were in it; yet upon the taking of another town called Taricha, he renewed his hopes again, [Id.]

Thimbrons Mariners and sea Souldiers, being turned out of the Port, knew not what to do for victuals, but were faine to go a free-boating into the country for it: and this, when they were daily forced to do, at last the Boors of the Country, knowing their haunts, laid wait for, and slew a great number of them, and took as many prisoners, as they had slain: They that were left, got a shipboard, and sailed away toward other confederate places. But being on their way, there fell a violent tempest, which sunk many of them in the sea; those that escaped, were driven a shoare in Egypt, and some in the Isle of Cyprus: All which put such heart into the Cyrenians belies, that they stuck not now to encounter Thimbron in the open field; which they did, and in a battle slew many of his men, [Id.]

Craterus departing from Cilicia, with six thousand of those old Souldiers, which came at first with Alexander into Asia, and four thousand more, of such as came to him upon the way, besides 1000 Persian Archers and Slingers, and 1500 horse, halted all he could to the succour of Antipater, and came into Thessaly: where yielding the precedence in all things to Antipater, they both (ate down in camp together, upon the bank of the river Peneus. And in the month of Mounition (our April) next, fought a battle with the Grecians, and overthrew them, [Id. with Arria, and Plut. in the lives of Phocion and Demosthenes.]

After Jaddus his son Onias succeeded in the Priesthood at Jerusalem, [Joseph. Antiq. lib. 11. in fi.] and there late one and twenty years, [Scalig. in Graec. Encheirid. pag. 50.]

Thimbro

Thimbro, having hired new souldiers from Tenuarus in Laconia, where they wandered up and down, out of pay, began a fresh to make war upon the Cyrenians, and they on the contrary, praying in aide from the Africans and Carthaginians, made up an army, with their own men, to the number of 30 thousand, and put all upon the hazard of a battle: wherein after a long and bloody fight, they lost a many of their men, and Thimbro had the better of the day. Then the Cyrenians, having lost all their own Commanders, made Mnasicles their General, Thimbro growing proud of this victory, set upon the port of Cyrene, and took it, and made every day an assault upon the City it self, to take it. But the siege continuing, and provisions failing, the Cyrenians began to mutiny among themselves; the end whereof was, that the common people, who bare the sway for matter of power, thrust the richer fort out of the City, and they, being so thrust out, repaired, some to Thimbro, and others into Egypt, [Diod. ut. sup.]

They who fled into Egypt, dealt with Ptolomei, to restore them into their Country; and by his means, returned with forces both by land and sea, under the command of one Ophellias a Macedon, which coming to the ears of those which were gone to Thimbro, they prepared to fly over, and to joyn with Ophellias, but their intention being disclosed under hand to Thimbro, he put every mothers son of them to death. Thence the leaders of the Commons of Cyrene, taking a flight at the return of their banditti, made their peace with Thimbro, joyned with him, and in a main battle, were all utterly vanquish, by Ophellias, [Id.]

Thimbro, in his flight, was lighted on by some certain African Carters, who took and carried him to one Epicides, who held a Town, called Teuchira, in those parts under Ophellias: and the men of that place, with Ophellias his leave, first scourged him with whips, and then sent him to be crucified at the port of Cyrene. But for as much as the Cyrenians continued still in combustions among themselves, therefore Ptolomei himself made a journey thither by sea; and having by his presence settled all matters there, came back again by sea as he went, [Arrianus, in Phoc. Biblio.]

Perdiccas, having King Philip, and the Royal Army all at his command, made a journey against Ariarathes, the petty King of Cappadocia, for that he had not received Eumenes for Governour there, as he was commanded. Ariarathes, at that time, had gotten together a great army, 30 thousand Foot, and 15 thousand Horse: In two severall fights, Perdiccas slew four thousand of his men, and took six thousand prisoners; and among them Ariarathes himself: and both him and all that were allied to him, he first tortured, and then crucified. The rest he pardoned, and having settled all matters in Cappadocia, committed the Government of it to Eumenes, according to the first establishment, [Diodorus with Arria, and Plut. in Eumenes, and Appian in his Mithridatica, pag. 175.]

Eumenes committed the several cities of his Government, to his most trusty friends, and appointed them Garrisons, with Judges, and gatherers of his tributes, such as pleased him best, without any interposing of Perdiccas: which done, he returned with Perdiccas, both in respect to him, as also, that he might not be a stranger at Court, [Plut.]

Perdiccas, and Philip the King, leaving Cappadocia, went into Pisidia, with a purpose there to destroy two Cities, one of the Laranadians, the other of the Isaurians; for these in Alexanders life time, had slain Balacrus the son of Nicanor, whom he had let over them. Laranada therefore they took at first assault; and putting all that were of age to the sword, they sold away the rest for slaves, and laid the City level with the ground: those of Isaurius, seeing themselves believed, set the City on fire over their own heads, with purpose to consume both it and themselves with it, to ashes. But the souldiers, to whom Perdiccas had given the spoil of the City, quenched the fire, and by that means, found great store of silver and gold there, [Diodorus year, 2. Olympiade 214.] Justin sayes, that this was done by the Cappadocians, when they saw Ariarathes overcome, [lib. 23. cap. 6.] and Orosius, reading in his steps, sayes the same. [lib. 3. cap. ult.]

Jollas, the son of Antipater, and Archias, came to Perdiccas out of Macedonia, bringing with them Nicæa, Antipaters daughter, to be his wife. Perdiccas, long before, whilst his estate was yet unsettled, had betrothed her. But now, that he had gotten the Royal Army, and administration of the Kingdom quietly into his hands, he purposed to marry Cleopatra, daughter to Philip, the father of Alexander, and Alexanders own sister, especially by the procurement and setting on of Eumenes, yet that he might the more easily procure a supply of the Macedonian youth, and that he might not have Antipater for an opposer in his undertakings, he married Nicæa when he came, being drawn thereto principally by the advice and perswasion of his brother Alcetes, [Diod. and Arria, with Justin, l. 13. c. 6.]

Cinna

Cinna also, another daughter of Philips, and sister likewise of Alexanders, but not by the same mother, brought her daughter Adea, which was afterward called Euridice, to be married to Philippos Arideus: but Perdicas and his brother Alcetes, between them, dispatcch her out of the way: whereupon the Macedons began to grow into a combuftion, and Perdicas to quiet them, was fain to give her daughter in marriage to Arideus, [Arrian, in Photius.] where she is named, not Cynna, but Cynane: which yet in the same Arrianus, [lib. 1. de Gest. Alex. p. 5. is called Cyna: and by Diod. year 1. Olymp. 116. and by Athen. l. 13. c. 23. Cynna.]

Perdicas sent away Eumenes out of Cilicia, under a colour of looking to his own government in Cappadocia, but indeed, that he might have a care of Armenia, to keep it in due order; because Neoptolemus sought to make some innovations there: But Eumenes by fair words, prevailed so far with him, though a man of a high, and an intemperate spirit, as to keep him quiet, [Plut. in Eumen.]

Eumenes, finding that the Macedonian Squadron grew insolent and fierce, raised an army of horse out of the Provincials in those parts, remitting to them all payment of tribute, and granting them other immunities. He furnished also them whom he most trusted, with horses at his own charge; kindling their affections towards himself with his largesse and bounteous favours bestowed among them, and keeping them in breath and exercise, by continual labours and journeys, which he put them upon: so that in a short time he had gotten together six thousand three hundred and sixty Horse, [Id. lib.]

Antipater and Craterus together in Greece, made war upon the Ætolians; whom when Craterus his old souldiers, compelled by continual alarms, to lye abroad in the snow, in the winter season, they were ready to perish for want of victuals, [Diodorus, lib. 1.]

Eumenes carried Perdicas his presents to Cleopatra lying at Sardes; for that Perdicas was now resolved to rid his hands of Nicæa, Antipaters daughter, and to take Cleopatra to be his wife, and so much Menander, the Governor of Lydia, signified to Antigonus, who was an intimate friend to Antipater, [Arrianus.] And when Perdicas, laying every day false crimes to Antigonus his charge, fought unjustly to put him to death, he made shew, as if he desired to come to a hearing; but under hand, sending a ship of Athens in the rode, got privily into her, with his son Demetrius, and some other of his friends, and fled away into Europe, there to joyn with Antipater, [Diodorus.]

When Aristander, a Southsaier of Telmessia, had given it out, that it was revealed to him by the gods, that the land where Alexanders body should rest, should prove the most happy of all others, and forever free from all foreign invasions and incursions of the enemies; much emulation grew among the Nobles of Macedon, who should get the body of him into his hands: but principally between Perdicas and Ptolomei the son of Lagus, [Elian. l. 2. c. 64.] Perdicas dealt with his friends to have it carried to Egos, [Pausan. in his Attica, p. 5.]

But Aridaus, who had the body in his keeping, contrary to Perdicas his will, went and carried it to Ptolomei: taking his journey, from Babylon, by Damascus, into Egypt. And although he met with many rubs cast in his way by Polemon, a salt friend of Perdicas, yet he went through with it, and carried it into Egypt, as his purpose was, [Arrian, in Phot.]

For having spent two full years in preparations for this funeral, the sumptuousness, and magnificence whereof is at large let down by Diodorus; at length he removed the body out of Babylon, with an infinite company of workmen, to open and level the waies where need should be, and others to attend the funeral following him: But Ptolomei with his whole army, went as far as into Syria to meet him, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 124.] and there receiving the Corps, buried it first at Memphis, with all rites and ceremonies, after the Macedonian manner, [Pausan. in his Attica, pag. 5.] and some few years after removed it to Alexandria, [Curt. l. 10. c. ult.] which removal of it yet was made by his son Ptolomeus Philadelphus, and not by the father, [as Pausanias intimates in his Attica, p. 5. of which, see more in Strabo, l. 17. p. 794.]

Perdicas, calling a Council of Captains and friends in Cappadocia, propounded to them, whether he should march with his army first into Macedonia against Antipater, or into Egypt against Ptolomei: some were of opinion to passe over first into Macedonia, but it was resolved, that it was the best way to begin with Ptolomei in Egypt, least when he had put over into Europe, and was engaged there, Ptolomei should come and possesse himself of Asia. Hereupon, Perdicas gave unto Eumenes, besides what he had already, the provinces of Caria, Lycia, and Phrygia, and the government of all that part of Asia which lyeth between the mountain of Taurus, and the Hellespont, commanding him moreover to take charge of all the gendarmery in Cappadocia and Armenia in chief, and with them to attend the motions of Antipater and Craterus, and and to fortifie all places upon the Hellespont, and to stop their landing, in case they should offer to passe the sea in those parts. Moreover Perdicas gave order to his brother Alcetes, and Neoptolemus, that they should in all things attend the commands and orders of Eumenes; but Eumenes he willed to do things, as he should think fittest for the present service, in his own discretion. Cilicia was taken from Philotas, and committed to Philoxenus: And Perdicas himself moving from Damascus, to the end he might seem to have the better colour for what he went about to do, took Aridaus, and Alexander the son of Alexander the great by Roxane, along with him; and solet forward towards Egypt, to fight with Ptolomei, [Diodor. Julian. lib. 13. cap. 6. Arria. Plut. Emil. Probis, in Eumene, Pausan. in his Attica, cap. 5.]

When Antipater and Craterus had heard by Antigonus, that Perdicas was removing Cleopatra, purposed to come for Macedon, and there as absolute King to restore them from their Governments; they presently struck up a peace with the Ætolians, and leaving Polyperchon, to manage all matters in Greece and Macedon, halted into Hellespont in Asia side, amusing and abusing those who were appointed to keep that passage, by sending daily Embassies unto them. They sent also Ambassadors to Ptolomei, who was otherwayes a deadly enemy to Perdicas, and a friend to them, and in like danger of Perdicas, as they themselves were, and desired him to joyn with them. As also to Eumenes and Neoptolemus; both which, were at that time at Perdicas his devotion: and with Neoptolemus they prevailed to fall over unto them; but with Eumenes they could not, [Diodorus, Julian, ut sup. and Arrianus.]

Alcetes, Perdicas his own brother, flatly refused to bear arms against Antipater and Craterus: and Neoptolemus envying the power of Eumenes, did not only understand joyn in society with them, but laid a traine to have blown up Eumenes, and to have taken his life, and to have betrayed all his army into their hands: which when Eumenes had discovered, he was forced to fight it out with the traitor in a pitch field: wherein he made a great slaughter of Neoptolemus his men, took all his baggage, and drew the residue to serve him, and grew strong by the access of to many good Macedon souldiers to his former army. Neoptolemus getting away with 300 Horse only, fled to Antipater and Craterus, and they again sent Ambassadors to Eumenes, to draw him over to their Party, promising that he should not only hold what he had, but also have more Provinces added to him. But when he answered, that he would rather lose his life than break his word to Perdicas, they divided their army in two; with one Antipater marched into Cilicia, that going from thence into Egypt, he might there joyn with Ptolomei, against Perdicas; and the other stayed behind with Craterus, to try it out with Eumenes.

Eumenes seeing the enemy coming on, and fearing least his souldiers, knowing against whom he was to go, would not only not go with him; but disband and flee from him, led them about by unknown wayes, where they might not easily hear how the squares went: and the rather for that there was a buzzing already among them, that Neoptolemus was recruited, and came on together with Pigis, with an army of Cappadocian and Paphlagonian Horse: and withal he wrought it, by chusing his ground every where as he went, that he could force the enemy to come to a battle of Horse, wherein he knew he overtopp his enemy, and not of Foot, wherein he knew he was the weaker. His Foot was so thousand strong, some of one nation, some of another, and 5 thousand Horse; upon whose valour he principally relied for the victory. Craterus had but little above 2 thousand Horse, and as many Foot as Eumenes: but they were all Macedons, old souldiers all, and of approved valour, and such as he well durst put the day upon.

These met in Cappadocia: Craterus had the right wing, Neoptolemus the left. Eumenes put none of his Macedons to fight against Craterus, but only two Regiments of foreign Horse, led by Pharnabazus, the son of Artabazus, and by Tenedius of Phœnicia; willing them, without any shouting, or word speaking, to fall on roundly upon him: and himself with a company of 300 Horse, flew in like lightning upon Neoptolemus. And Craterus truly for his part, led on very bravely, and in his own person valiantly belaved himself, but his Horse floundering, a certain Thracian, or rather as Arrianus, a Paphlagonian ran him into the side with his Lance, and bare him to the ground: In the fall, one of Eumenes his Captains knew him, and did what he might to have saved him, all wounded as he was, and giving up the ghost. Mean while, Eumenes and Neoptolemus met, and graping each with other, fell both off their horses to the ground; that a man might easily see with how deadly a hatred they encountered each other, and that their spirits were more hostile than their bodies could be: being down, Eumenes wounded Neoptolemus in one of his ham's, and his hamstrings being cut, he fell along; yet his courage bearing him up, he raised himself upon his knees, and fighting on, gave Eumenes three wounds; one in his arm, the other two in his thigh: but none of them being any way mortal: at the second blow,

Eumenes

Eumenes made a full blow at him, and strook off his head; which was about ten dayes, after the former victory which he gat of him, [Id.]

Eumenes, seeing Craterus brought half dead out of the field, did what possibly might be done, to have saved his life: but when it would not be, he wept bitterly over him, and with outspread arms lamented his case; and in regard both of his high place, and also, of the former love that had been between them, buried him honorably, and sent his bones home into Macedon to his wife and children, [Plut. and Emil. Pro. in Eumene.]

Both the Leaders being slain, and many others, especially of the better sort, taken prisoners; the rest of the Horse fled back to the main squadron of the Foot, as to a sure defence: and Eumenes contenting himself with what he had done, founded a retreat, and let up a trophy upon the place, and buried his dead. But the Foot army, which was brought as it were, into a noose, whence they could not escape, without Eumenes his leave, desired quarter: and taking their oaths for his loyalty towards him, had leave to buy victual, in the places adjoining. But having gotten victual, and recovered their strength, contrary to their oath, they went away, and returned to Antipater, [Diod. with Arrian. and Emil. Prob. in.]

Perdiccas, with the two Kings, Aridaeus, and Alexander a young child, coming with his army into Egypt, encamped not far from Pelusium: where, while he busied himself in fowling an old ditch, an extraordinary inundation of Nilus, spoiled all his work. And although Ptolomei cleared himself, to the world of all those crimes which Perdiccas laid to his charge, yet contrary to the good liking and will of his Army, Perdiccas would needs proceed and make a war upon him, [Diodorus and Arrianus.]

When Perdiccas at last saw that many of his friends forsook him, and fled over to Ptolomei, he assembled all his Commanders and Captains, and what with gifts, what with large promises, what with fair words, and his sweet behaviour towards them, made them all lure to himself again. And then removing his Camp without any noise, in the grasp of the evening, encamped upon the bank of the River Nile, not far from a certain Castle, called Murus Camelorum, (i.e.) a wall of Camels. And at day break, crossed the River with his Army and Elephants, and set upon the Castle, but was valiantly repulled by Ptolomei, and glad to retreat to his Camp again. And the night following he removed, and with all silence possible, came to a place over against Memphis, where the River parting, made an Island, fit to encamp in; and in passing the River, to come at it, he left above two thousand of his men, of which no less than one thousand being long toft up and down in the water, were devoured by Crocodiles, and other monsters of the River. But Ptolomei took such bodies as were cast a shoar on his side the River, and bestowed all solemn Rites and Ceremonies of funeral upon them, and sent their bones to their friends and kinsmen in the Army. Whereupon, the minds of the soldiers, grew much more enraged against Perdiccas, and inclined to Ptolomei than before, [Diod.]

Then arose there a mutiny and sedition in the Camp, wherein the chief Commanders, to the number a hundred, fell from Perdiccas, and among them Pithon himself; than whom there was not a braver man, for virtue and valour, and high esteem, among all Alexanders Nobles. But some of the Horse, conspiring together, made no more ado, but went to his pavilion where he lay, and there slew him; when he had now held that principality three full years, at least, the third year running, [Id. with Arrianus and Justin, lib. 13, cap. 8. Pausan. in Attica, pag. 5. and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

The next day, when the whole army was called together, Ptolomei crossed the River, and came to the two Kings; and presenting both them, and other of the Nobles with honourable gifts, and behaved himself in all fair and humble manner to them all. And when he had excused himself for what he had done, finding that the army was diffusive of provision, he supplied them with plenty of corn, and all other necessities for their use. And he made it openly to appear, that he was hartily forry, and bemoaned the present state and condition of Perdiccas his friends: and as he saw any Macedon in any distresse or danger, he did, what possibly he could, to relieve him, and help him out. Now albeit, being so gracious with all there, as he was, he might easily have gotten to be L. Protector of the two Kings, as Perdiccas was, yet he so far prevailed by his counsel with them, that when they met about that matter, all with one accord, cast the Protector ship of the two Kings, Aridaeus, and Alexander the young child, upon Pithon, who was the man that had formerly quieted the commotions of the Greeks in the upper Asia, and Aridaeus, which had formerly the charge of conveying the body of Alexander from Babylon, with sovereign power over all the armies; in such manner and form, as Perdiccas had, according to the first establishment, [Diod. and Arrian.]

Two daies after the death of Perdiccas, there came news of Eumenes his victory, gotten in Cappadocia, and of the death of Neoptolemus and Craterus, which had it come but two dayes sooner, had, no doubt, saved Perdiccas his life, for who, upon that successe, durst have stirred against him? But the Macedons, enraged for the death of Craterus, declared Eumenes for an open enemy, with 50 other Noble persons that were near about him; among which, was Pitho Ilyrius, (for so I read them joyntly in Justin as also in Arrianus his Indica, [pag. 185.] Pitho Regis: Ilyrius: (i. e.) Pithon, the son of Craterus, of Alcomene; which in Stephanus de Urbibus, is a City in Ilyria) and Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas: Generals, against them, were Antigonus and Antipater; and to this purpose was Antigonus sent for out of Cyprus, and commanded, together with Antipater, to come to the two Kings presence in all haste, [Diod. and Arrian, with Justin, lib. 13, c. 8. and Plut. in Eumene.]

In Egypt also were put to death, all that had any reference to Perdiccas, and his sister Alalanta, whom Attalus the Admiral of Perdiccas, lying then with the fleet before Pelusium had married: He hearing of the death of his wife, and of Perdiccas, weighed anchor, and came to Tyrus, where Archelaus a Macedon, and Governor of the place, entertained him with all respect and love, and gave up the City, with 800 talents, which Perdiccas had deposited and left in trust with him, into his hands.

Attalus, staying at Tyrus, received and relieved all such of Perdiccas his friends, as could escape and get away from the Camp, lying before Memphis, [Diodorus.]

Euridice, the wife of King Aridaeus, would not that the two Protectors should do any thing of moment without her: and they at first said no Nay thereto. Yet afterward, they told her plainly, that she had nothing to do with matters of State; only they said, they would have a care of her, till Antigonus and Antipater came, [Arrian.]

Pitho and Aridaeus, the two Protectors, removing from Nilus with the two kings, and the army, came to Tripardilus in the upper Syria: where, when Euridice would needs be over-bulic and meddling in matters of state, and would many times crosse the Protectors in their waies, Pithon, offended therewith, and the rather, for that he saw the Macedons inclined to obey her commands, called the Macedons together, and before them all, resigned his Protectorship: Thereupon they chose Antipater to bee Protector in his place, with all sovereign power belonging therunto, [Diodorus.]

The army now demanded of Antipater, performance of all those rewards for their long labour in the wars, which Alexander had made them. Antipater, when he had nothing to give them for the present, told them that their demands were just and reasonable, and that he would shortly look into the Kings Treasure, and find out whatever he had laid up: which speech of his gave the army little satisfaction: whereupon when Euridice also helped to lay load upon him, the minds of the common soldiers were stirred up to a mutiny and sedition against him. At the same time Euridice made an open declamation against him, which was pronounced in the peoples hearing, by Alcibiodes her Secretary. And Attalus seconded her, with another of his own; so that Antipater had much ado to escape alive out of their hands: But Antigonus and Seleucus stood up in his defence, and therein ran a hazard of their own lives also.

Wherefore Antipater, having thus got clear of them, got him presently away to his own army, and then the chief Commanders of the Cavalerie coming together, with much ado, pacified the multitude, and so Antipater was sent for again, and willed to retume the sovereign power, and use it, as formerly he had done, [Diod.]

After this, Antipater made a new distribution of the Governments of the Provinces in Tripardilus: wherein he partly ratified what had formerly been done in that kind, and made some alterations, as the present state of things required: And for Ptolomei, he was bid to hold what he had, for it was hard to remove him to any other Government, seeing he had in a manner gotten Egypt by way of conquest to himself. But Melopotamia, and the Country of Arabia, were assigned to Amphimachus the Kings brother, Babylon to Seleucus, Parthia to Philippos, Aria and Drangiana to Straton of Cyprus, Bactria and Sogdiana to Stator of Solos in the same Island, Media, as far as to the Caspian Gates, Perdiccas his son in law being now dead, was taken from Antipater, and given to Pithon the son of Craterus, or Cratenas, whereupon Antipater, calling the lesser Media from his own name Antipatria, turned it quite away from the Macedonian Government, and made himself absolute King of it: and in succession from him, it continued down to Strabo his time, as himself testifieth, [lib. 11, pag. 523.] Antigones, (for whom Antigonus is falsely written in Diodorus) Captain of the silver Targateers, because he was the first that set upon Perdiccas, had the Province of Sufa given given him for his pains; and three thousand of the most turbulent Macedons in the late sedition to carry with him: The rest of the Provinces of the upper Asia, were left in the hands of such as had them before, save that Patala, the greatest City of all India, was upon this settlement assigned to King Porus: as Arrianus saith; which we can hardly believe.

In the lesser Asia, Cappadocia, and with it Paphlagonia, were taken from Eumenes, and given to Nicanor. Lydia, (not Lycia as it is read in Diodorus) to Cinyus; Phrygia the lesser, as far as to Hellepont; to Aridaeus. Caria to Cassander, with Phrygia the greater, Lycaonia, Pamphylia, and Lycia, to hold them as he did before. In Diodore, is here read Cilicia, instead of Lydia: which himself a little before said was given to Philoxenus; or rather as Arrianus hath it, was confirmed to him: for I shew'd a little before out of [Justin, lib. 13, cap. 6.] that Perdiccas had taken that Province from Philotas, and given it to Philoxenus.

This Antigonus (who because he wanted one eye, was nick-named, the Cyclops, [Elian, lib. 12, Var. Hist. cap. 14.] was by Antipater made General of the Kings army, and Commander of those Forces in particular, which Perdiccas had. He committed to him all the care of the two Kings, and sent him to make war upon Eumenes, being of himself very desirous of that employment: whereupon it is, that [Appianus in his Syriae, pag. 121.] says, that Antipater made him, Ἐντονωτοῦ δὲ βασιλῆος Ἀντίγονος: (i. e.) Over-see of all Asia: and [Diod. lib. 18, pag. 636.] calls him ἐντονωτοῦ αὐτοῦ βασιλῆος: (i. e.) absolute Commander of all Asia: but joined with him his own son Cassander (the Governour of Caria) as his Master or General of the Horse; to the end, that if Antigonus should go about to set up for himself, he might have an eye upon him, [Diodor. and Arrianus.]

At the same time Antipater made Autolycheus the son of Agathocles, Amyntas, the son of Alexander, and brother to Penefta, Ptolemei the son of Ptolemei, and Alexander the son of Polypercon, Squires of the body to the two Kings, [Arrian,] and having gotten a great applause among all sorts of men for his well ordering, and due administration of things in his Protectorship, he set onward of his journey with the two Kings, toward Macedonia, [Id. & Diodor.]

Eumenes, hearing that he was declared an enemy by the Macedons, and that Antigonus was sent against him, declared the matter of his own accord to the army; least perhaps the fame of it coming otherways to their ears, might make matters worse than they were, or the novelty of it should damp their courage: at least he should thereby find how his army stood affected to him, and to dispose of himself, as he should see occasion, upon the general carriage of them thereupon: yet he told them plainly, that if an mans heart failed him upon this news, he should have free leave to depart, and go whither he would: with which words, he so won and fastned all mens hearts unto him, that they all bad him be of good cheer, saying, That they would cut that Decree of the Macedons in pieces with their swords, [Justin, lib. 14, cap. 1.]

Moreover when news of that Decree came to Alctas the brother of Perdiccas, he presently fled, and ingratiated himself with the Pisidians; for whiles he was among them, when ever he got a booty from the enemy, he gave one half thereof to them, and was ever affable and courteous to them in his speech, often inviting the principal of them to Feasts and honouring them with gifts and presents, whereby he won the hearts of all unto him, [Diodor. pag. 623.]

Attalus also, who was chief Admirall of the Navy, and who was with the first of them that fell off from Antipater, fled and banded himself with the rest of the now Banditti: and gat together an army of 10 thousand Foot, and 800 Horse; and with these going to possess himself of Cnidus, Caunus, and Rhodes, was by Demarcus the Admirall of Rhodes, valiantly put off, [Arrianus.]

Eumenes took as many horses, as he wanted out of the Kings breed, which was in the mount Ida: And when he sent an account for them in writing to the Kings Officers of the Revenue, Antipater laugh'd at it, and said, that he wondered to see Eumenes so cautious, as to think, that either he himself would ever be accountable to them of the Kings goods, or look for an account of them from others.

From hence he marcht with his army, not into Eolia, as it is in the printed Copies of Justin; but as a Manuscript Copy hath it, into Eulia, or Eulane, which is a part of Armenia the lesse in Cappadocia (as Isaacus Vossius a most learned young man, and my very good friend, observed out of Ptolemei) and there levied monies of the Cities in those parts: and if any refused to pay contribution, he plundered them as so many enemies. And from thence again, he went to Sardes, and to Cleopatra, sister to Alexander the great, hoping that her presence would confirm his Centurions and other Officers of his army in their obedience unto him, as supposing that the right of Royal Majesty was on that side, on which the sister of Alexander stood, [Justin, lib. 14, cap. 1.] And when it so fell out, that Antipater took also Sardes in his way to Macedonia, Eumenes

Eumenes would fain have put the matter upon a battle, in the fields of Lydia; both because he was the stronger in Horse, and because also he was desirous to let Cleopatra see, of what metal he was made. But Cleopatra, fearing lest Antipater and the Macedons might hereupon charge her to leave Sardes, Πλευρα and Αρριανου. Nevertheless Antipater when he came, forbore not to reproach her, with many fowl words, for having held correspondence with Eumenes and Perdiccas. But she, beyond what could have been expected from a woman, answered him again very stoutly, justifying her own actions, and laying the fault upon Antipater: yet so as at last they parted fair, and upon good terms, [Arrian.]

Eumenes therefore left the Country of Lydia, and marcht away into the upper Phrygia, and there took up his winter quarters in Celzæ, Πλευρ. and dispatcht away messengers to Alctas, and his associates; advising them to draw their forces into a body, and to make head against a common enemy. But when they could not agree among themselves; nothing was done, [Arrian,] for Alctas, and Polemo, and Docimus, could not agree, who should be chief: Whereupon Eumenes cryed out and said, This is according to the old saying, Exiit nulla habetur ratio, (i. e.) There is no fence against destruction, [Pleurarch.]

Eumenes promising to pay his army within three dayes, let all the Towns and Cities of that Country, which was full stored with men and Cattle, to sale. Whereupon the Captains and Commanders took them off his hands, and receiving Engush of battery from him, went and enter'd by force upon them, and making sale of all, paid every man his company to the full, [Id.]

Antipater, not daring as yet to fight with Eumenes himself, sent Cassander, to try the fortune of a battle with Alctas and Attalus; and fight they did, and parted upon equal termes, yet so as Cassander had the worse of it, [Arrian.]

Cassander, falling out with Antigonus, upon his father Antipaters persuasion, grew friends again with him; yet meeting with his father in Phrygia, he advis'd him, not to keep himself far off from the Kings, nor to rely too much upon Antigonus. But Antigonus by his temperate and discreet carriage, and obsequious behaviour upon all occasions, did what he could, to make Antipater have a good belief of his sincerity to him, and loyalty to the cause. Whereupon Antipater, putting of all displeasure towards him, deliver'd into his hands, of those forces which he had brought with him out of Asia, 8500 Macedons, and as many Horse of his confederates, with one Moeis of his Elephants, being 70 in number, that with them he might go thorough with the war against Eumenes; so Antigonus took upon him the management of that business; and Antipater with the Kings, took his journey to returne to Macedonia, [Id.]

But then his whole army cryed out for gelt, and he promised them pay, when he came to Abydus; and told them, that perhaps he would there bestow on them the whole donative, which Alexander had promised; if not, yet at last the greater part thereof, feeding them therefore with this hope; he drew them on quietly to Abydus: but when he came thither, he with the two Kings in his company, staid away by night, and put over the Hellepont, and went to Lytmachus. And the morrow after they followed him, without any further calling for their pay. So saith Arrianus [in Biblio. Theat. cap. 92.] and here Arrianus ends his ten books, which he wrate of the gets of Alexander.

Antigonus drew all his forces out of their winter quarters, to march against Eumenes, and to subdue him, who at that time lay in Cappadocia, [Diodor.] Now there were billets cast about every where in Eumenes his Camp, promising 100 talents, and good conditions and offices besides to him that would bring in Eumenes dead to Antigonus, [Justin lib. 14, cap. 1. Pleur. in Eumene.] Which when Eumenes perceived, he forthwith called all the soldiery together, and first thanked them all, for that in so great a multitude, there was none found, that would falsifie his oath taken to him, in hope of so bloody a reward; and yet withall cunningly intimated toward him, to the end, that if the enemy should do the like hereafter, the army might imagine, that it was still but a device of his to try them: Whereupon they all cryed out, and vowed their service, in the defence of his person, and preservation of his life, [Justin.] And thereupon they decreed among themselves, that there should out of the principal of the army, be chosen a thousand men, for his daily guard; and that they should watch every night by themselves him, and they which were so chosen, were glad of the employment, and willingly received from his hands, such gifts, as the Macedon Kings used to bestow upon their Nobles: for Eumenes now took upon him scarlet Hats, and robes upon them, which among the Macedons was ever esteem'd for a principal favour from their Kings, [Pleur.]

yet one of his chief Commanders, called Perdiccas, with 3 thousand foot, and 5 hundred horse fell from him, and was gotten 3 days journey on his way: and Eumenes dispatched away Tencidius a Phœnician, with 4 thousand choice foot, and a thousand horse to overtake them: which he did, and falling on them unawares, in the night time, whilst they were all asleep, took Perdiccas prisoner, and brought back all his soldiers to Eumenes, who pickt out the chief Authors of that defection, and put them to death, and distributed the rest by small parcels, among his other companies, speaking them faire, & using them courteously, and thereby wan their affections to himself again, [Diodorus.]

After this Antigonus dealt, by a privie messenger, with Apollonides, one of the commanders of the Horse, under Eumenes, and by large promises, drew him to play the traitor with Eumenes, and in the midst of the fight, to forsake, and turne against him. Eumenes at this time encamped in the country of Orecynia, in Cappadocia, a place fit for horse to fight in; and thither came Antigonus with his army, and took up all the upper ground, near the foot of the mountains, his army consisting of 10 thousand foot, most part whereof were Macedons, and men of admirable force and courage, and two thousand horse, and 30 Elephants: And Eumenes in his army had no less than 20 thousand foot, and 5 thousand horse. The battle began very fiercely on Eumenes his side: but Apollonides with his regiment of horse, falling suddenly off to the enemy, gave the victory to Antigonus: in that fight Eumenes lost 8000 men, and all his Carriages, [Id.]

Yet Eumenes suffered not the traitor to escape, but whilst he was in acting of that vilany, took him, and hung him up: Himself fled by a contrary way to that which they that pursued him took, and turning bak short, passed by the enemy, and came to the place where the battle was fought, and there encamped, and gathered together the bodies of his slain, and for want of other fuel in the place, took the doors and gates of the towns and villages thereabouts, off their hinges, and cleft them, and made piles of them to burn his dead withal, the Captains by themselves, and the common soldiers by theirs. In so much that Antigonus coming to the place afterward, stood amazed at this bold attempt of his, and undauntedness of his high courage, [Plut.]

After falling by chance upon Antigonus his carriages, though he might there have taken many a prisoner, many slaves, with much stuffe, yet fearing lest his men, having gotten so much wealth, should grow lesse forward to fight, and if need were, lesse able to fly, by reason of their luggage, gave order that every man should see his horse well fed, and refresh himself, and then be ready to set upon the enemy: mean while he privily sent to Menander, who was let to keep the enemies luggage, to remove immediately out of the plain, to the foot of the mountain, for fear of being suddenly surrounded by the enemies Horse, which when he, seeing the danger, speedily did, the enemy said that they were very much beholding to Eumenes, for saving their children from slavery, and their wives from ravishment: But Antigonus told them that Eumenes did it not for their sakes, but to the end he might not flacke & hinder himself thereby in his fight, [Id.]

Eumenes went from thence, skulking here and there, and perswaded a great many of his men to leave him for the present, and to get them gone: whether out of an honest care which he had of them; or because they were now grown too few to oppose the enemy, and yet were too many to conceal him in his flight. But when he was come to Nora, which was a strong castle, and which Strabo, [l. 12.] saith in his time, went by the name of Neroasus, a place leared upon the confines of Cappadocia and Lycæonia, with 500 horse, and 200 foot (though Diodorus saith that there were not above 500 in all there), as many of his friends as desired his leave to be gone, because they could not brook, either the desolatenesse of the place, or the scarcity of victuals, that they there found, he gave it them freely, and embracing every one of them, in all faire and courteous manner sent them away: For the place it self was not above two furlongs in bignesse, and there was in it provision enough of corn, and fale, and water, but there was no store of fresh Carres to be had, [Id. with Diodorus, and Justin, lib. 14. cap. 2.]

Antigonus, coming to the place, before he began any siege, sent to Eumenes to come to a parley, and when he required Hostages, Antigonus refused, but bad him come out as to his Superior: But Eumenes sent him word again, that as long as he were a sword by his side, he would acknowledge no Superior. Whereupon, when Antigonus sent him his own bothers son, called Ptolemei, as was required, Eumenes came forth: and they embraced each other very lovingly, and in all familiar manner. And having disposed of sundry matters, when Antigonus saw that he never mentioned any thing of his own security or pardon, but still demanded his former Governments to be confirmed, and recompence for his losses to be made unto him, the standers by stood amazed at it, and wondered at the constancie of his courage and magnanimity that was in him. And

Antigonus

Antigonus told him, that concerning these articles, he would advise with Antipater: And so with much ado, returned him again into his Castle, safe from the violence of the multitude: And having built a double wall, with trenches round about the Castle, and left men enough to maintain the siege, removed his Camp, [Ibid.]

After a while Eumenes sent messengers (among which, one was Hieronymus the Historian, a town-born child of Cardia, as himself was) to Antipater, for a pacification, [Diodorus, and Justin, lib. 14. cap. 2.] and in the mean time, he provided victuals for his company, and though his tate was short, yet he made good cheer with what he had, admitting them all in their turnes to his table, where he entertained them with pleasant discourse, and familiar speeches, instead of better meat, [Diod. and Plut.] and then as often as he had a mind to it, out he would fall, and either burn or overthrow Antigonus his works, [Emil. Prob.]

But fearing least by lying alwayes in one place, he should dry foundier and lose all his horses, for want of breathing them, he gave order every day once to trusse up his horses with their fore feet above ground, and made them stand upon their hinder: that so with striving and much struggling, they might gather heat and fall a sweating: and gave them boiled barley to eat, that they might the sooner dispatch it, and the better digest it: whereby it came to passe, that when at last he came out of the Castle every man wondered to see his horse so fat and sleek, as if they had been all the while kept in the best pasture of the country, [Diodor. Jul. Fronti. strab. lib. 4. cap. 7. Plut. and Emil. Prob. in Eumenes.]

Ptolemei the son of Lagos, perceiving that Phœnicia, and Cœlœsyrta, would be very commodious to him, both for the keeping of Egypt, and also for the acquiring of Cyprus by his brains about it, how he might compass them. Wherefore he tried, whether he could draw Laomedon, who was made Governour of those two Provinces, first by Perdiccas, and afterward by Antipater, to deliver them into his hand: offering him a vast summe of money for it. But not able to compass it that way, he raised a greater army, made his truly friend Nicanor General of it, and sent him to wrest it by force out of his hand: and he marching into Syria, took Laomedon prisoner: but he by bribing his keepers got away, and fled to Aleuts where he was in Caria: and Nicanor having in a short time subdued all Phœnicia and Syria, and put Garrisons in them, he returned into Egypt, [Diodor. with Appian, in Syriac, p. 121. and Pausan. in his Asia, pag. 5.]

Ptolemei, setting upon the parts of Phœnicia and Syria, and having gotten Hierusalem by a slight, carried thence to the number of 100 thousand men into Egypt: out of which, he selected 30 thousand of the ablest of them, whom he armed, and took into his army upon greater than ordinary pay, and committed his Garrison Towns and Castles in Egypt, especially to their trust. The rest he gave away for slaves among his soldiers, not so much of his own accord, as upon their importunity, who desired to have them rather than any other, for their necessary uses, and attendance in things belonging to the wars, [Aristot. in lib. de 70. interpret. with Ptol. Philadel. his epistle, ed. lib. Joseph. Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 1. Enst. 2. in Chron.]

Of his taking of Hierusalem, Agatharchides Chnidus, writeth in this manner, in his book of the successors of Alexander the great, in Josephus lib. 1. cont. Apion, pag. 1050. with lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 1. They which are called Jews, saith he, dwell in a most fortified City, which the natives call Jerusalem; they keep every seventh day Holiday: and meddle with no armes upon that day, nor with any part of husbandry, or any other manner of work whatsoever: only holding up their hands in hallowed places, they there stay praying till the evening with outstretched hands. And when Ptolemei the son of Lagos entered their City with his army, all men observed the folly of them that were set to keep it, and so the country came enslaved under a bitter master, and their law was found, to be naught else, but a foolish custom. Appian adds, that Ptolemei demolished the walls of the City: and that leaving Garrisons in Syria, he returned into Egypt by sea, [in Syriac, pag. 129, 131.]

Of his carrying away the Jewes captive into Egypt, Josephus speaketh in th's wife, [lib. 12. Antiquit. cap. 1.] Ptolemei, saith he, carried away many captives out of the hill-country of Judæa, and places bordering upon Jerusalem, and from Samaria, and the mount Gerizim, into Egypt, and made them to dwell there. And finding that they of Hierusalem were most strict observers of any oath which they had taken, by the answer which they made to Alexander's messengers, after the last overthrow of Darius, he thought fit to place many of them now in his garrisons, and castles: and when he had planted many of them in Alexandria, there to live enjoying the same privileges which the Macedons had, he bound them all with an oath to be true to him to his posterity, that had bestowed so great favours on them. And again in his 2 book cont. Apion, pag. 1063. Ptolemæus Lagos, saith he, committed all his castles and places of strength to his Alexandrian Jewes, conceiving they would be kept most safe in their hands, in regard of their fidelity and manhood: and to the end he might reign most securely in Cyrene, Cyrene, and other parts of Libya; he therefore sent many of those Jews to inhabit in that country. And from thence descended that Jason Cyrenensis out of whose writings was collected the second book of the Maccabees; [2 Maccab. cap. 2. v. 24.] and Simon Cyrenensis, who bare the cross of Christ; [Matth. chap. 27. v. 32.] and of whom mention is made, [Act. 2. v. 10. and cap. 6. v. 9.]

Antigonus; whilst Eumenes kept in Nora, besieged there with a double wall round about him, marched with his army against Alceas, and Aitalus, and first into Pisidia, where Alceas with his strength lay; and having in seven days space marched two thousand and five hundred furlongs, he came to a City called, The City of the Creteuses; and coming thus speedily and unawares upon them, he possessed himself of some fitting hills and places of advantage thereabouts; and had in his company besides his Elephants, 40 thousand Foot, and 7 thousand Horse; yet durst Alceas meet him in the open field, having but 16 thousand Foot, and 900 Horse of his friends in his army. But Antigonus having the advantage of the ground, and by far the stronger party, routed him, and took both Aitalus and Docimus and Polemon, and many other great Captains prisoners; all which he took to mercy, and used great clemency and humanity towards them, and disposed of the rest among his companies, and thereby much encreased his own army.

Alceas himself with his life-guard, and sons, and other Pisidians which served him, fled to Telmessus a city of Pisidia, which the Pisidians, being to the number of 6 thousand, and all very strong and valiant men promised never to forsake him, and therefore when Antigonus with all his army came before the walls of Telmessus, and demanded Alceas to be delivered up unto him, and the elder sort thought it fit so to do, the younger crew met together by night, and there bound themselves each to other by an oath, not to forsake him, for any danger that might come thereof: which notwithstanding, the Elders of the City sent a messenger privily to Antigonus, to let him know that they would deliver Alceas into his hands alive or dead, if he would but toll out the soldiers to a skirmish, and making as if they themselves fled, draw them a reasonable distance off from the walls of their City; which was done accordingly; and in the mean time, the Elders fell upon Alceas, with their men, which he perceiving, rather than he would fall alive into his enemies hand, drew his own sword and slew himself: His body laid upon a beer, and wrapt in a vile cloth, while the young men were fighting, was sent and presented to Antigonus, which he having for three daies together, exposed to all the contumelies and indignities that could be imagined, at last caused it to be cast out unburied. The younger crew returning from the fight, and hearing what had passed in their absence, grew enraged against the elders, and seizing on a quarter of the city, resolved at first to let it all on fire, but changing that purpose, they all fell to walt and spoil the enemies country thereabouts, and finding that Antigonus had left the corps of Alceas behind him, they took it up, and buried it as honourably as they could devise, [Id.]

Antipater falling sick, and drawing to his end, ordained Polyperchon to be Protector of the Kings, and sovereign Commander in his room: which Polyperchon was almost the eldest man of all that ever served under Alexander; and was in very great esteem among the Macedons: But Cassander, Antipaters son, not content with the office of General of the Horse, which he held, but desiring to see that Polyperchon was preferred before him in the Protectorship and sovereignty of the realm, began to treat with his friends, of getting the kingdom into his own hands, and sending underhand his Agents to Ptolomei, renewed his former friendship with him, and desired that he would make an association of arms with him, and come away with his fleet out of Phenicia into Helefpont: The like he did to other Commanders and Cities, intreating them to joyn in arms with him, [Idem, with Plutarch in Phocia.]

When Antigonus, returning with his army out of Pisidia into Phrygia, came to the City of the Creteuses, he was there advertised of all these matters by Aristodemus of Miletum, which pleased him well, for hereupon he presently founded his hopes of sovereignty in his mind, [Diodorus, with Plutarch in Eumene.] for being left sole and absolute Commander over all Asia by Antipater, and having a greater army there, than any other, he made no doubt of seizing upon all the Kings treasure there, whilst there was none to oppose him. He had then in his army, 60 thousand foot, and 10 thousand horse, and 30 Elephants; and saw that he had means to encrease, if need were, his army at pleasure: for that drawing foreign Nations to his service, Asia was well able to feed and pay them all abundantly: Wherefore calling a Council of his friends, he declared to them, That his purpose was, to put for all; and thereupon, assigned such and such of his friends, to several Offices and Commands, and desired them with huge promises made to every of them, to stand by him and assist him what they could, in what he went about; for that he resolved to go thorough all Asia, and to put out out such Governours, as were then in office, and to put others of his own choice in their rooms, [Diodor.]

Antipater, who had the government of Phrygia upon the Hellespont committed to him, perceiving what Antigonus went about, and purposing to provide for one; went and set upon Cizicum, which was a great City, and of all others lay most opportunely for his occasions. He had in his company above 10 thousand mercenary Foot soldiers, and one thousand Macedons, Persian archers and slingers five hundred, and eight hundred Horse, with all manner of Engines of battery, and in great abundance. And the men of Cizicum, under a colour of a treaty for a pacification, obtained of him cessation of arms, for a time, and then drove out the time in drawing up articles upon which the surrender was to be made; but had in that time sent to Byzantium for aide and supplies of men and munition, of all sorts for the use of the Country, and stored the city with them; and with such provision as they brought with them. The end was, Antipater having been fooled by the men of Cizicum, and lost many of his men upon the place, was fain to leave Cizicum as he found it, and to return to his own government again, [Id.]

Antigonus, being then at Celene, halted him away, with 20 thousand choice foot, and three thousand Horse, to the relief of Cizicum, thinking hereby to have that City hereafter at his devotions. But coming a little too late, he sent messengers to Antipater, to expostulate the matter with him, and why he did it: and withall, to require him, to give up that government which he had into his hands, and to live there hereafter, in the quality of a private man, contenting himself with the revenue of one only City to live upon. That he refused to do, and presently disposed guards about the gates and walls, and other places of the City, wherein himself was; and then dispatched away a part of his army, with a Commander over them, to joyn with Eumenes, and to raise the siege from before Nora Castle, and having rid him out of that danger to draw him into a league and association of arms against Antigonus, [Id.]

Emil Probus tells us, that Eumenes toward the beginning of the Spring, under colour of submitting himself to Antigonus, and treating of conditions from day to day, at last put a trick upon him, and got both him self and all his people safe out of the Castle, [in Eumene.] But Justus, [lib. 4. cap. 2.] says, that Antigonus, when he found that Antipater had sent relief to Eumenes, raised his siege. And Diodorus, and Plutarch deliver, that Eumenes by the Mediation of Hieronymus Cardianus, his contrinman and true friend, was suffered to come out upon his word, and thus it was.

Antigonus casting with himself how to get all into his own hands, sent for Hieronymus the Historian, to come unto him, and employed him in a message to Eumenes, to deal with him to this effect, to wit, that forgetting what had passed between them two in the fight at Cappadocia; he would now be pleased to joyn with him in a firm league of love and friendship, and association of arms; offering to restore him far more wealth than he had lost, and a greater Province and Dominion, than ever he had before; and to make him chief of all his friends, and partaker of all his desires and fortunes. [Diodor.] And when Antigonus had drawn up a form of an oath, whereby to bind each other to a strict performance of conditions, and sent them to Eumenes; Eumenes took and corrected them in some points; and then put it to those Macedon Captains, which were in the siege against him, to judge which of the two was the better, and more indifferent daught. For Antigonus among other things, made mention of the Kings pertinacity, and as by the ways, but performance of all services and conditions, referred only to himself, and were made in his own name: whereas Eumenes in his draught, first joyned Olympias with the two Kings: and then secondly drew the oath in such terms, as purported that he would reckon them all friends and foes, as were friends and foes, not to Antigonus, but to Olympias and the two Kings. And when this seemed to be the more reasonable of the two; and Eumenes took his oath, to that they presently raised their siege, and sent to Antigonus, praying him that he would bind himself in the same form of oath to Eumenes. Mean whilst, Eumenes what ever hostages he had of the Cappadocians, sent them all home again. And Antigonus wrote back a sharp and taunting letter to those Macedons, for presuming to amend or alter any thing in the form of the oath, which he had prescribed for Eumenes to take, and willed them to besiege him again, as close as ever they did; but this came too late, [Plut.]

Eumenes, having after a years close siege, got out at last beyond expectation, stayed a while in Cappadocia: and there gathered together, such of his old friends and soldiers, as were now scattered about the Country, [Diodor.] And to begin the world anew, the friends of those hostages which he had restored, lent him Horse, and carriages, and Tents: and in a short time, there came into him, of his old Regiments, which which hitherto lay culling up and down the Country, to the number of 1000 horse [Plut.] For in regard that he was of himself a most active and industrious man, and sundry others there were, who were in like manner affected to the state, as he himself was: hence it came, that great multitudes of soldiers came flocking to him. To be short, within a few days, besides those five hundred friends, which were with him in the Castle, he had gotten together two thousand men, all ready bent to serve him, [Diodor.]

Antigonus, having sent some of his force to besiege Aridaeus, the Governour of the lesser Phrygia, marcht himself with a mighty army into Lydia, to turn Citus out of his Government there, but Citus having gotten notice aforehand of his coming, presently stuffed every Town of his, and place of defence, with a strong garrison, and went himself into Macedon, there to acquaint the Kings, and Polyperchon the L. Protector, with Antigonus his doings, and how his purpose was to revolt, and fall off from the Macedonian Government, and thereupon prayed aide against him, [Diodor.]

Then did Antigonus take in Ephesus at his first coming, having come within the city, which help to bring him in. But a while after, when Euclyus of Rhodes came thither, and in four ships brought with him six hundred men out of Cilicia, and 400 talents, which from thence were sent to the Kings in Macedon; Antigonus seized on it all for his own use: saying that he had need of it, to raise and pay foreign soldiers withall; by which act of his, he plainly discovered his intention to be, wholly to set up for himself, and to rebel against the Kings. This done, he then proceeded to take in the rest of the Cities, some by force, others by fair words, [Id.] And from this revolt it is, that Dexippus, Porphyrius, and Eusebius, reckon the 18 years of his principality in Scaliger's Græca Eusebiana [pag. 48, 184, 206.]

Cassander, crossing the Hellespont, went to Antigonus, in Asia, desiring his assistance, and assuring him of Ptolemei's concurrence therein. Antigonus was glad of his coming, and presently offered to assist him by land and sea. This he did under a colour, as if he would help him for his father Antipater's sake; but his main drift was, to involve him in as many wars and troubles, as possibly he could in Europe: to the end, that he might the more freely go on, and compass his own ends in Asia, and make himself King there, [Diodor.]

Polyperchon, Protector of the Kings, and ἰμπαρτῆς, (i. e.) Curate of the Macedonian Empire, wrote away a letter to Eumenes, in the two Kings names, requiring him thereby to stand firm to the Kings, and to make a party against Antigonus, as hitherto he had done; and therein to take his choice, whether he would come over into Macedon, and there joyn with him in maintenance of the two Kings lately, or would stay in Asia, and have supplies sent him thither of men and money, and munition, to oppose Antigonus, who had now openly declared himself a rebel against the Kings, And that if he stood in need of greater forces, himself would be ready with the Kings, and all the power that the kingdom of Macedon could make, to cross the seas, and to come into Asia, to joyn with him. The like letters were sent to the Treasurers in Cilicia, requiring them, out of those monies, which were at Quindi (where the Kings exchequer for Asia was kept, as Strabo lib. 14. p. 72. testified) forthwith to furnish him with 500 talents toward the reparation of his losses lately sustained, and out of the rest of the Kings monies, as much as he should call for, to hire and pay foreign soldiers withall. He also wrote his letters to Antigene and Tentamus, who between them, commanded three thousand silver Targateers under Antigonus, that they should put them over to Eumenes, and be assistant to him all that possibly they might; as the man, that was made absolute Commander and Governour of all Asia, under the Kings. And Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, failed not on his part, to write the like letters, requiring all men to come and aide both herself, and the Kings, [Diodor. with Plut. and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

Eumenes hereupon removed out of Cappadocia, having 500 Horse, and two thousand Foot only in his company; for he had not the leisure to attend their coming, who had promised to lift themselves under him, but were not then come: because Menander was coming on with a great army, which would not suffer him to tarry in Cappadocia, having professed himself an open enemy to Antigonus. But those who were left behind, following Eumenes three dayes journey, when they saw they could not possibly overtake him, returned into Cappadocia, [Diodor.]

Eumenes, making long stages, passed the mount Taurus, and came into Cilicia. Then came to him Antigene, and Tentamus, Captains of the silver Targateers, with their friends; in obedience to the command of the Kings, and having congratulated his happy escape out of so many and imminent dangers, they offered him their service, and promised to stand by him in his utmost dangers, and then came the Regiment of the silver Targateers, all Macedons, to the number of about three thousand, to present themselves, with promise of all duty and service to him, [Id.]

Eumenes

Eumenes, fearing the envy of the Macedons, if he being an alian borne in Cardia, in the Cherfoneus of Thracia, should bear himself as absolute General in the place; first waived the receipt of those 500 talents, which were ordered to him for his losses; saying that he needed not so great a summe, seeing he pretended to no principality there; [Diodor. and Plutarch.] Then pitched he his tent in the name of Alexander, and called it Alexanders pavilion, pretending that he was warned so to do, by a vision in a dream: and there caused a golden Throne to be set, with a Scepter and a Diadem; and there they met every day to consult of matters, hoping that the envy towards him would be the less, if he seemed to administer all things, under the majesty and title of Alexander. [Diodor. Plutarch, Emil. Prob. Polyamus, lib. 4. Strabon.] By this means therefore, and by carrying himself in all meetings, as an ordinary man, and by speaking every man faire, and with courteous language, he put off all envy from himself; and carrying himself in like manner toward the silver Targateers, being all Macedons, he grew very far into their books, so that every man said, that he was of all men most worthy to have the tuition of the Kings, [Diodor.] for in the fairness of his language, he sucked not to call them sometimes, but his low soldiers; sometimes his masters, and companions of his, in those Eastern wars; telling them, that they were the onely men who conquered the East: the onely men who out-wear Bacchus and Hercules, with their victories; That they were the men, who made Alexander Great; That by them it was, that he attained divine honours, and immortal glory in the World: desiring them withal, that they would not look upon him, as upon their Commander, but as upon their fellow soldier, and a man of their own company and body, [Justin, lib. 14. cap. 2.]

Then pickt he out certain choice men of his friends, whom he furnished with money in abundance, and sent them to take up and hire soldiers, upon large pay. Whereupon they presently dispersed themselves, some going into Pisidia and Lycia, and places bordering upon them, others into Cilicia, Cœlolyria, Phœnicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and did their utmost endeavour to lift what soldiers they could get; many Grecians also, seeing what large pay was offered, lifted themselves; so that in short time, they had gathered together a thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse: besides the silver Targateers, and those which Eumenes brought with him out of Cappadocia, [Diodor.]

Ptolemei, coming with his Navy to a Port called Zaphyrium in Cilicia, sent some of his Agents, to sollicite the silver Targateers, not any longer to follow or look after Eumenes, a man long since, proclaimed and devoted to death. He sent also to the chief officers at Quindi, advising them not to issue out any monies to him: But no man hearkened to one word he spake, because the Kings and their Governour Polyperchon, and Olympias herself, had written to, and required them to be obedient in all things to Eumenes, as to the Commander in chief and General of the kingdom, [Id.]

After this Antigonus sent one of his chief friends Philotas, with 30 Macedons in his company, to the silver Targateers, to feel the pulse, first of their Captains and principal soldiers among them, if by any largesse, or hope of reward, they might be drawn to destroy Eumenes, now that he was in their hands. But they found no man pliant to their desires, save onely Tentamus, one of the Captains of the silver Targateers; who not only promised for himself, but undertook also to draw over Antigene's colleagues, to their fowl design. But Antigene was so far from hearkning to him therein, that on the contrary he prevailed with Tentamus, to give off his purpose; shewing him that there were better things, and upon better grounds to be hoped for from Antigonus, who Eumenes, a man of a moderate fortune and a limited power, than all into his hands, would was already grown too great; and that he, having once gotten all into his own presently thrust them out of their places, and put in whom pleased himself of his own friends. Then did Philotas deliver to the chief Captains Antigonus his letters, directed to the soldiers in general, whereby he required them upon sight thereof, to lay hold on Eumenes, and kill him; threatening withal, that if they did it not, he would come on Eumenes, and fall upon them with his army, and do exemplary justice on them for their presently and fall upon them with his army, and do exemplary justice on them for their disobedience herein: whereas they were not a little terrified; but Eumenes, coming in upon them, persuaded them, rather to follow the command of their Kings, and not in hearken to the words of a man who had now professed himself an open rebel. And in the end, having spoken many things pertinent to the present purpose, he not onely saved himself from an imminent danger, but also, obliged the multitude to him in a firmer band of duty and affection, than ever they were before, [Id.]

And presently gave order to march, and went into Phœnicia, and there gat together what ships possibly he could out of all the sea towns, and made him a strong Navy: to the end, that Polyperchon having a Fleet at command, might upon all occasions put over with his forces out of Macedon into Asia against Antigonus. This therefore was the cause which made him stay the longer in Phœnicia, [Id.]

R r

Poly-

Polyperchon, mean while, made Clitus the Governour of Lydia, Ammiral of the Fleet, and sent him into the Hellespont, commanding him to stay thereabouts, and to take care, that no shipping passed that way out of Asia into Europe: willing him moreover to assist Arideus Governour of the lesser Phrygia, and who was at that time fled with such men as he had into the City of the Cyonians for fear of Antigonus, [Id.]

After that Clitus was come into Hellespont, and had taken the Cities of Propontis into his protection, and had joyned Arideus his army to his own, then did the Captain of the Garrison of Manychium, sent by Cassander, with all his Navy put to sea likewise, taking with him also Antigonus his Fleet, so that he was in all above one hundred ships; coming therefore to a sea-fight not far from the City of Byzantium, Clitus had the better of it, and sunk 17 of the enemies ships; and took no less than 40 more with all the men in them, [Id.] whereas if he grew over-joyed, it is no marvel, considering that having but a little before taken but three, or at the most four ships of the Grecians near the Isle of Amorgus, one of the Cyclades, he was content and suffered himself to be called Neptune, and bare a Trident in his hand; as [Plin. lib. 2. De form. Alexan. faith.]

Antigonus, hearing of the losse of his Navy at sea, sent for certain Barques from Byzantium, and put into them archers and slingers, and targateers, and such light armed men, as many as he thought fit, and landed them in Europe side; and these leaving upon Clitus his men who were gone ashore, and busie in making their Camp; put them into a fright, and thereupon they halted to their ships again: but were sore troubled, what for losse of their baggage, what for the misse of their fellows, many of which were taken prisoner. And in the mean time he provided other ships of war; whereinto he put many of his principal best souldiers, and sent them to the same place, with a strict charge to set violently upon their enemies; for that in so doing, they should no doubt overcome them. Thiele therefore, coming thither by night, under the command of Nicanor their Captain, let upon their enemies at the break of day; put them to flight at the very first assault, and bilging some of them with their beakes, took others with the men in them, which called for quarter: and at last, took all the rest of the ships and men; save only the Ammiral. Clitus himself left his ship, and fled to land, thinking to get into Macedonia; but in the way fell among Lytimachus his souldier, who slew him, [Diodor.]

Antigonus, having given the enemy this great blow, bare himself for master of the Sea: and halted now to make himself absolute Monarch of all Asia: Wherefore, taking with him 20 thousand foot, and 4 thousand Horse, the best of both sorts, that he could pick out of all his army, he marcht away towards Cilicia, to disperse those companies of Eumenes which there were, before his whole army came together, [Id.]

Jubilæ 23.

Eumenes, knowing Antigonus his design, endeavoured to reduce Phenicia where he then was, to the obedience of the Kings; because at that time it was unjustly possessed by Ptolemei: but failing thereof, he removed thence, and went thorough Cretolyma, purposing to get into those parts, which are called the Upper Provinces, [Diodor. lib. 18.] and having the silver Targateers with him, with their Captain Antigones, wintered in a country of Babylonia, which is called Cares, [Id. lib. 19.]

Eumenes, being there, sent to Seleucus the Governour of Babylonia, and to Pithon the governour of Media, to come, and together with himself, to assist the Kings against Antigonus, who rebelled against them. Seleucus sent him word that he would do what service he could for the Kings: but commanded by Eumenes, who stood long since a condemned person by the Council of the Macedons, he would not: and withal sent under-hand to Antigones and the silver Targateers, to depose Eumenes; but they would not, [Id. ibid.]

Eumenes, commending the loyalty of his souldiers, went forward to the bank of Tigris, and there encamped, 300 furlongs off from Babylon: and there lost some of his men, by the rising of the Natives upon him. From thence he purposed to go forward to Susa, both that he might there recollect his souldiers out of the upper Provinces, and also take and make use of the Kings monies, which lay there, for his urgent and necessary occasions. But Seleucus coming upon him near the Euphrates, he was put in danger of losing his whole army by a sudden inundation, which Seleucus brought upon him, by opening the head of an old dam or fluce, and letting in the water upon his Camp, which was ready to drown all. Wherefore he and his men were faine to flee from thence to a piece of upper ground, and there they spent that day; casting in their minds, how to remedy this inconveniency. And the next day they got 30 flat-bottomed boats, wherein they transported the chief part of the army, without impeachment of the

the enemy: For Seleucus had nothing but horse with him, and them also far interior to Eumenes in number: And now the night came on, when Eumenes, taking care of his carriages which were left behind, went back with his Macedons again over the river, and there by the means of the Natives, found a place, where to let out the water another way, and so to make all that country dry and passable again: which Seleucus perceiving, and withal, desirous to rid his country of such guests, as soon as possibly he could, sent messengers to offer them a truce, and to suffered them to march away without interruption. And to Eumenes, having escaped out of Seleucus his hands, beyond expectation, came with his army into Persia; or rather into the country of Susa, having then with him 16000 Foot, and 1300 Horse, and then, having refreshed his army after their hard and miserable march, he sent to the Commanders of the upper Provinces, to send him in, forthwith, both men and money, for the service of the Kings, [Id. 18. and 19.]

Attalus Polemo, Antipater and Philotas, all Captains, taken in the overthrow of of Alceus, and committed to prison in an exceeding strong Castle, hearing that Antigonus was marched up into the upper Provinces, (Diodorus saith, that at that time he was in Melopotamia) and having gotten every man a sword, and being but eight in number, at midnight, set upon 4 hundred men, then in the Garrison: and seizing first upon Xenophiles, the Captain of it, threw him down the rock of the Castle, which was one furlong high, & having killed some, & forced the rest, let fire on the houses within the fort, whereupon they which were without, attending the issue of their attempt, came, and were received into the Castle, to the number of fifty men; But being in, and not agreeing among themselves, whether they should make good the place, attending supply from Eumenes, or leave it, and shift every man for himself, the souldiers of other Garrisons, not far off, to the number of 500 foot, and 400 horse, and upwards, and the Natives thereabouts, to the number of 3 thousand came in, and making a Captain one of themselves, besieged the place round; Docimus, who advised to leave the place, clyping a way down the hill, without a guard to keep it, treated by a messenger with Statomice the wife of Antigonus, who lay not far off, and with one only in his company, gat out, and went to her: but she, not keeping her word with him, laid him fast again; But he that went with him, made himself a leader and guide to the enemy, and led them up the castle, and with them, being a considerable number, possessed himself of a strong place in it. Nevertheless Attalus, with the rest, which were of opinion to maintain the fort, kept on fighting from day to day, in manifold wife, [Id. lib. 19.]

Pitho, who was Governor of Media, having slain Philotas, who was Governor of the upper provinces, put his own brother Eudramus in his room: Whereupon the other Governors combined together, fearing least they might also be served with the same sauce, because Pitho was a man of a turbulent humor, and used to put himself upon great matters, and having overthrown him and slain a great part of his men, they drove him quite out of all Parthia: whereupon he came into Media, hoping to have relief there, but finding none, he retired to Babylon, and there desired succour from Seleucus his hand, [Id. lib. 19.]

Eumenes, continuing in the Country of Susa, for want of victuals, divided his whole army into three brigades, and yet so marching through the country, found great scarcity of corne every where; but was faine to give them instead thereof, rice, and a kind of Indian wheat, and the fruit of palm tree, whereof there was great abundance in those parts. Now although he had afore-hand sent the Kings letters to them of the upper Provinces, to be aiding to him; yet he again sent other letters to them of his own, to request them to come unto him with all their power into the country of Susa. But his Agents found them all in a body, met together against Pitho, [Id. ibid.]

The chief among them all, and the man on whom allies were most fixed, was Peneftes, whom Alexander had heretofore made the chief Squier of his body, and Governor of Persia; he had about him Persian Archers, and Slingers, to the number of ten thousand, and of other Nations, taken into the rank of Macedons, 3 thousand, with 6 hundred horse, of Greeks and Thracians together, and of Persian horse, 4 hundred; Polemon a Macedon, Governour of Carmania had 1500 foot, and 700 horse; Sibyrus the Governour of Arachofia had one thousand foot, and 610 horse. Androbazus was there, with 1200 foot, and 400 horse, sent from Oxyarta, the Governour of Parapamylus; Stafanor the Governour of Aria, and Drangia, with some Bactrians, made 1500 foot, and one thousand horse. Out of India came to them, Eudamus (whom Arrianus calleth Eudemus, and Curtius Eudemom,) Governour of the Oxycracans and Mallians, with 300 horse, and 3 thousand foot, and 120 Elephants, which he got, when he treacherously slew Porus the King of Indians: so that they amounted in all, to 18700 foot (though the particulars make 20000.) and 4600 Horse, [Id. ibid.]

These, when they were all come to Eumenes, in the Country of Sufiana, called a publick council, where arose a hot dispute, especially between Peneceus and Antigonus Captain of the silver Targateers, about the choice of a General. But Eumenes had long before taken away all occasion of that dispute, by erecting a pavillion for Alexander, and erecting his throne therein, wherein all meetings were to consult of publick affairs as in his presence, [1b.]

And then coming all together to Sufa, Eumenes took out of the Kings treasure there, so much as the Kings service then necessarily required, for the Kings letters to the keepers of their treasure there, had required, that they should issue to Eumenes alone, to much money, without stint, as he required. Wherefore he gave the Macedons six months pay before-hand, and to Eudamus, which brought thole Elephants out of India, he gave two hundred talents, under colour of defraying the charge of thole beasts, but indeed to oblige the man himself to his devotion: for he saw well, that if any controversy should arise among them, that party was most like to carry it, to which he with his beasts should apply himself. The rest of the Governours paid every man his own soldiers that he brought with him. This done, Eumenes continued a while in Sufiana, to refresh his army after their hard journey, [1bid.]

Philippus Aridaeus (one of the two Kings) with his wife Euridice, by the command of Olympias, were murdered: having reigned six years, after the death of Alexander, [Justin. lib. 14. cap. 5.] and four months over, as [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 115.] Id. and Porphyrie [in Græc. Euseb. pag. 228.] about the 22 day of our September.

Cassander, the son of Antipater, besieged Olympias with her grand-child Hercules, the son of Alexander the Great, and his mother Barthe, in a Town of Macedonia, called Pydna. In the beginning of the Spring following, all provisions failing, Olympias was forced to dismisse her soldiers; and her self shortly after, upon promise of life, which she could hardly obtain, yielded her self into Cassanders hands, [Diod. and Justin. lib. 14. cap. 6.]

Antigonus, removing out of Mesopotamia, came into the Country of Babylonia, and there confederating with Seleucus and Pitho, and receiving some supplies from them, he made a bridge of boats over the River Tigris; and there crossing the River, he marched away with all speed against Eumenes, wherefore Eumenes being before-hand advertised, gave in charge to Xenophilius the keeper of the Cattle in Sufa, to issue out none of the Kings monies to Antigonus, nor to come out to a party with him, at any hand; and so went with his armies, and manned the bank of Tigris all along, from the head thereof, to the very sea, with forts every where built upon the bank thereof: and because that work, by reason of the length thereof, required no small number of men, therefore Eumenes and Antigonus obtained of Peneceus to lend them 20 thousand archers more out of Persia, [Diodor. year. 1. Olymp. 116.]

Antigonus, going with his army to the Kings palace in Sufa, there made Seleucus, Governour of that Country, and leaving a sufficient army with him, willed him to besiege the Cattle there: and when Xenophilius the Treasurer, refused to obey his commands, he about the rising of the dog-star, with his army marched by night-journeys to the River Copates, where it falls into the Tigris; but lost a great multitude of his men, by the way, in regard of the excessive heat of the season: and whereas he found that river, when he came to it, to be four acres broad, therefore he got together a small quantity of flat-bottom'd boats, and in them put over some of his Foot, bidding them there to attend the coming of the rest. Whereof Eumenes being advertised by his scouts, (and he was at that time but 80 furlongs off from the place) presently with four thousand Foot, and 1300 Horle, passing the bridge of Tigris, found three thousand Foot, and three hundred Horle, of Antigonus his army put over, and no less than six thousand of others, who were foraging about the Country; all these he suddenly fell upon, and routed them. As for the Macedons which made resistance, he forced them to the river; where running headlong into their boats, and overcharging them, they sunk, so that few of them escaped: and they that would not venture upon the River, were taken prisoner, to the number of four thousand: so that Diodorus. But Plutarch saith, that when Antigonus passed the Passigris, and the rest of the army perceived it not, Eumenes himself met him, with his own company, and slew many of his men, and filled the River with dead carcasses, and besides, took four thousand prisoners.

Antigonus, seeing he could not passe that River, retired with his army toward a city called Balaca, seated upon the River Ullae, where staying some certain dayes, he refreshed his army, which was tired out with the vehemence of the heat, and proposing from thence to go to Ecbatane, he went not by the high-way, both by reason of the immoderate heat, and because it would take him up no less than 40 dayes journey, in going; but by the Cossians, which was the shorter cut, and not so exposed to the scorching of the sun, as the other was, wherein nevertheless, he lost a multitude of his men, men, and hazarded all the rest, and yet at nine dayes end, hardly came to any habitable place in Media: where when the whole army began to gremble, for that within the space of 40 dayes, they had received three such blows, he commanded Pithon to go over all Media, which he did, and brought him in two thousand Horle, and a thousand Horles ready furnished, and to many loads of munition, that all the army might thereof be completely furnished; and withall, five hundred talents out of the Kings treasure. Antigonus disposed of thole Horle among his other Troops; and distributed the Horles, among thole who had lost their own, and gave the beasts of draught or carriage, freely among thole that wanted them, whereby he quickly regained the love and favour of his army again, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 116.]

Eumenes with his men, removing from Palutigris toward Persia, came to the Regal seat of the kingdom, called Persepolis at the end of 24 dayes march; where his whole army was entertained, and most magnificently feasted by Peneceus the Governour of that Province, after sacrifice offered to the gods, and among them to Alexander and Philip; and as Plutarch adds, a sheep was given to every man of them, for his own particular sacrifice. But when Eumenes perceived that his purpose was hereby to ingratiate himself with the army, and to gain to himself the sovereign power and command thereof, he caused a forged letter to be written to himself in the name of Oronates the Governour of Armenia, an intimate friend of Peneceus, in Syriac characters, purporting that Olympias, with Alexanders youngest son, having destroyed Cassander, had recovered again the kingdom of Macedonia, and that Polyperchon, with the main power of the Kings army and his Elephants, had put over into Asia, against Antigonus, [Diod. lib. Polyperchon, lib. 4.] These letters therefore going for current, every man cast in his mind, that Eumenes must be all in all, and the great man to advance whom he pleased, and to punish whom he thought fit, and therefore resolved to depend on him: and he, as he found any averse from him, called them in question, in form of law; beginning with Sibyrtius the Governour of Archachia, and so made them all afraid; and in the mean time courted Peneceus, and held him on, with all terms of love and friendship: telling him what beaps of honour and wealth he would cast upon him when time should serve; and by that means held him quiet, from attempting any further against him, as he had begun to do, [Diod. lib.]

And being further desirous to oblige the rest of the Governours of Provinces, and Commanders to himself, he made as though he had wanted money; and therefore exhorted them to contribute what they could spare, for the Kings service: and having by this means gotten out of them to the summe of 400 talents, he made them who seemed most fickle to him before, most sure to him now, for fear of losing the monies which they had lent, [Id. lib. and Plut. in Eumene.]

In the lesser Asia Artalus, and the rest of the Commanders with him, after one year and 4 months siege endured, and much hardship suffered therein, were forced at last to render themselves, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 115.]

In the greater Asia, Antigonus removing with his army out of Media into Persia, Eumenes preparing to march against him, and offering sacrifices, fell a feasting with his Captains: and therein following their humor, over-drunk himself to lary, that he was fain to lye by it, and so hindered his march for certain dayes. Whereupon his soldiers said, that other Generals could feast, but Eumenes could do nothing but command and fight. Yet after a little while, he recovered himself, and went on upon his march, where Peneceus and Antigonus led the Van: and he in a Lictier came after with the Elephants. And now the two armies were within a dayes journey each of other: when the scouts came in, and brought tidings of their approach, and what numbers they were, and what wayes they took; whereupon each party prepared for the field. But when Eumenes, lying in his Lictier, came not into the Camp among them, the chief soldiers in every company, resolved not to stir a foot further, unless Eumenes himself came into the Camp among them. Whereupon he was carried in his Lictier, and so went from one quarter to another throughout the army, and gave order every where for the ranging of it, whiles Antigonus lookt on, and laughed at him for his labour: and so the battles were ranged on both sides, but could not come to fight, the ground was so bad that lay between them, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 116. Plut. in Eumene.]

Wherefore drawing off each from other three furlongs space, they spent four dayes, in light skirmishes, and forraging the Country thereabouts, being pinched on either side, with hunger, and want of other necessities: and on the fifth day, Antigonus fell again a practising with Eumenes his army to betray him, upon hopes of huge rewards: but his agents were sent away by the Macedons with great indignation and threats, if they offered to come again in that errand. After which Eumenes having gotten intelligence that Antigonus had a purpose to remove his Camp by night, three dayes journey off, to a place called Gubiene, a country abounding with all provisions, sent some trusty men under colour of run-aways, to inform Antigonus, that Eumenes would would fall upon his Camp that night: and whiles Antigonus was preparing to receive him there, Eumenes stole away with his army, to get to Gubiene before him, and there to take up his station for his Camp. Antigonus finding at length that Eumenes had put a trick upon him, though Eumenes was gotten six hours march before him, yet he followed after him; and willing Pitho to come fairly after, with the main body of the army; he, with a company of the swiftest that he could chuse, gat before him, and shew'd himself upon a hill, where Eumenes must needs see him. Eumenes gathering thereby, that Antigonus with all his army was there, made a stand, before he came to the very place, where he intended to pitch his Camp, and there ranged his battle in array, and the mean while, came Antigonus his army up unto him: thus these two great Generals used their wits, and put tricks each upon the other, [Diodorus lib. 18.]

And here now, being in the Country of the Paræceni, these two Generals ranged each his army, in excellent array, and with great judgement; as Diodorus sets it down at large. Eumenes had with him 35 thousand Foot, and six thousand, and one hundred Horse, and 114 Elephants. Antigonus on his part, had 28 thousand Foot, and upwards: 8500 Horse, and 65 Elephants. These fell to work in most manfull wise, and continued on the fight without shrinking on either side, till almost midnight, the moon beamed then at full. When being spent on both sides, they were fain to give off fighting, and to fall to work upon encamping: there died on Antigonus his side, 3700 Foot, and 54 Horse, and about four thousand maim'd. Eumenes lost of his Foot 540, and a very small number of his Horse, and upward of 900 hurt, [lib. 18.]

Eumenes would fain have gotten the copies of such as he had left to bury them, in signe of a total victory: but the army would not, but would needs return to the place, where their stuff was laid, being somewhat far off; and so Eumenes was fain to let that alone.

But Antigonus forced his men to camp near the place where the battle was fought, and where his men lay dead, &c. there burying them, bare himself for master of the field; and gave it out, that the victory was his, saying, that he who had power to bury his dead, was ever to be counted conqueror of the field: so having buried them by break of day, and detaining by him the herald which came to him, to beg the bodies of the dead, sent him back at night again, and gave leave to come and bury the bodies the next day.

But himself having sent away the herald, presently marched away with all his army, and by long stages came to Gamarga in Media, far off from Eumenes: which Country, being of Pithons government, was wonderful plentiful of all provisions, and able to maintain great armies, [lib. 18.] And so Eumenes having beaten Antigonus in the Country of Paræceni, sent him away to take up his winter quarters in Media, [Emil. Prob. in Eumene.] in a place there called Gadamia, al. Gadaris, as Diodorus, or Gadamaris, as Polyanius nameth it.

Eumenes, hearing by his scouts that Antigonus was gone, would not follow after him, both because his army was not in case, and also for that he had a great desire to enterr his dead, in the most solemn wise, that possibly he could. Among whom there was one Cereus, which commanded those who came to him out of India, at whose burial there grew a great contention, between his two wives, there present, which of them should have the prerogative and honour, to be burnt alive with him; the younger of the two having gotten the preeminence of the other, who was great with child, went into the fire, and left the other to live, whether she would or no; but the allo, for very grief thereof, pined away and died, as Diodorus more at large declareth.

Eumenes, having finished these obsequies, removed from thence, unto Gabiene, which was distant from where Antigonus lay with his army, if one would go thorough the Countries which were inhabited, 25 dayes; but if thorough the desert, then but nine dayes journey: so far did they winter each from other, and gave their armies leave to breathe, and to recover their spirits again, against the next spring, [Id.]

In this mean while, Cassander the son of Antipater, desirous to make himself absolute King of Macedon, made away with Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, and married Thessalonice, the daughter of Philip, (not of Arideus, as Justin mistaketh it) and Alexanders own sister: and that done, sent Alexander the son of Alexander the Great, being a very child, with Roxane his mother, to be kept in the Castle at Amphipolis, [Dind. year 1. Olymp. 116. Justin. lib. 14. in fi.]

When Eumenes his soldiers had taken a little breath, they grew heady and insolent withal, and in spite of their Commanders, camped where they listed all the country of Gabiene overslo that some of their tents were no less than a thousand furlongs off from their head-quarter, [Plutarch] for they chose their quarters, not according to any discipline discipline or order of war; but to satisfy the luxurious appetite of their own humours; [Emil. Prob.]

Antigonus, being advertised hereof, & finding himself too weak for the enemy, whiles he was in any good array, relolved to let upon them, in this disorder as they were: and therefore casting it abroad, that he would march with his army out of Media into Armenia upon the sudden, & in the depth of winter, ἡ δὲ ἀρχὴ χειμῶνος ὄρεται, saith Diodorus, (i. e.) about the season of the Winter Tropic: leaving the ordinary way, marched thorough the Desert, making fires in the day time, and putting them out at night, least that any perhaps seeing them a far off, might discover his approach to the enemy. But when they had spent five dayes in this tedious journey, the soldiers for very cold fell to making of fires by night as well as by day: which some of the dwellers in the Desert espied, and presently getting upon Dromedaries which commonly run 1500 furlongs in a day; gave notice thereof to Eumenes and Pancestes, [Diodor. Plut. and Emil. Prob.]

Pancestes stood like a flock at the hearing of this news, and seeing the rest no less amazed therat than himself, began to think of running away; but then came Eumenes, and dispersed this cloud, bidding them not fear, and assuring them, that he would take order, that the enemy should not come into those parts, these three dayes, no nor four: or as Emilius hath it, not in five; wherefore he sent messengers about into all parts, to require them to repair to their head-quarter: and then he went about himself with certain nimble officers, and caused fires every where upon the hill Countries to be made, so as Antigonus might see, and take notice of them: and all within the compass of some 70 furlongs, that from thence Antigonus a far off might gather, that all his army was there come together. Antigonus espising those fires, began presently to imagine that he was betrayed, and his counsels discovered by some of his own people, and that Eumenes was coming to fall upon him with his whole army: and fearing to hazard his tired army, against Eumenes his fresh and lusty soldiers, turned a side out of the plain, into a more winding way, and there staid one whole day, to rest his men, and to refresh his beasts, that all might be in the better case to fight, if need should be, [Idem. and Polyanius, stratag. lib. 4.]

Mean while Eumenes his army, for the most part, was come to their Rendezvous: and his soldiers seeing his surpassing dexterity and wisdom in ordering things, desired him to order all matters him self: whereupon Antigenes himself, who had ever hitherto stood firm unto him, and Theudamus, the two Commanders of the silver Targateers, moved with envy, practised with other Captains of the army to kill him; which when Eudamus, who commanded the Regiment of the Elephants, and one Phadimus, (being two of those, who had lent him monies, and were in fear of losing it, if he miscarried) understood, they forthwith disclosed the practice to Eumenes: and he, saying, that he had to do with a company of brut beasts; went presently and made his will, and then burnt his Cabinet of papers, least after his death, they should tell tales, and prove dangerous to those that had written them, [Plutarch.]

And now the day came, that should try the matter between Antigonus and Eumenes, which Diodorus at large describeth. Antigonus had with him 22 thousand Foot, and 9 thousand Horse, with 65 Elephants. Eumenes his army consisted of 36 thousand, and 700 Foot, and 6 thousand and 50 Horse, and 114 Elephant. The field where they fought was very spacious, landy, and waste; whereupon such a dust presently arose, upon the first stirring of the Horse, that if a man were never to little off, he could not possibly discern what was done: which Antigonus observing, sent forth with away some Median Horse, and certain Tarentines out of Italy, to let upon the baggage of the enemy, which were left, about five furlongs off, from the place, where the fight was. And Pancestes the Governour of Persia, being frighted by Antigonus, got out of the dust with his horse, and drew with him some 1500 more. But the silver Targateers which were on Eumenes his side, making a strong impression upon Antigonus his main battle, flew upward of 5 thousand of them upon the place, and routed all the rest, not losing to much as one man of their company. And so Eumenes had the better of the day, having no loss in all that battle above 300 of his men, [Diodor. Plut. Polyen, stratag. lib. 4.]

When the Macedons, after the fight was done, saw their carriages all taken, and their wives and children, and whatever else was dear unto them, taken prisoners, and carried away by the enemy, great sorrow and lamentation there was among them the Camp all over: whose dolorous complaints Eumenes seeking to pacify and allswage, put them in mind that they had slain 5 thousand of the enemies, and if they would but bear up a while, they should force them to sue for peace, and then all would be well again. That the losse they to much lamented, was but only some a thousand women, and a few children and servants, which they might better regain by pursuing the victory, then by letting it go now they had it in their hands. But the Macedons plainly told told him, that they would neither flee now they had lost their wives and children, nor bear arms against them, and withal left a railing at him. Then Teucamus, of his own head, sent a messenger to Antigonus to desire him to send back their goods again which he had taken; and so the bargain was driven between them, that giving up Eumenes into his hands, they should receive every man his own again: And so the Macedons, and ten thousand Persians which came with Peneceſtes, and the other Governors of places, and ſouldiers for the moſt part, left Eumenes, and went to Antigonus in his Camp, [Idem, with Juſtin lib. 14. cap. cap. 3.]

The ſilver Targateers therefore, before they went, broke in upon Eumenes, and wreſted his ſword out of his hands, and bound his hands behind him with a garter, and upon the fourth day after the fight, delivered him bound to Nicanor, who was ſent by Antigonus to receive him; Eumenes deſired nothing of Nicanor, but that he would lead him through the miſt of the Macedons, and give him leave to peak his laſt unto them: which done, he went before his keepers into Antigonus his Camp, then followed the army which had betrayed their own Commander, and who were now themſelves no better than to many captive ſlaves; and went in triumph of themſelves, into their Conquerors Camp; and to make it a compleat triumph of themſelves, the Elephants alſo, and the auxiliaries out of India, brought up the rear. But Antigonus, for very ſhame and reverence of the old familiarity and friendſhip that had been between them two, would not ſuffer him to be brought unto his fight, but affigned him certain ſouldiers to keep him, [Plutarch in Eumene: Juſtin, lib. 14. cap. 4.]

Among thoſe that were wounded, was brought alſo Hieronimus of Cardia, the Hiſtoriographer, who having been ever in great eſtream with Eumenes during his life, found after his death, great favour alſo at Antigonus's hand, [Diodor. lib. 19. year 1. Olymp. 116.] This Hieronimus wrote a book, ἱστορίαι as Diodorus, [lib. 18. p. 62.] and Joſephus, [lib. 1. contr. Apionem, pag. 1050.] terme it, ἱστορίαι (as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſus in the poem of Roman Antiquities calls it) both importing as much, as Of the Successors of Alexander the Great, with the general Hiſtory of his own time.

Antigonus, having now gotten both Eumenes and all his army into his hands, laid fiſt hold of Antigeneſs, the Commander of the ſilver Targateers, and putting him alive into a coffin, there burnt him to aſhes: and then put Eudamus, who brought Eumenes his Elephants out of India, and Celbanus, and ſome others whom he always had found his oppoſites, to death, [Diodor.]

When Onomarchus the Captain of the watch asked Antigonus, how he would have Eumenes to be kept? his answer was, as you would keep (ſaid he) a raging Lyon, or an unruly Elephant: yet afterward, relenting a little toward him, he commanded his heavy chains to be taken off from him, and a boy of his own to be ſuffered to attend him, and to help to anoint him, and gave leave to his friends, that would, to viſit him, and to ſupply him with neceſſaries. And now, although his own ſon Demetrius, and Nearchus the Cretian, were deſirous, and laboured to have his life, yet almoſt all the reſt that were about him, preſſed him by all means to end him out of the way: yet for all this, Antigonus took ſeven days time to think upon it; and then, fearing leaſt his Army might happen to grow into a mutiny about it, he gave order that no man ſhould be ſuffered to come at him, and command his daily diet to be withdrawn from him: for he ſaid, that ſure his hand ſhould never be upon him, who had formerly been his friend; and when he had neither eaten nor drank in 8 days ſpace, and the camp was ſuddenly to move, one was ſent in to him, unknown to Antigonus, and cut his throat.

Antigonus, in reſpect to his former familiarity with him, commanded his corps to be delivered to his neareſt friends, to be buried as they thought fit: and they buried it in an honourable, but a military way, all the army following the bier, and burnt it, and gathered his bones into a ſilver Urn, and took care to convey them to his wife and children in Cappadocia, [Diodorus, year 1. Olymp. 116. Plutarch and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

Antigonus, returning into Media with his whole army, ſpent the reſt of the winter in a towne not far from Ecbarane, and diſtributed his army here and there over all that Province, and eſpecially in the country of Rages, ſo called from ῥαγ becauſe there had been above a thouſand cities and townes deſtroyed by earth-quake in thoſe parts, as Strabo ſaies [lib. 11. pag. 514.] out of Perſidionus; where, when he diſcovered that Pitho, the Governor of Media, fought to oblige many of the ſouldiers by large gifts, and larger promiſes, to his own devotion, and to perſwade them to a revolt from him, he diſſembled the matter very handſomely, and gave it out, that he purpoſed to make Pitho Governor of the upper Provinces, and to leave a ſufficient army with him, to maintain them: He wrote alſo his letters to Pitho, and therein earneſtly entreated him to come away in all haſte unto him, to the end (ſaid he) that having conſulted together

gether upon ſome neceſſary matters, he might forthwith march away into the leſſer Aſia. Whereby, and by other letters ſent him from friends, as he took them to be, Pitho, who was then in the furtheſt parts of all Media, in his winter quarters, being grieved, came to Antigonus, who ſo ſoon as he had him, called him before a Council of war; and they quickly found him guilty, and chope off his head, [Diodorus, in ſupra.]

Antigonus, gathering all his army together, committed the Government of Media to Orontobazes, a Median born, but General of his army he made Hippotratz, who had 3500 forraign Foot ſouldiers under him. Himſelf taking with him the body of his army went to Ecbarane, where taking into his hands five thouſand talents of maſſe ſilver, he marched into Perſia, and it coſt him 20 days journey before he arrived at Perſepolis, the Capital City thereof, [Id.]

While Antigonus was upon his way thitherward, the friends of Pitho, and ſuch as were his conſorts in the plot which he was about, the chief whereof were Meleager, and Menoetas, with other well willers both of him and Eumenes, but were ſcattered abroad into all corners, met together to the number of 800 Horſe, and ſell fiſt upon the lands and poſſeſſions of ſuch of the Medes, as reſuſed to joyn with them in this combination, and then ſet upon Heroſtratus, and Orontobazus his Camp by night, and miſſed very narrowly of the prize they came for: but being over-laid with the multitude of their men, and having only enticed ſome of the Medes to run the ſame courſe with them, were ſain to retire; yet ſome of the nimbleſt of them, (and they were all horſe-men) made many incursions upon the Country people, and raiſed many hubbubs among them; but were at laſt encloſed in a place compaſſed about with Rocks, like a pinfold, and were there partly ſlain, partly taken. But Meleager and Canes, and the better ſort of them, that would not yield, died like men, with their ſwords in their hands, [Id.]

So ſoon as Antigonus came into Perſia, the people there did him all kingly reverence and honour, as to the man that was now, without contrivance, ſole Lord of all Aſia; there calling a Council of his Nobles together; he propounded to them the matter of the government of the ſeveral provinces to be conſidered of: in which conſultation, they left Carmania to Tlepolemus, Bactria to Staſanor, and Parapamiſus to Oxyartes the father of Roxane, becauſe they could not well be taken from them, to hold as they did before. Into Aria was ſent Euitus, and he coming ſhortly after to die, Eutagoras was put in his room, a man of wonderfull valour; and grave wiſdom withal, [Id.]

Antigonus ſent for Sibyrtius, a well willer of his, out of Arachofia, and confirmed him in his government of that province, and gave him a whole thouſand of the moſt turbulent and ſeditious ſilver Targateers, which had betrayed Eumenes; theſe he appointed to him, under a colour of ſerving him in the war, but indeed of purpoſe to deſtroy them; for he gave Sibyrtius inſtructions withal to employ them in all break-neck ſervices, till he had conſumed them, that there might not a man of them ever return into Macedon, or ſee the Greek coaſt again, [Diodor. lib. 19. with Plut. in Eumene and Polyamus, Strabo, lib. 4.]

Antigonus, finding that Peneceſtes was very much beloved in Perſia, made it one of his fiſt works to ſtrip him of that government. And when all the natives there, repined at it, a certain chief man among them, called Theſpias, ſpoke openly againſt it; and ſaid, That the Perſians would be governed by no other man but Peneceſtes: whereupon he ſlew Theſpias, and made Alcibiadus Governor of Perſia, and held on Peneceſtes with vain hopes, of preferring him to higher preferments elſewhere, until he had drawn him quite out of the Country, [Diodor. lib.]

Whiles Antigonus was upon his way to Suſa, Xenophilus, who had the keeping of the Kings treaſure there, being ſent by Seleucus, went and met him at Paſtrigris, and offered him his ſervice, in whatever he ſhould be pleaſed to command him. Antigonus received him very graciously, and made as if he honoured him above all the friends he had; fearing leaſt he might happily alter his mind, and keep him out when he came thither. But when he came into the Caſtle of Suſa, he poſſeſſed himſelf of it, and there got the golden vine, and ſtore of other ſuchlike rarities, to the value of 15 thouſand talents, all which he turned into ready coin, beſides Crowns of gold, and other preſents, and ſpoiles taken from the enemy, which amounted to five thouſand talents more, beſides a like quantity which he collected out of Media, ſo that in all he made 25 thouſand talents, [Id. lib.]

Antigonus left for Governour of the province of Suſa, one Apifiſus a native of the Country: but purpoſing to carry away all this money to the ſea ſide in Aſia, he cauſed cartage to be provided for that purpoſe, and for taking all along with him, he took his journey toward Babylon, [Diod. Olymp. 116. year 2.]

When at 22 dayes end he arrived at Babylon, there Seleucus, the governour of that province,

Province, received him with all royal presents, and feasted his whole army; but when he struck one of the Captains without acquainting Antigonus therewith. Antigonus willed him to give an account of all the monies of the publique flock, which he had there received since his coming to the place: But Seleucus answered him that he was not bound to make an account for that which was given him by the Macedons, for the service which he had done to Alexander in his life time: and when grutesch grew daily between them, Seleucus, finding himself too weak for Antigonus, and fearing lest he might happily be sent packing out of the World, as Pitho, the Governor of Media, was, he fairly stole away with 50 horse only in his company, and betook himself to Ptolomei in Egypt; for now all the world talked of his deponanarity, and how propitious he was to all, who in their necessities fled unto him, [Id. Ibid. and Appian his Syriae, p. 121.]

When Antigonus grew now very jolly, for that without being forced to draw blood of his old friend, and without stroke (strike), he had quietly gotten into the possession of Babylon, the Chaldeans told him, that if he let Seleucus go, all Asia would be his; and himself should one day lose his life in a battle against him, he repented him that he had let him go, and sent men after him, to take and bring him back again; but they, having perswaded him awhile, gave him off, and returned without him to Antigonus, [Diadumenus, ibid.] And he thereupon, turned Bitores the Governor of Melopotamia out of his place, for suffering Scicucus to pass that way, [Appia, ib.]

Seleucus, having got safe into Egypt, was entertained by Ptolomei, with all expressions of love that might be: and having laid open the proceedings of Antigonus against himself, stirred up Ptolomei to engage in a war against him, [Diod. ib. with Pausanias in his Attica, p. 5.]

Seleucus, from thence sent some of his trustie friends into Europe, to perswade Cassander, who then commanded all in Macedonia, and Lyfimachus, who did the like in Thracia, to make war upon Antigonus: and Antigonus, guessing what his intentions were, sent his Agents to Ptolomei, and Cassander and Lyfimachus, to entreat them all three, to continue their love and friendship to him as in former times, [Diod. ut supra] but Seleucus had to wrough with them, that they all joyned together with him in a firme league, against him, [Appia, ut supra].

Antigonus, having made Pitho, who came out of India, Governor of Babylon, marched forward toward Cilicia; and coming to Mallos, which is a city in Cilicia: there he distributed his army into their winter quarters, it being then when Orion sets, (i.e.) in our month of November; and he received in the city of Qundi of the same Province, 10000 talents: and 11000 talents more out of the yearly revenue there [Diod. ibid.]

And now Antigonus, was removed into the upper Syria, when Embassadors came to him from Ptolomei, Cassander and Lyfimachus, who being brought into him as he sat in Council, made their demands according to their instructions, which were that he would deliver up all Cappadocia and Lycia to Cassander, Phrygia bordering upon Hellespont to Lyfimachus, all Syria to Ptolomei, and the Province of Babylon to Seleucus; and all the common stock of monies which he had encroached upon since the death of Eumenes, to be shared equally among them: whereunto he answered roughly, that he was now upon making a war against Ptolomei, and that his purpose was not to leave any sharers therein with himself, either of profit or loss, [Diod. and Appia, ut supra, Justin, l. 15, c. 1.]

The Embassadors returning with this answer, Ptolomei, Cassander, and Lyfimachus, buckled themselves instantly to a war against him, by sea and land, [Id.] And Antigonus, perceiving what a storm was ready to fall upon him, sought the alliance and confederacy of other Cities and Nations, and Princes, for his assistance in this war: and to this purpose, he dispatch away Agellus to the King of Cyprus, Idomeneus and Melchion to Rhodes, and one Ptolomei, his own brothers son, into Cappadocia, with an army, Aristodemus into Laconia, with a thousand talents, to hire souldiers from thence, and disposed Becons and Carriers throughout all Asia, which was wholly at his command, thereby to give and get knowledge of all things that passed, in a moment.

Having taken this order, and being upon his march into Phenicia, there to provide him of a fleet, and encamping near to Tyrs, in Phenicia, he sent for the petty Kings and Governors of those parts, to come unto him; and when they came, dealt with them to joyn with him, in furnishing out a fleet, and in building of more ships, because all the ships that belonged to Phenicia, were at that time with Ptolomei in Egypt. He gave them order likewise, to bring him in 400000 bushels of wheat (for so much, came the yearly expence of his army) and then men on work, to fell timber, and to build ships, and to draw the materials for them, from mount Lebanon to the sea side, employing therein 8000 men to work, and 1000 beasts for carriages, [Id.]

Whiles

Whiles Antigonus was thus employed, and had his Camp by the sea side, came Seleucus with an hundred ships royally furnished, and in a scornful manner, skirted along under the noles of them; which when it seemed not to him to trouble the minds of his new associates, Antigonus had them be of good cheer, saying, that ere the end of that Summers they should see him put to sea with a fleet of 500 saile, as good as those. Mean while returned Agellus with his Embassi: out of Cyprus, and brought word that Nicocreon, and the most potent Kings of that Island had already confederated with Ptolomei, nevertheless, that Citicus and Lapius and Marrus and Cirenytes, would joyn with him: whereupon he left three thousand men under the command of Andronicus, to maintain the siege against Tyrs, and with the rest of the army marched against Gaza and Joppe, which stood out against him, and took them by force, and such of Ptolomei men as he found there, he took and distributed them among his own companies, to serve him in his wars, and placed Garrisons in both places to keep them in obedience: which done, he returned to his standing Camp before Tyre, and prepared all necessaries for a siege against it, [Id.]

At the same time Aristo, who was entrusted to carry Craterus his bones, delivered them to Phila, the daughter of Antipater, who was married first to Craterus, and afterward to Demetrius; whose father Antigonus had perswaded him to marry her, and when he shewed himself averse from the match, by reason of the inequality of years between them, the being by so much the elder of the two, he would always round him in the car with that saying out of Eurypedes,

Ὅρα τοῖς γυῖσι μέγ' ὅσον γαμβρόν, (i. e.)

In marriage look unto thy gain,

Though nature sometimes doth restrain.

Where he prettily put in γαμβρόν, (i. e.) to marry, instead of γαμβρόν, (i. e.) to serve, meaning that a man must do any thing to serve his own turn: but this Phila was a woman which was reputed to excell both in wit and widom, whereby she often repressed the tumultuous spirits of the most turbulent souldiers in the army, and preferred in marriage at her own cost, the sisters and daughters of the poorer sort among them, [Id. with Plut. in the Life of Demetrius.]

Aristodemus, being sent with other Captains into Laconia, and having there gotten leave of the Spartans, to raise souldiers there, got together eight thousand men out of Peloponessus, and upon conference with Polyperchon, and his son Alexander, joyned them both in a firme league of amity with Antigonus; and made Polyperchon their General, and Polyperchon he there presently made Commander over the forces which he had raised in Peloponessus, but prevailed with Alexander to passe over into Asia, to Antigonus, [Id.]

Ptolomei, another of his Captains, going with an army into Cappadocia, and there finding the City Amisus besieged by Afclepiodotus, a Captain of Cassanders, raised the siege, and secured the place: and to having sent Afclepiodorus packing, upon certain conditions, recovered that whole province to Antigonus, and marching from thence through Bithynia, came upon the back of Zibytes, King of Bithynia, whiles he was buile in the siege of two cities at once, that of the Affacians, and the other of the Chalcidians, and forced him to raise his siege from both, and then falling to capitulations both with him and with the cities that were besieged, and having received hostages of them, removed thence toward Ionia and Lydia, for that Antigonus had written to him, to secure that coast, with all possible speed, having intelligence that Seleucus was going into those parts with his fleet, and thither indeed Seleucus was come, and besieged the City Erythrae: but hearing of the approach of Ptolomei, the nephew of Antigonus, left it, and went his way as he came, [Id.]

Mean while Alexander the son of Polyperchon came unto Antigonus, where, calling together the whole army, with the strangers that were in it, he opened to them that Cassander had done, pretending before them, that he would revenge the murder by him committed upon Olympias, and deliver Alexander his Kings son, with his mother Roxane, out of prison, in Amphipolis, and break off that yoke, which Cassander had laid upon all the Cities of Greece, by his putting his garrisons into them, and then sent back Alexander, Polyperchons son, with five hundred talents more, into Peloponessus, [Id. with Justin lib. 15. cap. 8.]

Then, having gotten a fleet from Rhodes, with other new built ships of his own, he set saile for Tyre; and having all the sea at his command, kept it so, as no supply of victual, or other necessaries, could come thither, whereby that city fell presently into great distresse, [Diod.]

Ptolomei of Egypt, hearing what a declaration Antigonus with the Macedons had made concerning the deliverie of all Greeks from the thraldom of Cassander, made the like declaration for himself, as desirous that all the world should take notice, that he was no less zealous for the liberty of all Grecians, than Antigonus was, and then joyned to his party, Cassander the Governour of Caria, who was a man of a great power, and had many great Cities under his command. And although he had formerly sent three thousand souldiers to the Kings of Cyprus, yet he now sent them 10 thousand more under the command of Myrridon an Athenian born, and an hundred saile of ships, commanded by Polyclitus: but Generall over all, he made his brother Menelaus, [1d.]

These coming into Cyprus, joyned there with Seleucus and his Fleet, and in a Council of War, advised together what course was fit to take. The result of all which deliberation was, That Polyclitus with fifty sail should passe into Pelloponesus, and there make war upon Aristodemus, and Polypercon, and Alexander his son: That Myrridon with an army of foreign nations, should go into Caria, there to help Cassander the Governour of that Province, against Ptolemei, a Captain of Antigonus, which lay heavy upon Cassander; and that Seleucus, and Menelaus, staying in Cyprus, should bear up Nicocreon the King, and the rest of their confederates against their enemies, which warred upon them. Having therefore thus divided their forces, Seleucus went and rook Cerynia and Laphus: and having drawn over Stafacus King of the Malles to his party, he forced the Prince of the Amathusians to give him hostages for his fealty in time to come: as for the City Citium, seeing it would come to no agreement with him, he fell to besiege it with his whole army, [1d. ibid.]

About the same time, came 40 sail of ships, out of Hellepont and Rhodes, under the command of one Themion their Ammiral, to Antigonus: and after them, came Dioscorides, with 80 sail more; though Antigonus had already a Navy of his own, new built in Phenicia, to the number of 120 ships, reckoning in those which he left at Tyre: so that he had in the whole, 240 ships of war, of which there were 90 of four tire of oares: 10 of five, 30 nine, 10 of ten, and 130 open gallees. Then dividing this Navy, into parts, he sent 50 of them into Pelloponesus, and the rest he committed to Dioscorides, his own brothers son: with this charge, that he should keep the Seas, and help his friends at their occasions required: and that he should gain unto his party such of the Islands, as hitherto stood out against him, [1d. ibid.]

Polyclitus, Seleucus his Lieutenant, sailing from Cyprus, came to Cenchrea, which was a Port of Corinth; where when he found that Alexander, Polypercon's son, had fallen off from Antigonus, to Cassander, so that he now found no enemy there to encounter, as he expected, he changed his course, and set sail for Pamphylia: and from thence, sailed to Aphrodisiades in Cilicia, and there understood, that Theodotus, a Captain of Antigonus his Navy, passed by from Patara, a Port of Lycia, with the Rhodian Fleet, furnished with Mariners out of Caria, and that Perilaus with a land army, coasted along by the shoar, for the defence of the Fleet, if need should be. In this case he used his wits, to save himself out of this brake; for he landed his men, and laid them close in a fitting place where the land army must needs passe: and himself with the Fleet went and lay behind a Foreland, near to the place, waiting for the coming of the enemy: and so it fell out, that Perilaus coming along, fell into the ambuscament that was laid for him: where himself was taken prisoner, and of his men, some were slain, and the rest fell alive into their enemies hands. The Fleet at sea, seeing the land army engaged, halted to their relief: but then Polyclitus, coming upon them in this confusion, with his Ships in good array, put them easily to flight: so it came to passe that Polyclitus took all their ships, and the most part of the men in them: and among the rest, Theodotus himself their Ammiral, sorely martyred with wounds, of which he shortly after died, [1d. ibid.]

Polyclitus, having sped so well on all hands, sailed back first to Cyprus, and after that to Pelusium in Egypt: where Ptolemei richly rewarded him for so great a service: and withal, promoted him to a far higher dignity and place of honour than he was in before: as the author of so great a victory: but released Perilaus, and some other of the prisoners, which Antigonus desired by a messenger sent to him for that purpose. And then himself going to a place called Ecregma, came to a parlie with Antigonus: but Antigonus refusing to grant him what he demanded, he left him, and returned, [1d. ibid.]

Cassander put over an army out of Macedonia into Caria, both to help the Cities there which had confederated with Ptolemei, and Seleucus, and also to find Antigonus work there, that he might have no leisure to come into Europe: and the Commanders of this army, Cassander the Governour of Caria, and Prepelatus, hearing that Ptolemei, Antigonus his General in those parts, had laid up his army in their winter quarters, and that himself was now busie in the burying of his father, lately deceased, sent away Eupolemus, with 8000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, to a place called Caprima in Caria, to lie in ambuscament for him there: but Ptolemei, getting notice thereof by some that fled over to him, got together out of the next quarters 8300 Foot, and some

630 Horse, and with them falling unlookt for into the enemies trenches, and finding there all fast asleep, took Eupolemus prisoner, and forced all the rest to submit to his discretions, [Diodor. year 3 Olymp. 116.]

Antigonus, seeing that Cassander put in for the Sovereignty of Asia; left his son Dmetrius in Syria, with instructions to intercept Ptolemei's men, which he suspected were then coming with an army further up into Syria; and to that purpose, left with him 10 thousand Foot of other nations, and two thousand Macedons, 500 out of Lycia and Pamphylia; Persian archers and fencers 400, and moreover five thousand Horse, and upward of 40 Elephants, and four men for his counsellors, Nearchon, Pitho, who came lately from Babylon, Andronicus, and Philipus; all men of mature age, and judgement, and such as had attended upon Alexander in all his wars: for Dmetrius himself was but a young man, not passing the age of 22 years, [1d. ibid.]

Upon Antigonus himself, whilst with the rest of the army, he went to passe the Taurus, there fell a mighty snow, wherein he lost a multitude of his men: whereupon he returned back into Cilicia, where he advised himself of a better way to passe that mountain, and with little damage to his army; and to coming to Celenae in Phrygia, he there bestowed his army into their winter quarters, [1d. ibid.]

Tyre, when it had stood out the siege one whole year and three months, at last surrendered to Antigonus upon articles, by which Ptolemei the King of Egypts men, went away with their bag and baggage: and Andronicus was left to hold the place with a Garrison, [1d. year 2. Olymp. 116, and Olymp. 117, year 1.]

Medius, being sent for by Antigonus to come to him with his fleet, which he had in Phenicia, upon his way met with the fleet of the Civ Pydna, and brought both it, and all the men in it, under his subjection, [1d. year 3. Olympiade. 116.]

Cassander, the Governour of Caria, being over-laid by the enemy, came to this agreement with Antigonus, that he should give up all his army to Antigonus, and suffer all the Greek Cities there, to live after their own laws, and should hold the government which he there had, as by grant from Antigonus, and should carry himself as a firm friend to Antigonus in time to come, and for performance hereof, gave his own brother Agathon in pledge; yet shortly after, repenting him of his bargain, got his brother again out of their clutches, that had him in keeping, and sent his agents to Ptolemei and Seleucus, to come speedily and help him; which Antigonus took in such ill part, that he forthwith sent both by sea and land his forces, to set the Greek Cities at liberty; and to that purpose made Medius his General by land, and Docimus his high Ammiral by sea. These coming to Mileum, dealt with the inhabitants to stand for their liberty, set upon the Castle and took it, with the Garrison that was therein, and restored the City to her pristine liberty, [1d. year 4. Olympiade 116.]

Mean while Antigonus took Tralles, and going before the walls of the City Cauaus, and sending for his fleet, took that likewise, all save the Castle: and having cast a trench round about that also, he made continual assaults upon it, where there was any hope of entry. He had sent Ptolemei to the City Iassus, but he was faine to come back and joyn again with Antigonus, and so all these Cities came at that time into his subjection, [1d. ibid.]

The Cyrenians, falling off from Ptolemei, besieged the Castle there, so fiercely, as it they would presently have taken it: and when messengers came from Alexandria, persuading them to desist, they struck off their heads, and fell to work against the Castle harder than ever. Ptolemei, exceedingly moved herewith; first feather one Agis, a Captain of his, with an army; and withall, a navie to assist him by sea, under the command of Epanetus. Agis pursuing the war against these rebels vigorously, took the City of Cyrene by strong hand, and committed the authors of this sedition to prison, and then sent them bound to Alexandria, and disarmed the rest: and so having left things in order there, as he saw cause, returned into Egypt, [1d. year 1. Olympiade 117.]

Ptolemei, having had this good success at Cyrene, took shipping, and with his fleet passed over into the Isle of Cyprus, against those who rebelled there against their King; and having gotten Pygmalion, who traded with Antigonus, into his hands, put him to death: then took he Praxippus King of the Laphis, and Prince of Cerynia, who was suspected of a revolt, and laid them fast: he took likewise Stafacus, a petty King of the Mallians, and destroying their City, removed the inhabitants from thence to Paphos: which done, he made Nicocreon Commander over all Cyprus; and gave him the Cities together with the revenues of all the Kings which he had cast out of their dominions, and then went with his army into the upper Syria, and sackt the Cities of Posideum and Potamos in Caria; and that done, he went with a flying army, and took Mallus in Cilicia, and lould away all the inhabitants thereof for slaves, and wasted all the region thereabouts: and having stored all his army with wealth, sailed back again to Cyprus, [1d. 16.]

Mean while, Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, kept in Cœloſyria, expecting the coming of the Egyptians: but hearing what work Ptolemei had made of so many Cities in Syria, he left Pithon to command in those parts, leaving his Corſeleeters and Elephants with him, and he with his Horſe, and companies of light armed ſouldiers, highed him away in all ſpeed toward Cilicia, to aide them which for want of help were diſtreſſed there: but coming too late, and finding the enemies all gone, he returned ſpeedily to his Camp again, ſpoiling many of his Horſe by the way; for in ſix days ſpace, he marched from Mallus, 24 days journey by their ordinary ſtages, ſo that thorough immoderate travel, none of the ſervants or Horſe-boys were able to keep them company. [Id. lb.]

Ptolemei, ſeeing all goevery where as he would have it, for that preſent, returned into Egypt: but not long after, being put on by Seleucus, for the hatred he bare to Antigonus, he reſolved to march into Cœloſyria, and there to try it out with Demetrius; wherefore gathering all his army together, he marched from Alexandria to Peluſium, having with him 18000 foot, and 4000 horſe, whereof ſome were Macedons, and ſome hired ſouldiers: the Egyptians, ſome ſerved to carry their darts and weapon; and other luggage of the army, and ſome for ſouldiers, and having paſſed the deſert from Peluſium, he encamped near the old city of Gaza in Syria, not far off from the enemy. And Demetrius on the other ſide, called all his army out of their winter quarters and appointed them their rendezvous at Gaza; there to attend the coming of the enemy, [Id. lb.]

In the 117 Olympiade, Ptolemei overthrew in a main battle near Gaza, Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus, ſurnamed afterward, Poliorcetes, (i. e.) the City-taker: as Caſtor, the Hiſtoriographer reporteth, cited by Joſephus, (lb. 1. com. Apion. p. 1048.) the particulars of which fight are related by Diodorus Siculus in his hiſtory of that Olympiade, where he ſaith that there were taken priſoners of Demetrius his men, to the number of 8000 and upward of 500 ſlain; but that iſto be amended, and made 5000 out of Plutarch. But among the Nobles that were there ſlain, one was Pithon, who was at that time joyned in commiſſion with Demetrius, and Boetorus, a man who had long lived with Antigonus the father, and was ever privie to all his deſignes, and partaker of all his counſels.

Ptolemei and Seleucus took Gaza, but Demetrius, by the help of a good pair of ſpurs came to Azotus: about midnight following, having rode 270 ſurlongs, and from thence ſent to beg the bodies of his dead for burial: which Ptolemei and Seleucus not onely at firſt word granted, but alſo ſent him back his own pavillion, with all the furniture thereto belonging, free, and without ranſom, adding thereto a generous meſſage, that they thought not for pray, but for honour, and to ſee who ſhould wear the Garland. [Diodorus, Ur. Sup. Plutarch. in Demetrio, and Juſtin. lib. 15. cap. 1.]

Demetrius, being no longer able to hold out, in the caſe he was in, diſpatcht away a meſſenger with his letters to his father, who lay then in Phrygia, to pray in aide of him, and to come away ſpeedily to his help; and he himſelf coming to Tripoli in Puzenia, ſent for the ſouldiers that were in Cilicia, and elſewhere in Garrifons remote, and far diſtant from the enemies quarters, to come unto him, [Diodorus.]

But Antigonus, when he heard the news, ſaid that Ptolemei had now gotten the victory, of a company of beaſtleſſe boys; but that he ſhould fight next time with men: yet that he might not quell the courage of his ſon, and becauſe he lo deſired, he gave him leave to fight again with him himſelf, if he law cauſe. [Plutarch, in Demetrio.]

Ptolemei ſent the priſoners which he had taken into Egypt, there to be diſtributed, among the ſeveral regiments of his fleet: and when he had honourably enterred his own that were ſlain, he went forward, and ſet upon the Cities and ſtrong places of Phœnicia, beſieging ſome, and perſwading others of them to yield unto him, and having taken Sidon, he went and encamped before Tyre, and ſent to Andronicus, Captain of the Garrifon, there to render up the City to him, tendering him large promiſes both of wealth and honour: but he not onely answered, that he would never betray the truſt which Antigonus and his ſon Demetrius had put him in, but alſo uſed many reviling ſpeeches againſt Ptolemei, but yet a little after, when ſurprized by a muſiny of his own ſouldiers, he fell into his hands, Ptolemei forgetting that by-paſt railing of his, highly rewarded him, and took him into the number of his friends, and honourably preferred him. [Id.]

Seleucus, taking with him 1000 Foot of Ptolemei's men, (as Appianus ſaith it: for Diodorus ſayes but 800.) and 200 Horſe, went with ſo ſmall a train to recover his Government of the Province of Babylon; and coming with them into Meſopotamia, he there dealt with ſuch Macedons as he found dwelling in Carran, and ſome of them by

by perſwaſions, ſome by plain force, he drew to go along with in this journey of his. Now no ſooner had he ſet foot within the territory of Babylon, but the inhabitants came flocking to him; and offered him their ſervice in the recovering of his right. Polyarchus alſo, who bare ſome kind of office among them, came unto him to receive his commands, with a full thouſand of men compleatly armed. But they who ſtood for Antigonus, when they perceived the general, and irreſiſtible inclination of the multitude toward him, fled all to the Caſtle, which was commanded by Diphilus, and Seleucus, fell preſently to beſiege it: and having taken it by force, he there delivered ſuch children and friends of his, as Antigonus, when Seleucus for fear fled away into Egypt, had there committed to priſon. This done, he then ſet to railing of ſouldiers in the Country, and having bought Horſes, diſtributed them, among thoſe who were fit to ride them. And withal, carrying himſelf fairly and amiable unto all ſorts, made them all ready to run any hazard with him, and ſo in a trice recovered all his government of Babylon again. [Id. with Appian, in his Syria, pag. 121.]

But then Nicanor, whom Antigonus had made Governour of the province of Media, marcht againſt him with 10 thouſand Foot, and ſeven thouſand Horſe, and Seleucus made no tarrying, but went out to meet him, having with him in all little above three thouſand Foot, and four hundred Horſe, and paſſing the River Tigris, when he heard that the enemy was not far off, he hid his men in the ſennes thereby, purpoſing to ſet upon Nicanor at unawares, and Nicanor, when he came to the bank of the Tigris, and found no enemy there; went and encamped near to a poſt-houle of the Kings; little thinking the enemy had been ſo near. But the night following, when contemning his enemy, he cared not to keep a due watch, alter a military manner, Seleucus fell upon him, and raiſed a great tumult in his army, for when the Perſians put themſelves forward to fight, Euager their General, with ſundry others of their Commanders, happened to be ſlain: after which broile, the greater part of Nicanor's army, what for the preſent danger they were in, what for the miſlike they had of Antigonus his government, left him, and came to the ſervice of Seleucus. Whereupon Nicanor, fearing left at the next bout, his ſouldiers would deliver him up to Seleucus, fairly ſtate away with ſome few of his friends, and fled thorough the deſert home into Media again, [Diodorus.]

Seleucus, having by this means gotten a potent army about him, and continued his fair carriage to all men as before, eaſily procured the provinces of Media and Sula, and other countries bordering thereupon, to come under his ſubjection, and then ſent Ptolemei word, how he had ſped, having now gotten a full royal power and majeſty into his hand, as [Diod. year 1. Olymp. 117.] declarath. From whence it is, that from this year, Euſebius deduceth Seleucus his principality or reign; and with all notes, that the Editeſſe begin their Epoch, and the ſtory of the Maccabees their account of the Grecian reign. And out of doubt from the Autumne of this very year, that is, from Septemb. or Octob. of the year 440, according to the Julian Calendar, it is, that the compoſer of the ſecond book of Maccabees reckons his Grecian years, &c. the Jews there, aram Contraſtium, (i. e.) their account of Contraſts, and thoſe of Edeſſa, and other Syrians, their Epoch of the Seleucian race, and the Arabians, the years of Alexander Dabikerrain, as they term them, and yet the writer of the firſt book of Maccabees begins his account of the Grecian year, from the Spring precedent to this autumne, and Ptolemei of Alexandria, in his great Syntaxis begins his Chaldean account, from the Spring following.

Ptolemei of Egypt, ſtaying ſtill in Cœloſyria, ſent one of his Nobles about him, called Cilles, a Macedon born, with a great army againſt Demetrius, who lay encamped in the upper Syria, willing him to fight with him, and to turn him quite out of all, that is called Syria, or to coup him up, and tread him to dirt, where he lay. Demetrius underſtanding by his ſpials, that Cilles with his army lay at Myus careleſſely, without keeping watch or ward, leaving his carriages behind him, marcht away with a company of light-footed lad, which travelled all night; and a little before day fell in upon Cilles his Camp, put all in a conſuſion, took it, and Cilles himſelf priſoner, and with him ſeven thouſand ſouldiers, and a great booty beſides: yet becauſe he thought Ptolemei himſelf was coming after, with all his army, he therefore pitched his Camp in a place where he had a bog on the one hand, and a great Lough on the other to ſecure him. [Diodorus, year 1. Olymp. 117. and Plut. in Demetrio.]

Demetrius ſent news of this his good ſucceſſe to his father Antigonus, where he lay at Celene in Phrygia, ſoliciting him by his letters, either to ſend an army ſpeedily, or to come himſelf in perſon into Syria. Antigonus, having read the letter, was wonderfull joyfull at the news, both becauſe the victory was gotten by his ſons own conduct and ordering of matters in the fight, and alſo for that he had beſewed himſelf a man worthy hereafter, to wear a Crown upon his head. [Diodorus.] But Demetrius, with his father's leave, ſent back Cilles and all his friends to Ptolemei again, thereby, not to lie any longer longer in his debt, and to cry quittance with him for his former kindness in that kind, [Plur.]

Antignus with his army removed out of Phrygia, and having in few dayes passed the Taurus, came to his son Demetrius, And Ptolemei, by the advice of his Council, thought fit to leave Syria; but before he went, he laid waste and destroyed the principal Cities which he had there at that time in his possession; as Accon in Syrophenicia, and Joppa, and in Samarias and Gaza of Syria: and then taking along with him out of the country, whatever he could drive or carry, laden with wealth he returned into Egypt, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 117.]

A multitude of men there was, who seeing his good disposition, and clemency of nature, would needs along with him into Egypt; among whom there was one Ezechias Αιζαχας; (i. e.) a high Priest (perhaps a secondary one; for the chief High Priest at that time was Onias the first) of the Jews: a man of about 66 years of age, and much respected among his people, very eloquent and of much experience in the affairs of the world. This and much more of this Ezechias is related by Hecataeus the Historian (who conversed with him in Ptolemei's army) in a peculiar Treatise which he wrote, of the Jews: where he also maketh a large narration of another Jew, which he grew acquainted with, called Mosollamus. al. Mosollamo: as followeth.

When I went, saith he, toward the red Sea, there was one among the rest of a Troop of Horse of the Jews, which went to convoy us, called Mosollamus, a high-spirited man, and the best archer of all the company, who espied a certain wizard in the company which stood still; and desired all the company to do the like, whilst he observed a certain bird that flew to divine thereby: and asked him the reason why he stayed: and when the wizard showed him the bird which he had in his eye, and said withal, that if it were expedient for the company to stay there, that bird would stay where he was: but if he rose, and flew before them, then they should do well to go forward too: but if he flew back, then all the company ought also to return. Then this Mosollamus said nothing, but drew his bow, and shot, and killed the bird, and when the wizard and others there present grew angry at it, and cried shame of him for so doing: why are you so angry, quoth he? and why do you take this unlucky bird into your hands? Could he that knew nothing of what was to befall her self, tell any thing of what would befall us in this our journey? for if she had had any knowledge of things to come, she would never have come thither, here to be shot to death by Mosollamus a Jew.

Many things besides there are, which [Josephus in his book, contra, Apion.] recites, out of the same book concerning the Jews. As namely, that at that time, there were to the number of 1500 Priests, which received tithes, and governed all things belonging to the common wealth: and Demetrius Phalareus, in his Epistle to Ptolemaus Philadelphus (found in Aristas his book of the 70 Interpreters and in the same Josephus, lib. 12. Antiquit. cap. 2.) out of the same Author, yields the reason why no heathen Poet, or Historian, makes mention, either of those sacred books, or of those men who lived according to the rule delivered in them: to wit, for that they contain a sacred and a venerable rule, which was not to be taken into, or uttered by unhallowed mouths.

Antignus, when he had without stroke striking recovered all Syria, and Phoenicia, into his hands; took a journey into the country of the Arabians, called the Nabathæans: for, conceiving that they never much favoured his proceedings, he appointed one of his Nobles called Athenæus, with 4 thousand Foot, and 600 light-Horse, to fall in upon them, and robbing away what spoils he could get out of their Country. And now the time grew near when all bordering Nations used to come thither as to a common Mart, to sell off to them their commodities, and to buy from them the merchandise of their Country. To this Mart therefore the Nabathæans now went according as they were wont leaving their wealth, and old men with their wives and children, upon the top of a rock; Athenæus, watching this opportunity, marched speedily to this rock, and having marched out of the Province of Edom, the length of 2200 furlongs, in three dayes and three nights space, late in the night, the Arabians knowing nothing of his coming, possessed himself of it. The souldiers which he there found, he partly put to the sword, and partly made prisoners of them, and such as were wounded, he there left behind him; and carried from thence the greatest part of their mirth and frankincense, with 500 talents of silver, and slaying there again: and now he with his souldiers having gone 200 furlongs, could go no further for very weariness, and therefore rested them there, keeping neither watch nor ward; as presuming that the country people could not reach thither in two or three dayes after, [Diodorus, year 1. Olympiade 117.]

The Arabians, being accertaind of what had fallen out, by those which had seen the army of the enemy: left the Mart, where they were met, and returned to the rock, and being there more fully informed by the wounded persons which were left, what way they

they were gone, incontinently followed after them: and because Athenæus his men kept no watch, and after their long journey lay weary and fast asleep, some of their prisoners stole away from them: from whom when their country men, whom they met, had learnt how the enemies Camp lay, they halted to the place, and coming upon them at three of the clock in the morning, fell into their trenches, to the number of 8 thousand of them, and cut the throats of some snoring in their cabins; others that made resistance, they slew: to make short, they utterly destroyed all their Foot, only 50 of their Horse got away, and they wounded too, for the most part; and to the Nabathæans, having recovered their goods again, returned to the Rock: and by a letter of theirs written to Antignus in Syriac characters, complained of Athenæus, and his wrong doings, and excused themselves: to whom Antignus wrote back again cunningly, telling them, that Athenæus was well enough served by them: blaming him for doing what he had done, and assuring them, that he had given him no such order, [Id. ibid.]

But Antignus, having for a time made fair weather with these poor Nabathæans, shortly after, chole out of all his army, 4 thousand Foot, light-armed, and the twelfth of foot that he could find, and to them added 4 thousand Horse, willing them to take in their knapsacks, as many dayes victuals as they could well carry, and such as needed no cooking: and assigning Demetrius, his son, to command them: he sent them away in the first of the night, with this charge, that he should by all means be revenged of them. He therefore travelled 3 dayes journey thorough the Desert, halting to fall upon them at unawares: but their scouts perceiving the first approach of the enemy toward their borders, made fires, and by them gave notice of their coming to the Country: whereupon they presently got them to their Rock, to the top whereof there was but one way up, and that made by hand too; and there leaving their baggage, left withal, a sufficient guard to keep it; and the rest went and drove away their cattle, some to one place, some to another in the Desert. Demetrius, when he came to the Rock, and saw all the cattle driven away, presently went to besiege the Rock; but when they that were in it manfully defended it, and by the advantage of the place, had all the day long the better of it, Demetrius at last was fain to draw off: and seeing he could do no good upon them, made a peace with them, upon hostages given him, and such gifts as were agreed upon between them, and to removing with his army 300 furlongs off, encamped near to the Lake Alphatis, or Dead Sea, [Id. ibid.] but Ptolearch says, that he went thence, with a huge booty, and 7 hundred Camels.

Antignus at his return to him, having heard the relation of his voyage, blamed him for his making a peace with the Nabathæans: saying, that those barbarous people, having escaped, would thereupon grow more insolent than before: yet commended him for discovering the Lake Alphatis, seeing that from thence he might raise some yearly revenue to himself: and made Hieronymus Cardianus the Historian, his Treasurer for that revenue: whom [Josephus, lib. 12. cont. Apion.] noeth to have been made President of Syria by Antignus: and very deservedly blameth him, for that in his History he maketh no mention of the Jews, considering that he lived near unto, and almost among them; this Hieronymus was commanded to build ships, and to gather together in one place all the bitumen, or liquid brimstone that could be gotten out of that Lake: But the Arabians coming together to the number of 6 thousand men, set upon them as they were in their ships gathering this brimstone, and shot them almost all to death with their arrows; whereby Antignus lost all hope of making any standing revenue that way, [Diod.]

Antignus, understanding by letters from Nicanor the Governour of Media, and others, how Seleucus prospered in those parts, sent his son Demetrius with 5 thousand Macedon Foot, and 10 thousand mercenaryes, and 4 thousand Horse; with charge, that he should march to the very walls of Babylon: and having recovered that Province, should from thence march down to the Sea: and he, parting from Damalus in Syria, went vigorously on to fulfil his fathers commands. But Patrocles, whom Seleucus had left President of Babylon, so soon as he heard that Demetrius was falling into Mesopotamia, not daring to stay his coming, because he had but a small power about him; commanded the rest to leave the City, and that passing the Province of Sufa, and to the Persian sea: and himself with a company which he had about him, rushing in the bars of the Rivers, and dikes of the Country thereabouts, instead of so many Fortresses and Bulwarks for his defence, kept himself still within the bounds of his own government, and cast about, how to entrap his enemy: sending ever and anon tidings to Seleucus in Media how things went with him, and desiring aid to be speedily sent unto him, [Id.]

Demetrius, when he came to Babylon, and found the City left void of inhabitants, fell presently to besiege the Forts and Castles that were therein: and having taken one of them, gave the spoils thereof to the souldier; and turning out Seleucus his men, put therein therein a Garrison of his own, consisting of seven thousand souldiers; but not being able to take the other, in half, after some few days siege departed, leaving Archelaus, one of his truly friends, to maintain the siege about it, with five thousand Foot, and 1000 Horse: and himself forcing the time run out, which his father had appointed him, to finish his work in, bad his souldiers rap and read what ever they could light on in all that province, and take it to themselves; and then took his journey back into Asia; whereby, he left Seleucus more grieved; and better settled in his government than before. For why, said men, should Demetrius wait and spoil the Country, if he took it for his own? [Id. with Plut. in Demetrius.] Whereupon the Chaldeans reckon the Epocha, or beginning of the Seleucian reign in Babylon, from this time; rather than from the former.

Demetrius returning into Asia, quickly raised the siege, which Ptolemy had laid to Halicarnassus, [Plut. in Demetrius.]

And now Callander, Ptolemy and Lyfimachus, made peace with Antigonus, upon such articles, as follow, to wit, That Callander should command all in Europe, untill Alexander the son of Roxane, came to age. That Lyfimachus should hold Thrace; and Ptolemy Egypt, with the bordering Countries of Lybia and Arabia: And Antigonus should have the command of all Asia to himself: but this compact between them held not long, for every one took one occasion or other, to encroach upon more than his part came to, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 117.]

Callander, seeing Alexander the son of Roxane to grow up, and hearing a bruit cast abroad among the Macedons, that it was high time, that the young King should now be freed from his prison, and take the rule of the kingdom into his own hands, took a fright hereat, and gave order to Glaucia the keeper, to murder Roxane, and the King her son; and burying their carcases, in some secret place, should by all means possible conceal their deaths. [Id. 16.]

Parysades the King of Bosphorus Cimerius dying, after that he had reigned 38 years, left his kingdom to his eldest son Satyrus, which he held nine years only, [Id. year 3. Olymp. 117.]

In Peloponessus, Ptolemy a Captain of Antigonus, falling off from him to Callanders side, sent souldiers to a most truly friend of his, called Phenix, and one to whom he had committed the managing of the government of Hellepoint; advising him with all to man his Forts and Cities, and to stand upon his guard; and no longer to be at Antigonus his command. [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 117.]

On the other side, Ptolemy of Egypt cried out upon Antigonus, for that he, contrary to agreement, had put Garrisons of his own, into sundry Cities of the Greeks in Asia side: and thereupon sent Leonides, a Captain of his own, into Cilicia Aspera, and there possessed himself of certain Cities and places belonging to Antigonus; and moreover sent his agent to some Cities appertaining to Callander and Lyfimachus, that they would follow his advice, and not suffer Antigonus, to grow too fast in power. [Id. 16d.]

Antigonus sent his younger son Philippus, to make war upon Phenix, and others who had revolted from him in Hellepoint, but his son Demetrius, he sent into Cilicia against Ptolemy of Egypt, who going in hand with the errand he was sent in, routed the Captains of Ptolemy, that there were, and recovered the Cities which he had taken. [Id.]

Polypercon in Peloponessus cried out in like manner upon Callander, and affecting the government of Macedon, sent for Hercules, a son of Alexander the Great, begotten upon Barline, and now of the age of 17 years; and sent about to those, who were enemies to Callander, to help to set this young man in his fathers kingdom. [Id.]

Ptolemy of Egypt, having all Cyprus under his command, and finding that Nicocles the King of Paphos, negotiated under hand with Antigonus, sent two confidents of his own, Argasus and Callicrates, with instructions, to make away Nicocles; wherefore passing into Cyprus, and taking with them a certain number of souldiers from Menelaus, who commanded the army there: they betel the house of Nicocles, and then telling him, what Ptolemy's pleasure was, advised him, to dispose of himself for another world. And he at first went to clear himself of what was laid to his charge, but when he saw that no man hearkened to what he said, drew his sword and slew himself. Axiothes his wife, hearing of her husbands death, took her daughters, who were all young, and virgins, and fled them, and was earnest with the wives of Nicocles his brothers, to accompany her in her own death. Whereas yet Ptolemy had given no order concerning any of them, save only to preserve them. The brothers also of Nicocles, that every man his own doors upon him, and set fire thereon, and slew themselves, and to the whole race of the Kings of Paphos, came to a tragick and lamentable end. [Diod. 16. and Poly. Strateg. lib. 8.]

Agathocles King of Sicilia, falling about this time into Arie, there to make war upon the Carthaginians, there fell to great an Eclipse of the Sun, that the stars appeared every where in the firmament, and the day was turned into night, [Diod. year 3. Olympiades. 117. Justin. lib. 22. cap. 6.] which dreadful Eclipse of the Sun, the Astronomical tables they to have fallen upon the 15 day of our August, 11, this year. Epicurus, being now 32 years of age, read publicly both in Mitylene and Lampsacus five years together, [Diog. Laertius, in the Life of Epicurus.]

In Bosphorus Cimmerius, Eumelus, younger brother to Satyrus, compacting with some of the natives adjoining, laid claim to the kingdom against his elder brother, whereof Satyrus being informed, went against him with a great army, and passing the river Thapfus, when he came near his quarters, fortified his Camp, with his Carts and Waggon, wherein he had brought an infinite quantity of provisions: and ranging afterward his army in the field. Himself, as the manner of the Scythian Kings was, led the main battle, in his Army, he had not above two thousand Greeks, 21. one thousand, and as many Thracians, all the rest were Scythians, which came to assist him, to the number of 20 thousand, and no less than ten thousand Horse. Eumelus was borne up, by Ariophanes King of Thracia, with 20000 Horse, and 2000 Foot, Satyrus encountered first with Ariophanes, in a skirmish of Horse, and routed him; and then overthrew his brother Eumelus with his Foot, and forced all to retreat into the Kings palace, which was environed with a river, and steep rocks, and thick woods about, [Diod.]

Satyrus at first went and wasted the enemies Country, and set fire on their villages, and drew from thence a huge spoil, and then making away thorough their fen country, came to their wooden Castles, and took them, and crossing a river, felled a vast wood, thorough which he must needs pass, that would come to the Kings palace, in which work the whole army, spent three days, and so came to the walls of the Castle. There Meniscus, who led the mercenary companies, having gotten in at a passage, though he fought very manfully, was nevertheless, being overlaid with the multitude within, forced to retreat: and Satyrus coming to his relief, was wounded in the arm with a spear; which was so sore, that it forced him to retire to his Camp, and the next night died thereof. And Meniscus breaking up the siege, drew off the army, to a City called Gargaza, and from thence carried the Kings body down the river, to a City called Panticapaeum, his brother Prytanis: who having magnificently buried it, and laid up the reliques, in the Kings sepulchre, went presently to Gargaza, and there took into his hands the army, and the kingdom withall. [Id.]

Then came the Agents of Eumelus to him, to treat concerning a partage of the kingdom between them two; which he would not hearken to: wherefore leaving a strong Garrison at Gargaza, he returned to Panticapaeum, there to settle the affairs of his kingdom. But a while after, Eumelus, by the help of some Barbarians, possessed himself of Gargaza, and of sundry other Towns and Castles: and after that, overthrew Prytanis in a battle, and having thrust him up in a neck of land, near the lough of Mæotis, forced him to render himself upon condition, which were, to give up all his army, and to depart the kingdom. Nevertheless, when Prytanis returned to Panticapaeum, which is the place where the Kings of Bosphorus keep their standing Court, he there endeavoured again to have recovered his kingdom: but being sold there again, he fled to a place there called the Gardens, and was there slain, and his brother Eumelus reigned in his stead, five years and five months, [Id.]

Eumelus, to establish his kingdom, put to death all the friends; and wives and children, of both his brothers, Satyrus and Prytanis, only Parysades, Satyrus his son, being but a very youth, escaped his hands: for, by the benefit of a swift Horse, he got away to Agarus King of the Scythians. But when Eumelus saw that the people repined at the losse of their friends which he had murdered, he called them all together, and there excused himself, and restored to them their ancient form of government; and restored moreover to the Citizens of Panticapaeum, their former immunities; and promised to discharge them of all kind of tributes, (paying for no fair words, which might reconcile the hearts of the people to him: whereby having gotten all their good will again, he held a just and moderate hand over them, and grew afterward into no small admiration for all kind of virtue among them, [Id.]

Ptolemy of Egypt, hearing that he had lost all again in Cilicia, put over with his fleet to Phaelis, and took that City by force; and from thence passing into Lycia, took Xanthus by assault, and the Garrison of Antigonus that was therein: then sailing to Canus, took the City upon surrender, and then set upon the ciadales and forts that were in it, and took them by assault, as for Heraclum, he utterly destroyed it, and the City Pericum came into his hands by the surrender of the souldiers that were there put to keep it, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 117.]

Then failing to Coos, he sent for Captain Ptolemai to come unto him: that same was Antigonus his brother's son, as was said before; and had an army committed to him by Antigonus: but now, forsaking his Uncle, he came to Ptolemai, in all his ways, Putting there ore from Chalcis, and arriving at Coos, Ptolemai at last received him in all courteous manner; yet after a while, when he saw the infidelity of his carriage, and how he went to allure the officers by gifts, and secret meetings with them, fearing the worst, he clapt him up in prison, and there poisoned him with a draught of hemlock: as for the soldiers that came with him, he made them his own by large promises which he used towards them, and distributed them, by small parcels, among the rest of his army, [Id. ibid.]

Callander, fearing lest the Macedons would fall out with Hercules, the son of Alexander the Great, who was then fourteen [as Justin, or rather Leveneth, as Diodorus hath it] years of age, struck in with Polypercon, and by his means procured both him and his mother Barine to be privily murdered, and their bodies to be hid deep enough in the ground, lest by their solemn Funerals the truth might happily come to light. And now that Alexander's two sons were both rid out of the way, and dead, and no heir of his body left to succeed him, every Governor made himself a King of the Province which he held, nor more, nor lesse, than if he had won it by the sword, and right of war, [Id. ibid. and Justin, lib. 15. cap. 2.]

3696. Ptolemai, sailing from Myndus along the Islands which lay in his way, came to Andros, and putting out the Garrison that there was; restored it to her former liberty, [Diodorus, Olymp. 118. year 1.]

Cleopatra, the Daughter of Philip, and Sister to Alexander the Great, being incensed against Antigonus, of her own accord, infilled to Ptolemai and left Sardes, to go unto him: but the Governour there, to whom Antigonus had given in charge not to hurt her, stopp'd nevertheless her going, and afterward by his command, and the help of some other women about her, privily got her to be murdered: But Antigonus, who would no way be thought guilty of her death, put some of those women to death for having a hand in her murder: and buried her with all the magnificence that might be, [Id. ibid.]

Ophellas, who had thrust out Timbro, and reduced the Cyrenians under the obedience of Ptolemai, challenged now, Cyrene itself, with the Cities and Regions thereunto adjoining, as his own: and not therewith content, began to look after greater matters, and to have higher projects in his braines: and whilst he was casting these magnaniations in his mind, one Otho of Syracuse, came to him in a message from Agathocles, soliciting him to join in armes with him against the Carthaginians; telling him finally, that if he added them, he would make him Sovereign of all Afric. This therefore coming in the way, so heightened him in his former hopes, that he readily hearkened to him, and sent his Agent to Athens, from whence he had married his wife Euridice, the Daughter of Milnades, to pray their aid and assistance in this war, [Id. ibid.]

3697. Many there were of the Athenians, and other Grecians, which willingly hearkened to this motion, hoping thereby to have the sharing of the richest pieces of all Afric, with all the wealth of Carthage amongst themselves. And now Ophellas, being fully provided of all necessities for such a voyage, drew out his army, consisting of 18 thousand Foot, and six or seven hundred Horse, and one hundred Chariots, with above 300 murtherers, and fouldiers to manage them: many of which, drew their wives and children with their stuff and baggage along with them: so that they looked more like a Colony going to be planted, than an army marching against an enemy. Having therefore marched 18 dayes journey, and in them gone 3 thousand furlongs, they came to a City called Autimolus, in the westerne border of Cyrenaitas, where they encamped, and rested themselves: then removing again, they travelled thorough a dry and thirly Country, and full of noisome Serpents, and came at last, after two months miserable travel, with much adoe, to Agathocles his Camp, where they pitcht their Camps at a small distance each from the other, [Id. ibid.]

Agathocles, hearing of his approach, went to meet him, and advised him by all means to have a care of his army after so tedious and hard a journey, and to see them well refreshed, and having often supped together, at last Ophellas adopted Agathocles for his son: but he, when upon a time the greater part of Ophellas his army was gone foraging into the Countrys suddenly called an assembly of his own army, and before them accused Ophellas, for that being called for an assistant in this war, he went about to betray him; and having incensed the multitude, drew out his whole army in battalion against him and his Cyrenians: Ophellas growing amazed at this unexpected alteration, but nevertheless himself, and the men he had with him into a posture of defence; but the enemy being too quick for him, and he too weak for them, he was there there slain upon the place, and Agathocles, when he was dead, perswaded the rest that were left, to lay down their armes, and then telling them what great things he would do for them, perswaded them to take his pay, and to be busied of Ophellas, and got all his army to himself: but such of them as he found not fit and serviceable for the war, thole he sent away to Syracuse, of which few yet are we there, being for the most part cast away in a fierce tempest, that fell upon them at sea, [Id. lib. 16. with Justin, lib. 22. cap. 2.]

After Ophellas his death, Cyrene and all Libya returned to Ptolemai's obedience again, [Suid. in Leptus.]

3698. Demetrius Poliorcetes, or as Pliny renders it, Expugnator Urbium, (i. e.) the City taker, being furnished with two strong armies, one by land and another by sea, and provided of weapons, and all other necessities for the war, let forth from Ephesus, to let the Grecian Cities at liberty, [Diod. year, 2. Olympiade 118.] and carrying with him five thousand talents of silver, came to Pyraeus, the port of Athens, with 500 galle of ships, upon the 26 day of Thargelion, (i. e.) about the 31 day of our May, as Pataarch in the Life of Demetrius, saith. And having been received into Athens, took the City of Megara, and because Callander had put a Garrison into Munichium, which was the Fort or Castle of Athens, under the command of one Dionysius, therefore he raised it to the ground.

In the year when Anaxicrates was L. Chancellor in Athens, as among others, Philochorus hath it, who lived at this very time, in his Attic History, [lib. 8. cited by Dionysius Halicarnassus, in his Dinarchus] reporteth, so was, toward the end of his Chancellorship, and withal, [year, 2. Olymp. 118.]

When Euridice, the relict of Ophellas, & Ophellas, Prince of Cyrene, who was slain the year before returned to Athens, Demetrius the son of Antigonus married her; which marriage, the Athenians took as a great honour done to them; and thereupon they began, and were the first that honoured Demetrius and Antigonus, with the title of Kings; who otherwise refused that title, as the only mark of regality, which hitherto remained entire and untouched to the stock and lineage of Philip and Alexander his son, [Plut. in Demetrius.]

Demetrius, being re-called out of Greece by his father Antigonus, to make war upon the Captains of Ptolemai, in the Isle of Cyprus, put over first into Caria, and from thence went into Cilicia, and furnishing himself there with shipping and men, sailed thence into Cyprus, with 15 thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse, and a fleet consisting of 110 ships, of three rate of Oares a pieces, of singular swiftnesse, and 53 not so swift, as the other, yet men of war, as the other were, besides ships of burden of all sorts, and fowerable to great a multitude of Men and Horses, as were in them to be wasted over.

Being landed, he first encamped near the shore, not far from Carpassa, and drawing up his ships to land, fenced them there with a deep trench, and ramparts, and then went, and by force took Urania and Carpassa, and leaving a sufficient guard to defend his trenches about the fleet, marched forthwith to Salamis, [Diodorus, year 2. Olympiade 118.]

Menclaus, the brother of Ptolemai, and chief Commander of the Isle, being then in Salamis, and seeing the enemy, within 40 furlongs of the City, drew out of the Garrisons adjoining, to the number of 72000 Foot, and 800 Horse, and went to meet him; but not able to endure the impetion of the enemy, fled, and Demetrius following him hard at heels, to the very gates of the city, took to the number of three thousand of his men, and slew one thousand more upon the place: the prisoners he distributed among his own companies to serve him: but finding that they were ever ready to fly over again to Menclaus, because their wealth was in Ptolemai's hands in Egypt, he thrust them all away to Antigonus his father, [Id. ibid.]

Antigonus at that time was building a City in the upper Syria upon the river Orontes, called after his own name, Antiochia, laying out great sums of money upon it, and taking in within the walls 70 halcons of ground: for the place it self was very opportune, to lie as a yoke, both upon Babylon, and the upper provinces, and also upon the nether, as far down as Egypt, [Id. ibid.]

Menclaus, flying back to Salamis, resolved there to endure a siege, and dispatch away a messenger to Ptolemai, for more help, telling him what danger he was in. And Demetrius fell presently to work, drawing his Engines of battery, to take it by force: among others he had one special Engine, which he called Heliopole, (i. e.) one that would not fail him in taking any City, which it was bent against, besides landry other great rams, and galleies for them. But they within, in the night time, threw fire-works upon them, and consumed the principal of them, with the greatest part of the men that kept them: yet Demetrius would not off, but pressing the siege hotly by sea and land, thought in time he should not fail but have it, [Id. ibid.]

Ptolemai

4408. 306.

Ptolemy, hearing of the loss of his men, took presently shipping with an army well furnished for sea and land, and arriving at Paphos in Cyprus, took boats from the Cities adjoining, and went to Citium, distant from Salamis about furlongs: his whole Fleet consisted of 140, or as Plutarch hath it, 150 sail; the biggest whereof was five tire of oares, the least of four; and these were attended with 20 ships of burden, containing no lesse than 10 thousand soldiers; and sent word to Menelaus, that when he saw them in heat of fight, he should then fetour of the Port of Salamis, with 60 sail of ships, and fall in upon the rear of the enemy, and disorder them, all as he possible he could. But Demetrius foreseeing what might be; as he left a part of his army to maintain the siege by land, so he gave order to Antifthenes his Admirall, with ten ships of 5 tire of oares a piece, to lie at the mouth of the Haven of Salamis; and to keep in the Fleet that there was, so that they should not be able to come out: and having first ranged his land army upon the shoar and forelands looking into the sea; took ship himself, and with a Fleet of 108, or as Plutarch hath it, of 180 ships, the greater sort whereof were 7 tire of oares, the least of four, put out to sea, [Diad. and Plutarch.]

Ptolemei, in the wing where himself was, utterly routed the enemy, flanking force of their ships, and taking others with the men in them; and then returning thought to have done the like with the rest: but when he came, he found his left wing wholly routed by Demetrius, and him in hot pursuit of them; wherefore he made back to Cition. But Demetrius committing his men of War to Neon and Burtichus, to pursue the enemy withal, and to take up such as they found swimming for their lives, returned to his own Port whence he let out, [Diador.]

returned again to Salamis, [Id.] Ptolemei, (seeing no good to be done in Cyprus, returned with eight thips only into Egypt, [Id. with Jufin, lib. 5, cap. 2. and Plut.] and Menelaus herewith gave up both the city and also all his Forces both by land and fea to Demetrius his Forces were 20000 Horfe, and 12 thoufand Foot, all Corleeteers. [F. Plut.] And Demetrius having in a fhort time taken in all the reft of the Cities and Forces of the Ifland, diftributed the Garriſon ſouldiers, among his own companies, to the number of 16 thouſand Foot, and 6 hundred Horfe, [Diodor.]

hundred Horle, [Diador.] He took 100 ships of lading, wherein there were almost 8 thousand souldiers. Of the ships of War he took 40 with the men in them; and of those which were bilged in the fight, about 80. all which, leaky as they were, and full of water in the hold, they drew to land, under their Camp near the City. Demetrius had twenty of his own ships (loose to hurt in this fight, which yet being recovered, and rigged up again, proved serviceable as before, [to saith Diador.] But Plurarch thus; Of Ptolemis ships there were 7 taken, as before, with the men in them, Souldiers and Mariners; but of the rabble, and hang-bags, which were in the ships of burden, and flaves, and friends, and women, and children, and monies to pay the souldier, and engins, nothing escaped. Demetrius took all, and carried it to his Camp: Among the rest, there was one Lania, renowned at first for her excellent skill in playing upon the Recorder, and afterward a famous harlot, and though the were then past her prime, yet Demetrius, younger a great deal than she, fell in love with her; and the foir caught and enamoured him, with the pretines of her discourse and behaviour; that he grew a farr in love with her as other women were with him. [Plur.]

him; [Plur.] Demetrius buried the bodies of the enemy, that were slain, very honourably; and dismissed such as he had taken prisoners, and gave the Athenians arms enough to furnish 1200 men; [Plur. in Demetrius.] He sent home Leontidas, Ptolemeis Ion, and Menelaus his brother, and his other friends, with fitting provision for their journey by the way; nor did he forget what Ptolemei had formerly done to him in the same kind: using the same interchangeable and reciprocal offices of love and kindness, in the very time of war, that it might evidently appear, their contention was for honour, and not for hatreds sake, it being the fashion, it should seem, in those days, to wage war more religiously, than now men use to observe the laws of friendship in time of peace, [Justin. lib. 15. caps. 2.]

[fin. bb. 15. cap. 2.]
Demetrius dispatch away Aristodemus the Mileſian, with the news of this victory to his father: which Aristodemus was reckoned the prime flatterer in all the Court: and coming to Antigonus, stood till a while, and held him in ſilence, what the news might be: till at length he burst out with these termes, God save the King Antigonus, we have overthrowne King Ptolemei at sea; Cyprus is ours, we have in our hand 16 thousand 8 hundred of his men prisoners: to whom Antigonus answered, and God save thee too: nevertheless, because thou heldest me so long in silence before thou thou toldest me thy good news, thou shalt in some sort be punished too; for thou shalt stay a while, before thou receivest thy reward for thy good news, [Plur.]

Antigonos, puffed up with pride upon this victory, assumed to himself the title of King, Diadem, and the Title of King ever after; and thereupon Ptolemaeus affected to regard him in any ways mean to hang the head upon this base and ignominious neck; and he, to revenge his injuries, took the Crown away from him, and gave it to himself likewise; and in all his letters from that time he was called King. And he, to revenge himself King: And by their example, other Governors of the Provinces did the like; as Seleucus, who had lately subdued the upper Province to himself, and Lyfianachas, and Cassander, seeing there was neither mother nor brother, nor son of Alexander the Great now left alive, Diador, and Juffin, lib. 15. c.p. 2. Plut. in Demet. and Appianus, in the Syrian. p. 123.

[illegible]

King Antigonus, (for to hereafter we must turn him) his youngest son coming to decele, buried him, in a kingly manner; and calling home Demetrius son of Cyprus, commanded his whole army to meet at his new City of Antioquia; for he was purposed to march from thence into Egypt: wherefore leading the Foot himself, he went thorough Celysiria, having in his land army 80 thousand Foot, and about 10 thousand Horse: and he made Demetrius Admirall of his Fleet, giving him order to keep close to the shoar, in fight of the land army, having in all 150 fighting ships; and 100 more of burthen, wherein was an infinite store of armes of all sorts: and when the Pilots told him that now was the time that the seven Stars were ready to set, and would let the day from thence, (to wit, in the beginning of April, he told them they were too timorous to make good sea-men of, [Disd. year 3 Olymp. i. 8.]) Demetrius

Antigonus, coming with his army to Gaza, and purposing to fall upon Ptolemy before he was provided for him, commanded his soldiers to take with them 150 thousand bullocks, and getting together Camels out of Arabia, he loaded on them 150 thousand bullocks of wheat, and infinite flocks of hay upon other beasts of carriage, and carrying his munition in carts, went thorough the Desert, not without some trouble to the army; for that they met with hungry fenny, and dirty places by the way, especially at Barathra.

Demetrius, with his ships looting from Gaza, in the dead of the night, was for many days together becalmed; so that the lighter ships were fain to tow the ships of burden along with ropes: but after this, and to foot as the fewest Stars were, a northerly wind rose, and fell upon them, with which, many of the ships of 4 tuns or ares a piece were driven on shore, near to the City Raphia, where was no commodious landing for them: but of those which carried the artillery, some of them were sunk, and the rest recovered Gaza again: yet some of the best of them bare up, and came under the promontory of Cabots. This Foreland is not far distant from the River Nile; but is no place fit for shipping, especially at any tempest be, there is no coming in it: wherefore every ship dropping two anchors a piece, two hulks off from land, were driven to ride it out, in a huge sea, and in the middle of a thousand dangers, and were driven to that extremity, that had the tempest lasted but one day longer, having lost their fresh water, they must all necessarily have perished by very thirst. But in this great extremity of theirs, the storm ceased; and Antigonus with his army coming to the place, there encamped, and the weather-beaten men came ashore, and refreshed themselves there encamped; and nevertheless in this tempest, there were lost, three ships of 5 tuns or ares a piece, out of which, yet four men escaped alive to land. [164.]

From thence Antigonus removed and late down with his army a fordung off from the River Nile: But Ptolemee having manned the bank of the River with strong Garrisons, sent some in River-boats, thinking as near the further bank as safely they might; if they should these proclamacons, that if any of Antigonus his army would come to him, he would give them as much as common findlers two pounds, if a Captain, a whole talent for his pains. But the former was this proclamation made, but a multitude of Antigonus his soldiers were luredd here for pay, grew very deftuous to be gone: yea, and some of his Captains also, for that, and some other reasons, had a mind to be going too. But when Antigonus perceived that a multitude of his men were flying away from him, he disposed archers, and flingers, and other engines of War, to keep them from flying over the water in boats, and if any were lightened so that went, he put them to death with horrible slaughters, [ibid.]

Antigo

Antigonus, gathering together his ships which came, though late, to him; went to a place called Pseudostomon, thinking there to have landed some of his men: but found a strong Garrison of the enemy there, and was beaten off from thence with bows and slings, and other Engines of war; and therefore the night drawing on, he went his way, giving order to the masters of every ship to follow the lantern of the Admiral, and to come to the mouth of the river Nile, which is called Phageticum, but the next morning, finding that a many of his ships had lost their way, and were gone he knew not whither, he was fain to come to anchor there right, and to send away the swiftest ships he had, all the sea over, to look out, and bring in the rest unto him. Mean while, time ran on, and Ptolemei, being advertised of the approach of the enemy, went forth with to the relief of his men, and ranged his army all along the shoar, in the enemies fight. Then Demetrius, finding no possibility of landing here neither; and being informed, that if he should land, yet the Country adjoining was naturally fenced and fortified with fens, and moorish grounds, set sail, and returned, [Ibid.]

But as he was going, the wind struck up to the North, and with a mighty tempest, drove three of his ship, of four tire of oares, and some others of his men of war, upon the shoar, all which came into Ptolemeis hand; the rest, with much ado, recovered Antigonus his Camp. Now Ptolemei had placed strong Garrisons, at every one of the mouthes of the river Nile, and had an infinite number of river boats every where ready, and stored with darts and slings, and men which knew right well how to use them; which troubled Antigonus very sorely, for the mouth of the river at Pelusium, being strongly guarded by Ptolemei, he could make no use of his ships at all: and for his land force, the river Nile, which beginneth always at the coming of the sun into Cancer to swell, but at his entering into Leo, overfloweth all his banks, was now grown to that height, that they could do little, and it was with work, with his long lying both food for men, and fodder for cattle, began to fail, [Ib.]

Wherefore Antigonus, seeing his army to hang the head, called them all together, and before them all, propounded it to the Captains, whether of the two were best, to stay and fight it out now, or to return into Syria for the present; and to return again better provided the next year, and when the waters should be lower. And when every mans voice was to be gone; he bad his soldiers trust up their trinkets, and his Navy keeping still along the shoar by them, he returned into Syria, [Ibid.] Which fruitless issue of this journey, Medius one of his Nobles, is said to have fore-seen in a dream: for it seemed to him, that he saw Antigonus with all his army to contend in a race at Olympus, called Dianlus, (i. e.) a double course, wherein at the first setting out, they seemed to run exceeding well, but after a while, to grow somewhat wearisome: and when they came to the race-post, and were to turn about it, and return to the barriers whence they set out, (for that was the manner of this double course) they grew to out of breath, that they could go no further, [Pur. in Demet.]

Ptolemei, growing glad at heart, that the enemy was thus gone, offered sacrifice to his gods, for this great benefit bestowed upon him; and made withal, a magnificent feast for his Nobles: and wrote away letters to Seleucus, Lyfimachus and Cassander, of his prosperous success; not forgetting to tell them what a company of Antigonus his men, had shut over to him. And now having refused, as it were, Egypt, a second time, and gotten it by his sword; he thought he might lawfully reckon it his own, and returned in triumph to Alexandria. [Diodor.] Whence it is that Cl. Ptolemeus, in his Reg. Cano. counts the beginning of his reign over Egypt, from this time, reckoning from the death of Alexander the Great to this time, full 19 years: for the 19 year from the death of Alexander the Great ends just, according to his account, with the sixth day of this present November, which we are now upon, of the year 4409, according to the Julian account.

Whiles these things thus passed in Egypt, Dionysius the Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, (as Diodorus writes) dyed; having then reigned 33 years, as Athenaus lib. 12, cap. 26. recordeth: though Memnon saith, that he reigned but 30, and Diodorus but 37 years: of whole incredible fardness, besides Memnon, Nymphis, Heracleotes, in his book of the City Heraclea, cited by Athenaus in the place aforesaid, maketh mention: and to doth Elia, [Var. Hist. lib. 9, cap. 13.] To him were born two sons by Amastri, al. Amestris, the daughter of Craterus, by Alexander: the eldest of these sons was called Clearchus, the younger Oxathras; and by Diodor, Zathras: Dionysius, therefore by his last will, left the government of his kingdom, and charge of his two children, who were yet very young, to his wife, joining some other in commission with her, [Memnon in Excerpt. Photii, cap. 5, with Diodorus, year. 3. Olympiade 118, and 119. year 3.]

of Cilicia, wherein were found letters from Phila, together with rich and royal apparel, and other furniture most curiously and costly wrought, sent to Demetrius Ptolemees: all which Menecdemus sent to Ptolemei in Egypt. This affront envenomed Demetrius against the Rhodians, as he then lay in siege before their City to take it: yet after a years time spent about it, by the mediation of the Athenians, they came to this agreement, That the Rhodians should assist Antigonus and Demetrius, in their wars against any, save only Ptolemei: and to the siege brake up, [Diod. Olymp. 119, year 1, and Plut. in Demet.]

The Rhodians, so soon as the war was ended, sent some of their Priests to consult the Oracle of Ammon, whether they should worship Ptolemei as a god or no; and being answered, yea, they presently consecrated to him a four-acre Grove in their City; building on every side thereof, a gallery of a furlong in length, and called it Ptolemeum, or Ptolemeis gallery: and then was also the surname or title of Saviour: (i. e.) Saviour, first given him by them: to wit, for that he had saved them from the force and violence of Antigonus and Demetrius, and nor by the soldiers, for, his saving of Alexander in the City of the Oxydracans, (of which before) as some have imagined, [Arria, lib. 6, pag. 131. and Steph. in the word Oxydras, Diodorus, ut supra.]

Eumelus, the King of Bosphorus Cimmericus, having now reigned there 6 years, came to his end by a mischance: for, making haste homeward out of Scythia to a certain solemn sacrifice that was then to be offered, and was in a Coach running upon four wheels, and drawn with four horses, and covered over with a Canopie, coming to his Palace, the horses took a fright, and ran away with him: and when the coach-man could not hold them, Eumelus for fear lest they would run down some precipice or other, leapt out of the Coach; but his sword hanging in the wheels, he was whited away with it, and so killed; after whom, succeeded Spartacus his son, who reigned 20 years, [Id. year 3. Olymp. 117, and year 1. Olymp. 119.]

Seleucus, crossing the River Indus, made war upon Sandrocottus, al. Androcottus; for that he, at the same time when Seleucus laid the foundation of his greatness in the East, had murdered all the Governours, which Alexander had set there, and took all India into his own possession, [Jussim, lib. 15, cap. 4. Appia, in his Syracae, page 122, 123.]

Now as he was going to make this war, a wild Elephant of a vast bignesse came to him upon the way, and as if he had been tame, and brought up to it, suffered him to get up, and proved a prime and singular Elephant for the war, [Jussim, ibid.] Whereupon, traversing all India over, with 600 thousand men, brought it entirely into his own subjection, [Plut. in Alexan.] and then making himself King over them, freed them from a yoke of strangers, to bring them under another of his own, [Jussim, ut sup.]

Megasthenes, in his Indica, writes, that he oftentimes repaired to him, whiles he remained with Sibyrtius Governour of the Aracholians; as [Arria, lib. 5, cites him] and withal saies, that he had been in his army 400 thousand soldiers, [Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 709.]

Cassander, King of Macedon, sending his Ambassadors to Antigonus, desired him to make a peace with him. But when he would not, unless Cassander would absolutely stand to his mercy: then upon conference with Lytimachus King of Thrace, they both agreed to send their Ambassadors to Ptolemei, King of Egypt, and to Seleucus, King of the upper Provinces of Asia, crying out upon the pride and fardquary of Antigonus, exprest in his answers, and remonstrating to them, how far this war concerned them both, [Diodor, year 3. Olymp. 119.] Wherefore perceiving that Antigonus his purpose was to take them to task one after another, whiles they never cared to make it a common cause; they heartened each other by their motives first, and then appointed a place where all were to meet; and resolved to contribute their several stocks to the maintenance of this war: but because Cassander himself could not be there, by reason he had an enemy to nigh at hand, therefore he sent Lytimachus, with all the power which he was able to make, and infinite provisions for them, [Jussim, lib. 15, cap. 2.]

Seleucus, having made affinity with Sandrocottus, King of India, gave him all those Regions lying upon the bank of Indus, which Alexander had taken from the Arians, and made them Colonies of his own, setting Governours over them, and received of him for a present 500 Elephants, [Stra, lib. 15, pag. 724. Plut. in Alex. and Appia, in Syracae, pag. 123.] And to having made all peace in the East, prepared himself for the war against Antigonus, with his comforts, according to agreement in the West, [Jussim, lib. 15, cap. 4.]

Lyfimachus, putting over into Asia side with his own army, came before Lampacus and Paros, and because they submitted readily to him, he restored them to their ancient liberty; but having taken Sigeum by force, he put into it a strong Garrison of his own own, and then committing six thousand Foot, and 1000 Horse, to the charge of Prepelas, sent him to take in the Cities of Ionia and Eolia; and himself went before Abydos, carrying all manner of Engines of battery, and other necessaries with him. Nevertheless, when an army sent from Demetrius for the defence of that place arrived, he gave off that siege; and having taken in Hellepont and Phrygia, he went on and besieged the City Synada, where the king Antigonus his Magazin lay, and the same time drove over Docimus, a Commander of Antigonus his party, to stand for the common cause, and by his help, took both Synada and other Forts and places belonging to Antigonus; and where his treasures were laid up. [Diadormi, year 3. Olymp. ade 119.]

Mean while, Prepelas, who was sent to make war upon Ionia and Eolia, by the way, took Adramittium, and besieged Ephesus, and to terrified the inhabitants, that they submitted to him; and finding there the hostages which the Rhodians had given, he sent them all home again to their friends: nor did he any hurt at all to the Ephesians themselves in their persons; only let on fire all the ships which he found in their harbour; because the enemy commanded, as yet, all at sea: and for that, the issue of the war was hitherto uncertain: after this he joyntly, and the common cause, the Teians, and Colophonians; but as for Erythrae, and Clazomenae, they had succor sent in to them by sea; and therefore he could not take them; but having wasted their territories, he departed, and went for Sardis, and there he drew over by fair words, two of Antigonus his Captains, Phœnix and Docimus; and took the City itself, save the Castle, into his protection; as for the Castle, Philippus, a friend of Antigonus, kept it; and would not betray the trust which he had repoled in him. [Id. Ibid.]

Antigonus was at that time, wholly taken up in making sports and feasts, at his new City of Antigonía; and had proclaimed great prizes for such as would put in for them, and huge wages to all cunning artificers, that could be gotten. But when he heard how Lyfimachus was come into Asia, and by what mutinies his soldiers revolted to him, he brake off his sports, and yet disbursed among the wrestlers, and artificers: that were already thither come, to the sum of 300 talents; and then taking his army with him, he marched away, and by long journeys, hastened to meet the enemy; and so soon as he came to Tarsus in Cilicia, he there out of the monies, which he took with him out of the City Quindí, gave his army three months pay before hand: and besides this, brought three thousand talents along with him from Antigonía; to the end he might not be to seek for money, if need should be; then passing the Taurus, he hastened into Cappadocia, and reduced such as in the upper Phrygia and Lycaonia, had revolted from him, to serve him in the wars, as they did before. [Ibid.]

Then Lyfimachus, hearing of the enemies approach, tell to consult with his council, in this imminent danger, what were fittest to be done: and their advice was, by no means to hazard a battle, till Seleucus came down out of the upper provinces; but to possess himself of the surest places, and to intrench himself, in the strongest manner that possibly he could, with ramparts, and palisades and stakes: and there expect the coming of the enemy. Lyfimachus having heard this advice, put it seriously in execution, and Antigonus on the other side, so soon as he came in sight of his Camp drew out in battalion, and provoked Lyfimachus to a fight, but seeing he would not, he went and kept all the passages, by which any victual might come into the Camp, whereupon Lyfimachus, fearing least, food failing, he might happily fall alive into Antigonus his hand, removed by night, and having marched 400 furlongs, came to Dorylaeum, and there encamped: for that in those parts, there was store of corn, and other provisions in abundance, having a river at the back of him: wherefore, having there raised a work, and enclosed it with an exceeding deep trench, and three rows of stakes upon the top of it, he made all as sure as art could make it. But Antigonus, finding the enemy gone, pursued after him with all speed, and coming near the place where he lay entrenched, and seeing no disposition in him to fight, he presently fell to work, and drew another trench round about his Camp to besiege him there; and to that purpose caused all kind of instruments of a siege, as darts, arrows, and Catapults thither to be brought, and though many skirmishes were made about the trenches, because Lyfimachus his men fought from their work; to hinder the enemy in making theirs, yet it so fell out, that Antigonus his party had still the better of it. [Ibid.]

But in process of time, Antigonus his works came to be almost finished round about, and Lyfimachus his provision began to fail; wherefore Lyfimachus, taking the advantage of a tempestuous night, gat him away with his army, and thorough mountainous countries, came to his winter quarters. But when Antigonus the next morning saw that the enemy was gone, he also marched after him thorough the champion country. But by reason there fell great store of rain, and the ways were foul, and full of ditches, he lost many of his carriages, and some of his men also in that journey: and the whole army army was distressed therewith: wherefore, both to spare his army, and because the Winter quarter came on, he gave off the pursuit of him, for that time; and casting about for the fittest places to winter in, distributed his army into them. [Id.]

And Lyfimachus, in like manner, sent his army to be quartered in the country of Salmonia, having made large provision for them out of Heraclea: for that he had made alliance with them of that City; by marrying Amstiris, the widow, as was said before of Dionysius, and tux of his two young children; and Governelle for the present of that City. [Id. Ibid. with Ammon, in Plotius, cap. 5.]

At this time Demetrius, being sent for by his father out of Greece, made peace with Callander; and, steering a straight course thorough the Islands of the Egean Sea, came to Ephelus: and there landing his army, encamped before it, and reduced it to their former obedience; and suffered the Garrison of his own into the Castle there, to depart with safety. And putting a strong Garrison of his own into the Castle there, marched away with the rest of his army, as far as Hellepont, and reduced the Lampacians and Parians to his subjection. And from thence going to the mouth of Pontus, encamped near to a place called the Temple of the Chalcidians, and there fortified: which done, he left there 3 thousand Foot, and 30 sail of good ships to keep it; and sent the rest of his army to quarter for that Winter, in sundry places thereabouts. [Diadormi, year 3. Olymp. 119.]

About this time, Mithridates who was subject to Antigonus, being suspected of favouring Callanders party, was slain at Cius, in the country of Mylia, where, as also at Artinus, he had continued Prince 35 years. [Id. Ibid.] Of whom divers Authors speak diversly. For this Mithridates, is that son of Ariobarzanes, a man of the Royal blood of Persia, and descended from one of those seven which destroyed the Magi there: as we may gather out of [Polybius, lib. 5. pag. 388. and Florus, lib. 3. cap. 5. and Sext. Aurelius, Victor, de Vir. Illust. cap. 76.] (urnamed Krius: (i.e.) the Builder; and lost the succession of the kingdom of Pontus after him down to Eupator, at that Mithridates, who maintained so long a war against the Romans: as Strabo tells us, [lib. 12. pag. 562.] whence it is also that Tertullian, [lib. de Anima, § 11. c. 11] (alth he) out of Strabo, that Mithridates got the kingdom of Pontus by a dream: the Story is this: Antigonus in a dream, thought that he had a field full of a golden harvest; and that Mithridates came and cut it, and carried it away into Pontus: whereupon he purposed to apprehend and kill him; whereof Mithridates being advertised by Demetrius, fled away with six horse only in his company, and fortified a certain Town in Cappadocia, where many men joyntly with him: and so he obtained to himself, both Cappadocia, and also many other Countries of Pontus, and left them to the eighth generation after him; and then it was extinguished by the Romans. [Plut. in Demetr. and Appian, in his Mithridatica, pag. 176. Lucian, in his book of Long-lived men, pag. 176.] out of Hieronymus Cardianus, and other Writers reporteth, that he lived, to the age of 84 years; and that his son, called also Mithridates, succeeding him in his Principality, added to his Dominions Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia, and held them 36 years, [Diadormi, ad sup.]

Callander sent one Pleistarchus into Asia, with an army of 12000 Foot, and 500 Horse, to assist Lyfimachus; and he, coming to the mouth of Pontus, found that streite kept by the enemy: and thereupon despairing of any passage that way, went to Odelus, which lies between Apollonia and Galatia, over against Heraclea, where a part of Lyfimachus his men lay; but finding no ships there, for his transportation, he divided his army into three parts; and the first part that set out, landed safely at Heraclea; the second, which carried by the enemy, which were set to keep that streite of Pontus. The third, wherein Pleistarchus himself was, was so overtaken with a violent tempest, that the greatest part of the ships, and men in them, perished; and the ship wherein himself was, being a goodly ship of fix tire of oars, was cast away likewise: and of all the men in her, which could not be less than 500, only 33 escaped, of which Pleistarchus himself was one, who getting upon a plank of the ship when it split, was cast on shoar half dead: yet being a little recovered, was carried to Heraclea; and there growing strong again, went to Lyfimachus in his winter quarter, having lost the greater part of his army by the way. [Id. Ibid.]

About the same time Ptolemei, coming with an excellently well appointed army out of Egypt, reduced all the Cities of Cœlo Syria, to his obedience; but when he lay in siege before Sidon, there came a false rumour to his ear, that a battle had been fought, wherein Seleucus and Lyfimachus were beaten, and fled to Heraclea, and that Antigonus thereupon was halting into Syria with his victorious army. Ptolemei, giving over-light credit to this report, made a Truce with the Sidonians for five months; and putting Garrisons into the other Cities which he had taken in those parts, returned into Egypt. [Ibid.]

Whiles these things thus passed, 2800 of Lyfimachus his chief souldiers fled over to Antigonus.

Antigonus, and Antigonus entertained them very curiously, and furnishing them with such pay as they said Lyfimachus ought them, gave them also for a reward of their doings, large monies over and above, [Ibid.]

At the same time also, Seleucus with a great army came down out of the upper provinces into Cappadocia, and wintered his army in tents, which he brought ready made for them. His army consisted of 20 thousand Foot, and 12 thousand horse, (reckoning in with them his archers on horseback) and 480 Elephants, and iron Chariots one hundred, thus these Kings forces came together, purposing the next summer to try for the mastery between them.

Pythagoras the soothsayer, as formerly for Alexander the Great, and for Perdiccas, so now for Antigonus, fell to his divinations by the bowels of beasts offered in sacrifice; and finding the strings or filets wanting in the liver of them, told Antigonus that his death was thereby portended. [Arrian, lib. 7, pag. 160.]

Alexander the Great also appeared to Demetrius in his sleep, all gloriously armed, and asked him, what was the word which he and his father purposed to give; and he answered, Love and victory; then replied Alexander, Therefore will I go over to thy enemies; for they will take me for theirs. [Plut. in Demetrio.]

Antigonus, hearing that there were many men, Kings gotten together against him, vainly laid, that he would have been able to kill all like to many birds out of a bulw, yet the enemies approaching, he was observed to be more lumpish and silent then he used to be, and fleeing his army, told them that this was the man, that mu't be his successor, in which they marvelled at, more than all at the rest; had speech with him in his tent often times all alone, whereas formerly, he would never impart any secret at all unto him. And when his army was all ready ranged in batalio, and he going out of his pavilion to them, he stumbled, and fell all along upon his face, and being sorely troubled thereat, and got up again, he begged of the gods to find him either a victory that day, or a death void of pain. [Plur. 16.]

This fight, between these two many Kings, was fought at Ipsus, a Town in Phrygia, [Arria. lib. 7. Plutarch in Pyrrhus, and in Scipio, cap. 122. Diod. and Porphy year 4. Olymp. 119.] to wit in the beginning of that year. In which battle Antigonus and Demetrius we see that the King Antigonus was slain, and his Son Antiochus, the younger, and Demetrius with the belt part of his Horle, charged upon Antiochus the son of Sel. uas, and his succellor afterward in his kingdom, and having slain him valiantly routed him, nor over rashly pursuing him, and too far, was the cause of the loss of that victory to his father; yet in that pulvite, Pyrrhus made his brave valour and worth, conspicuously to appear, who being then but 17 years of age, and thrust out of his kingdom by the Epitores his subjects, joynd himself with Demetrius, who had married his sister Deidamia, who was intended for Alexander, the son of Alexander the Great, by Roxane, [Id. in Pyrrho.]

Alexander the Great, by Roxane, [Latin text].
Seleucus, seeing Antigonus his dardanic defunctive of all help from their Horfe, made as if he would have fallen upon them, but withall, very adively invited them rather to fall over unto him: whereupon a great part of them did fo, and the reft fled: and turning upon Antigonus, one of them cryed out, laying, I thefe come upon thee, O King: and he answered, But Demetrius will come and help us: and whiles he flood looking till for Demetrius his returne to refcue him, the enemy came on, and powd on their dard, as thick as hail upon him, and in that foime, he fell: whereupon all took him, and threift for themselves, only one Thorax of Larida flaid by the body of him, [Id est, Demetrius.] His body was afterward taken up, and buried in a royal manner, [Id est, Id. 16. 21.] Plutarch tells us, that when Antigonus was upon his late voyage into Egypt, he was then little lesse than 80 years of age; Appianus, that when he came upon this journey, he was upward of fourcore years old. But the whole term of his life, was 86 years, as Porphyrie affirms, cited by Scaliger in his Greek fragments of Eusebius, [lib. 16.] But Hieronymus Cardianus the Historiographer, and one who lived with (as Lactantius, in his booke of Long-Lived men, voucheth him) affirmeth, that he lived 81 years, and no more.

Demetrius, seeing all lost, with five thousand Foot, and four thousand horse, fled away with all possible speed to Ephesus; where, when all men began to fear, lest for want of monies, he would fall a plundering of the Temple of Diana, and he himself thought he should not be able to hold his foundiers hands from it, he halted thence with all speed. [Plut. in Demetrius.] And taking his mother Stratonice, and all his treasure with him, sailed to Salamis, in the Isle of Cyprus, which was at that time under his command. [Id. lib. 2.]

The Kings that had gotten this great victory, fell presently a sharing this great kingdom of Antigonus and Demetrius, among themselves, and laid every man his share, to the dominion which he formerly possessed. [Plut. in Demetr. Appian, in Syriac. pag. 122. with Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 410.]

But

But when they could not agree about the partage of the spoils, they fell again into two sides between themselves; for Seleucus joyined presently with Demetrius; and Ptolemy with Lysimachus, [Isufing, lib. 15. cap. 4.] for Seleucus and Ptolemy, were, without compare, the two mightiest of them all; and therefore the contention between them was propagated, and continued to their posterities, under the names of the Seleucians, Kings of the North; and the Ptolemies Kings of the South; as we find foretold in the 11 chapter of the prophesie of Daniel.

in the 11th chapter of the prophesie of Daniel. . . .

the double height (or curtain) the high fortresse of the wall about the Temple. In his dayes the cisterns to receive water, being in campe as the Jewes was covered with plates of brass. He took care of the Temple that it should not fall, and fortified the City against besieging. How was honoured in the midst of the people at his coming out of the Sanctuary? [See Salian. his Annals.

3704. Scleucus, upon the 23 day of our April, offering sacrifice to Jupiter in the mountain Calis, consulted him also concerning a place, where to build a City in Syria; when presently an Eagle came and caught away a piece of flesh from the altar, which is said to have let fall, in a place near the sea, below Palaeopolis, (a little city built in former times by Syrus, the son of Agenor, on a hill thenceby) in a sea town of Picia: Whereupon, Scleucus let presently to lay the foundation of a great City, which he built there, and called it after his own name, Scleucia, [Johan. Malela, in his Chron. not printed.] wherein yet, others say, that he followed not that act of the Eagle, but the flash of some lightning that appeared to him, and that thereupon the lightning was ever after in that place celebrated with set hymns and praises, as if it were a god itself, [Appian, in Syriae. pag. 125.]

Seleucus himself proceedings, came to Iopolis, a City built in the hill Country of Silphium: and there the third day after his coming, falling upon the first of Artemisium; (i. e.) of our May, offered sacrifice to Jove the Thunderer, in a certain Chappel, laid to have been anciently there built by Pericles the son of Danae: And afterward coming to Antigonos, and there offering sacrifice to Jove, upon the alters newly then built by Antigonos, he together with Amphion the Priest, prayed that Justice would flourish by some sign, whether he should inhabit Antigonos it self, calling it by some other name, or whether he should go and build a new City in another place: and then again it is said, that an Eagle came and caught away a piece of flesh from the alters, and let it fall near the hill of Silphium. Whereupon it was, that ever against that Hill and Iopolis therein built, near the River Orontes, where was a Town called Borsia, he laid the foundation of his wall, upon the 22 day of the month Artemisium, and the rising of the sun: which City he called after the name of his son Antiochus; and therein afterwards erected a Temple to Jupiter Borsianus. These things concerning the origin of things, doth Johannes Malela an Antiochian borne, deliver concerning the origin of this City; which Eusebius also in his Chron. affirmeth to have been built by S^{us} Iscus this City; in the 12 year of his reign. Now this Metropolis of Syria, was afterward made a Tetrapolis; (i. e.) a fourfold City, being divided into four Regions, making, as it were, in many Cities: for that every one of them, had a proper wall built about it self, and one common one, which enclosed them all: of which, the first only was built by this Seleucus Nicator: The second was the work of the Inhabitants themselves. The third was finished by Seleucus Callinicus: And the fourth, by Antiochus Epiphanes.

[Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 750.]

Now that Seleucus called this City after the name of his son Antiochus, besides Maieia and Cedremus, Julian also the Apollonia in his Misopogon teacheth us: whereas yet Strabo, and Appianus, and Trogius Pompeus, tell us, that he called it Antiochia, after the name of his father Antiochus, [*and Insin, out of Trogius Pompeius, lib. 15, cap. 4, lib. 16, that heerein he conferred the memorial of a twofold beginning: for, faith he, he called it Antiochia after the name of his father Antiochus, and consecrated the fids about it to Apollo; because forsooth, his mother Laodice, would needs make him believe, that he was begotten on her by Apollo: and therefore Daphna, a suburb of Antioch, a place much renowned for the Grove of Lawrelltrees that there was, and no lesse than 80 furlongs in compass, was consecrated to Apollo: whence as this day it is called ὁ ἄνθος τῆς Δαφνῆς καὶ ἡμετέραν (i.e.,) Daphne near unto Antiochia,] [as Maecenas chapter 4. verse 33.] So the City it selfe of Antioch, is* called Αντιόχεια ἡ ἐν τῷ Δάφνῃ; (i. e.) Antioch near unto Daphne, by other Writers.

Seleucus, utterly demolishing Antigonias, conveyed the materials down the river Orontes, unto Antioch; and transplanted from thence, to the number of 5300 Macedonians and Athenians, which Antigonus had there planted, unto his new city [Jo. Malala], though Diodore saies indeed, that Seleucus did destroy Antigonias, but adds, that he transported the inhabitants thereof, to his new city Seleucia; [2. Olym. 118.] But Strabo also maketh mention of the inhabitants of Antigonias, removed to Antiochia; [1. 6. p. 750.] where he also adds, that some of the race and off-spring of Triptolemus, and Argivians, which were long ago sent with him to seek out Io, were there planted by Seleucus; which yet were none other than those Grecians out of Peloponnesus, which Stephanus Byzantius saith, were placed to dwell in Antioch, ἡ ἐν τῷ Δάφνῃ, (i. e.) in Antioch by Daphne. To which purpose also is that saying of Jo. Malala, ἡ ἐν τῷ Δάφνῃ ἡ πόλις ἡ ἀρχαία ἡ ἀπὸ τῶν Ἀργείων, οἱ δὲ ἄλλοι, οἱ δὲ ἄλλοι, &c. (i. e.) Seleucus himself brought some of the Grecians of Ionia, and translated those Grecians which dwelt in Iopolia, to make them inhabitants of Antioch, and whom he made Citizens there, as men of a more sacred and generous kind, than the rest: compare this here with Scaliger's note, upon the 1713. number of the English Chron.

Lyfimachus the King of Thrace took to wife Antioche, the daughter of Ptolemei, not Ptolemei Philadelphus, as in Mennon, [cap. 5.] but of Ptolemei the fifth, the son of Lagus, surnamed the deliverer, as we learn out of Plutarch in Demetr. and Justin, [lib. 17. cap. 2. and lib. 24. cap. 2.] and even out of Mennon himself, in Excerptis, [cap. 9.] of Ptolemei the first, I say, and Eutidice, as we find in Paulan his Asie, [pag. 8.] whereas his former wife Amestris, the relict of Dionysius, the King perforce, or tyrant, or usurper of Heraclea, grew to offended, that he left him, and returned to Heraclea, and there built a City near the Euxian sea, which he called after his own name Amastria, and sent for men out of Sefamus, Cytorus, Ciomius and Teios, and other places to inhabit it, [Admon. Excerpt. cap. 5. with Strabo lib. 12. pag. 544.]

Seleucus, following the example of Lyfimachus, sent his Ambassadors, and by them desired to have Stratonice, the daughter of Demetrius, surnamed Poliorcetes, and Phila, for his wife. Whereupon Demetrius, taking his daughter along with him, took shipping, and with his whole fleet which attended him at Athens, set sail for Syria. But by the way touched in Cilicia, which Plutarch, the brother of Cassander, then held, as allotted to him by a general consent of the Kings, after the battle wherein Antigonus, his Grandfather was slain. This Plutarch conceiving himself wronged by Demetrius his setting foot upon his land, went and complained thereof to Seleucus, and expostulated the matter with him; for that without the consent of the other Kings, Ptolemei and Lyfimachus, he had entered into a league and alliance with Demetrius, a common enemy to them all. Hereupon Demetrius in a rage went from thence to Quinda, where when he found yet remaining of the old treasure of Alexander, 1200 talents, he took them all away with him, and weighed anchor, and to sea, as fast as he could high him, [Plut. in Demetr.]

Seleucus came to meet Demetrius, and his wife Phila, at a place called Oroffus, and first invited them to dine with him at his pavilion in his Camp: after which Demetrius invited him aboard his ship of 13 tite of oares high, after which they spent whole days in familiar discourse together, without arms or guard about them, till at length Seleucus married Stratonice, and with her returned in great pomp and magnificence to Antioch.

Demetrius, having possessed himself of Cilicia, dispatch away his wife Phila to her brother Cassander, to excuse such matters as Plutarch, might happily have laid unto his charge, and whiles the was away, his other wife Decidamia came to him to Athens, where after a short while, she died. [Ibid.]

Seleucus desired Demetrius to let him have Cilicia for a certain sum of money, which when he would not grant, Seleucus in a choleric way, demanded to have Sidon and Tyre cut of his hands, and this seemed an injurious act of his, that having made himself Lord, and possessing all from India, to the Syrian sea, yet he was of so poor a spirit, as to trouble his father in law, being otherwise under a cloud of adverse fortune, for two such poor Cities, as Tyre and Sidon were. Wherefore Demetrius stoutly answered, that if he were a thousand times overcome, yet he would never buy a son in law at so dear a rate; and thereupon fell presently a fortifying of those two Cities, which were such force in Seleucus his eyes, [Ibid.]

3707.

Cassander, having had the rule and government of things in Macedonia 19 years, dyed, leaving three sons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander, begotten on the body of Theffalonice, the sister of Alexander the Great, all which reigned after their father three years and six months only, [Dexippus and Porphyrius in Scaliger's Greek Eusebians, pag. 48. 228.]

Philip

Philip the elder of the three, coming shortly after his fathers death to fall away and die of a consumption, his two younger brothers, Antipater and Alexander, fell together by the ears about the kingdom, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 1. Paulan, in his East. pag. 287. and Plut. in Pyrrho & Alexan.]

This Antipater, Dexippus, and Eufeb, in Chron. call by the name of Antigonis: not could Herimippus understand any other, where he saith, that Demetrius Philareus, after the death of Cassander, for the dread he had of Antigonus, fled to Ptolemei, surnamed the Deliverer, [Diog. Laertius, in Demetr. Phil.]

Pyrrhus also, at the same time, remained with Ptolemei, as a hostage in Egypt: where he married Antigone the Daughter of Berenice the Queen, by Philip her former husband, [Plut. in Pyrrho, Paulan in Asie, pag. 10.]

Pyrrhus, by the help of Antigone his wife, having obtained both a Fleet of ships, and store of money withal, from Ptolemei; set sail for his old kingdom Epirus; and there came to a composition with Neopolemus, who had usurped his kingdom, upon terms, to hold it joyfully with him, [Id. ibid.]

Eupolemus, the Historian, deduceth his Chronologie from Adam, and the coming of the children of Israel out of Egypt, down to the fifth year of this Demetrius, reckoned from the death of his father Antigonus, and to the 12 year of Ptolemei, reckoned from the utter extinction of Alexander the Great, his Race, of which I spake toward the end of the year of the World, 3695, in his book of the Kings of Juda; as we find in the [1 book of Sirem, of Cleman, Alexan.]

Demetrius, Poliorcetes, (i. e.) the City sieger, wasted the City of Samaria, which Perdiccas had formerly new rebuilt, [English Chron.] 3709.

Velleius Patereulus, in the first book of his History, tells us, that Pyrrhus began his reign, when Fabius Max. and Q. Decius Mus, were each of them, the fifth time Consul of Rome; to wit, when Neopolemus being slain, Pyrrhus took the sole possession of Epirus into his hands; and then, remembering how much he had been beholding to Berenice and Ptolemei, by whose favour it was, that he had thus recovered his kingdom; he called his son, which Antigone now bare unto him, by the name of Ptolemei; and having built a new City in a neck of land in Epirus, he called it after the name of his wives mother, Berenice, [Plut. in Pyrrho.]

3710.

In the 36 year of the Periode or account of Calippus, the 25 day of the month Poldiceon, in the year 454, of Nabonassar, the 16 day of Paophus 3 hours after midnight, the 21 day of our Decemb. Timochares observed at Alexandria in Egypt, that the Moon rising to her utmost height northward, touched upon the most northerly Star of those which are in the head of Scorpio, [Ptol. in his great Synax. lib. 7. cap. 3.]

In the same year also, upon the 15 day of Elaphebolion, the 5 of Tybus, four hours before midnight upon the 9 of our May, the same Timochares observed the conjunction of the Moon with Spica Virginis, [Id. ibid.]

Theffalonice the Queen, and relict of Cassander, the Daughter of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, begotten upon the Daughter of Nicaipolus, was murdered by Antipater her own son; yea, though she begged life of him by those paps which gave him suck: the reason was, for that in the partage of the kingdom, made between him and his brother, she seemed a little inclined to her youngest son Alexander. And Alexander, to revenge this murder of his mother, prayed in aid of all the friends he could make; of Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, of Demetrius Poliorcetes, in Peloponnesus, [Justin, lib. 16. cap. 1. Plut. in Pyrrho & Demetr. Paulan, in East. pag. 287.]

Lyfimachus the King of Thrace, for the dread he had of Demetrius his coming, persuaded with his son in law Antipater, rather to agree with his brother, than by falling out with him, to draw upon himself an old hereditary enemy of his father; [Justin, ibid.] And knowing well, that Pyrrhus would do any thing for Ptolemei's sake; he sent certain forged letters to him, as sent from Ptolemei, wherein he advised him, to receive a gratuity of 300 talents from Antipater, and to give off his journey into Macedon for the support of Alexander against his Brother. But Pyrrhus perceived this trick of his; for opening the letters, he found not there the usual salutation from Ptolemei to him: which was, Pater filio, (i. e.) The father to his son: instead whereof, it was there written, King Ptolemei to King Pyrrhus, sendeth greeting: and withal Demetrius his sudden falling in upon Macedonia, brake off all these devices of Lyfimachus, [Plut. in Pyrrho.]

Ptolemei of Egypt, took the whole Isle of Cyprus out of Demetrius his hands; the City Salamis only excepted, where he besieged Demetrius his mother and children that were therein: and them, having at length taken the City, he sent home unto him honourably attended, and with rich presents bestowed on them, for their journey, [Plut. in Demetr.]

Demetrius, having gotten Alexander into his hands and slain him, possessed himself self of the kingdom of Macedon, [Iustin. l. 16. cap. 1. Pausan. Bæot. pag. 287. Plut. in Pyrr. & Demetr. and in his Treatise, περὶ δουλείας: (i.e.) of shamefacednesse; and held it seven years, as the same Plutarch affirmeth.]

Lysimachus, being at that time engaged in a war which one Dromichetes a King of the Getae made upon him, lest he should be forced to maintain a war against the King of Getae, and Demetrius both at once, gave up that part of Macedon, which belonged to his son in law Antipater, and so made peace with him, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 1. with Strab. lib. 7. pag. 302. & 305.]

Dromicheus his hap was to take Lyfimachus prisoner, but used him very kindly [Strabo, lib. supra, Diodorus, in Excerpt. H. Vales. pag. 257, 258.] and Lyfimachus gave him his daughter to wife, and gave-up into his hands that part of Thrace, which lay beyond the Ister, for a dowrie with her. [Pausani, in Attica, pag. 8.]

Clearchus, the King perforce, or Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, going to help Lyfimachus in his war against the Geres, was taken prisoner together with him, and when Lyfimachus was gotten at liberty himself; he, by his wisdom, used the means to procure his liberty also. Memnon, in Excerpt, cap. 6.

When Simon, (turned the Jew, the High Priest at Jerusalem, was dead, leaving behind him one only son Onias, then an infant, his brother Eleazar, the son of Onias the first, took upon him the high priesthood of the Jews, [Joseph, lib. 12, cap. 2.] and is said to have reigned there 32 years, in Scaliger's Greek Eusebian fragments, [pag. 50. and 162.]

After the return of Lyfimachus from the Gerick war, Agathocles, his eldest son, and who was taken prisoner in the first battle that ever he was in, as some report, took to wife Lylandra, the daughter of Ptolemei of Egypt, surnamed the deliverer, and of Euridice his wife. [Pausan. in his Attic. p. 8.]

After this, Lyfymachus, paffing wth his Navy over into Afia, feized on fuch as there were in fubjection to Antigonus and Demetrius, [1d. 16. wth Plut. in Demet.] where whies he lay before Ephelus, and they had to help them one Mardo, an arch Pirate, who often brought in thither rich prizes which he had taken: Lyfymachus fell a bringing of him, and wth him over to betray the City to him, and for the offering thereof, put into his hands certain valiant Macedons, whom he wth their hands bound behind them, brought like prifoners into Ephelus; and they fpying their time, got arms in the Caftle where they were, and took the City for Lyfymachus; [Jul. Front. Strat. lib. 5. cap. 3.] and wthreas the City of Ephelus being feated in a low ground, was a while after infinitely annoyed by an inundation of the fea coming in upon it, and quite drowned by it, of which deluge we may read an epigram in Stephanus Byzantinus; made by one Duris, Lyfymachus now removed it into another place; and being now built, called it after the name of his new wife Afines, though after his death, quickly returned to her former name and appellation of Ephelus. [Strabo lib. 14. p. 640. and Stephanus in Ephelus.] and to replenish his new City wth inhabitants, he demolifhed the two Cities of Lebedus, and Colophos, and removed the dwellers in them to it; which deftruction of thofe two famous Cities, Phoenix in his Iambicks, grievoufly deplores, [Pan/an. in Epig.]

Seleucus, to fit his new Cities as he had built in Asia; and the lower Syria, and especially Antioch, the Metropolis of every where equal privileges, prerogatives and immunities with the other Colonies both in Towns and Cities. [Euseb. Chron. Joseph. Antiq. lib. 6. c. 10. & lib. 8. cap. Apia. pag. 1063.] But of the Cities which he built, he named 16 after himself, his father Antiochus; and six others after the name of his mother Laodice; Laodicee; nine of them from himself, Seleucia; three from his wife, Apamea; and one from his left wife, Stratonice; and to the rest, he gave certain Greek and Macedonian names, as came in his head: as Berræa, Edessa, Pella, and the like. [Apian, in Syria.]

Agabothelos, the Tyrant of Sicilie, coming to die, shut away his wife Thoxena, with his two children, which he had by her, being very little ones, with all his treasure and family, and rich furniture, when he exceeded all other Kings, and sent them into Egypt, from whence he was never more heard of. His wife Thoxena, being made a slave to some other, fearing lest to soon as he was dead, they should be cruelly sold, and sold at last the her self, might not be forced to leave him, whilke the breath of his life lasted, she was so much in love with him, that she would not leave him, as his wife; pleading for her self, that when the married him, she contracted a society with him of all fortunes, as well bad as good, and that the world willingly hazard her own life, to be with him at the hour and instant of his death, and his children, little though they were, yet hardly could they be drawn off him holding by the hand, and in the end, parted from him with a dolefull cry, and piteous lamentation, when the wind leveld, and they must be gone, and so loven as they were gone, he breathed

cap. 6.] Lyfimachus, desirous to revenge the death of Amatrix, former his wife, came into Heraclea, and shewing there all fatherly affection to Clearchus and those who were nearest about him: he first flew him, and then his brother Oxathres, [i. e. cap. 7.] seven years after, after the death of Clearchus their father: as may be gathered out of Deudon. year 3. Olymp. 118. [and so, having reduced that City and territory thernuto belonging into his own power, and obliged it to himself, he took all the treasure belonging to those Tyrants, and whatever they had scraped together, into his own hands, and leaving the City in full liberty, and to live after their own laws, he returned into his own kingdom. [Memnon, sup.]

Strato of Lampfacus, the son of Arcefilaus, and surnamed Phycus, succeeded Theophrastus in his schoole; which Strato wasthe teacher and bringer up of Prolemaus Philadelphus, who gave him for his pains, taken in his education, as it is said, fourecore talents, [Diog. Laert. in Strabone.]

Demetrius Poliorcetes, seeking to recover all his father Antigonus his Dominions, was now ready to land in Asia, with so huge an army, as no man after the days of Alexander the Great, to that time, had like to see: for his army he had no less than 100 thousand Foot, 40 thousand Horse, and little less than 12 thousand Horle: in his Fleet he had 100 Gallies, whereof some were of an excessive bignesse, as of 15 or 16 of our tonnage. Before his going, he made a firm league with Pyrrhus; for fear least he, moving on any troubles in his absence, might interrupt, and hinder him in his main design. [Plut. in Demetri. & Pyrrho.]

Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lyfimachus, fearing, as well they might, whether this excessive preparation tended : combined together and making one body of all their Forces, began to find him work, and to make war upon him in Europe ; and in all their actions, three names lent Ambassadors to Pyrrhus in Epirus, advising him to invade Macedon : nor should reckon that a league, which he had made with Demetrius, since he therein had no intention of his help, but only a purpose to be at liberty himself, to make war upon him, as he pleased : Pyrrhus easily affected herunto : debauched Demetrius his wife, and then he him to flight, and took the kingdom of Macedon into his own possession, [Id. ibid. Pyrrhus, lib. 16, cap. 2.] And this was the first time, as [Pausanias, in Attic. pag. 11. l. 10.] note, that ever Pyrrhus was Master of some few Elephants,

But when Lyfimachus came, and pretending that he had a hand in the quashing of Demetrius as well as Pyrrhus, and therefore craved halves with him in the kingdom of Macedonia; Pyrrhus, doubting of the firmity of the Macedons unto him, yielded thereto, and so came to a division of the kingdom of Macedonia with him by Cities and Regions, [Plut. ut sup.]

But in this mangling of drings, Lyfimaachus, finding that his son in law Antipater complained openly that he was a law had cheated him of the kingdom of Macedonia, made short work of him and slew him : and because his daughter Euridice Antipaters now was bereaved at the death of her husband, therefore he committed her to prison. And to the whole house of Caffander paid Alexander the Great the price, whether of his own death, or whether of the destruction of his Race, partly by murdering partly by to-ments, partly by perniciatious acts committed in his own family to the utter extirpation of it. [Justin, sup.]

Thus Demetrius, being in an instant strip of his kingdom, fled to Cassandria. But his wife Phila swallowed up with grief, and not enduring to see her husband fall again into the condition of a private man in a foreign country, and despairing of all better success in time to come, poisoned her self, and died, [Plut. in Demetri.]

When Demetrius lay at the siege of Athens, which had revolted from him to Ptolemy, Crates the Philosopher, being lent in Embasie to him, persuaded him to raise his siege: whereupon, getting all his ships together, and putting aboard them eleven thousand Foot, besides his Horse, he sailed away into Asia, there to get all Caria and Lydia from Lysimachus. There Euridice the filter of his wife Phila, met him not far from Miletus, bringing with her Ptolemais, her daughter by Ptolemy of Egypt, who was his son in law Seleucus, had formerly spoken to Ptol. mei to bestow on him. Demetrius therefore now married her, by the good will of Euridice; and of her Demetrius beget Demetrius, who afterward reigned in Cyrenia, [ibid.]

In this voyage, Demetrius took in many Towns and Cities, some by fair means, some by force, and some tell over from Lyfimachus to him, who also brought great store of men and means with them. But when Agathocles the son of Lyfimachus came towards him with an army, he marched up into Phrygia, purposing to invade Armenia.

This Demetrius, being in an instant stripe of his kingdom, fled to Cassandria. But his wife Phila swallowed up with grief, and not enduring to see her husband fall again into the condition of a private man in a foreign country, and despairing of all better successe in time to come, poisoned her self, and died, [Plut. in Demetr.]

When Demetrius lay at the siege of Athens, which had revolted from him to Pyrrhus, Crates the Philosopher, being sent in Embassee to him, perswaded him to raise his siege : whereupon, getting all his ships together, and putting aboard them eleven thousand Foot, besides his Horse, he sailed away into Asia, there to get all Caria and Lydia from Lysimachus. There Euridice the sister of his wife Phila, met him not far from Mileus, bringing with her Ptolemaus, her daughter by Ptolemy of Egypt, whom his son in law Seleucus, had formerly spoken to Ptolemy to bestow on him. Demetrius therefore now married her, by the good will of Euridice; and of her Demetrius begat Demetrius, who afterward reigned in Cyrenia, [Ibid.]

In this voyage, Demetrius took in many Towns and Cities, some by fair means, some by force, and some fell over from Lysimachus to him, who also brought great store of men and means with them. But when Agathocles the son of Lysimachus came towards him with an army, he marched up into Phrygia, purposing to invade Armenia, and and thereby to make a combustion in Media it self, and consequently to feel the pulse, of the upper provinces of Asia, and how they stood affected to him; for that there he might happily find many a lurking hole, if need should be: as for Agathocles, who followed him, he often worried him in small encounters, but never came to a main battle with him, [Ibid.]

Nevertheless, failing many times of food for himself, and fodder for his Horse, he found himself sorely distressed, especially by an error committed in passing the Lycus, he lost many of his souldiers, which that fierce river swept away. And at last by a pestilence following the tamin in his army, he lost eight thousand of his company, and was fain with the rest to come back to Tarsus in Cilicia, where his purpose was to refrain all kind of injury and oppression of the people, as appertaining to Seleucus, whom he would not offend in any kind. But that could not be; considering the extreme necessity his army was in, and Agathocles kept all the passages of the Taurus, wherefore he wrote his letters to Seleucus; wherein complaining of his own hard fortune, he humbly besought him to compassionate his case, as a poor kinsman of his, and one that desired to be piuced, even of an enemy, [Ibid.]

Seleucus, taking into consideration the distressed estate of his father in law, wrote to his Commanders and officers in those parts, to supply him with all necessities in a kingly manner, and not to suffer his army to want in any kind. But there was one Procles, an intimate friend and familiar of Seleucus, who wrought to stir with him, by insinuations which he put into his head against Demetrius, that he presently led an army against him into Cilicia. Demetrius, wondering at this sudden alteration in Seleucus, drew off presently into the craggy mountains of Taurus, and from thence sent his agents to him, to desire, that by his good leave, he might fall upon some free state or other, among the Barbarians; and there spend the remainder of his life, without ranging the world over any longer: but if not, yet that he would suffer him to winter quietly where he was, and not to expose him, in the extremity he now was in, to the force and fury of his enraged enemy. Seleucus made an ill construction of all these motions; and therefore granted him only, that, giving up into his hands the principal of his friends, which he had about him for hostages and pledges of his good abearance, he should spend two months of his winter quarters in Caesarea, which was a country bordering upon Cappadocia, and withall, stop up all passages which led from thence into Syria. [Ibid.]

And now Demetrius, being thus closed up like a wild beast in a den, having Agathocles the son of Lyfimachus on the one hand, and Seleucus on the other, to watch him; turned himself to try what he could do by force, and wasted some of the provinces belonging to Seleucus, and in every encounter, he had the better of him; and when Seleucus let his lion Chariots file upon him, Demetrius sundry times routed them also, and put his enemies to flight; and took the passages of the mountains, casting out the Garrisons which Seleucus had there placed for the keeping of them. And growing now confident of his own strength, resolved to throw at all, in a pitch battle with Seleucus, when upon the sudden, a grievous sickness fell upon him, which utterly overthrew the state, both of his body, and also of his affairs, and hopes in the world; for that during his sickness his souldiers all abandoned him, some falling away to his enemies, and others disbanded, and went where they pleased. [Ibid.]

Whiles Demetrius thus lay under the lash of Seleucus in Syria, Lyfimachus set upon Pnythus, in Macedonia; and in five years and six months space, won it all from him, [Decep. and Porphy.]

Demetrius, at the end of 40 dayes, being recovered of his sickness, taking such souldiers with him as were left, removed his Camp, making as if he would march into Cilicia; and the night following, without sound of trumpet, turned short another way; and having passed the hill Amanus, ravaged and plundered all that Country as far as Cynthetica, a region in Syria. And when Seleucus came thither with his army, and encamped not far from him. Demetrius with his men came upon him by night, whiles he slept, yet he getting notice of his coming by some that fled over to him, start out of his bed, and commanded an alarm to be sounded; and whiles he was putting on his shoes, cried out to his friends, that he had to do with a fierce wild beast: and Demetrius, finding, by the noise which he heard in the enemies Camp, that his coming was discovered, retired presently, and went his way. [Plut. in Demet.]

So soon as it was day, Seleucus followed and overtook him; and Demetrius giving one wing to be led by a captain of his, led the other himself, and routed the wing of the enemy, on his side; then Seleucus leapt off his Horse, and took off his helmet, and with a target in his hand, shewed himself bare faced to the mercenaries of Demetrius his army, and exhorted them to leave Demetrius, and fall over to him, and to be once to wife, as to understand, that it was more in favour of them, than of Demetrius, that he had restrained thus long from falling on them: whereupon they all cried out, God save save Seleucus, and calling him their King, abandoned Demetrius, and served him, [Ibid.]

Demetrius, supposing this to be the last reverse of fortune, and worst that could befall him, retired to the streets of the mount Amanus, and there spent that night in a thick wood, with those few friends which he had about him: purposing from thence to go to the City Caesus, and hoping there to get shipping for some other country to flee unto. But when he saw that he had not so much as one dayes provision for them neither; it fell out so luckily with him, that an old friend of his, Sotigines, came and brought him 400 Crowns. This supply he hoped would carry him and his to the sea side; and therefore went by night, to pass the top of the mountain: yet because he saw by the fires every where made, that the enemy lay in his way, in great despair he wast him to return to the place whence he set out. And there, when one of the company told him, he should do well to put himself into Seleucus his hands, he drew his sword, and would have there present fallen upon it; but being persuaded by his friends about him to forbear, he sent to Seleucus, and submitted both himself and all that he had to his will and pleasure, [Ibid.]

Seleucus, having heard the message, gave order presently to his servants, to fit up a Royal Pavilion in most princely manner to receive Demetrius in; and disparted away one Apollonides, who had formerly been an intimate friend of Demetrius, to comfort him, and to tell him, that there was no cause of fear, seeing he was to come to an old friend and son in law of his: when this came to the ears of Seleucus his servant, first by one and one, and anon after, they all flocked in great multitudes to Demetrius: which act of theirs, instead of compassion, caused envy towards him, and made his foes to alienate Seleucus his good intentions, from him: telling him, that no sooner should Demetrius be seen in the Camp, but he should find strange alterations, and innovations in it, [Ibid.]

Hecupon, Pausanias was sent with a traine of about a thousand men, Horse and Foot together; who put all others from him, and instead of bringing him to Seleucus his presence, carried him away to a certain Forland lying out into the Sea, in Syria. In that place was he kept ever after, with a strong guard upon him; but sufficient allowance made him, wanting for no moities, no walks, no gardens, nor places of hunting, or other recreations, that his heart could wish: and with his friends that had followed him, had free leave to have access unto, and converse with him: nor passed there a day, wherein some or other came not unto him, to see him from Seleucus, with friendly messages from him, and to bid him be of good comfort, and to put him in hope of his further liberty upon reasonable conditions: so soon as Antiochus (which was Seleucus his son) and his wife Stratonice were come to Court, [Ibid.] yet [Diodorus, lib. 21.] tells us, that he was all this while kept prisoner at Pella, [Hen. Vales. in Excerpt. pag. 262.]

Demetrius, being fallen into this condition, wrote to his son, and other Captains, and friends of his at Athens, and Corinth, and other places, that they should give no credence to any letters that might happen to come to them as sent from him, or sealed with his seale: but should look to, and order all, for the behoof of his son Antigonus, as if himself were actually dead, [Plut. in Demet.] from whence it is that Porphyrie deduceth Antigonus his reign over Greece from this time; to wit, from the tenth year before he headed the kingdom of Macedonia to his other Dominions: which Porphyrie telleth us further, that this Antigonus, from a place called Gont in Thessalia, where he was bred and brought up, was surnamed Gontaris, [Scalig. in Grac. Enjekia, pag. 226.] Now Antigonus, hearing the news of his fathers captivity, took it very heavily, and put himself into mourning weeds, and wrote away his letters, as to sundry other Kings, so to Seleucus himself, in all humble manner and suppliant-wise, offering himself, and whatever he could call in, in pledge unto him for his father; the like letters and messages came to Seleucus from sundry Cities and Potentates, on his behalf, [Plut. in Demet.]

Only Lyfimachus by his letters advised Seleucus to take heed how he let a man go, of so ambitious and turbulent a spirit, so ambitious of Sovereignty, and to encroaching upon the rights of all other King; and offering him 2 thousand talents gratuity, if he would send him packing out of the World: but Seleucus, who had never any good opinion of the man, upon this letter of his, grew into utter detestation of him, as of a barbarous and execrable person, and spared not to let fall foul words to his Ambassadors, for that they went about to persuade him, not only to break the word and promise which he had given, but also to commit to prodigious a murder upon a person, so many wayes and so nearly allied unto him: nevertheless he wrote away his letters forthwith to his son Antiochus, who was then in Media, for his advice, what he should do with Demetrius now he had him: for that of himself, he was purposed to let him go at liberty, and to restore him in all points to his former state and glory of a King; which he therefore thought fit to communicate to him, because he had married his daughter

Serapion, and had children by her, [Id. Ib. and Died. in Excerpt. publ. by Hen. Vales. lib. 21.]

Demetrius, being hitherto confined to that Cheronea or neck of land, at first, forbore not to exercise him self in hunting, and other sports: but by little and little grew idle and recheifless, and fell to potting and dicing, and spent his time for the most part that way, Plut. in Demet.

Ptolemy of Egypt, turnamed Soter, having children first by Euridice, the daughter of Antipater, and then by Berenice, whom Antipater lent as a companion only with his daughter, into Egypt, drawing now near to his end, left Ptolemy, turnamed Philadelphus, one of his sons, which he bred by Bernice, to succeed him in the Kingdom, as Pausan. in Attic. Assemethe. Justin lib. 10. cap. 2. [telleth us, that before ever he grew into any infirmity of body, he put over his kingdom to his laid son, and that he gave his reasons for his doing to the people. But Lucianus in Macrobius, and Porphyry in the Greek Eusebian fragments, [pag. 225.] tell us, that when he had reigned 38 years alone, he then joynd his son with him in the kingdom, and so held it joyntly with him two years. But I conceive, that it was in the 39 year, beginning after the death of Alexander, that he took his son Philadelphus into the consortship of the kingdom with him, and that in remembrance thereof it was, that Dionysius the Astronomer, framed a new Era or Calendar, to be reckoned from the summer of this year, 3719, as Clau. Ptolemy [telleth in his Great Syntaxis, out of the laid Dionysius his celestial observations, which Dionysius is the same man, and none other which this Ptolemy Philadelphus sent into India, as Plinie lib. 5. cap. 17. reports.]

Hermippus saies, that Demetrius Philadelphus advised Ptolemy, the father, by all means to joy with him in his kingdom, one of his sons begotten of Euridice, and not of Bernice: and Heraclides, (reported by Diog. Laertius in Demetr. Phaler. in his Epitome: of the successions of Sotion, saith, that when the laid Ptolemy would needs give the Diademe to his son Philadelphus, Demetrius said to him, Sir, take heed what ye doe; if you give it once away, you will never have it again; yet did the father for all this, not onely give him the Crown in the open sight of all the people, but also attended on him as one of his ordinary guard or Pensioners, saying, That if he surpassed the having of a Kingdom, to be the father of a King. [Justin lib. 16. cap. 2.]

Ptolemy turnamed Ceraunus, (i. e.) Lightning, either for his quickness and celerity in dispatch of busines, or for his beneficence of nature, as Memnon saith, the son of Euridice, seeing his younger brother made King before him, for fear of what might follow, got him privily away, and fled to Seleucus; and he pitied his case, as of the son of a friend, and entertained him with large and honourable allowance, not without some signification, that when ever his father came to die, he would let him in his throne in Egypt. [Memnon in Excerpt. cap. 9. & 13. Apian in Syriac. pag. 128.]

In the 124 Olympiade, as we find in Civil of Alexandria, [lib. 1. com.] [the image of Serapis was brought from Siope, upon the Euxine sea to Alexandria, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, as some think, or rather under Ptolemy the first, his fathers (for in the beginning of this Olympiade it was, that they reigned joyntly, as was said before), for that Ambassadors were sent from him concerning this very thing to Scythrothenis, who was at that time King of Siope in Pontus, Cornelius Tacitus sheweth at large in the fourth book of his History, toward the end thereof.

In the same Olympiade, as we find in Euseb. Chron. Sostratus of Cnidus built the Pharos, or watch-tower, in Alexandria, of which Plinie, [lib. 36. cap. 12.] [saith in this wise, Magnificum turris a rege facta, &c. (i. e.) Much renowned, saith he, is the Tower built by a King in the Isth of Pharos, which makes the port of Alexandria, in the reign of 800 years the building: wherein (to omit nothing great was the mind of Ptolemy the King, in that he suffered Sostratus, the Architect of this great work, to find his name upon it. The use of which Tower was, to bear a light in it, for the help of those who travelled by sea in the night season: and by day, to shew them the way, into the port, and how to avoid the shoals that lay before it. [Strabo lib. 17. pag. 791.] calls this Sostratus, plav rai Cnidius, &c. (i. e.) the friend of Kings; meanings of the two Ptolemies, father and son, who, as I shewed before, at this time held that kingdom in consorship together: and withall, relates the inscription which Sostratus there made of himself; as thus, Σωστράτης Κνίδιος ὁ ἀρχιτέκτων, οὗτος ἀνέσχετο τὴν πύργον τοῦ φάρου, ὅπως οἱ πλοῖα εὐκόλως εἰσέλθωσι καὶ ἐκέλθωσι, καὶ ὅπως οἱ ναυτικοὶ ἀσφαλῶς ἐκ τῆς θαλάσσης ἐκταχθῶσι, καὶ ὅπως οἱ ναυτικοὶ ἀσφαλῶς ἐκ τῆς θαλάσσης ἐκταχθῶσι, καὶ ὅπως οἱ ναυτικοὶ ἀσφαλῶς ἐκ τῆς θαλάσσης ἐκταχθῶσι. Sostratus a Cnidius born, the son of Dexiphanes, to the gods the deliverers, for the benefit of the sea-men, and Lucian in the end of his book, of the right writing of a History, hath the same saying, that he saith: Sostrates himself it somewhere cunningly, and of himself, and not, as Plinie, by the sufficiency and good liking of the two Kings. For when he built the Tower, he graved this inscription somewhere in the inside of it, and then plaistered it over, and upon that plaister, let the name of the Ptolemy, whoever it were, that then reigned, conceiving that it would come to passe in some short time (as indeed it did) that the upper inscription, together with the plaister, would fall off, and then his own name, that was graven under in good stone, would appear.

But

But to the end that there might be a safe arrival made for shipping to this Pharos, which lay 7 fadoms distant from the main land, there was made a huge caule, which joynd the Island to the Continent, and made it now to be no longer a distinct Island; but a Cheronea or Peninsula, and a part of the Continent, joyning to Rhacotis a suburb of the City of Alexandria: of which [Ju. Caesar, in lib. 3. Commenta. De Bello civi.] toward the end thereof, [saith in this wise: *Pharos, saith he, is a tower in that Island, of a wondrous height, and sumptuously built, which is so called from the Island is self whereon it stands: This Island lying over against Alexandria, makes an arm of the sea between a sure haven for the Cities use; but a superfluous Region; (for so it should be, as Brodus, Scalliger, and Sallianus have well observed, not, a superfluous Regionibus, as the vulgar printed Copies have it) (i. e.) by their Kings in elder ages, had a narrow causeway of 500 paces long been made through the sea, which by the help of a bridge joyneth it to the town, for we may in no fort give credit to that fable of Artemia, Marcell. lib. 2. of Joban. Malala lib. 9. cap. 2. of the Author of the Festivals of George Cedreus, and Job. Theop.] who dreams, that both the tower it self, and caulway, were the work of Cleopatra, the last Queen of Egypt.*

Spartacus, the King of Bosphorus Cimmetrus died, when he had reigned 22 years, as Diocorus telleth us in the year 1. of the 119 Olympiade: after whom, as it seemeth, succeeded his son Paryates, of whom I spake in the year of the World, 3695.

Demetrius Poliorcetes, who had now lain three whole years confined in a Promontory or Foreland of Syria, partly with laziness, partly with potting and gormandizing, fell into a sickness, and died, [Plut. in Demetr.] 17 years after the decease of his father Antigonus: as [Dexippus, Porphyrie and Eusebius (ay:)] Seleucus was ill (spoken of abroad in the world about his death: and indeed, he repented him often, and blamed himself for being so jealous and suspicious of him. But Antigonus, Demetrius his son, when he heard that the Reliques of his father were coming towards him, put to sea, with all the shipping that he could make, and met them about the Isles, and there receiving the ashes of his fathers body, laid them up in a golden Urne, and covering them over with a vail of Scarlet, and a Diadem or golden Crown set thereon, and using all Rites Pomps, and Ceremonies usual and belonging to so great a Funeral, carried them along with him first to Corinth, and afterward to Demetrius, a City so called after his fathers name, and by him peopled with men, drawn out from the lesser towns and villages of Iolcos in Thessalie.

Seleucus, having now gotten all that which Demetrius possessed in Syria, and Asia, properly to be called, made of both those kingdoms one entire Empire, [Euseb. Chron.] at which time the Jews paid him 300 talents yearly for their tribute: yet they had no foreign Ruler set over them, but were governed by their High Priests, and according to the fashion of their country, [Sever. Sulpic. Sacr. Hist. lib. 2.]

In this year, Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, turnamed Soter, died; after his joyning his son with him in the consortship of the kingdom, or the Epoch of the Dionysian account, 1 year, and almost 3 months after the death of Alexander the Great, 39 years and 4 months, or thereabouts (for which others reckon 40 full years; but [Clau. Ptol. in Reg. Can.] 39 years only) when he had lived full 84 years, as [Lucian (saith in Macrobius)] The countries and kingdoms which he held in his possession, are all contained, [Idyl. 17.] of Theocritus the Poet; as namely, Egypt, Phoenicia, Arabia, Syria, Lybia, Ethiopia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Lycia, Caria, and the Isles of the Cyclades. And the truth is, that he is said to have joynd in arms with Seleucus, against Demetrius, upon expresse conditions, that the dominion of all Asia should be to Seleucus; but Phoenicia and Cœlœsyrta he would have to himself. But the Seleucians lay, nay, but that Ptolemy entered into an allocation of arms against Antigonus, not to gain any thing thereby to himself; but onely to help Seleucus in the claim which he laid to Cœlœsyrta; and that, that upon the death of Antigonus, Callander, and Lyfimachus, was it which call Cœlœsyrta upon Seleucus, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 410.] Now although there be no doubt but that Phoenicia and Syria, as Theocritus also testifieth, did sometime belong to Ptolemy; and that he after the death of Antigonus, who had wrested them out of his hands, subdued Syria again to himself; as [Pausan. in Attic.] relateth: yet we have already shewed, that Tyre and Sidon, were in the possession of Demetrius Poliorcetes; and after his death, if not before, both those two places and all the rest of Syria, came into Seleucus his possession.

Josephus [lib. 11. cap. 2.] gives Ptolemy Philadelphus 39 years of his reign, reckoning as it seemeth from the time, that he first reigned joyntly with his father: for after his fathers death, Clemens Alexandrinus gives him but 37 years, [Clau. Ptolemy, in Reg. Can. 38.] and so do Porphyrie, Eusebius, and others. Whereas, according to my account, he reigned after his fathers decease, 37 years and almost 8 months, but in all, 99 years; wanting one month. But how long longer he reigned, certain it is, that he put to death his younger brother Argæus, as guilty of conspiring his death, did did he another brother of his, born of Euridice, as detected for soliciting the life of Cyprus to revolt from him. [Paulan. in Attic. pag. 6.] Whereby it seems, that he little deserved that specious name of Philadelphus, (i. e.) a lover of his brethren. Theocritus in his 17 Idyllion faith, that he had in his dominions 33339 Cities, and is said to have been of to great power, that he exceeded therein, his father Ptolemy the first: which Jerom confirmeth out of Histories, upon [Daniel, cap. 11.] and so doth Appianus Alexandrins, out of the Records of the Kings of Egypt, in his preface to his History of the Romans, unto whom for this purpose we may add, what Athenæus, (i. e. 5, Deipnosoph. cap. 5.) relateth of his feets, and the unmeasurable bignesse of his ships.

In the year 47 of the first Periode of Calippus, in the eighth day of the month Anthelion, 465 years of Nabonassar's account, the 29 day of the month Athyr, three howers before midnight, in the end of the 29 day of our January, after the Julian Calendar, Timochares observed at Alexandria. That the fourth part of the Moon covered the following part of the Virgilia's, to a third part or near half. [Ptolem. lib. 7, cap. 3.]

Lymachus, now King both of Thrace and Macedon, being drawn thereto by the persuasion of his wife Arinoe, (by whom he had also children born) murdered his son Agathocles; his eldest son, and whom he had ever designed to be his successor in his kingdom, and by whose conduct he had achieved so many glorious victories, but whether by poyson, or by the hand of Ptolemy Ceraunus, brother to his said wife Arinoe, I cannot say; [Strabo lib. 13, p. 623, Justin lib. 17, cap. 1. Paulan. in Attic. pag. 9, Memnon Excerpt. cap. 9.]

But having thus begun with his own son, he fell afterward to act the like upon his Nobles that were about him, for no other cause than for that they lamented the death of his son. Whereupon they which escaped his hands, and the Captains of his armies in all parts, fled away to Seleucus, [Justin lib. 17, cap. 1.] and when upon these murders of his Nobles, all the people fell to have him in abomination, now not single persons only, but whole Cities fell off from him, and revolted to Seleucus. [Memnon lib. 1.]

Lyfandra, the daughter of Ptolemy Soter, and sister to Arinoe, with her children begotten on her by Agathocles, and her brothers with her, fled away all to Seleucus; and with them Alexander also, another son of Lymachus, but by the venter of Odyrias, another wife of his, fled also for company to him; all which coming to Babylon, joyed in perion to him, to make war upon Lymachus, [Paulan. lib. 1, with Appian in Syriac. pag. 120.]

At the same time also, one Phileteus a Paphlagonian born, and an Eunuch made, but one who had had good education in his youth, and whom Lymachus had made keeper of all his treasure laid up in Pergamus, repining at the murder acted upon Agathocles, and therefore laid at by Arinoe, who daily caused him to Lymachus, seized himself of the city Pergamus, which stands upon the river Caicus, and then sent to Seleucus, offering himself, and all the treasure which he there had under his charge, belonging to Lymachus, to his disposing, and to holding in still with the strongest, and him that was next at hand, and bearing them in hand, with fair promises, and good offices, as occasion was offered, kept the Cattle there, and principality of the place, 20 years long. [Paulan. in Attic. pag. 7, and 9, Strabo lib. 13, pag. 623, and Appian in Syriac. pag. 129.] calls him, no ἡγεμὼν Περσέων, (i. e.) the Prince or Potentate of Pergamus, but certain old choicenes in Huber. Gelsus Thebanus, have him, Regem, (i. e.) King: For indeed this was the man that was the founder of that new principality in Pergamus; being 60 years of age, as Lucian, in Macrobiis affirmeth of him.

In the year 48 of the first Periode of Calippus, on the 25 day of the month Pyanepfion, 466 year of Nabonassar, the seventh day of the month Thoth, three howers and one half before midnight, the ninth day of our November, Timochares at Alexandria observed the Conjunction of the moon with Spica Feneris, in the northern part thereof. [Ptolem. lib. 7, cap. 3.]

Antiochus, surnamed Soter, son of Seleucus Nicator, falling in love with Stratonice, his Stepmother, and one by whom his father had a son born, being conscious to himself, of the tedious of his own desire, neither attempted any thing upon her, nor disclosed ought of that which troubled him, but lay gnawing his feets, and in that melancholy, would fain have died. But Lepinæ, a Mathematician, or as others say, one Erasistratus, a Physician, Aristotles grandchild by a daughter of his, and a disciple of Chryppus, as Plinie hath it, [lib. 29, cap. 1.] to wit of Chryppus a Cnidian born, and by profession, a Physician likewise as Laertius in the life of Chryppus saith, though some others say he was a scholar under Theophrastus, as the same Laertius, in the Life of Theophrastus toward the end thereof noteth, against whose followers, going by the name name or sect of Erasistratus. Galen afterward wrote a book of Phlebotomie, or opening of a vein, yet extant; this Erasistratus therefore, sitting upon a time by Antiochus, observed, that at the coming in of Stratonice his colour ever rose, and his pulse beat high, and when the went away, he grew pale and wan again, and tereht his breath short, and panted, found thereby what ailod him; and opened the matter to Seleucus: who thereupon was content to part with her, though most dearly beloved, to his son, and calling his army together, before them all, married her to his son, and whereas he had at that time 79 Provinces under him, he gave up the greater part of them, scilicet 18, (i. e.) the upper provinces, which were all to the eastward of Euphrates, to his son, reserving to himself onely such countries as lay from the Euphrates westward, to the Mediterranean sea, [Appian in Syriac. with Valer. Max. lib. 5, cap. 7. Plut. in Demet. Lucian. De Syria Dea, Galen. in ἑρμηνείᾳ, (i. e.) of foreknowing, and Julian in Mefopogone.]

Lymachus, passing over into Asia, made war upon Seleucus. And this was the last battle fought between the Survivors of Alexander the Great: of which there were now already 34 extinct and dead, these two onely survived: This battle was fought in Porygia, lying upon the Hellespont, scilicet 18, as we read, [in Porphyry, in Græc. Euseb. Scaliger, pag. 228.] wherein Lymachus fighting very valiantly in his own person, and having lost many of his men, was struck thorough with a great Spear, by one of Heraclea, whose name was Malacon: and to have seen the death of fifteen of his children, before him, remained as it were the last stone of his house, to be pulled down, [Paulan. in Attic. pag. 9, Memnon Excerpt. cap. 9. Appian. in Syriac. pag. 128, 131, Justin. lib. 17, cap. 1, & 2, Oros. lib. 3, cap. ult.] Appian saith, that he had then lived 70 years, Justin, and Orosius, 74, but Hieronymus Cardianus, the Historian, who then lived in great esteem, saith that he was at that time 80 years of age, as [Lucian, in Macrobis], reporteth out of him.

When Lymachus was fallen, a dog of his kept by the body, and beat off all birds and beasts from it: till at length one Thorax, of the country of Phalaris, having long sought for it, found it out, when it was almost putrified, and knew it principally by his dog that lay by it; and Alexander his son by Odyrias, with much ado, and after many entreaties, gat it of Lyfandra, and carried it into the Cheroneise of Thrace, and there buried it: his bones were afterward translated to the Temple in Lyfymacia, by the Citizens of the place, and there laid up in an Urne: which Temple, went afterward by the name of Lymachiæum. [Paulan. and Appian.]

When he was dead, his kingdom accrued to Seleucus, as an addition to his former Monarchie, [Memnon], with which, to great a victory he much pleased himself: and thereafter, for that he now lay himself the last alive of all that company, which went by the name of Alexander's fellows, or companions in arms; and a Conqueror of Conquerors, which he said, was a gift not of man, but of god himself, [Justin].

The men of Heraclea in Pontus, hearing that Lymachus was dead, and that he was slain by a country man of theirs, in the 84 year after that Clearchus had first usurped the Sovereignty over them, fell into a desire of recovering their native liberty, which after their town-born tyrants were extinct, Lymachus had again taken from them; and in the recovery thereof, they shewed themselves right valiant men for Lymachus, though upon the death of the two Brothers, Clearchus the second, and Oxathres, he restored their liberty to the Citizens for a while; yet afterward, thorough the importunity of his wife Arinoe, he made war afresh upon them, which [Justin, lib. 17, cap. 3.] mentions; and having taken their City, he made one Heraclius Cimeus, a man wholly at Arinoes devotion, Governour over them. After Lymachus his death therefore, the men of Heraclea dealt with this Heraclius offering him not onely all security for his own person, but also a large summe of money to bear his charges on the way; provided onely, that he would be gone, and leave them in their prison and native liberty. And he thereupon, grew into a rage, and commanded some of them away presently to be put to death: which the Citizens perceiving, and having formerly underhand agreed with the chief officers of the Garrison under him, to make them free of their City, and to pay them all their arrears which had been detained from them, fairly took Heraclius himself, and put him in prison: where they kept him for a while; but seeing themselves anon after free from all dangers, they demolished the Citadel, which Lymachus had built upon them; and sending an Embassie to Seleucus, to satisfy him concerning what they had done, made one Procorus, Superintendent or Curator of their State, [Memnon Excerpt. cap. 8, & 10.]

Zizpeus, a petty King of Bithynia, growing angry with the men of Heraclea, first for Lymachus and now for Seleucus his sake (for he was enemy to them both) made inroads upon their land, and spared not for any mischief that he could do them; where in nevertheless his men escaped not free: but received oftentimes, as much damage them.

themselves as they did hurt to them, [Ibid. cap. 11.]

Mean while, Seleucus sent one Aphrodisius to the Cities of Phrygia, and places adjoining, to look to his profits and affairs there: who having dispatched the business he was sent about, at his return, gave large commendations of other Cities, but laid made things to the Heraclians charge; especially that they stood ill-affected to Seleucus himself: whereupon the King growing into choler, scorned the Embassy sent by them unto him; and used many rough and minatory speeches to them: but there was one of them called Camatcon, who, nothing daunted therewith, spake to Seleucus in this wise, Sir, Hercules, Carron, (now Carron in the Dorian Dialect or language, signifies, him that is the strongest) which word, when Seleucus understood not, perceiving in his former choler against them, turned away from them. Whereupon the Messengers that were sent, conceived that it was no boote for them, either to stay there, or to return home again; which tidings coming to Heraclea, they not only fortified their City, the best they could of themselves, but also fell to procuring of foreign aides, and sent their Ambassadors to Mithridates King of Pontus, and to the States of Byzantium, and Chalcedon, to pray in aide of them, [Ibid. cap. 12.]

But chole who were banished and lived in exile from the state of Heraclea, met together, and came to an agreement among themselves, which was this. There was one Nymphidius, who persuaded them to labour for a restitution to their country: and told them it would be no hard matter to effect it, if they would desire restitution of what their ancestors had lost in a fair, and not in a turbulent way: whereunto they were all easily persuaded; and when thereupon all things fell out happily, and succeeded according to their desires, it was hard to say, whether they that thus returned to their Country, or their Country which thus received them home again, were the gladder of it, for both they who returned, used the Citizens, who had expelled them, very lovingly; and the Citizens suffered none of them to want for any necessary and convenient means to live withal; and by this means they grew all into a body again, and returned into their pristine state of nobility and government; as they were before, [Ibid.]

Seleucus, purposing to end his days in his old and native Country of Macedonia, passed over the Hellespont, and going from thence to Lyfimachus, elapsed by chance, a certain altar standing in a conspicuous place, and asked what the name of that altar was; it was told him, that it was called Argos. Now it is said, that he had been forewarned by an oracle, to beware of Argos. But he further asked, why it was called Argos, whether from the Argonauts, which passed that way in elder time, when they went with Jason to Colchos, or from the Argivi, who went to the siege of Troy, or for that the great Argos, wherein Jason went, was there cast away in their return, or for that it was the Country of the Attride, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; and as he was thus questioning about the name of that altar, Ptolemæus Ceraunus, the son of Ptolemei the first, by his wife Euridice, and brother to Antiochus the Relict of Lyfimachus, standing behind him, ran him thorough with his sword, and slew him; having been his great benefactor, and who had ever borne him up, and maintained him, and who would never let him be from him. And so Seleucus within seven months after the death of Lyfimachus, lost both the kingdom of Macedon, which he had taken from him; and his life withal.

Arrianus tells us, that Seleucus was the greatest man that was, after Alexander the Great, and the most nobly spirited of all the rest, and the extent of whose dominions, exceeded all others, [lib. de Reb. Alexand.] He died in the 43 year after the decease of Alexander, the 32 year of the Grecian, or Seleucian Calendar, having spent in his life, as Appian says, 73 years, but as Justin intimates, 78. His body was buried by Philæterus the Potentate of Pergamus, which he redeemed out of Ceraunus his hand, with a great sum of money; and having buried it in all solemn wife, sent his ashes to his son Antiochus, who receiving it, burned it in Selucia, which stands upon the sea coast; adding a consecrated Chapel to his tomb, which, from his surname, was called, Nicatorium, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 129.] Justin tells us, that both he, and his sons, and grand-children after him, were all born with the signe of an anchor in one of their thighs; as a naturall badge and token of that race, [lib. 15. cap. 4.] And Antonius in his book de Claris Urbibus, (i. e.) of famous Cities, speaking of Antiochia, saith, [l. 2.]

—Ma Seleucum, &c.
She for her founder did Seleucus praise;
Who wore a native anchor in his thigh;
A true impress of his nativity,
And cognisance on all his progenie.

But Polybius, [lib. 2 pag. 128.] notes, that Ptolemei the first, and Lyfimachus, and Seleucus, and Ptolemæus Ceraunus, all died about the 124 Olymp. and that Ptolemei the

the first, died in the first year of it, and Lyfimachus and Seleucus in the last: But Ceraunus died not till the later end of the first year of the Olympiade following: and whom therefore Polybius, mentioning again the concurrence of their deaths in the [same book, pag. 155.] seemeth of set purpose to have omitted.

Ceraunus, having thus murdered Seleucus, by the help of a swift horse, gat him to Lyfimachia; where putting a Crown upon his head, and taking a fair guard about him, he went unto the army, where of pure necessity the army received him, and cried, God save the King: who had but a little before, sworn fealty to Seleucus, [Memnon, Excerpt, cap. 13.]

Antigonus, surnamed Gonatas, the son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, hearing how Seleucus was murdered, made a journey into Macedonia, purposing to prevent Ceraunus in that part, both by his land and sea Forces. But Ceraunus, having all Lyfimachus his Fleet in a readinesse, drew out, and met him in right good array at sea: in which among other forts, there were from Heraclea in Pontus sent him sundry vessels, some of six, some of five tire of oares, and such as were called Aprallæ; and above all one of eight tire of oares, called the Leontifera, which for her great bulke, and exquisite buildings, was much admired by all that beheld her; for in her were an hundred oares, so that on each side there were 800 rowers, which made a 600 in all: and upon the upper deck or hatches, there were 1200 fighting men; under two special Commanders: inasmuch, as when they came to grapple, Ceraunus had by far the better of it; and Antigonus was fain to flee, with all his Navy. In this fight the ships from Heraclea, did best; and among them the Leontifera best of all. Antigonus therefore being thus routed, fled into Boeotia, and Ptolemæus Ceraunus went into Macedonia, where he remained quiet by the space of two years, [Ibid. cap. 14, 15.] to wit, one full year and five months, as Dioxippus and Porphyry, do more precisely relate this matter.

Ceraunus, growing now gracious in the eyes of the multitude, both in regard of his father Ptolemei the first of Egypt, and also for the revenge which he took of Lyfimachus his death, endeavoured first, to take in, and make faire with Lyfimachus his sons: and desired to marry Arfinoe their mother, and his own sister, bearing them in hand, that he would adopt them for his children; that so succeeding in their fathers room, they might, either in reverence of their own mother, or in regard that they were now to call him father, forbear attempting any thing against him. He also by his letters sought the love and friendship of his brother Ptolemæus Philadelphus King of Egypt, professing that he utterly forgat his losse of his fathers kingdom, and that he would never seek to get that from his brother, which he had already more fairly attained to, by getting it from an enemy. [Justin, lib. 17. cap. 2.] He made also a peace with Antiochus the son of Seleucus, whom he had murdered, [Id. lib. 24. cap. 1.]

Neither did he omit to sollicite Pyrrhus the King of Epirus to the same effect: supposing it would infinitely sway the scales, to which side soever he leaned. For as much as he so then lay at catch, to get any mans estate that lay in his way; and offered himself to any man that would make use of him. In which humor, being to aid the Tarentines in Italy against the Romans, he sent to borrow ships of Antigonus Gonatas, to transport his army into Italy, to Antiochus the son of Seleucus deceased, to borrow money, because he seemed to be better stored of money, than of men; and to Ptolemæus Ceraunus, to furnish him with some companies of soldiers out of Macedonia: and Ceraunus presently sent him 5 thousand Foot, and 4 thousand Horse, and fifty Elephants; yet to serve him two years, and no longer. In request of which favour, he took his daughter to wife, and left him Guardian and Protector of his kingdom of Epirus, during his absence; for fear, least while he was away, with the flower of his youth in Italy, some or other, might take advantage, and make a spoile thereof in his absence, [Id. lib. 17. cap. 2.]

Wherefore, leaving his son Ptolemei, whom he had by Antigone the daughter of Berenice, being but 5 years old, Governour of his kingdom, yet as it were under the tuition of the said Ptolemei Ceraunus King of Macedon, he took his journey, and with his army landed in the Port of Tarentum, now Otranto in Italy; taking with him his two younger sons, Alexander and Helenus, being very little ones, for his solace in so remote a war, [Id. lib. 18. cap. 1.] and never staying for the Spring, put over thither in the middle of Winter, as Zonasas reporteth, out of Dionysius Halicarnassensis in the 124 Olympiade, as [Polybius saith, lib. 2. pag. 129.] to wit, in the fourth and last year of that Olympiade.

Antiochus Soter, after his father Seleucus his death, held the kingdom of Syria 19 years. [Porphyry, Eusebius, and Serr. Sulpicius.] who when, with much ado, and with many a battle fought, he had hardly recovered all his fathers Dominions: in the end, he sent an army under the command of Paracles, to pals the mountain Taurus; and he chose him a Lieutenant, one Hermones, borne at Apendus. Now Paracles his purpose was, to set upon Heraclea, in the country of Pontus: but receiving satisfaction by an

Embassie which they sent unto him, he forbear proceeding any further against them, and making a firme league with them, turned his course, and passing thorough the country of Phrygia, came into Bithynia. But the Bithynians by an ambulation which they laid for him, cut off him, and his whole army, and utterly destroyed them; where-in yet Patrocles himself played all the parts of a most valiant man, and did with his own hand many exploits upon the enemy. [Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 16.] and Zipates the King of Bithynia, having thus destroyed Antiochus his army, built a City at the foot of the hill Liparus, and called it after his own name. [Id. ibid. cap. 21.]

In the end of the fiftieth year of the first Periode of Calippus, being the 44 from the death of Alexander the Great, Aristarchus of Samos, took an observation of the Summer Solstice; and after that Meton did the like for 15 or 9 decades of years: as Cl. Ptolemaeus in his book De anni Magnitudine, reporteth out of Hipparchus, [Ib. 3. Syn-tax. cap. 2.]

Artinoe, the Relict of Lyfimachus, being married to her own brother, Ptolemaeus Ceraunus, received him into her City of Cassandrea: and he presently, seizing upon the Castle there, took her two sons, which he had by Lyfimachus: the one called Lyfimachus of the age of 16 years, the other, Philip, being but 3 years old, and slew them both in their mothers arms; and the her self rending her clothes and tearing her hair, was baled out of the gates of the City with two servants onely, and sent into banishment to the Isle of Samothracia. [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 2. & 3. Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 15.]

Ptolemaeus Ceraunus, with a small company, and they not all of the best marshalled neither, (as it was were as casily waged, as murders are committed) driven on with the furies of his wicked minde, went out against Belgus; and when the King of the Dardani offered to aid him against these new-come Galls, with 30 thousand men, he would none of them: and when the Galls sent Messengers to him, offering him peace for money, he sent them back word, that he would not give them peace, unless they delivered their armes, and the principal of their army, for hostages of their good-bearing unto him. So to it they went, and the Macedons not able to endure the impression of the Galls, fled before them: Ptolemaeus himself being sorely wounded, and the Elephant on which he rode, being also wounded, and thereupon grown unruly, was cast off his back, and taken by the Galls, and by them torne in pieces; his head cut off, and being taken upon the point of a Spear, was carried about for a terror to the enemy. Few of the Macedons escaped; the rest were either slain or taken prisoners. [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 4. 5. lib. 23. cap. 2. with Memnon Excerpt. cap. 15. Diod. Sic. lib. 22. Sec. 3. Paulianus in Phoc. pag. 335.]

After Ptolemaeus, in the kingdom of Macedon, succeeded his brother Meleager; and him the Macedons, after two months space, ejected, as a man unworthy of the place; and put in Antipater, the son of Philip, who was brother to Cassander; of whom, [Justin, lib. 12. cap. 14.] maketh mention: and whom they nicknamed the Erebian, because he continued in the place but 45 dayes, for thereabouts it is, that the Erebian winds blew upon that coast to blow every year, and no more, [Porphy. in Grac. Enstib. pag. 228.]

Brennus, (who, some say, was by birth a Praufian, as we read in [Strabo, lib. 4. pag. 187.] hearing of this great victory gotten by Belgus, fretting in himself, to see that he had letten slip out of his hands so faire an opportunity, of getting so great a Preie, as the whole riches of the East: gathered together 15 thousand Foot, and 15 thousand Horse of his Galls, and marched in all haste into Macedonia, Justin, lib. 24. cap. 6.] but coming into the country of the Dardani, a people in Illyrium, was forced to stay there, by reason of a mutiny which rose in his army: for to the number of 20 thousand of his men, (which number Suidas also, in the word Galatæ harh) with Leonorius and Lutarius their Captains, fell from him, and went away into Thracia; and what with fighting, what with selling peace to those that would buy it of them, came at length to Byzantium: and having for a while wasted the country of Propontis, and making it tributary to them, possessed themselves at last, of all the Cities in those parts, [Liv. lib. 38.]

3726. Softnesses a chief man in Macedonia, gathering together the youth and lusty gallants of the country, made head against those Galls that there were, and quelled them in many encounters, and defended the country from their further plundrings. For which

which great service, when many of the Nobles there strove for the kingdom, he being a man of obscure place and parentage, and of no Royal blood, was yet preferred before them all; and when they would have made him King, he refused it, and made them take their oath to him, as to their Captain or Commander onely, [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 5.] and in that capacity, he governed that country two years, [Porphyrie and Eufr.]

When Brennus came into Macedonia, and there fell to spoiling and ravaging of the Country, Softnesses met him with his army; but so few as they were against so many, and heartless against men grown haughty upon so many victories, the Macedons were quickly overthrowen, and fled to their Cities; where whilest they kept themselves, not daring to peep out, Brennus with his army, overran and plundered all the Country, [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 6.]

Leonorius and Lutarius, getting by a trick, into Lyfimachia, and possessing themselves briefly of the Cherfonefe there, came down from thence into Hellepoint, and there finding how little a cut it was over into Asia, had a great mind to passe over into it; and sent their Agents to Antipater the Governour of Hellepoint, to treat with him about their passage, [Liv. lib. 38.]

Zipates, having now reigned in Bithynia, full 48, and lived 76 years, died, leaving four sons: the eldest of which, was called Nicomedes, who succeeded his father in the kingdom, and proved to his brothers, not a brother, but a butcher, [Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 21.] but the younger who was called Zipates, and whom [Liv. lib. 38.] callith Zibeas, had the sea coast of Bithynia, which went by the name of Thracia Thyoniaca, at Asiatia, [Ib. cap. 18.]

Now, when after Zipates his death, Antiochus Soter prepared to make war upon Bithynia, Nicomedes sent and prayed in aid of the City of Heraclea; promising to do the like for them, if they ever happened to stand in need of him: whereupon they sent him aid at that present; and by this occasion they afterward, though with great expence of monie, recovered Cierus and Tius, and the land of Thinis; But when they went about to recover the City and Territory of Amestris, (which had also been taken from them) and spared neither for war nor money to recover it: Eumenes who held it, as Governour onely, chose for very sight to give it up to Antiochus the son of Mithridates, then King of Ponus, gratis, rather than to render it to the State of Heraclea, upon any termes, [Ibid. cap. 17.]

Brennus, and Acichorius, with the Illyrians (as Appianus in Illyria telleth us) whom they call Auratians, and Celts, whom they call Cimbrians, left Macedonia, and went into Greece, with an army of 152000 Foot, and 20400 Horse, every of which Horse had two footmen attending on him, they on horseback likewise, to help their Masters, if occasion were, and to supply his place, if he happened to be slain: but, when they went to plunder the Temple at Delphos, they were terribly beaten off with Thunder and Lightning, with Earthquakes, and with the sinking of the ground under them in the Mount Olympus, and with bitter Frost and Snow, being then the Winter Season, and miserably distressed in all kinds: and they which were slain by the sword of the Phocenses themselves, were little lesse than six thousand men. There fell upon them likewise, a panick fear; and by a Frost falling in a night, they lost upward of ten thousand more, and as many more perished of very hunger in the place. Brennus their Leader, vexed with the wounds which he had received in his body, and for very shame of such his overthrow, having first swallowed himself with drink, fell upon his own sword and died: and Acichorius, seeing how the heads of this war were punished, gat him hastily, with a company of 10 thousand poor maimed fouldiers out of Greece 5 but the continual stormes of rain and snow, with bitter frosts and famine, and which was worst of all, perpetual waking, utterly consumed the reliques of this unlucky army; and all nations thorough which they passed in their return, fell upon them as they went, here and there scattered, and made a prey of them, [Paulian. in Phoc. & Asie, Justin, lib. 24. cap. 6. 7. 8. Eclog. Diodor. lib. 22. Sec. 13. Appian. Illyr. pag. 758.] which calamity Polybius, [lib. 2. pag. 108.] notes to have befallen them, year 2. of the 125 Olympiade, and when Anaxitares was Lord Chancellor of Athens, [Paulian. in Phoc. pag. 340.]

As for those of Illyrium, called Auratians, which escaped this misfortune, when they came home into their own country, they found themselves there pestered with such a multitude of frogs, sent upon them, that they corrupted the very Rivers with their puresfaction; and then a vapour rising out of the earth after them, bred a pestilence throughout all the Country, till they were faine to flee from their native soile; but carrying the plague along with them, no Country would receive them, and so were they faine to go on 33 daies journey, till they came into the country of the Bithurnian, and there they built them cities to dwell in, moreover it is said that the land of the Celts, was plagued with Earthquake, and in them whole Cities swallowed

lowed up; and that these plagues still followed them, till at last they also were forced to leave their habitation, and went wandering till they came to the Country of the Illyrians, who were partakers with them in their action at Delphos: and them, as being already consumed with the plagues, they easily overcame, but taking the infection there by mixing with their goods, they were slain again to be gone from thence, and wandered still, till they came to Pyrene, [Appian, iv. m. sp.] of all which horrid, strange, and miraculous plagues and punishments falling upon these Galls and others formerly mentioned, or hereafter to be mentioned, for their sacrilegious acts committed against their Idols, we may truly say, and must confess, that to be most true, which the wife man faith of them, who swear falsely by them, That it was not the power of them by whom they swore, nor of them, whom these thus robbed, but the just vengeance of sinners, from the true God, which punisheth always the offences of the ungodly. [Wild, cap. 14. v. ult.]

As for the Cordula, who were a part of these Galls, which attempted the plundering of Delphos, it is said, that one Bathanasius their Captain, [seated them near the bank of the river Ister, from whom it is, that the way by which they returned, was afterward called Bathanasius his way, as Athenasius tells us, lib. 6. cap. 4.] which are the same Galls, which Strabo calls, the Scordisci, [seated upon the Ister, and they put these Avarians, or Avartians, from their possession, which they had there gotten, lib. 7. pag. 293. 296. 313. 317. 318.]

And now for those Galls, who as I said before, went out of Thracia, down to the strait of Hellespont, upon a discord raised among them, Leonorias, with the greater part of his men, returned to Byzantium, from whence he came. But Lutatius took from the Macedons, who were sent by Antipater, to him, as spies upon him, under the colour of Ambassadors, five ships, which he used to transport his men by some and some, day and night, till he had landed them all in Asia, [Livius lib. 38.]

And now to return to where we left, the war growing between Zepetes, the Bithynian, and the state of Heraclea, Zepetes got the victory of them, but succours coming to them from other parts, Zepetes was slain by; whereupon the Heracleians, getting the bodies of their slain, burnt them, and carried their bones into the City, and laid them up in their charnel howles, as the bones of men, who among others had excellently well deserved of their Country, [Memorus Excerpti. cap. 18.]

About the same time, Antiochus Soter, and Antigonus Gonatas, making each of them great provisions for war, one against the other, Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, sided with Antigonus; but others with Antiochus, Antiochus therefore, for bearing Antigonus for the present, matched first against Nicomedes, whereupon he was slain to gather what aides he could from other parts, and among the rest sent to his friends the Heracleians, and got from them 13 ships, of three tire of oars a piece, and then went to encounter Antiochus upon the sea, and their fleets met indeed, but having stood at gaze a while, and looking only one upon another, each party drew off again, and so nothing was done between them that time, [lib. cap. 9.]

They of Byzantium, wearied out with the continual incursions and plunderings of the Galls, sent their Ambassadors about to their friends, and got of the Heracleians a thousand, I once say, four thousand Crowns; and not long after, Nicomedes dealt with these Galls, and upon terms, procured them to come to his help in Asia; which terms were these: That they should for ever continue firm and fast friends to Nicomedes, and his heirs. That without his privacy and consent, they should lend no helping hand to any that by Embassies should implore their aid in their wars, but should be friends to his friends, and foes to his foes. Item, That they should help them of Byzantium, if occasion were. Item, That they should maintain league and friendship with the Thracians, and Chalcidians, and Carians, and some other States, which had other nations under their jurisdiction. [lib. cap. 20. 21.] and so Leonorius, by the means of Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, put over from Byzantium into Asia side, [Livius lib. 38. Strabo lib. 12. pag. 566.] Now this passage of the Galls into Asia, Pausanias in Phoc. [p. 340.] tells us, was in the third year of 135 Olymp.

Neither yet were they of Byzantium hereby quite rid of those plundering Galls, for some of those who were at Delphos with Brennus, and escaped that danger, came into Hellespont under their Captain Comontorius, and they had no mind to go any further, but liking well of the Country which lay about Byzantium, there sat them down, and having conquered the Thracians, and made Tyla the head City of their kingdom, put Byzantium into as great a fear of an utter ruin, as they were in before, [Polib. lib. 4. pag. 313.]

Ptolemies Philadelphus, being a great favourer of learning, and all liberal, arts and sciences, built a most famous library at Alexandria, in that quarter of the City which was called Brachium; and having committed the care of getting books of all sorts, and out of all Countries, to Demetrius Phalerus, upon his advice, he also sent to have the holy writings of the Jews to be translated out of Hebrew into Greek by 72 interpreters, preters in the seventh year of his reign, as Epiphanius in his book, de mensuris & ponderibus, (i.e.) of weights and measures, reporteth, of which Tertullian, [cap. 18. Apology.] thus writeth: The most learned King, faith he, of all the Ptolemies, [named Philadelphus, and most exquisitely keen in all kind of literature, finding, as I conceive, to enrich Philistras in the matter of libraries, among all other monuments, which either antiquity or curiosity could afford, for the serving of a man; gave to posterity, by the advice and setting on of Demetrius Phalerus, a most excellent scholar, and humanist in those days, whom he had set over that work, desired of the Jews to have their books also.]

And verily that this Ptolemy, never any King, was infinitely addicted to the studies of humane learning, is confirmed by Phylarchus, vouched by Athenasius, [lib. 12. cap. 17. Deipn.] which is more fully delivered by Vitruvius, in his preface to his book of Architecture, where he leweth, that having finished his great library at Alexandria, he instituted certain games in honour of Apollo and the Muses: whereunto he invited, all writers in the common arts and sciences, (as others were wont to do, wrestlers and the like) to put in for the prize; and appointed great rewards to them who were found to excel, and surpasse the rest in them, and shewed how he entertained Zolus, [named Homeromysus, (i.e.) the scourge of Homer, when he came unto him,]

For this collection of books, Aristotle shewed him the way, for he at his death, left his library to Theophrastus, and Theophrastus by his last will and testament, which we find in Diog. Laertius, left it to Nilus Scopius, [Strabo lib. 13. pag. 608. Plus in Sylle.] and from him Ptolemy bought them, besides others which he bought at Athens and Rhodes; and brought them all to Alexandria, as Athenasius, [lib. 1. cap. 1.] teacheth us, though Strabo and Plutarch in the places above mentioned, and Athenasius himself elsewhere, to wit, [lib. 5. cap. 11.] say, that Theophrastus his books, and with them all Aristotles library, came to the hands of Neleus his heirs, and were by his successors, and long after in the days of Sylia, sold for a great sum of money, to one Apellion the Teian.

Keeper of this great library after Demetrius Phalerus, (who was not only a great Grammarian, for which only Tertullian commends him, but also a singular Philosopher, and one who had been formerly a great State-man, and an excellent Governour in Athens) was one Zenodotus of Ephesus, (the first Corrector of Homers books) as Suidas saies, and after him Aristophanes, who with great diligence and industry, read over all the books of that great library, in order as they stood; as Vitruvius in his forementioned Preface to his book of Architecture affirmeth. But this was afterward: and therefore to return to the time we are now upon. Aristas in his Treatise of the 70 interpreters, and after him Josephus, [lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 2. and Enchir. lib. 8. de Prepar. Evangel. speak.] as followeth.

Demetrius Phalerus, being upon a time asked by King Ptolemy, how many Myriads, or ten thousands of books he had gotten together, answered about 20 Myriads, but hoped ere long, to make them 50 Myriads, which number of 200000 books, (ince we find, not only in Aristas, which we now have, but also in those Copies which Josephus and Eusebius heretofore used, that that lesser sum of 54800, found in Epiphanius, who wrote long after them, is in no wise to be admired,

Demetrius Phalerus advised the king, as I said before, to ask those sacred writings of the Jews; but Aristas, who was an attendant about him, at that time, advised him, for the purchasing of them, to let all the Jews, who were then slaves in Egypt at liberty, and send them home; and it is said that the number of them came to 10 Myriads, (i.e.) one hundred thousand souls: and in our copy of Aristas, it is said: that every one of them cost the King 30 drachmae, or 120, as it is in Josephus: now 120 drachmae, make 30 sicles, or sates, or tetradrachmae in silver, which was the full price of a slave in Exod. c. 21. 32. [as which rate our Saviour also, what time, for our sakes, he took the form of a slave upon him in the flesh, was sold by Judas the traitor, now those 30 drachmae which we find in our Aristas, being multiplied by 80 Myriads (i.e.) 800 thousand amount to 200000 drachmae, which again being divided by 6000 which make just an Attick talent, make 333 Attick talents; now the price which Ptolemy paid to redeem the Jews from their masters, came to above 400 talents, both by Josephus his and also by our Aristas his account: because it is said that there were above 10 Myriades paid. In which redemption of the Jewish slaves from their masters the like price was paid for every sucking child of them, together with the mothers which they suck on over and above, whence it is that Josephus saith that Ptolemy paid in this kind, upward of 400 talents, in reed of which our vulgar editions of Aristas have 400 talents,

Of these Jews Ptolemy took the younger sort and ablest of them into his army, and of the rest, such as he thought fit, he employed in his private affairs, as in his letters to Eleazar the High Priest, himself affirmeth, for which one true letter of the Kings, Epiphanius

Epiphanius giveth us two forged ones, far different both in stile, and meaning, from that which we find in Aristeas, and Josephus, the latter of which beginneth thus, ὁ δὲ ἀριστέας, 8cc. (i. e.) of a treasure that is hid, and of a fountain sealed up, what profit is there? whereas in the greek one attributed to the king, who doth not perceive a manifest Hebraisme, and that taken out of Ecclesiast. [c. 20. 30.] wisdom is if it be hid, and a treasure unseen, what profit is there of either of them?

But together with that Epistle, he sent also rich presents to the use of the Temple at Jerusalem, by Andreas, and Aristeas his two servants, to be delivered to Eleazar the High Priest, as namely, a golden table of two cubits long, (and an half, as Josephus addeth) and no less than half a cubit thick, all of solid gold, and not covered over onely with plates of gold; with 30 goblets of like gold, and 30 of silver, for the making of all which, he allowed over and above, 50 talents weight of gold, and 70 of silver, and precious stones to the number of 5 thousand, so that these stones amounted in the value of them, to five times as much as the gold which he sent, came unto, and the workmanship these unto belonging, besides all which he sent 100 talents for sacrifices and other uses of the Temple.

Eleazar the Priest, receiving these presents, out of every tribe, (for that after the captivity there remained some of 10 tribes of the twelve, I shewed before in the year of the World 3468. c.) he chose six principal men, most eminent above all others, for ripeness of age, for nobility, for learning and experience; which should translate Gods Law, out of Hebrew into Greek; the particular names of the which 72 elders are expressly delivered by Aristeas; the last of which called Ezekiel, I conceive to be none other but him, whom Eusebius in the ninth book, de Prepar. Evangel. reporteth to have written a Tragedie of the bringing forth, or deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt: for the very name of Ezekiel sheweth, that he was of the Jewish race, and not a Greek, as Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius thought he was.

Aristeas also wrote back a letter to the King, the beginning whereof, as we find in Aristeas, was this, Αἰνέειν ἡμῶν, (i. e.) God save you, or as Eusebius more rightly, Εὐχαριστέω, 8cc. (i. e.) If your self are well, and the Queen Aristeas your sister, all is well, and as we desire it should be: for Philadelphus after the death of Arsinoe, the daughter of Lysimachus King of Thrace and Macedonia, by whom he had Ptolomeus Evergetes, and Berenice (of whom more in their proper places) married a second Arsinoe, his own sister, which after the death of Lysimachus her first husband was married to Ptolemus Ceraneus her own brother, but he dyed, before he bare any child to Philadelphus, on whom he he doted, that he called a province in Egypt, Arsinoitis, after her name, [Paulsan, in Attic, pag. 7.] and made her a statue of 10 piaz stone, four cubits high, and consecrated her in a Temple, which was called the golden Temple, [Plinius lib. 27. c. 8.] and by his appointment, Dinocrates the Architect, let him to make an archroof over her, all of load-stone, to the end, that an image of her made of Iron, might cleave thereto, and seem there to hang in the air, [Id. lib. 24. cap. 14.] of which Dinocrates, Antonius in his 9 Idyllion, speaking, saith;

*Justus ob incestu qui quondam factus amoris, 8cc.
(i. e.) Who for a monument of incestuous love,
By Ptolemis command did make to hang,
Arsinoe in the air of an Egyptian King.*

These 72 interpreters entering into Alexandria, presented the King with such things as Eleazar had sent unto him, together with sundry parchments, wherein the law was written, with golden letters, in the language of the Jews, all curiously written, and the parchments so joyned together, that the learning of them could not be discerned by the eye of man. and it fell out, that they came thither at a time, when news came to him of a great victory gotten by him at sea against Antigonus, of which sea fight, for want of writers in that time, I find no mention made in any other place but this, for I can no wayes approve their judgement, who refer it to that time, when Antigonus Gonatas making war upon the Athenians, besieged their Cities by sea and land, which we find by Justin, [lib. 26. and by Paulsan, in Laconie.] was not till after the death of Pyrrhus, and before the death of Aretas, or Arcus the first King of Lacedaemon, which was between the years 442, and 445, according to the Julian account: for albeit that Arcus with his land forces, and Patrocles with Ptolemis fleet, came at that time to the succour of the Athenians, yet seeing that Arcus returned home without any battle fought, Paulsanias shewes, that Patrocles did nothing neither for their relief, [In Attic, pag. 7. and in Laconie, 87.]

But concerning our 72 interpreters, Ptolemei to entertain them, feasted them seven dayes, or as Josephus hath it, 12 dayes in a most sumptuous and magnificent manner, and afterward appointed one Dorothus to take care of them, and to supply them with with all necessaries, not letting them want for any thing, for their table or otherwise. And the King himselfe would now and then put them questions, some concerning affairs of State, some of morality: whereunto they extempore made him very prudent and well advised answers: as we find in Aristeas, who took all that he wrote out of the Kings Diaries, or Day-books, thence caused he three talents to be given to each of them and the boy that carried them.

Three dayes after, one Demetrius walking along the caufway, called the H-prastadium, that is a mile, wanting one furlong, with the Interpreters, led them over the bridge into the Isle of Pharos, and there placed them in a goodly house, upon the north shoar of the Islands and far off from any noise or tumult; and they there set themselves every man to his work of the Translation, most exactly fitting it to the meaning of the Original: which done, Demetrius caused it to be lairely exhibited: every day they fate at it till three of the clock in the afternoon; and then went and took their repast: having all things abundantly provided for them, and especially their diet, of the same kind that was provided for the Kings own table, did Dorothus see them furnished withal, by the Kings appointment. Moreover, every morning very early, they came to Court, and there having bid the King good-morrow, returned to their place: and there having waitt their hand, as their manner was, and said their prayers, they let themselves to read, and to interpret from point to point: But Epiphanius, varying herein from Aristeas and Josephus, writes that they were put into 36 cells; to wit, two together in every one of them; and there continued from break of day, to the very evening; and that then they were put into 36 boats, (i. e.) two into a boat, and brought back to the Kings Palace, and there ate of the Kings diet: in the former part of which Narration, he followeth I know not whom; but in the latter, it seems, is led by their Fables, which dream't that the caufway of 7 furlongs was not made, at least not finished, till Cleopatraes time.

And it so fell out, that this work of the 72 Interpreters was finished in 72 dayes, as if it had been so fast by them of set purpose: which done, Demetrius calling all the Jews together in the place where it was done, read it all over in the presence of the Interpreters themselves: and they as the authors and finishers of so great a good, were highly commended and magnified by all the Jews there present: Demetrius also himselfe wanted not his share of praises among them: and they blesought him, that he would deliver a copy of the law, so translated to their Rulers. And when it had been all read over to them, then the Priests and Elders of the Interpreters, and the Magistrates and Officers of the Jews, stood up and said, Forasmuch as this Interpretation is religiously, and in every point accurately performed, it is requisite and fit, that it should stand as it is, and that no alteration be made in it. And when all approved that saying of theirs, with a great acclamation, then Demetrius required to lay a great curse (as the manner was) upon any man that should offer to alter it, by adding any thing thereto, or taking any thing therefrom.

And when all had been in like manner read over to the King, he infinitely admired the wisdom of the Legislator; and commanded all possible care to be taken of those Books, and that they should be religiously laid up and kept. He also desired the Interpreters themselves, that after their return home, they would not fail to come often to him again; and gave to every of them, three faire Gownes, two Talents of Gold, a Cup of one whole Talent, and the full furniture of a Chamber.

And moreover, to Eleazar the High Priest, he sent by them, ten beds with Silver feet, and rich furniture thereto belonging: a Cup of 30 Talents, ten Raiments, with Scarles, and a Crown richly wrought, and about one hundred pieces of Linnen, as fine as Silke; and withal, Violes, and Mazers, and two golden Goblets, to sacrifice withal; and by his letters desired him, that if any of these men had at any time a desire to come and visit him, he would not hinder them; for that he infinitely desired to converse with such kind of men, and chose to spend his money upon them rather than any other way.

The Galls, which were left by Brennus, when he went into Greece, to keep Macedonia, least they should seem to sit idle, whilst their fellows were at work, fired out 15 thousand Foot, and 3 thousand Horse; and set upon the Getes, and the Triballi, and routed them, [Justin, lib. 25. cap. 2.]

Antigonus Gonatas, having lost a battle at sea, as was said before, by Ptolemei Philadelphus his men, made a peace with Antiochus Soter, as Justin, shewes, [lib. 25. cap. 1.] and went into Macedonia, where his father Demetrius Poliorketes had sometimes reigned, and which himselfe, coming to it in the tenth year after his first being King of Greece, held 34 years, [Porphyrius in Graec. Enchiridion, pag. 229.] whose Heirs continued King there down to Perseus; in whom, being overcome by the Romans, the Kingdom of Macedonia, was ending, [Id. in Demetrium.]

The Galls, having overcome the Getes and the Triballi, sent their Ambassadors to Antigonus

Antigonus the King of Macedon, to offer him peace for his money; but withal to spare his army, and the manner of his Camp: These Antigonus entertained and feasted in sumptuous manner: but the Galls seeing the infinite store of Silver and Gold laid forth for the feast, for greediness thereof, returned more his enemies than they came. And thereupon resolved with one accord to set upon him: but he having got an inclining of their coming, gave order that every man should take with him what he could, and lie close in a wood adjoining: the Galls came on, and taking what they there found, turned away to the sea side; where, whilst they were busy in rifling the ships, the Mariners, and a part of the army which was thither fled with their wives and children to save themselves, set upon them unawares, and slew them, and made such havock of them, that the reputation thereof secured Antigonus from thence forward, not only from the Galls, but also from all the nations round about him. [Justin lib. 25, cap. 10 & 2.]

Now as touching those Galls, who under their 17 Commanders, the chief whereof were Leonorius and Lutarus afore named, passed over it several times into Asia, they all came again into one body, and offered their assistance to Nicomedes against Zibæus, al. Zibæus the younger, who held the coast of Bithynia lying upon the sea; by these, and others which came from Heraclea in Pontus, was poor Zibæus crushed to pieces; and so Bithynia came all into the hands of Nicomedes. But the Galls having wasted that Country all over, shared the spoil thereof among themselves; and then dividing the kingdom between them and Nicomedes, called their portion thereof, by the name of Gallogracia. [Livie lib. 38. Justin, lib. 25, cap. 2. Admon. Excerpt, cap. 20.]

Of 20 thousand men that they were, there were not above 10 thousand armed; yet they struck such a terror into all the Nations and Countries on this side the Taurus, as well the places which they went not to, as those they did go to, far and near, all submitted to them. And whereas they consisted of three nations of their own, to wit, the Tolissobogians, al. the Tolissobogians; (coming, as was thought, from the Galls, which were called the Boii) the Trocmi, and the Tectofagi, they divided all Asia between them, according to the several parts thereof, where they planted themselves: to the Trocmi they left Hellefpont, and all that coast; Eolia and Ionia, they left to the Tolissobogians; and the Tectofagi possessed the inland or middle part of Asia; but they made their chief seat upon the bank of the river Halys. [Liv. lib. 28, and Strabo in the word Galatia.]

Of this passing of the Galls out of Europe into Asia, Demetrius Byzantius wrote 13 books, as [Laert. in the Life of Demetrius Phalerus] says, which one Phœniss, who lived a whole age before this fell out, is said by way of oracle to have foretold, in these words,

Δὴ νῦν ἀπολείπει, &c. (i.e.)
The Galls shall pass the ftreights of Hellefpont,
And ravage all the land of Asia;
Yet worse things hath God in store for them,
Who on the sea coast of that land do dwell.

In the 126 Olympiade, Eratosthenes Cyrenæus, the son of Aglai, or, as others, of Ambrosius, was born. He was a scholar of Aristo Chius the Philosopher, and of Lyfania's of Cyrene the Grammarian, and of Callimachus of Cyrene a Poet, [Strabo in the word Eratosthenes.]

3730.

Curius Dentatus, this year fought with Pyrrhus in Italy: and having slain 23 thousand of his men, and taken his Camp, made him retreat to Tarentum. [Enrop. lib. 2.]

When the Ambassadors, which Pyrrhus had lent to the Kings of Asia, and to Antigonus Gonaras, to help him with men and money, and they returned without either, to him; he called the Princes of the Epirotes and Tarentines together, and suppressing the letters, told them, that supplies would come very speedily. But when the same hereof came among the Romans in their Camp, and that there were great supplies coming to him out of Macedon and Asia both, that report held them quiet from attempting any thing more upon him, [Pausan. in Asia, pag. 11.] But Pyrrhus, never telling why, made as if he would remove with his army from Tarentum. Mean while, he willed his confederates to provide for war, and committed the keeping of the Castle at Tarentum to his son Helenus, and to one of his Nobles, whose name was Milo. [Justin lib. 25, cap. 3.] and when he had spent six whole years in the war in Italy and Sicilie, and lost many of his men, and had no hope left, of doing any good, he returned into Epirus, with those eight thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, which he had left. [Plut. in Pyrr.]

Curius

Curius in his Consulship triumphed of Pyrrhus; and was the first that brought Elephants (four in number) to be seen in Rome. [Enrop. lib. 2.] nor did the people behold any thing in that triumph more willingly, than those beasts with turrets on the backs of them, and which they were so much afraid of: which very beasts seemed to have a sense of their captive condition, by holding down their heads, as they followed the victorious horse in the triumph. [Florus, Rer. Rom. lib. 1, cap. 18.] which triumph, was made in the month of Jan. or Febr. as is gathered out of the Marble fragments of the Records of their Triumphs.

Pyrrhus, getting some of the Galls to joyn with him, made some incursions upon Macedonia, where Antigonus Gonaras then reigned. And having gotten many Cities, and two thousand of Antigonus his souldiers revolting to him, and his hopes still increasing, he marched directly against Antigonus himself to bid him battle; and put him with all his Forces, Macedons and Galls, to flight. Of which Galls who brought up the reare, and fought that day very manfully, many were cut in pieces, and died in the place, and the Captains of the Elephants, being distressed by the coemy, yielded themselves and Elephants unto him. The Macedon Foot standing amazed at this overthrow, and hearing Pyrrhus calling upon them all in general, and upon their Captains, and chief Officers by name, to yield unto him, left Antigonus, and fell to him; and when Antigonus saved himself by flight, Pyrrhus pursued him to the sea side. [Plut. in Pyrrho, Pausan. in Asia, pag. 11, 12.]

After this victory to gotten, Pyrrhus took the richest and fairest spoils of the Galls, and hung them up in the Temple of Pallas of Ionia, which is between Phœra, &c. Larissa: and brought all the upper Macedonia and Thessalie into his subjection. [Id. ibid.] and as if this had made him amends for Italy and Sicily, which he reckoned he had lost, sent for his son Helenus from the Castle of Tarentum where he had left him, [Justin, lib. 25, cap. 3.]

When Pyrrhus had spoiled the City Egeas, which was the Royal Seat of the late Kings of Macedon, and where they lay buried, he left there the Galls who had followed him in this war, to keep it, who when they had heard by some, that in the Tombs of the Kings which there lay, there was great store of treasure laid, according to the fashion of old times, they brake down the Tombs themselves, and took away such wealth as was in them; threw their bones about the streets, and basely trampled them under their feet. But Pyrrhus, though finding that by that act of theirs, he himself was ill spoken of among the Macedons, yet blamed he not them therefore openly, knowing what need he had of them in his wars. [Plut. lib. Diodes, lib. 22, in the Excerpt, by Valer. pag. 266.]

Antigonus, with some few Horse that followed him, came to Thessalonica, there to attend the event of things, and what would become of Macedonia, now he had lost it: purposing to put for it again, by the help of such mercenary Galls as he had taken into his pay. But being a second time utterly defeated by young Ptolemei, Pyrrhus his son, with eleven only in his company, he skulked up and down, seeking no longer now to recover his kingdom, but to save his own skull. [Justin, lib. 25, cap. 3.] And Pyrrhus reproached him, calling him an impudent fellow, for that, notwithstanding the condition he was in, yet he would not get him a cloak to wear, as other Grecians did, but continued still in his Scarlet Robe. [Plut. in Pyrr.]

3731.

In the year when Caius Fabius Licinius, and Caius Claudius Caninas, were Consuls of Rome, Ptolemeus Philadelphus, hearing of the great overthrow of Pyrrhus by the Romans, and how they began to grow in the world, sent his Ambassadors, with presents from Alexandria to Rome, and made a league and covenant with them. [Enrop. lib. 2. Liv. lib. 14. Dio. in Excerpt. Legatus, published at Rome by Fulvius Ursinus, and Jo. Zonar. Chron. lib. 2.] and the Romans being glad to see that to great a King as he was, thus sought their friendship; set likewise their Ambassadors to him: to wit, Q. Fabius Gurgus, Cn. Fabius Pictor, and Quin. Ogulnius. The latter, having received rich presents from the King, as soon as they came home, and before they went to yield an account of their Embassy to the Senate, went and gave up all that ever they had received from him into the Treasury; rightly conceiving, that out of a publick service for the Common-wealth, they ought not to reap any benefit of their well-doing, save only praise and honour; but all was restored to them again, not only by a Decree of the Senate, but also by the general vote of the people; and the Questors were commanded, to go and deliver to every of them his own again. So that in this one thing, the bounty and magnificence of Ptolemei, the sincerity of the Ambassadors, the equity of the Senate, and whole people of Rome, had every of them the praise due and belonging to them. [Diod. in Ep. Valer. Max. lib. 4, cap. 3.]

3732.

In the 13 year, according to Dionysius, on the 25 day of Egon or Capricornion, in the 53 year from the death of Alexander the Great, or 476 from the beginning of Nabonassars account, on the 20 day of Athyr, (17 of our January) the Planet of Mars was was observed to be in the morning, under the northerly part, of the forehead of the Scorpion. [l. Ptol. lib. 10. cap. 9.]

Pyrrhus, having obtained the kingdom of Macedonia, began now to look after the sovereignty of all Greece and Asia. [Justin lib. 25, cap. 4-5.] But before he had quite subdued all Macedonia, he was sent unto by Cleonymus of Sparta to come and help him in his wars at Laconia; [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 12.] in the absence of Arcus his King, who was then away in Crete, helping the men of Gortyna there, who were then oppressed with a war. Pyrrhus thither went, with a small number of his men, and thought and fate, and a Pyrrhic victory, which great advantage Pyrrhus in mind, not to recover Sparta to Cleonymus, but to get all Peloponnes for himself. [Plutarch in Pyrrhus.]

3733- In the 13 year of Ptol. Philadelphus: (in some impressions it is falsely, and a half,) in the 436 year of Nabonassar, in the 17 day of the month Mator, answering the 1 of our October, 12 hours after the setting of the sun, Timochares observed the star of Venus in the morning wholly to have eclipsed and darkned, [Cl. Ptolem. lib. 10. cap. 4.]

While Pyrrhus lay before Sparta, a company of woemen, whose Captainesse was Archidamia, defended it against him till the return of Arcus out of Greec, and Acrotatus the son of Arcus, valiantly repulld Ptolemie the son of Pyrrhus, when he made an assault, and would have broken into it, with two thousand Galls, and certain choise companies out of Chaonia : whereupon Pyrrhus, despairing of any good to be done there, drew off, and took the spoile of the Countrey, purposing there to winter.

Now whilst the writhus lafed in Laconia, Antigonus, having recovered the Cities of Macedonia, marched down with his army into Peloponfe, there to encounter again with Pyrrhus, knowing that if he foed well there, he would prefently return into Macedonia, to purfue the point of the war there; [Luſim. in Antiq. pag. 12.] and when Pyrrhus was upon his way to Argos, Arcus the King fell upon the rear of him; and ever now and then cut off ſome of the Galls and Molians, which brought it up, and once Oraſus a Cretian born, flew Ptolemei the fon of Pyrrhus, valiantly fighting on his father's behalf; [Plutarch] whole body brought off, when his father beheld, he ſaid, that this dead brach him not to ſoon as he feared it would, or his overmuch valour ſelf deſerve; [Luſim. lib. 25. cap. 4.]

And the very night that Pyrrhus entered into Argos, it is said, that a fierce-woman came and ran from the top of his Spear, [Epile, de Hippi, Animal, lib. 10. cap. 37.] and the day following, it was kill'd, with a brick-bat, which a poor old woman threw down upon his head; and his head was presently cut off by one Zophrys, a souldier of Antigonus, and carryed to Alcyoneus, Antigonus his son, who took it, and daubt it on the ground at Antigonus his foot, where he fate, with his Nobles about him: and Antigonus rebuked him very sharply for so joyfully intulfover the fall of so great a person; not considering the calualty of human condition: and taking the head, put his hood over it, which he then ware for an attire, after the manner of the Macedons, and buried his body very honourable. And when his son Helenus was brought prisoner to him, he willed him to take upon him both the habit, and also the spirit of a King, and delivered into his hands the bones of his father, enclosed in a golden Urne, willing him to carry it into Epirus, to his brother Alexander. And as for Pyrrhus his Nobles and friends, for they also camp and all, fell into his hands, he entreated them with all the fair respect that might be. [Plus, in the end of his Pyrrhus, lib. 25. cap. 5. Val. Max. lib. 5. cap. 1.]

Thoth of Tarentum, hearing of the death of Pyrrhus, lent to Carthage to crave aid thence, as well against the Romans, as against Milo, who held the City with a strong Confedon of Epirotes: and Milo being reduced to this exigence, and being enclosed on all sides, by the Romans at land, and Carthaginians by sea, delivered up the Castletto Papyrus Curio, the Roman consul, upon this condition, that he and his followers, with their monies, and other stuff, might be suffered safely to passe into their own Country. The City thereupon was also surrendered to Papyrius, by the Townsmen thereof: giving up their armes, their ships, themselves, and all into his hands: and thus was the end of the war of Tarentum, against the Romans, [Zonaras one of Diogenes, lib. 4. cap. 2. Frontin. Strateg. lib. 3.]

3734. After the death of Strato, who late master of the school of the Peripatetics: 8 years, Lycon of Troas, the son of Aftyanax, succeeded him; a man eloquent of himself, and very fit to instruct and bring up youth. [Laert.]

3735. Attalus the younger, the brother of Philitarus had a son born him, whose name also was called attalus, and reigned afterward in Pergamus, and lived 72 years, as we find in Polybius, in Excerpt. Hen. Vales. and Snid. in Attalus, and Liv. lib. 33.

1741. Philæus the Teian, born at Teii in Pontus, when he had ruled in Pergamus 20 years, departed this life at the age of 80 years, after whom came Eumenes the first, his elder brother Eumenes his son, who fate there 22 years, [Sirabo lib. 12. pag. 543. & lib. 12. pag. 623, 624. with Lucian, in his Macrobii.]

The first Punic or Sicilian war began this year between the Romans, (who now first set foot out of Italy, and fought their first battle at sea) and the Carthaginians, who had then invaded Sicily; and this war continued 24 years without intermission.

This same year also, when Diogenes was L. Chancellor at Athens, the Chronologer of Paros, made his Canon or order of times; which the learned Mr. Selden, lately published in his Marmora Arundeliana.

1742. In the 23 year, according to Dionysius, in the 29 (it should be 19 or 20, according to the point of the (sun assigned) of Hydron or Aquarian; in the 486 year of Nabonassar in the month Chææ, and 17 day thereof, (upon the 11 of our February in the morning; and fourth of the month Tauron, or first of Phamenoth the Egyptian month), (for in Cl. Ptolem. we must here write A for Λ) that is, upon the 26 of our April, in the evening, and first hour of the night, and in the lame year of Nabonassar, but the 24 of the Dionysian account, on the 24 of Leonion, or 30 of Painsus, answering to the 23 of our August, in the evening, Dionysius the Astronomer, too, the observations of the Planet of Mercurie, which Cl. Ptolemæus, relateth our of Hipparchus, [lib. o. cap. 7.] of his book called his Great Work.

Nicomedes King of Bithynia, enlarging the City Affacus, called it after his own name, Nicomedia, [Euseb. Chron. with Pausan. in his Eliac. lib. 3. pag. 159. Trebel. Pollin. in Gallien. and Ammian. Marcell. lib. 22.] though Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 21. saith, that he built Nicomedia over against the City Affacus, as indeed Strabo and Plinie both make them two distinct Cities.

Eumenes, 1. having gotten many Cities, and places near about Pergamus, into his hands, fought a pitched field, with Antiochus the son of Seleucus, near unto Sardes, and overthrew him in it. [Strabo lib. 13. pag. 624.]

Antiochus of Syria, having killed one of his sons, and declared the other his successor, died, Prolog. of 1st of Pompeius, [ch. 36.] who in his life time, for the great defeat which he gave the Galls, who came over out of Europe into Asia, was named Soter, (i. e.) their deliverer, Appian, in Syria, pag. 130. concerning which victory of his over the Galls, we may read more in Lucian, in his book, ἡ περὶ ἑρμιόπολεως ὑπερμαχίας (i. e.) of failing in his speech, and in his Zenobii, Antiochus. As for his son and successor Antiochus, whom he had by Stratonice, the Milefians, the Milefians were then first, who furnished him Θυρ, or God, because he rid them of their Tyrant, Timarchus, (Appian, ut sup.) and Taitanus the Affyrian, in his oration against the Gentiles intricate matters, that Berossus, who was a Priest of Belus in Babylon, dedicated his three books of the Chaldean History unto this Antiochus, by whom also, [Plinius 1⁷, cap. 56.] were published the observations of the Celestial Motions, among the Babylonians, for 480 years, which number of years, if we deduce from the head or Epoch of Nabonassars account, as other learned men do, we shall find it to end but six years before the beginning of this Antiochus. But Porphyrie, Eusebius, Severus Sulpitius, Johannes Malephius, and others, and all agree in this, that he reigned 15 years.

This man gave the Jewsliving in Ionia, equal rights and privileges with the Gentiles, and yet suffered them to live according to their own religion and customs of the nation. [Jepthah, ib. 12, cap. 3.] he made sundry times war upon Pro, Philadelphus; and fought with him, with all the forces he could raise from out of Babylon, and all the oriental parts. Wherefore Ptolemei, desirous to put an end to this bloody war, gave him his daughter Bernice two wife, while his former wife Laodice was yet living; but when yet he had borne him two sons, Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hieraix, the Bank, And Ptolemei accompanied his daughter as far as Pelusium, and there gave him an infinite maid of gold and silver, in dowrie with her, whence he was called εὐρύς (i.e.) the dowrie giver. [Jerem upon Daniel, c. 11.] and took great care to his no more soft bedlies, that water out of the river Nile, might be carried to her, where ever εὐρύς was, to the end the might never drink of any other water but that, as Athenius, [ib. 2, 2.] reporteth out of Polybius. And Appianus is mightily overseen, where he saith, that Bernice and Laodice were both daughters to this Ptolemei, [in Syria, pag. 130.]

Josephus, [L. 1. c. 3.] writeth that after Eleazar the son of Onias, (i. e.) his Uncle Manasses, the son of Jaddus, succeeded him in the Priesthood at Jerusalem, and reigned High Priest there 26 years; by the reckoning of [Scaliger, in Græc. Eusebia, page 50.]

In the year 28, according to Dionysius's account, the 7 day of the month Didymon, in the 491 of Nabonnassar, day 5 of the month Parmuthi, the 28 of our July, the Planet of Mercury was seen near to the sign of Gemini, in the evening toward the fourth head thereof, [Cl. Prot. lib. 9. cap. 7.]

3750.

This year the second Periode of Calippus began.

3753.

Aratus of Sicione, at the age of 20 years, delivering his native country from the tyranny and oppression of Nicoteles, joined it to the body of the State or Commonwealth of Achæa, [Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 130.] and then sent to Ptolemei Philadelphus in Egypt, and gave him 150 talents, which he bestowed among his poor country-men; especially in redeeming such as had been taken prisoners. And because those that had been turned out of their Country, and were now restored, would never let them be quiet, who upon what title soever, were now possessed of their lands and estates; therefore he made a journey himself to Ptolemei, and desired more money of him, to make all even among his country-men, and to take away all suits of law and differences between them. In which journey, thorough violence of tempests, and contrary winds, he was driven upon the coast of Caria, in Asia; and from thence, having made along voyage of it, came at last into Egypt: where he obtained a boone of 150 talents more for his country's good; of which he took 40 talents presently along with him, and returned into Peloponnesus, [Plut. in Arato.]

3754.

This year, when Manlius Vulso, and Atilius Regulus were Consuls in Rome, which, as Polybius noteth, was the 14 year of this first Carthaginian war, the Parthians, under their Captain Arfaces, broke off the Macedonian yoke, and revolted from them, [Trog. Pomp. lib. 31.] This Arfaces, the later Persian Writers call Akhal Akkan: and Mitrocondus Chapar, who, as he saith, began his reign there, in the 7th year, after the death of Alexander the Great; which is one year before the Consulship of Manlius and Atilius in Rome, and 3 years before Olymp. 133. in which Eusebius in his Chronoth: sheweth that Arfaces and his Parthians fell off, and rebelled against Antiochus Theos; nevertheless, because the Parthians keep the day, whereon Arfaces fought with Seleucus Callinicus, the son and successor of Antiochus, and overcame him, and took Callinicus himself prisoner, holiday, and make it great festival of it, as the very birthday of their liberty; as Justin relateth out of [Trogus, lib. 42. cap. 4.] therefore both [Justin, and Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] thought that the Parthians began their revolt, under Seleucus, and not under Antiochus his father. And the Parthians moreover, did this Arfaces that honour, as to call all their Race of Kings after him, by the names of Arfaces, [Justin, lib. 41. cap. 5. Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 702.]

Now that the Parthians, together with the Persians, which the later Persian Writers confound, and make one people with the Parthians, (of which we may see more in [Schekardi, Tarich, pag. 101. and 102.]) and our third note upon the Acts of Ignatius) fell off from the Persian Empire, Artabanus, in Persia, sheweth, as we find him in [Phorides, his Bibliotheca, cod. 58.] Where he also sheweth the cause of this their revolt from the Persian Empire, to have been since this Arfaces and Tyridates, the sons of Phartipates, at Priapatus, the son of Arfaces, first had slain one Pherecles (at Agathocles, as we find him titled by Geor. Syncellus) the Governor of that Country, appointed by Antiochus Theos; for that he offered to abuse the body of the said Tyridates in a sodomitical way, having five others in the plot with him. And then turning the Macedons out, took the Sovereignty to themselves: whose successors afterward stood it out also, against the Romans, and contended with them for the Empire of the World. See [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 515.]

At the same time also, Theodoros, who had under him 1000 Cities of the Bactrians, fell off, and revolted from the Macedons; and the whole East, following their example, did the like, [Justin, lib. 42. cap. 4. out of Trogus.] Others say, that the two Kings of Syria and Media, falling out, one Euthydemus persecuted the Grecians, which inhabited Bactria, to revolt from the Macedons, and to cast off their yoke; and that thereupon Arfaces, seeing Dionus, at Theodorus, grow into such power among the Bactrians, drew the Parthians to a revolt likewise from the Macedons; as Apollodorus also, in his books of the Parthian affairs, tells us; that those Greeks, which dwelt in the Bactria, growing strong, invaded Syria, and went to far therein, that, passing the River Hypanis, Eastward, went as far as the Hamus, and our went Alexander in the conquest of India, [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 515, 516. and lib. 15. pag. 686.]

Seleucus King of Syria, overcome with love, for his former wife Laodice, and her children; to Court again; and the shortly after, fearing the feebleness of his mind; and least his affections might happily return again to Bernice, his second wife, poisoned him, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11. Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] and to cover this flattery of hers, the caused one Artemon, who was very like him, to lie in his bed, as if he himself had lain there sick: and so, what with his face, what with his counterfeit speech, concealed all that came to see and visit him in his sickness; and by this means, concealed the death of the true King, till he had taken order for one to succeed him in the kingdom, whom he thought fit, [Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 14. Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 11. Solinus, cap. 1.] and by this means, Seleucus, the eldest son of Seleucus by Laodice, came to succeed him in the kingdom, who from many victories, which he got, (and they were none, that I know of) was surnamed Callinicus, and from his great beard, Pogon, (which signifies a beard, as in Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 155.) and he late King 40 years, [Eusebius, Chron.]

Likewise in Egypt, Ptole. Philadelphus, who, living luxuriously, doubted not to say, that he should live ever, and that he only had found out the way to immortality, as Athenæus, [lib. 12. cap. 17. reporteth out of Philarchus his History, lib. 22.] in the 40 year after the decease of Ptolemei the first his father, dyed; and after him succeeded Ptolemei, surnamed Euergetes, his son, begotten of Arsinoe, the daughter of Lyfimachus, and reigned 25 years, as [Cl. Prothom. in Canone, Clement Alexand. in Strom. lib. 1. and Jerom upon cap. 9. of Daniel.] tells us; and in his time it is said, that there appeared a Phoenix, which came to Helopolis, drawing with her a huge flock of other birds, all wondring at her beaury, [Tacit. Annal, lib. 6.]

Laodice put Bernice with her young son, which she had by Ptolemei, into the hands of Icadeion and Ganeus, (at Coenens) two chief men of Antioch, to be murdered. [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11. and Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] Bernice, when she heard that they were coming to murder her, shut her self up in Daphne, a Castle or Suburb of Antioch, of which I spake before. Where when the Cities of Asia heard that she with her young son were besieged, they in remembrance and reverence of her high calling, and progenitors, out of more compassion, sent her in aidships from all parts. Her brother also Ptolemei furnished Euergetes, fearing the danger his sister was in, left his kingdom, and sped him thither, with all the forces which he could make, [Justin lib. 27. cap. 1.] but before any aides could come, the young son, by such devices as Laodice used, was taken and carried away; whereon Bernice the mother hearing, armed her self, and got into a Chariot, and pursued after Ganeus, the butcherly minister of that cruel act; and overtaking him, when she could do nothing on him with her spear, took a stone, and with that, laid him all along; and forcing her Chariot over the very body of the knave, brake thorough the midst of the companies, and went directly to the houses, where she heard say, they had laid the body of her son, whom they had already murdered, [Val. Max. lib. 9. cap. 10.]

The murderers of the child, took another child very like him, and brought him forth, and shewed him to the people, with a royal guard about him, as if it had been the child indeed. But they set a strong guard of mercenary Galls upon Bernice, and delivered up to her the strongest part of the place or Castle at Antioch, and gave her their oath to be true unto her, and entered into a covenant with her; for she gave ear to Aristarchus her Physician, who perswaded her to make a league and covenant of friendship with them, but they using their oath for nought else but a stratagem, to wit to get within her, presently fell to cutting of her throat. The women about her stood to defend her, as well as they could, and many of them there dyed in the quarrel: but three of them, to wit Panariste, and Mania, and Gerholynes, took her body, and laid it in her bed, as if she had been wounded only, and not quite dead; giving it forth, that she might recover, and held the people on in that amulement, till the coming of Ptolemei, [Polybius Stratag. lib. 1.]

Now all the Cities of Asia, which were revolted from Seleucus, set ships to sea, and joined with Ptolemei, either for the defence of Bernice, if she were alive, or to revenge her murder, if she were dead, [Justin lib. 27. cap. 1.] and Ptolemei indeed, when he came, slew Laodice, and entering Syria, marched on as far as Babylon, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] possessing himself of Cœlogyria, with Seleucia, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 402, 403.] Syria also and Cilicia, and the upper provinces beyond the Euphrates, and almost all Asia fell unto him, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11.] even from Taurus unto India, without one battle fought, or stroke taken for it; it was may be said, Polyenus, in the place above cited, with which we may also compare, what we find in the monument of Euergetes, called monumentum Adhæmum, published at Rome, in the year 1631, by Leo Allatius, to wit, Æthiops received, saith he, the Sovereignty of Egypt, Lybia, Syria, Phœnicia, Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cyclades Isles, from his father; he gathered an army of Horse and Foot, with a fleet of ships, and Elephants out of Tregedicon, and Ethiopia parts of

of which Elephants had been there taken by his father, and the rest by himself, and brought from thence into Egypt, and there trained up to the war, all excellently well furnished, & with them sailed into Asia; and conquering all the land on this side the Euphrates, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Ionia, Hellespont, and Thracia, together with all their Forces, and other Elephants out of India, and all the Kings of the Nations, in his company; he put over the Euphrates, and there conquered Mesopotamia, Babilonia, Susa, Persia, Media, and all the country as far as Babilra.

This Euergetes, having conquered all Syria, came down to Jerusalem, and there offered many sacrifices of thanksgiving unto God, and dedicated to him gifts worthy of so great a Victory; as Josephus speaketh, [lib. 2. cont. Apion. pag. 106 4.] being called back by a sedition of his own people in Egypt, held Syria in Euergetes, being called back by a sedition of his own people in Egypt, held Syria in his own hands, but suffered Cilicia in the hands of one of his Nobles, named Antiochus; and the Provinces beyond the Euphrates, in the hands of Xanthippus for the Government thereof: and spoiling and wafting all the kingdom of Seleucus, carried from thence 40 thousand talents of filver, and all the rich vessels that was therein; and 2500 Images of their gods, among which he carried away also, those Images which Cam-byfes heretofore, had taken out of Egypt, at his being there, and carried into Persia and from thence it was, that the Egyptians, when they saw their gods come home again by his means, gave him the surname of Euergetes, [Jerom. upon Daniel, cap. vi. where he saith, that the Kings of Babylon did carry away the Images of the gods of the Chaldeans, and set them up again.] and called Monumentum Aduitiam, we find of whom, in that Monument aforementioned, called Monumentum Aduitiam, we find it thus written. Ptolemei, having then received those gods which the Persians had taken and carried out of Egypt in former times, with other treasures, there laid up; sent up his army, by disches new cut, to let in the water for that purpose.

After the departure of Ptolemei out of Syria, Seleucus, having fitted up a vast Fleet to go against such Cities as had revolted from him: by a sudden tempest arising at sea, lost all his Fleet: whereupon the Cities and Countries which for very hatred of his person had turned to Ptolemeis side; now in very commiseration of this his great calamity at sea, returned all to his obedience again, [Justin, lib. 27. cap. 2.]

3760. In the year 67, according to the Chaldeans, on the 3 day of the month Apellus, and in the year 504 of Nabonalar, 27 of the month Thoth, the 18 of our November, the Planet of Mercury was observed in the morning to have been to the northward of the uppermost Star in the head of Scorpio. [Cl. Phil. lib. 9. cap. 7.]

the uppermost Siar is his head of Scorpius. Upon Protegeni Euergetes, was utterly routed in the field, and thereupon fled to Antioch, and from thence wrote to his brother Antiochus, and craved his help, offering him for his pains, all Asia on this side the Taurus: but Antiochus, being at this time, not above 4 years of age, yet immoderately greedy of a kingdom, laid hold on the occasion, not with so brotherly a mind as he should have done: but like a very Laron, sought to strip his brother of all that he had, in his necessity; and though a child, yet put him on more than a man-like impression: resolution: from whence it was, that even thus, he gat the surname of Hierax; (i. e.) a greedy Hawke; or Harpye rather, because more like a Hawke than a man, he was ever ready to fall upon every mans estate. (J. Justin, lib. 17. cap. 2. with Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 754.)

At this time, the people of Smyrna and Magnesia, in the month Lenæon, entered a league between themselves to maintain the honour and greatness of this Seleucus : which league and decree of theirs, we find preserved to this very day, transcribed out of those Marmoræ Arundelianæ ; (i. e.) those Marble stones which the Earle of Arundel caused to be brought out of those parts, and published in print by Mr. J. Selden, as before.

Prolemei, when he saw that this young Antiochus took part with Seleucus; least he should be forced to have them both his enemies, at once, struck up a truce with Seleucus, for ten years, [Justin, lib. 27, cap. 2.] In which long time of peace, he sent for Eratosthenes Cyrenæan, from Athens, and made him the keeper of his Library at Alexandria; [Suidas, in Eratosthenes; and in the words, Apollonius.] For this Prolemei Evergetes, followed his father Philadelphus his steps, in promoting the magnificence of this Library; and with it, of all kind of learning besides; for he himself was a scholar of Aristotle the Philosopher, and wrote certain Historical Commentaries with his own hand, [Athens, lib. 2, cap. 33.] And of his care in getting into his Library the works of ancient Writers, Galen, upon the 3 book of Hippocrates, [of Epideimical diseases,] saith, He gave order to all the books of them which came from Egypt, to be brought to him, and took out copies of them: and then gave the transcripts of them to the owners which brought them, but the originals in his own Library, with this inscription, Τὰν ἐκ παλαιῶν (i. e. from out of ships; that is might appear, they came out of such ships as were arrived, And having gotten from Athens the works of Sophocles, Eurypides and Efecylus, only to transcribe them, and left them 15 talents in pawn, till he restored the originals, which he had borrowed; he caused them to be written out most exquisitely in fair parchment, and then retaining

83, died, [Lucianus] descended his son Demetrius; who reigned to years, [Porphyrus]

After him, succeeded his son Demetrius; who reigned thirty years.
 After him, 2d. page 131. in which time he made himself Master of Cyrene, and all Lybia, [Porphyrice, ibid.] Now Olympia, the daughter of Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, alter the death of Alexander her husband and own brother, gave her daughter Phebas to this Demetrius, who had at that time to wife, the filter of Antiochius, King of Syria : whereupon theyas turned off by her husband, went away to her brother Antiochus, and stirred up him, to begin a war upon her husband, for the injury by him done to her, [Justin, lib. 28. cap. 1.] Now in all this time there was no other Antiochus that was a King, save onely this Antiochus Hicrax, who would have wrested the whole Kingdom out of Seleucus his elder brothers hand ; for Julius our Troguis, [lib. 44. cap. 4.] calleth both these brothers, by the name of Kings; and the same Troguis, lib. 27. in the Prologue to it, and Polybe, lib. Strabo, A. in Asia, Hierax; these, that Antiochus went into Metopontia; whereas the Fausti Seculi have it, Seleu-cus had built a City, called Callimicropolis: though at that time, neither Antiochus nor Seleucus were yet Kings in their nation, but Ptolemei Euergetes King of Egypt.

Now at this time, Antiochus, (seeking to wrest all Asia properly to called, out of his brother Seleucus his hand, raised an army of the Galls for his money against him) and coming to a fight near to the City Ancyra, Seleucus there, by the extraordinary prowess of those Galls sold the field; whereupon, these Galls supposing that Seleucus had been slain in the battle, turned their arms forthwith upon Antiochus, who of fear hired them for himself, who perceiving, bought himself out of theirs, as out of many thieves' hands, with money, and was fain to enter a league, and to make an allowance of arms with his mercenaries: but Eumenes with a fresh army of his own, took upon Antiochus and his Galls, all bleeding and fore as they were: of their late-gotten victory, and routed them; and thereby got the greater part of Asia into his possession, [and returned thence, a. 62. 3. with the Prologue of Plutarch, ib.]

376c. Eumenes, the (son of) Eumekes the elder, who was the son of Philaretes, drank himself drunk, and died, as Albaniensis, lib. 12, cap. 16, out of Ctesicles, lib. 3, de Tem- poribus :) sepereth : and after him succeeded Antiochis, the daughter of Achaes, which was younger brother to Philaretes, begotten of Antiochis, the daughter of Achaes. This Antai, squaling his great wealth warily and magnificently withal, loved an opinion in himself, and then in other men also, that he deferred to beat the same and title of a King and therefore having upon a time overcome the Gauls in fight, he presently took the name and port of a King upon him : and fo used this matter by his care and providence, that it continued in his houle to the third generation, [Polyb. lib. 18, in the Ex- cerpt, of him, published by Valef, pag. 102.] concerning which points, Suidas reports Orchel which was given him by the prophete at Delphos : in these words.

ΕΔΕΤΗ ΤΑΥΡΟΞΙΩΣ, &c. (i.e.)

Go on Tannocerus, thou a Crown shalt wear,
And thy fow sons: and there an end shall be.

Now it is supposed, that this Lumenet, was therefore surnamed Taurocerus, because there were a pair of Bulls' horns added some where, to the head of his picture, or other statue of him: as also in that Oracle uttered by Poenans, concerning the slaughter, which he should one day make of the Galls, he is called, Tauri filius, (i. e. the son of a Bull, mentioned by [Pausan. in Phocicis, p. 334.] in these words,

Tá na sae goin a' b'annha Kp'waw, &c. (i.e.)

For Iove shall quickly them a Saviour send Son of a Bull, and by Iove nurtured,
Which on the Galls shall bring a dismal day.

Concerning which battle fought between Attilus and the Galls, Livie speaketh, lib
38. The first in Asia, such he, that refused to pay contribution to the Galls, was Attilus; and fortune here beyond all expectation of men, favoured this bold attempt of his: and upon a battle fought he had the better of them. But Polyanus, [lib. 4. Strateg. in Attalo] tells us, of a devile, which one Suidas, a Chaldean Soothlayer, used to animate the soldiers to this fight, when they had otherwise quite lost their courage: which Suidas, was not other, but that Babylonian Mathematicians, whom we find mentioned by [Strabo], lib. 16. pag. 739.] whole Astronomical tables, one Verius Valens of Antioch
 professeth

Etymologie concurs with him; for there he notes, that Philopater was there called Gallus, because he was wont to go with an Irvie Bull about his head, and other parts of his body, after the manner of the Galli, (who were priests of Cybele) in the solemnities of Bacchus; for so effeminate and debauched was this man grown, with whoring and drinking, that when he was in his best wits, and extraordinarily sober, yet even then he would run about the streets, with the maudlin dancers, and belisgingling about him, [Plut. in Cleom.] and so as Polybius observeth of him, he spent the whole time of his reign, in revellings and pastimes, giving himself over to all sensual and filthy lusts of the flesh, and to daily quaffing and carousing, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 380, 381.] and Strabo adds, [lib. 17. pag. 796.] that both he, and all the Ptolemies that followed, grew luxurious, and never ordered that state well afterward. Now this Philopater reigned after his father 17 years, [Cl. Ptol. in Reg. Canone. Clem. Alexan. Porphy. Ensch.]

Philopater, fearing Magas his brother, who by the means of his mother Berenice, was grown gracious in the army, took counsel with one Sosibius, (who was of chief credit with him) and others how to rid them both out of the way. But this employment troubled these men not a little, for fear lest, the high courage of Berenice considered, all this enterprise would come to naught, and therefore they were fain to flatter all the Court, giving them assurance of great matters in case the business went on, and succeed as they would have it. But Sosibius went farther; and finding Cleomeles the King of Sparta, who at that time stood in great need of the Kings help, to be a singular wife and politick man, and of great experience in matters of the world, brake the matter to him. But Cleomeles dissuaded him from it; saying, that the King had more need to beget him, if it were possible, more brothers, for the security and preservation of his kingdom, than to destroy those which he had. But when Sosibius had told him further, that the King could never be sure of the mercenary soldiers, so long as Magas was alive. Cleomeles then bad him, never fear that, for, faith he, among his mercenaries, he hath three thousand Greeks out of Peloponnesus, and one thousand out of Crete, who at one beck of his, would be ready to do what ever he would have them. Whereupon Sosibius took courage, and went on, and murdered Berenice and her son Magas, and all that belonged to them. [Polyb. lib. 5. p. 380, 382. and lib. 15. in Excerpt. p. 65. and Plut. in Cleom.]

Philopater, having first murdered his father, then his mother, and now with her brother, as if all had been well with him, gave himself over to his luxury more than ever; and in that way all the court followed him, and not only his Nobles in Court, and his chief Commanders in the army; but the whole body of the army, from the highest to the lowest, threw away all care of martial discipline, and lay lusting in Taverns and bawdy-houses at their pleasure, [Justin lib. 13. pag. 1.]

But to return to Antiochus, when he advised with his council, how to repress that rebellion of the two brothers, Molon and Alexander in Media and Persia, Epigenes (who was the man that reduced those forces to Antiochus, which were gathered together for Seleucus, and was of prime credit, and reputation in the army) advised, that Antiochus himself with his army, should presently march against them: but Hermias, on the contrary, advised the King to go himself into Cœlœsyrta, and recover that, and fend Xenon and Theodorus Hemolius, to subdue the two brothers, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 387.]

While this was in agitation, and the King lay at Zeugma in Seleucia, there came to him Diogenes his Ammiral, out of Cappadocia, conducting Laodice the daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus to the King; who, so soon as ever she came, married her: and coming out of the upper regions unto Antioch, there caused her to be proclaimed Queen; and that done, prepared himself wholly for the war, [Ibid. pag. 388.]

At the same time Molo, having a sure card of his brother Alexander to help him at all affairs, marched with a great army against Xenon and Theodorus, the Kings Commanders, sent into those parts, which put them into so great a fright, that they durst not keep the field, but put themselves into walled Cities for their defence; and in this case Molo, having the Country of Apollonia at his back, wanted for no store and plenty of provision, [Ibid.]

Mean while, Philip the son of Demetrius, in Macedonia, upon the death of Antigonus his Guardian, and father in law, being then 14 years old, took the Kingdom into his own hands, [Justin lib. 18. cap. ult. & lib. 29. cap. 1.] and reigned there 42 years, [Devis. Porphy. Ensch. and Polybius lib. 2. pag. 155.] observeth, that these three, Philip of Macedon, Ptol. Philopator of Egypt, and Antiochus Magnus of Syria, came to their Crowns all within the compass of the same Olympiads, 139. for as Antiochus came to the Crown in the first year of it, so Philopator succeeded his father in the third thereof, and Philip of Macedon in the fourth, and the same Polybius, [lib. 4. pag. 271.]

observeth further, that about that time, almost all the kingdoms of the World, came to have a new succession of Kings in them: the like doth, [Justin lib. 29. cap. 1.] where they both shew further, that Ariarathes, about the same time, came likewise to be King of Cappadocia.

Now when, upon the death of Antigonus, the Etolians joining with the Lacedæmonians, made a common war upon the Achæans and Macedons; Cleomeles beought Philopator of Egypt, that he would furnish him with certain necessities, and some soldiers, and dismiss him to return into his own country; but when he perceived, that Philopator lent but a deaf ear to that motion of his, then he began to be an often and earnest suitor to him, to suffer him with his own small train, to be gone. And the King, little caring which end went forward in any business of moment, and never forecaring what was to come, according to his wonted folly, never regarded what Cleomeles said unto him: but Sosibius, who, as I shewed before, was the chief man of all the rest about him in matters of the kingdom, advising with the rest of the Council, thought it no policy, to let Cleomeles go, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 381.]

Molo, of whom I spake before, assailed to pass the River Tigris, and to besiege Seleucia; but being prevented by Zeuxis, who had gotten all the boats of the River into his hands, he turned his course, and went to Cœliphon, and there made his provision, for his winter quarter, [Ibid. pag. 389.]

Antiochus, being advertised that Molo came on, and that his men still gave ground, resolved, to leave going against Ptolemy in Cœlœsyrta, and to march in person against Molo. But Hermias, who would not off from what he once propounded, sent Xenatas an Achæan born, against Molo, with an army very well appointed, and with full and absolute power to do with it as he saw cause, without controule; and brought the young King back again to Apamea, and there gathered an army about him, [Ibid. pag. 390.]

Xenatas, coming with his army to Seleucia, sent for Diogenes, the Kings Governour of the province of Sula, and for Pythiades the Ammiral of the Red sea; and with them drew into the field, and having the benefit of the River Tigris at his back, laid him down with his army in the very face of the enemy: and the next day, seizing upon Molo's Camp, which he that night had left, there fell to drinking and rioting with his army, till Molo, espying his opportunity, came back the night following, and in the deep of the night, let upon them, when they little thought of him; recovered his own Camp, took theirs, and Xenatas himself fighting in the dark, was there also casually slain, and Molo presently with his army came before Seleucia, and took it at the first assault; because Zeuxis was fled out of it, and with him Diomedon the Governour of the place it self: Then subducing the whole province of Babylonia, with that which lay upon the Red-sea, he took the City of Sula, and leaving there some to besiege the Castle, wherein Diogenes, their Commander was fled, he returned to Seleucia upon the Tigris, and there refreshed his army. And indeed, in the Country lying upon that River, he took in all as far as Europus, a City in those parts, and in Mesopotamia, all as far as Dura, [Ibid. pag. 391, 392, 393.]

Cleomeles, after that consultation held by Sosibius, was committed to custody: but watching his time, when Philopator with his train was gone to Canopus, he gave it out among his keepers, that the King would presently let him at liberty: and while they hereupon grew careless of him, and lay fast asleep by their over drinking, he with his friends, brake out of prison, at noon-day; and would faine have stirred up the people to a sedition, but could not: and therefore having no hope of escaping lest them, he and his followers, flew themselves, [Ibid. pag. 385.] three years after his overthrow in Laonia, [Id. lib. 4. pag. 304.] whereof when Philopator heard, he commanded Cleomeles his body to be beate, and to be hung upon a crose, and both his mother Crætefica, and his sons, and all the women that attended on her, to be put to death, [Plut. in Cleome.]

Antiochus, setting out with his whole army from Laodicea, and having passed the Desert, came to the Dale of Marfays, which lies between the Lebanon and Antileban. Spending therefore many dayes in marching thorough this Dale, and having taken in such places as lay in or near his way, he came to Gerza and Brochos, which are two Castles, built upon the mouth or narrow passage which leadeth into this Dale; and those he found kept by Theodorus, an Etolian born, but at that time, Governour of Cœlœsyrta for Philopator, which when he saw, he first resolved to set upon them: but perceiving the natural situation of the place, to be very strong, and Theodorus his courage in detanding them, to be no lesse, he drew off and went his way, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 390.] For which piece of service yet, Theodorus was so far from receiving any reward or thanks from Philopators hand, that being lent for afterward to Alexandria, he had much ado to there to escape with his life for it, [Ibid. pag. 385. and pag. 405.]

Antiochus, hearing of the utter destruction and slaughter made of his men with their General Xenarcas, and of Moloch his victory, whereby all the upper Provinces were utterly lost, and fallen unto Molo, brake off his intended journey, and cast in his mind how to settle and secure the main of his estate; [Polyb. lib. 5, pag. 390.] About which as he was in council, and Hermias could not stand alone against the general vote of all the rest which persuaded the King to go; yet to have his will in some thing, he forged certain letters, as written from Molo to Epigenes, and coming in a packet with other letters to him; and by that means, gave him to be put to death, as one that kept intelligence with Molo. And now the King marching against Molo, when he came to the River Euphrates, took into his army the remainder of his Forces that there were, and came to Antiochia, which is in Mygdonia, απὸ τῆς αὐτοῦ ἐκείνης; (i. e.) about the beginning of Winter, and there stayed till the next Spring, [Ibid, page 393; 394, 395.]

Then removing from thence, upon the fortieth day after he came to Lyba, and there following the advice of Zeuxis, and not of Hermias, he put over the Tigris with all his army; and then marching toward Dura, at the first approach raised the siege, which was laid unto it by a Captain of Moles: and going again from thence, and never camping two days in one place, at 8 days end, they passed Oricum and came to Apollonia. [Ibid., pag. 395, 396.]

to Apollonia, [Ibid., page 397, 398.]
 Molo, though he grew now much afraid, leaft his army would leave him, yet he drew out againft the King; and having two wings, he committed the charge of the left to his brother Neolaus, and led the other himfelf. But when the battel joyned, the right wing, wherein himfelf was, flood firm to him, and fought very floutly againft the Kingsmen, but the left fell over to the King: which when Molo perceived, and faw wial, that he was ready to be wholly furrounded by the enemy, he fell upon his own fword. The reft allo of his friends, and which had been partakers with him in this confpiracy againft the King, gat themfelves every man away to his own home, and there acted the like tragedy upon himfelf. His brother Neolaus allo, when the wing which he led yeilded to the King, gat him away into Perfia, to Alexander Moloes brother; and there having flain Moloes mother, and his children, flew himfelf allo over them: having firft advifed Alexander to do the like. The King commanded Molo's body to be hanged on a croffe in a high place, and having reproached his Rebel-army with bitter words, for their foul and difloyal carriage towards him; yet at laft gave them his hand, and received them to his favour and fervice again: and appointed fome to convoy them back into Media from whence they came, and to fettle that Province again. Mean while, himfelf went down from thole upper parts to Seleucia, where the laid Hermias found the inhabitants very hardly in other points, wrung out of them over and above a thoufand talents, for a fine; which yet the King mitigated and reduced to 50, and then left Diogenes to govern Media, and Apollodorus to be Prefident of the Province of Sufiana; but fent Tychon, Mafter of the Scribes, and General of the army, into the Regions lying upon the Red Sea, to govern them, [Ibid., from the page 396. to the page 399.]

Now at what time Antiochus made this war upon Molo, Theodoros the Eolian, Gouverneur under Philopator of Cœloryia, returning from Alexandria, and calling in his mind, that Patropator was no better than a loft man, and depraving of any good from the Princes about him, with such company as he had with him, seized upon Prolensis by himself, and upon Tyrus, by one Panetolos, and relieved to come to some agreement with Antiochus, and to put all Cœloryia into his hands: which he performed in a very short time after, [16. pag. 388. and pag. 405.]

Unto Attalus King of Pergamus was born by Apollinis of Cyzicum a son called Attalus Philadelphus, who lived 82 years, as Lucian in his Macrobis reporteth; and about the same time, Antiochus likewise had a son born to him, called Seleucus, and (named) as it seemeth) Philopator.

3787. Jubile 25.

Antiochus, having now gotten a son, resolved to set upon Ariobarzanes, who had obtained the Dominion of the Atropatians, and other Countries thereabouts: and Ariobarzanes fearing the coming of the King; especially because he was now grown old and decrepit, sought peace at his hands, and had it from him upon such terms as he was pleased to give it. [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 399. and 400.]

While the war went on, between Antiochus and Ariobarzanes, Achaus having shut up Attalus in his chief City of Pergamus, and taken all the places thereabouts, and entered into a league and confederacy with Ptolemei Philopator of Egypt, thought it no great matter to break into Syria, before Antiochus could return to relieve it; and by the help of the Cyrrhestians, who were already revolted from him, to make himself

Master of all that kingdom; and therefore with his whole army moving out of Lydia, marched thitherward; but when he came to Laodicea in Phrygia, he there took a Crown upon his head, and began to assume the title and port of a King, both when he received Ambassadors from other Princes, and also when he had occasion of writing unto them, one Siveris, who being banished out of his own Country, was entertained by him, egging him principally on thereto; and to go on ward in his journey toward Syria, when he came near to Lycaonia, his army there began to mutiny, complaining that they were led to a war against him, who was their liege Lord, and natural King. Whereupon Achæus, seeing it went against the hair with them, gave off his purpose, and proceeded no further in it; and moreover told the army that he never purposed to lead them into Syria against Antiochus, but only to wait the Country of Phidias, to which he presently led them, and did it to the purpose, and to having enriched them with the spoyle thereof, and made all fair with them, returned home again. [Idem. lib. 4. pag. 271. 314. 315. and lib. 5. pag. 401. 402.]

402.] When the war between Antiochus and Ariobarzanes was ended, Apollonarchas a Physician of Selucia, standing in bodily fear of Hermaias, wrought the means to bring him into suplication with the King, whereupon the King faining himself sick, caused Hermaias to be haled out of his house, and by a curre of certain men appointed for that purpose, to be murdered; and it to tell out, that at the same time, the wives of Apameas drew likewise his wife and children out of her house there, and stoned them all to death.

Antiochus, being now returned home, and having sent away his souldiers to their winter quarters, sent messengers to Achæus, with many threatening words. [Id. pag. 401. 402.]

Among the Jews, after the decease of Onians 2. his son Simon 2. succeeded in the priesthood, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 4.] and he is said by Scal. [in Græc. Enseph.] to have fac-20 years.

Antiochus, calling all his army to Apamea, at the first of the spring, by the persuasion of Apollonides his Physician, removed to Seleucia, which is called Picia, sending Diognes his Ammiral thither with a fleet, and Theodorus Hemolius with a convenient company to possess the selfsame in the town, whom he had won unto him, having intelligence with some of the Seleucians in the town, whom he had won unto him, by large monies and larger promises, took first one of the suburbs, and then the City, yet open their gates unto him, and having gotten it, he entranced the inhabitants very kindly, but put garriſons into the Caſtle and port both. [Polyb. lib. 5. from pag. 40. to pag. 405.]

The King was buſie in feeling things here, when letters came to him from Theodotus the Erolian, to requitt him to go into Cyſtopolya, for that he was now ready to deliver it into his hands: whereupon the King put himſelf upon a march thither-wards: but Nicolaus a Captain of Philopators, having diſcovered this praſtice, beſieged Theodotus in Ptolemais, where he was; ſo that he could barely get out at ſea according to his intentions, and withall, ſent Lagoras, a Cretian baron, near unto Berytus, with a party to keep the paſſage entering into Cyſtopolya, near unto Berytus, which Antiochus caſſy put to fight, and then Theodotus had hitherto been ſhur up with ſuch friends raiſed from before Ptolemais, where they had hitherto been ſhur up, and delivered both Tyſus as they had about them: went and met him upon his way, and delivered both Tyſus and Ptolemais, with all that in them was, unto Antiochus: his hand: there were found in both ports, 40 ſhips, which were conſigned into Diogenes the Ammittals hand, [lib. p. 505. 406. with lib. 4. p. 305.]

505, 406; with lib. 4, p. 305.
Antiochus being certified that Philopator was gone to Memphis, that his forces were all met at Pefiumium, that the fleet of Nilus were all opened, and the sea let in to poflefs all the fresh waters, he changed his purpofe of marching to Pefiumium, and went in to Caefary, where he was going from one place to another, fought to take in all partly by force, partly upon conditions, which he offered very reasonable unto them. Wherefore, the forces, that were left in ftrong, yielded for the moft part, upon the first fummons, the reft clavered to Philopator, whole Subjects they were, and thofe coft him much time in believing them. lib. 4, p. 306.
[The lib. 4, p. 306 is crossed out in the original.]

Mean while, Philopater had all go at fix and seven, and took no care of any thing :
yet Agathodotes and Solobius, who managed all under him, made all the provision they could for the war, keeping all clole from Antiochus, as much as possibly they might, and in the same hand elicited the states of Cyzicum, Byzantium, Rhodes, Erolia and others, to mediate for a peace between the two Kings, whilst they, the mean time, made all provisions for the war, and trained and exercised their men in all kind of arms, chivalric, and martial discipline, to the utmost of their endeavour; [Id. pag. 406, 407.]

But there happened at this time a new war to grow between the Byzantines, and the Rhodians; the ground whereof was, for that the Byzantines being fain to pay tribute and contribution to the Galls, which lay havir upon them, laid a tole upon every ship that passed by them into the Pontick sea, [Id. lib. 1. p. 158. & lib. 4. pag. 305, 306, 314.]

Whereupon the Rhodians sent presently to Prusias King of Bythynia, (that Prusias which in Excerptis Memoriis, [cap. 29.] is surnamed Xarxos, (i. e.) the Lame) and made an association of arms with him, who was otherwise mischievously enough bent against them, as for sundry other causes, so especially for that they laboured, all that ever they could, to make love and friendship between Attalus and Achæus, which he thought, in many respects would prove damageable to him, and his affairs. Wherefore he came to this agreement with the Rhodians, that they should take the charge of the war at sea upon themselves, and let him alone to plague the Byzantines at land. And to begin, he forthwith went and seized upon a port of theirs in Asia side called Hieron, which place belonged formerly in common to the Marchants which traded into Pontus: but the Byzantines had lately bought them out, and appropriated it to themselves, together with all that portion of Mysia in Asia, which they had many ages before enjoyed, [Id. lib. 4. pag. 314, 315, 316.]

The Byzantines, seeing what the Rhodians had done with Prusias, did the like with Attalus, and Achæus, and sent to crave aid of them, and Attalus was very desirous of himself to have hearkened to their motion, but Achæus lying too heavily upon him as he did, he could afford them but little help. Achæus, whose Dominions stretched far and near in this side the Taurus, and who had lately taken on him, (as I said before) the title of a King, promised them all the good that he could do them, [Id. lib. 314.] They sent also to Tibites, to call him out of Macedonia, to be their General in this war against Prusias; for it was conceived, that the whole kingdom of Bythynia, belonged as well to Tibites, as to Prusias, whose Uncle Tibites was, [Id. pag. 316.]

Prusias, fearing the coming of his Uncle, pulled down all Castles and places of any strength, that were in the kingdom, [Id. pag. 318.]

The Rhodians to draw away Achæus from the Byzantines, sent to Ptolemei, and desired him to bestow on them Andromachus, (who was at that time a prisoner in Alexandria) to present him as a gift of their own, unto his son Achæus. Which done, and some other offices of honour, done unto him by the Rhodians, the Byzantines lost the chiefest staff they had to lean upon: and without Tibites, whilst they were conveying him out of Macedonia, dyed by the way, which infinitely crossed them in their designs. But Cavarus (a petty King of those Galls, who were in Thrace, (as Polybins, in Excerptis, Valefii pag. 26. and Athenæus lib. 6. cap. 6. tells us) who at that time came to Byzantium, mediated a peace between them, and Prusias and the Rhodians upon condition, that the Byzantines should forbear exacting any more tole, or impost upon their ships, and Prusias should restore what he had taken from them of Byzantium, [Id. pag. 317, & 318.]

At the same time also Mithridates King of Pontus made war upon them of Sinope, who borrowed 140 thousand drachmas of the Rhodians, and therewith furnished their City against him: and all that Peninsula, or neck of land, wherein their City stood, [Id. pag. 319.]

Antiochus besieged Dura in Phœnicia, a City which Cl. Ptolemeus calls Dora, but to little purpose, for that the place was naturally strong; and Nicolaus, a Captain of Philopators, sent them ever and anon relief. Yet because winter now came on, he was contented to make a truce with them for four months, at the motion of certain Ambassadors sent by Philopator for further term, he would not grant, nor spend more time there, than needs he must, out of his own dominions: for manifest it was, that Achæus intended to invade his whole estate, nor was there any doubt but that Philopator aided him therein: wherefore having sent away the Ambassadors, he disposed garrisons in fit places, and leaving the care of all things there to Theodotus, he returned to Seleucia, and sent his army into their winter quarters: but taking no further care, of keeping them in military duties; supposing, that the rest would come on of it self, without any great fighting for it, because he had already gotten a part of Cœlelorya, and Phœnicia; and thought the rest would submit unto him of their own accord, and for words only without blows, [Id. pag. 409.]

But when things came not on, in such sort, as he imagined, at the first of the spring, he drew out his army again, purposing to set upon his enemies by sea and land, and by force to subdue the remainder of Cœlelorya that stood out against him, [Id. pag. 411.]

Philopator committed the main of all his wars to Nicolaus the Etolian, made Gaza the Magazin, and there laid in all his provisions for the war; sent forth his armies by sea sea and land, made one Perigæus Ammiral of his forces by sea, who had with him 30 fighting ships onely, but of vessels of burden, to the number of 400. [Id. pag. 411.]

Antiochus was marched as far as Marathos, when Ambassadors came to him from the Isle of Aradus, to desire his friendship, and he not onely took them into his affection, but also took up the difference that was between them and their neighbours, which dwelt upon the continent, and made them live good friends ever after: and then entering by the way of Theu-prolopon, into Phœnicia, came to Bzyrus, and in his way set upon Botrys, and took it, but burnt Treces and Calamus to the ground, [Id. lib.]

But when he came at last to a main battle, he divided his army into three parts, the one he gave to Theodotus, the other to Menendemus, and the third he reserved for these, and commanded Diocles to take charge of them; which Diocles he had made Governour of Parapotamia, lying upon the Euphrates. But he with his Lite-guard kept in the midst of all, as a reserve, so see how all things went every where in the battle, and to help where need should be: and withall Diogenes for him, and Perimenes for Philopator prepared for fight with their naval forces, keeping each of them as close to the land as possible they could; and at last, upon a general signal given, they fell to it by land and sea, and at sea neither party had the better, and parred upon even terms, but at land Nicolaus, after a strong fight, was routed by Theodotus, and in the chase, lost 2000 men slain, and as many more taken prisoners, the rest fled into Sidon. Perigæus seeing all lost at land, retreated at sea likewise, and came to Sidon: and Antiochus without any delay came thither with his whole army, and fate down before it; but forbore assaulting of it, both because it was stuffed with men, and had provision enough within to keep them, [Id. pag. 412, 413.]

When P. Cornel. Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus, were Consuls of Rome, Hannibal, having with much difficulty passed the Alpes, came down into Italy, in the Summer of this year, [Liv. lib. 21.] in the latter end of the 2 year of Olymp. 140, from whence we reckon the beginning of the second Carthaginian war, at the war of Hannibal, described at large by Polybius, Livie, Siliu. Italian. in verse, and Appianus Alexandrinus, in his Hannibalicæ: by which war, the name and fate both of the Carthaginians and Romans spread so far in the world, that in Greece first, and then in Asia, properly so called, and the Islands thereunto adjoining, all men, upon their several occasions, cast their eyes upon, and lookt after them, and not upon Philip, Antiochus, or Ptolemei, any longer, [Polyb. lib. 4. pag. 443.]

In the same Summer that Hannibal came into Italy, Antiochus also broke into Palestine; and having given order to Diogenes his Ammiral to approach with his Fleet to Tyrus, he with his army marched to Philoteria, a City seated upon the Lake of Tiberias, into which the River Jordan falleth: and from thence, runneth thorough the Country adjoining upon the City of Scythopolis: which Josephus calleth Betsan, in the Tribe of Manasses. And having taken them both, and put Garrisons in them, he passed the mountains, and came to Atabyrium; that is Thabor, a City seated upon a hill, the top whereof is reckoned to be 15 furlongs compass; where Antiochus toiling them out with small skirmishes, caused his Van to go close to the walls, and then to make as if they fled; which they did: and when the Towmen came out and pursued them, others that lay in ambushment arose, fell upon them, and slew many of them, and then himself falling in with the rest of his army, assaulted, and took that City also, [Polyb. ib. pag. 443.]

At the same time, Kerzas, a Commander of Ptolemei Philopator, revolted from him unto Antiochus; whose entertainment there, was so good, that presently Hippolochus a Thessalian born, with 400 Horse in his company did the like. And Antiochus, leaving a strong Garrison in Atabyrium, removed thence, and took in Pella and Camos and Cephurus, upon surrender: for that prosperous success of his, moved the Arabians, which bordered upon those parts, with one consent, to cast themselves into his armies, and to joyn with him. Antiochus, borne up with these new hopes, and considering in the riches of Arabia, marched into the Country of Galatis: and having made himself Master of the field there, took the City Abyla: and in it, all those, who under the command of Nicias came to succour them. There remained now only Gadar, a City in the opinion of the World, far stronger than any in all those parts: Antiochus therefore came and shewed himself before it; and beginning to cast up his works, with the very sight thereof, he struck such a fright into them, that they presently lent, and rendered themselves unto him, [Id. pag. 444.]

In the same Summer also, in Pamphylia, the Pednelisenses, being besieged by the Selgenses, and in danger to be taken by them, sent and prayed in aid of Achæus; who forthwith sent them 6 thousand Foot, and 500 Horse, under the command of Gattieres; who purposing to enter the Town, by the way of Mylias, found that passage blocked block up by the Selgenes: whereupon, he made as if he would be gone, and the Selgenes seeing him gone his way, brake up, and went their way too: some to the Camp, and others to their harvest, which was then ready for the hook; which Gafieres perceiving, turned back short, and passed the freight of Mylias, near unto Climax, without impeachment; and left a strong guard upon it, and then committed the whole management of that war, and defence of Pedneliffa, to Phaylus: who, going presently to Perga, stirred up the people of Pamphylia and Pisidia, to come and help the distressed: Whereupon they of Apendus (that them in 4 thousand Foot, and they of Ictenna 8 thousand; but the Selgenes instead of blowing the fire, blew it out, and by their rash and unadvised carriage of matters marred all, and being shamefully overthrown, lost 10 thousand of their men, and fled home to Selga: Phaylus followed them at the heels; wherewith they took such a fright, that they forthwith sent Logbas to treat of a peace: and he instead of a traitor, played the traitor with them; for a truce was taken, in which time, the souldiers of their adverse party came freely into Selga; but they of the Town had underhand sent to Achæus, and put themselves wholly into his mercy, to deal with them as he would: mean while, Logbas plotted the delivery of the Town to their enemies: and when things were now ready for their purpose, the plot was discovered; and to both he, and those of the Town, whom he had drawn in to the conspiracy with him, and the enemies, which lurked there, in expectation of the event, were all taken, and put to the sword. Then began Achæus ferociously to deal for a peace between them: nor were the men of Selga averse from the motion; Whereupon they were to pay down 400 talents ready money, and 300 more a while after; and the Pedneliffians were to restore them all their prisoners without ransom: Achæus, having gotten Mylias, and the greatest part of Pamphylia into his hands, marched forthwith to Sardes; where, harrowing Artalus with an uncertain war, he began at last to threaten Prusias also, [Ibid. from pag. 415. to pag. 420.]

While Achæus was busie in making war against the men of Selga, Artalus fate not idle, but, having the Galls, called the Tectogali (whom for the reputation of their valour, he had sent for out of Europe, to serve him against Achæus) of Europe, with him, he marched thorough the Cities of Eolia, and others therunto adjoining, which for pure fear had submitted themselves to Achæus: Cuma, Smyrna and Phocæa, all voluntarily joynt with him: those of Egea, and Lemnos, yielded to him for fear, at his first approach: Ambassadors also came to him from the Teians and Colophonians; whom, upon hostages given, he took in upon such conditions, and covenants, as before: and then going on still, and passing the river Lycus, he came into the Country, inhabited by the Myfians: and having gone thorough that, he came to the borders of the Carilenses, whom, together with those who kept Didyma-tiche, he loo frighted, that Themistocles, whom Achæus had left to keep them for him, gave them up both into Artalus his hand: and, removing from thence, he ravaged all the region of Apia, and passed the hill of Pellicante, and encamped upon the bank of the river Megistus; and while he was there, the Moon fell into an eclipse: and thereupon his Galls, who were otherwise weary of so long trotting up and down, with their wives and children in their company, pretending they held this eclipse for some bad prodigy, would go no further, [Ibid. p. 420.] for upon the first of our Septemb. the Moon, in the beginning of the night, was eclipsed for more than a whole hour long.

Artalus, fearing least his Galls, inclining to Achæus, would fall upon his Countries, yet because it was upon his word that they came out of Europe into Asia, would not fall upon them, and put them to the sword, but convoyed them all back safe to the Helicpoint, where they first landed, and there laid them out lands to live and dwell upon; promising them further, that if at any time after, they should have occasion to use him, he would not, in any reasonable matter, be wanting to them. Then calling to him those of Lampractis, Alexandria, and Ilium; and commending them for persisting to constantly in their loyalty to him, he returned with his army to Pergame. [Polyb. lib. 421.]

Antiochus, being advertised, that a great army of the enemy was met in a City of Arabia, called Rabatamana, (id. Rabath-Ben-Ammon) and there plundered all the Country therabout, marched thitherward, and came near to the little hillocks of earth, whercon the City stood, and having gone about and viewed them, he found that there were two onely wayes to get into it; and therefore planted his batteries against those places, committing the charge of the works, of the one to Nicarchus, of the other to Theodotus, to make breaches in the wall: when they were made, and the walls quite thrown down, sooner than could have been imagined: the Kings men laboured day and night without any intermissions and with all the multitude of people that get into the City, but could do no good, by reason of the multitude of people that were within to maintain the breaches. At last, one of the prisoners in the Camp shewed them a vault, or hollow way under ground, by which they came down to get them water: which no sooner had he stopp'd up, but they were forced to yield for want of water. The King having thus gotten the place, left Nicarchus with a sufficient Garrison to keep it: and sent Hippolochus and Kiras, which had revolted from Ptolemy to him, with 9 thousand Foot to the Country joynt upon Samara, to govern that province, and to take-guard those, who were his friends in those parts; and acknowledged him for their Sovereign; and went himself with his army to Ptolemais, purposing there to winter. [Ibid. pag. 414. 415.]

Cn. Servilius, entered his Consulship at Rome, upon the Ides, or 7 day of March. Now among other prodigies, which were from fudry places certified to the Senate at that time, this was one, That in Sardinia, the body of the Sun seemed to be left, than it used to be: and another, from Arpis, that the Sun and the Moon, seemed to fight each with the other. Ca. Flaminius the other Consul, who was with the army in the Spring of this year, fought unluckily with Hannibal, at the Lake of Trasimene, in Hetruria, and there slain with 15 thousand of his men, [Liv. lib. 22.] There was that year an Eclipse of the Sun seen in Sardinia, upon the 11 of our February, and [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 442.] telleth us, that as well that great battle at Trasimene, as that other between Antiochus and Philopator, concerning Cælofryia, were both fought toward the later end of the 3 year of the 150 Olymp. the later of which, fought at a place called Raphia; is by him described in this wile.

In the beginning of this Spring, saith he, Antiochus and Ptolemy, having all things provided for the purpose, were now upon the point to try it out for the mastery of Cælofryia, in a wided for the purpose, were now upon the point to try it out for the mastery of Cælofryia, in a main battle: Ptolemy therefore with 70 thousand Foot, and 5 thousand Horse, and 73 Elephants, set out from Alexandria, [Ibid. lib. pag. 421.] and made his first encamping at Perpsium, where he stayed till the rest of his army came in to him: and having there given every man his allowance of corn, he marched on thorough a country destitute of water, near the mountain Calfini, and the Barabtra, and so came to Gaza: and after five dayes march, came to the place which he intended; and there encamped, within 50 furlongs of Raphia, which is the first City of Syria, saving only Rhinocorura, which a man meets withal coming out of Egypt, to go into Cælofryia, [Ibid. pag. 421.]

Antiochus also at the same time, came thither with his army, consisting of 70 thousand Foot, 6 thousand Horse, and 102 Elephants: and passing by the walls of Raphia, encamped the first night about 10 furlongs, and the next day came within 5 furlongs of Ptolemy's Camp, [Ibid.]

At that time, Theodotus the Etolian, who was formerly a man well known in Ptolemy's Court, and one who had well observed his courtes and manner of doings: with two onely in his company, about break of day, came within his trenches, and the night following, got into the Kings Pavilion, hoping alone to have done the feat, and there to have slain the King; but Dositheus (who was by extraction a Jew, but one who had fallen away from the Religion of his fathers) removing the King to another Tent, had caused another man of mean quality, to lie that night in the Kings bed: Theodotus therefore, that night brake into the Kings Tent, and there wounded two of the Bed-chamber, and slew one Andrazs, the Kings chief Physician; and so returned untouched, into his own Tent again, [Ibid. and 1 of the Maccab. cap. 3. v. 34.]

After they had there lain 5 dayes, looking one upon the other, they then both resolved for a battle, [Polyb. ibid.] and fight they did; in which fight, when Antiochus appeared to have far the better of it, Arsinoe, Ptolemy's sister, went among the souldiers, with her hair hanging about her eares, and crying to them, that they would stand to it, and in that battle defend their own wives and children: promising them, if they came conquerors out of the field, to give every of them, two pounds in gold: wherby it came to passe, that the souldiers took fresh courage, and slew their enemies down-right, and took of them many prisoners, [1 Maccab. cap. 3. v. 5, 6, with Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 424, 425.]

In that fight, Antiochus lost little lesse than 10 thousand of his Foot, and upward of 300 Horse: besides prisoners taken, above 4000. of his Elephants there were 3 killed in the fight, two died afterward of their hurts. Of Ptolemy's side, there were slain 1500 Foot, and 700 Horse; of his Elephants 6 were killed on the place, and the rest for the most part taken, [Polyb. ibid. pag. 427.]

Antiochus, having buried his dead, returned home with the rest of his army; and Ptolemy took back again, both Raphia, and the rest of the places which had been taken from him, upon the voluntary surrender of the inhabitants: every man striving who should be foremost, in acknowledging him their Lord, and returned to his subjection: especially the Cælofryians, a Nation naturally, and of themselves, ever inclined to the service of the Ptolemy; upon this occasion, exceeded all others, in honouring him, with Crowns, Sacrifices, Altars, and other such like expressions of their affection, [Ibid. pag. 427, 428.] And Ptolemy going to visit the Cities next adjoining to that place, bestowed gifts upon their temples, and thereby heartened up the people, served under Antiochus, got Achæus out of the Castle, indeed by a train, but delivered him alive into Antiochus his hand : and Antiochus, having gotten him, caused his hands and his feet first to be chopp'd off ; then his head to be chop'd off, and to be sowed up in an asses belly, and his body to be hung upon a cross. The rest in the Castle, some holding with Ariobazus the Governour of Sardes, others with Laodice, the now Relict of Achæus, and daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, and both at variance among themselves, quickly resolv'd to put themselves, Castle and all, into the power of Antiochus, and so submitted all to him, [Polyb. lib. 8. pag. 522. and pag. 529.]

3790. Lacydes of Cyrenia, master of the new Academy, having spent 26 years in that place, was the only man that ever in his life time gave over his place, and he resigned it to Teicles and Euander, both of Phocæa, [as Laert. in Lacyde. affirmeth.] Antiochus now set upon Media and Parthia and other provinces, which had revolted from his progenitors, [as Appian in Syria. in Mithr.] whose expedition against Artaces, who was the chief and principal founder of the Parthian Empire, is at large set out by Polyb. in his 10 book, from pag. 597. to pag. 602.

3793. When P. Sulpitius and Cu. Fulvius were Consuls of Rome, Lævius being then Pretor, made a league with the Eriolians in Greece and Attalus King of Pergamus in Asia. [Liv. lib. 27. Justin. lib. 29. cap. 4. Europ. lib. 3.] which league, Attalus kept most constantly with the Romans to his lives end, [Polyb. pag. 820.]

3794. M. Attalus, any Manius Acilius were sent Ambassadors from Rome to Ptolemei and Cleopatra, Kings of Egypt, in Alexandria, to put him in mind of, and to renew their former league, and they presented them both him with a gown, and a robe of scarlet, with a chair of State, all made of ivory; and her with a gown embroidered, and a tur-coat of scarlet, [Justin lib. 30. cap. 1. & 4.]

3795. Ptolemei Philopator had by his wife, and the same his sister, Euridice, a son called Ptolemei Epiphanes, who at the age of five years, succeeded him in the kingdom of Egypt, [Justin lib. 30. cap. 1. 2.] whose birth day was first solemnly celebrated by all the great men and others of Syria, and the Country thereabouts of his dominion, at home, and then they made every man a journey to Alexandria, there to bid him joy of his young son. Among the rest, Josephus the Jew, the son of Tobias, and of the daughter of Simon, surnamed the Just, the High Priest, collector of his tributes throughout Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestina, sent his youngest son Hyrcanus, begotten of the daughter of Solymius, his elder brother, to kiss the Kings hand; with letters to his agent Arion, who had the managing of all his monies at Alexandria, amounting to no less than three thousand talents, to furnish him with monies, to buy the most rich and precious present for the King, that that place could afford. And whereas the others, that went highest, presented the King not with above 20 talents; Hyrcanus brought with him an hundred beautiful boys, and as many maidens, and put in each of their hands a thousand talents, to offer them the boys to the King, the maid to Cleopatra the Queen, for a present : which so great and unexpected a present, the King much admired, and not only entertained the young man with all princely honour, and royal gifts, but also by him wrote his royal letters, commendatory on his behalf to his father, and brethren, and to all his Commanders, and chief Officers in those parts, and so dismissed him, with all kind of honour that he could do him. But his brethren, (who were seven in number, yet all begotten of another Venter) seeing what great honour the King had done him, agreed among themselves to meet him as he was upon his journey homeward, and to murder him, not without the privy of the father himself, who, being angry with him for the prodigious expense which he made of his monies in his presents to the King, cared not now what became of him : but when his brothers set upon him, he slew two of them, and sundry others of their company. And when he came to Jerusalem, and saw that no man there would look upon him, for fear of the worst, withdrew himself to the parts beyond Jordan, and there kept [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 4.]

Philippus, King of Macedon, fought two several battles against the Eriolians, borne up though they were with succours from Rome, and from Attalus the King, and in both battles overthrew them : and received shipping from Prusias, King of Bithynia : and both Attalus, and P. Sulpitius, the Pro-consul in those parts, wintered that year in the Isle of Egina, [Liv. lib. 27.] See also [Polyb. lib. 10. pag. 612, 613, and 851.]

In the beginning of the Spring, Sulpitius, and Attalus, joining together, failed to Lemnos, and from thence coming into Eubæa, took Ocreum and Opus. And then Attalus hearing that Prusias had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, left the Romans, and the war in Eolia, and failed into Asia; and Philippus came to Elatia, where he had appointed the Ambassadors from Ptolemei, and from the Rhodians to meet him, and there, when they treated of putting an end to the war war in Eolia, news was brought them, that Niachanidas the tyrant of Lacedæmon, was ready to fall upon the Eleans; whiles they were busie about their solemn Games at Olympus, [Id. lib. 28.] and this Summer began the 143. Olympiade.

3797. [Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 719.] tells us, that Antiochus the Queen and sister of Ptolemei, was murdered by one Philammon, let on by Sotibius. See also [Hen. Valef. Excerpt. pag. 66.] and we find also in [Justin. lib. 30. cap. 1.] that Philopator slew his wife and sister, Euridice : Whereby it should seem, that Polybius his Antiochus, and Justin his Eurydices and Livies and Josephus his Cleopatra, [sup. an. Mund. 3794. and 3795.] were all one and the same woman.

But whatever her name was, when she was dead, Philopator, falling in love with one Agathoclia, a dressing woman, and with her brother Agathocles in a tojornal way, let this Agathocles to the wonderment of all men, at the helme of his kingdom : being a man of no Court-wit at all, nor ever versed in any point of State affairs; and with them took in also their mother Oenauthe, who, by her two childrens means, engaged the Kings affection to her self also. Agathocles, keeping always close to the King, told the whole State : and the women bestowed all offices of the State, with all commendations, and captain-ships in the army where they pleased; and the King himself, who was now in their hands, could do the least of any man, in his own kingdom, [Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 720. and in Excerpt. Valef. pag. 65. Justin. lib. 30. cap. 1. 2. Plin. in Eutrope, and in Joem. Athenæ. lib. 6. cap. 6. and lib. 13. cap. 13. Hieron. upon Daniel, cap. 11.]

But when the people wanted a man, by whose hand to wreak their anger upon Agathocles, and Agathoclia, they were fain to be quiet for the present; yet had their eye still upon one Tlepolemus, and fed themselves with some hope in him, [Polyb. pag. 66. Excerpt. Valef.] This young man, who had ever carryed himself eminently, and with great honour in the war, had at that time the managing of the Kings treasure committed to him; which when heuled, not as an officer, but rather like a young heir, he fell into the dislike and hatred of the Court : Whereupon, when Ptolemeus the son of Sotibius, (of whom I spake ere while) returned from Philippus out of Macedon, with the other Ambassadors, it should seem, who had been sent thither the year before, began to speak his mind somewhat freely of Tlepolemus, he found every man at Court, ready to applaud him in his way, [Idem. lib. 16. pag. 82, 85. and Excerpt. Valef.]

3798. These coles kindling, and growing into a further flame, the Courtiers in an open assembly complained of Tlepolemus, and Tlepolemus on the other side, set himself to frame one general accusation against them all to the King : which Sotibius hearing, (who had both the keeping of the Kings Seale, and custody of his person) gave up the Seale into Tlepolemus his hand; which he receiving, did all things afterward at his pleasure in the State, [Ibid. pag. 85, 86.]

3799. In the Consulship of P. Cornel. Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, there was found by the College of the Decemviri, a certain saying, written in the books of Sibylla, which were in their keeping, to this purpose, and in these words. Quandocunque hostes alienigenæ, &c. That whenever a foreign enemy should make war upon Italy, he might be driven out again and overcome, if the image of the Mother of the gods at Ida, which fell from heaven, were sent for, and brought to Rome. Whereupon, there were five Ambassadors dispatched away presently to King Attalus, to desire her of him, and to bring her by sea unto him. These five, had each of them a ship of five tire of oars to go in; to the end they might appear in a fashion answerable to the honour and dignity of the State of Rome, in those parts, where they were at their first arrival to ingratiate themselves, and to begget an opinion of the Roman name and Majesty of their State. Attalus received and entertained these Ambassadors at Pergamus, with all expressions of love and kindness; and then led them to Pessinuntis in Phrygia, and there delivered into their hands that sacred Stone, which the people there said, was the mother of the gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome, as they desired, [Id. 29.]

In the prologue to the 30 book of Trogus, it is noted, that Antiochus in that journey of his, quiered all the upper Provinces of Asia, as far as Bactria. But there, when he was long laboured, though all in vain, to turn Euthydemus out of that Province; he was fain, in the end, to come to an agreement, and make a league with him : for the ratifying whereof, when he sent his own son, called Demetrius, to Antiochus; Antiochus, seeing what his behaviour, judged him a man fit to be a King, and first promised to give him one of his daughters to wife, and then gave his father leave to take upon him the title of a king; and lastly, having subscribed to the other articles of the league between them made, and taken his oath for the true observance of them, removed with his Camp; having first distributed provisions largely among his own soldiers, and received from Euthydemus all the Elephants, which he had with him, [Polyb. lib. 11. page 651.]

Then

Then passing the Caucasus, he re-entered upon India, and there renewed the league, and friendship formerly made with Sophagafenus their Kings; and there he received more Elephants from him, and then distributed a further admeasurement of corn among his army; and to returned, leaving Androtheos of Cyzicum, to bring after him the treasure, which Sophagafenus had promised to put into his hand, [Id. lib. pag. 652.]

3800.

Then came he into Arachosia, from whence, passing the river Erymanthus, and going thorough the Country of Drangia, he came into Carmania; and there, because the winter season come on, he quartered his army about the Country, [Id.]

The Romans made a peace with Philippus King of Macedon; and into this league were taken by Philippus, Ptoleus the King of Bythnia, and by the Romans, the state of Ilium, and Attalus the King of Pergam, [Id. lib.]

Philopator died at Alexandria, leaving for his successor Ptolemaeus, surnamed Epiphanes, (i. e.) the Noble or Illustrious, whom Appian in his Syriac, surnameth also Philopator, after his fathers sur-name. He succeeded his father at the age of four years, as Hieronym. upon the 11 of Daniel (sayes, or of five, as Justin, and he reigned 24 years: as [Cl. Ptolem. in Reg. Can. Clemens Alexandr. Porphy. Euseb. and Jerom] tell us.

Philopators death was concealed a long time, whilst Agathoclia and Oenanthe her mother, rifled the Kings coffers, and got all his monies into their hands, and so put the state and kingdom into the power of their own lewd conlorts, [Justin l. 40. c. 3.]. Till at length Agathocles, calling together the principal of the Macedons, came forth unto them, and bringing with him his sister Agathoclia, and the young King, tells them; That the King, when he lay a dying, delivered the child into his sisters bosom, and commended him to hers and his care; and withall produced the testimony of one Critolaus, who testified that Ptolemaus was about to invade the kingdom, and to set the Crown of Egypt upon his own head. And when he still continued to utter the same words in all places where he came; every man scorned him. And he, to make his disagreement with Ptolemaus yet more apparent to the world, took Danae, Ptolemaus his mother in law, out of the Temple of Ceres, and dragged her thorough the open streets, and bare faced to prison; and then took Moeragenes one of the guard, (as because he gave information of all things to Ptolemaus, and favoured his parties, (as he could do no lesse, in regard of that intimacy that was between him and Adeus, the Governour of Bubattis) and delivered him into the hands of his Secretary Nicoftratus, to be tortured: but when he strangely elapsed the rack, and got out of their hands stark naked, as he was, he fled to the Macedons, and stirred them up against Ptolemaus, [Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 712, 713, 714.]

And now when the people of all forts came flocking to the Court, in a tumultuous manner, Agathocles, taking the King with him, went and hid himself, in a place called Syringes, which was a gallery or walk, which had every way three walls and gates to passe, before one could come unto it. But the Macedons forced him to deliver up the King into their hands; and they, having gotten him, brought him out to the people, and there set him in a Royal Throne: to the great joy and comfort of all that saw him. And not long after, was brought fourth also Agathocles, well fettered; but the first that met him, cut his throat. Then came Nico, and then Agathoclia all naked with her sisters, and all the generation of them: and last of all, the old beldam Oenanthe, haled out of the Temple all naked, and set upon a jade, was brought into the Piazoe, and being all together delivered up to the peoples pleasure, some fell a tearing them with their teeth, some lanced them with their knives, others pulled out their eyes, and as any of them happened to be killed, they presently fell to pulling them in pieces, untill there was no signe of any of them left. At the same time also, the damsel, who attended upon Artinoe, whilst she lived, hearing that Phlammon, whose hand was principally used in the murder of her, was come from Cyrene to Alexandria, brake into his house, and there slew him, with staves and stones; and finding there a little child of his, strangled it, and dragged his wife stark naked into the street, and there cut her throats, [Id. pag. 716, 718, 719.]. And then afterward, when the tumult and fury of the people was over; the management of the affairs of the kingdom, was committed to one Aristomenes, born in Acarnania, [Id. pag. 717. & lib. 17. pag. 771, 772.]; and he, being made governour of the King and kingdom, administered the affairs thereof, with a great deal of moderation and wisdom, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valer. pag. 294.]

Antiochus, King of Syria, and Philippus, King of Macedon, hearing of the death of Philopator, entered into a wicked consultation together, how to share his kingdom, between them two; encouraging one another, to begin with the murder of the young King that was, [Id. lib. 15. pag. 705, Livie, lib. 31. Justin, lib. 30. cap. 3.] whereof Polybius

Polybius in special, [Lib. 3. pag. 159.] speaketh in this wise; Πτολεμαῖος τῷ Βασιλεὺς ἀπεβίβησεν τὸν υἱόν, &c. (i. e.) When Ptolemaeus the King was departed this life, Antiochus and Philippus, laid their heads together, to share the estate of the young King between them, and began a wicked practice. Philip laying hands upon Egypt and Caria, and Antiochus upon Callosyria, and Phenicia. And Jerom upon [11. Dan.] Philippus saith h, King of Macedonia, and Antiochus the great, conspiring together, made war upon Agathocles, (he would have said, Aristomenes) and the young King Ptolemaus Epiphanes, upon this condition; that each of them, should take of his Dominions, what lay next him: which gives a light to that place in [Josephus, lib. 18. Antiquit. cap. 3.] where he saith; When Antiochus the great reigned in Asia, Judea and Callosyria both, lived in a continual trouble and vexation, by reason of the continual war which he had, first with Phloptor, and afterward with Epiphanes his son, for whether he had the better of it or the worse, the countries were ever plagued by him, being tossed and tumbled between his prosperous and adverse fortunes, like a ship in the sea, between contrary waves: Yet at length, Antiochus had the upper hand, and laid Judea unto his Dominions. But when Philopator was dead, Epiphanes sent a great army into Callosyria, under his General Scopas, who recovered both Callosyria, and our Country also, to himself again, &c. For this is that he would, at least he should, say, that Antiochus after a long war with Philopator and Epiphanes, concerning the Dominion of the land of Judea, got it at last from Epiphanes; and Epiphanes by his General Scopas, recovered it from him again, and anon after, lost it a second time unto him: which Eusebius not perceiving, in the 10 year of Philopator, saith, that Antiochus having overcome Philopator, joined Judea to the rest of his Dominions. And an. 1. of Epiphanes, in his Chron. saith, that Ptolemaus Epiphanes, by his General Scopas, took Judea. Whereas Antiochus, after his overthrow at Raphia, is no where read to have made war upon Philopator any more: and that the league, which was after that battle made between them, was first broken by Antiochus in the very first year of Epiphanes, (when Scopas was not yet employed in the management of that war, as hereafter shall appear) is shewed by Jerom upon [11. Dan.] where he he saith, When Ptolemaus Philopator was dead, Antiochus broke the league made with him, and led an army against Ptolemaus his son, who was then but 4 years old, and was surnamed Epiphanes.

When Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, were Consuls in Rome; it fell out, that at Frusino, the Sun seemed to be encompassed round with a little circle, and then that circle again, was surrounded by a greater body of the Sun, [Livie, lib. 50.] and it should seem, that was none other but that very Eclipse of the Sun, which the Astronomical tables shew us to have fallen this year, upon the 6 day of our May, according to the Julian Calendar.

The Carthaginians, worn out with the continual victories of P. Scipio, and despairing of all other safety against him; called Hannibal out of Italy, to their rescue: and he after 16 years stay in Italy, thereupon left it, and returned into Africa, [Jd. lib.]

Philippus, King of Macedon, sent one Heraclides a Tarentine born, and a most vicious fellow, to Rhodes, to destroy their Fleet; and then sent Ambassadors unto Crete, to stir them up to a war against the Rhodians, [Polyb. lib. 13. pag. 672, 673.]

There was a sea fight between Philippus King of Macedon, and the Rhodians, near to the Isle of Lada; wherein he took two of their ships of five tire of oares apiece. The rest of their Fleet, fleeing into the open sea, were lighted on by a foul tempest, and driven alhoar, first upon Myndia, and the next day upon Coos: But the enemy, trailing the ships which they had to taken, at their poyes, went into Lada, which lieth over against Miletus, and refreshed themselves in the enemies Camp which they had left: which the Miletians perceiving, they presented not Philippus onely, but even Heraclides himself, with Crowns, at their coming into Miletus, [Idem, in Excerpt. Valer. pag. 70, and 73.] Iout of Zeno and Antisthenes, two Rhodian Historians.

Philippus, wanting corn, ceased not to waste all Attalus his country, even to the very walls of Pergamus: but when he could neither take any one City of his, because they were so well fenced, nor get corn or other spoil out of the Country, by the exquisite order which Attalus had taken to prevent him: then he fell upon the Temple and Altars, and spoiled them, breaking the very stones of them in pieces, that they might never be put together again. And having utterly destroyed the Nicæphorian Grove, planted near the City Pergamus, and laid many a Church and Chappel thereabout level with the ground: he went from thence first towards Thyatira, but then turned back again, and went to a field called Tabees, hoping to get some great booty there; but failing there also, and coming to a place called Hiera-Come, he sent messengers to Zeuxis, Governour of Lydia under Antiochus, desiring him to supply him with provisions for his army, according to the articles of peace, between his Master and him: but Zeuxis made at first as if, by all means, he would do according to those articles: but what else? but indeed resolved to do nothing whereby any good might come to Philippus, Philippus, [Polyb. lib. 16. in Excerpt. Vales. page 66, 69. with Diodorus Sic. ibid, page 294.]

[Page 294.] This Philippos had another sea fight against Attalus and the Rhodians, near the Isle of Chios; in which there were slain of the Rhodians 60, of Attalus his men, to the number of 70 men; but of Philippos his part, were slain of his Macedons 1200, and of his aids and associates, to the number of 6000. There were also taken prisoners of the Macedon nation, with their fellows, 2000, and 700 Egyptians. Nevertheless, Philippos, though he had every way the worst of it, yet challenged the honour of the day to himself in two respects: one was, for that Attalus being forced to fly to Erythrae, he had seized on his Ammiral, and trailed her at one of his ships tails into his port; the other was, for that himself coming on shoar at Argentaum, a fore-land in Ionia, he there took up his landing, to recover what might be saved out of the naverage, [Polych. lib. 16, from page 723. to page 730.]

When Philippos besieged Prinaffa, a City of Caria, and could do nothing upon it by plain force; yet at length he got it by a stratagem, [Id. Ibid. pag. 730, 731.] and put Garrilios into Iassus, Bargyllis, and the City of the Euromene, [Id. pag. 731. & lib. 17. pag. 744.]

P. Cornelius Scipio utterly overthrew Hannibal, in Africa, and this was the last battle of this second Carthaginian war; we read in Zonaras, that the Carthaginians were amazed at a total eclipse of the sun which fell at this time: but that this was no such great eclipse, we find by Livie, [lib. 30.] who fails, that indeed the body of the sun at Carme seemed to be somewhat lessened: and the Astronomical Tables show as much, and tell us of a very small eclipse of the sun, this year, upon the 19 of our Octob. Some there are, who say that Hannibal flying out of the battle, came to the sea side, where he found a ship laid for him; and therein sailed directly into Asia, to King Antiochus: and that when Scipio demanded of the Carthaginians, first, and above all things, to deliver Hannibal into his hand, answer was made him, that Hannibal not in Africa. [Livie, Ibid.] But others more truly, that Scipio neither demanded him at all of them, nor any ways insulted upon his overthrow. [Plutarch in *T. Q. Flamini*o.]

When Philippus came toward Abydus, they flur their gates against him, not admitting to him his messengers, which he sent unto them: he lay long in siege before that place; and they might have escaped his hands, had Attalus and the Rhodians made any speed to their rescue. But Attalus sent them in only 300 men for a supply; and the Rhodians, who with their whole fleet lay at Tenedus thereby, sent them one only ship of four tire of oars to help them. The men in Abydus, at first, having good store of Engines all about their walls, kept him off very manfully, not quietly on making his approaches by land, but also, from coming into their port by sea. But afterward, when a breach was made upon the main wall, and they had cast up another within it, and the Macedons went to undermine that also, then were they lain to send to Philip, to treat of conditions for a surrender, one of which was, That the Rhodian ship with the fouldiers and mariners in her might depart in safety; the like for Attalus his men that were in the Town: and the last, that they themselves might depart with one suit of cloathes only upon their backs. But when they could get no answer from him, unless they rendered themselves wholly and absolutely to his mercy; they, what with indignation, what with despair, grew into such a rage, that they made fity of their principall men to swear openly, That if they law the inner wife and children, and throw his silver, gold, and jewels, into the sea: and that done, the fouldiers bound themselves in common, each to other, that either they would vanquish their enemies, or die every man of them fword in hand, and fighting for his Country. [Liv. lib. 31. Polyb. lib. x6. pag. 736. 737. 738.]

About the same time came Ambassadors to Rome from Attalus and the Rhodians, both, complaining of the wrongs done them by Philippus and his Maccodons, to whom answer was made, that the Senate, would take the affairs of Asia into their consideration and care. [Livie, lib. 32. with Justin lib. 30. cap. 35.]

cap. 35] Three Ambassadors were sent from Rome to Ptolemei and Antiochus, to put an end to all differences between them. The Ambassadors were, C. Clau. Nero, Mar. Emil. Lepidus, and P. Scmpronius Tudicianus; who coming to Rhodes, and there hearing of the siege of Abydus, and desirous to have some conference with Philippus; as they had in their instructions to do, put of their journey to Ptolemei and Antiochus, for the present, and sent Emilus the youngest of the three, unto Philippus; and he meeting with him at Abydus, gave him time to understand, that the senate of Rome had a purpose, to desire him to forbear making war upon any City of the Grecians, nor lay hands or touch any thing belonging to Ptolemei King of Egypt. This if he did, he

he might live in peace; if he did not, he should know, that the Romans were reſolv'd, and ready to make war upon him: to whom Philippius returned this answer, Thy age, laich, and comelines of thy person, and above all, the name of a Roman, makes thee speak thus high: but I would advise you, to remember the league and covenant made, and to keep peace with me; not, I am also resolv'd to do my endeavour, and to make you know and feel, that the power and name of a Macedon is no way inferior to our leſſe noble than that of a Roman is. [Id. lib. d. with Polyb. pag. 738, 739, 787, 388.]

[Julius, lib. 30. cap. 30.] tells us, that this M. Emil. Lepidus, was sent abroad by the Romans into Egypt, to govern the Kingdom of Egypt, on the behalf of th's young Ptolemæus Epiphaneus. Whether moved thereto by an Embassage sent to them from Alexandria; that they would vouchsafe to take upon them the patronage and tutelage of the Minor, and defend the kingdom of Egypt, which Antiochus and Philippus were said already to have shared between them, [Ibid. cap. 2.] or whether, the Minor himself was by the father in his death-bed committed to their care and trust; as he elsewhere intimates, [lib. 31. cap. 1.] whereof [Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 6.] speaking, uteth these words: When King Ptolemæus had left the people of Rome Guardian to his son in his minority, the Senate sent M. Emil. Lepidus, High Pontiff, and one that had been twice Consul to Alexandria, there to take care of the Ward's estate, and was content to wait the holiness of a most honourable, and wishful of a most upright man, and to long veried in their own affairs, to employ it in the exercise of a foreign charge, rather than suffer the Faith and trust of our City to have been impaired in vain. For he conceived that this man had executed the office of a Guardian of the Child in Egypt, whilst he was High Pontiff; in which he had been ready twice to be Consul to Rome; when as yet Epiphaneus was dead before that time; the cause of which error in him was; because it should seem, he had seen some come, and wherein, together with those titles of his honour and dignity, he found this office of his, Guardian-child in Egypt, joyued; for to this day, there are extant to be seen some silver coins, with this inscription; on the one side th'u, Alexandria; and on the other thus, S. C. M. Lepidus Pont. Max. Tutor Reg. who also, in the Image side, is stamped, putting a Crown upon a young man's head, standing on his right hand, with a Scepter in his hand.

And now the Athenians, seeing their territory wasted all over by this Philip, sent and prayed in aide from all parts; from the Romans, from the Rhodians, from Artalus, and from Ptolemei, [Liv. lib. 31.]

Whereupon the Ambassadors of the Romans and Rhodians, meeting with Attalus at Athens, by a common consent, agreed to aide them : for which the Athenians presently decreed excessive honours, first to Attalus, then to the Rhodians ; nay, they went so far, as to call one of their own Tribes, after his name ; and made it (supernumerary to their ten, that were before, [Id. Ib. Polyb. Legat. 3. pag. 786, 787]

While the Romans were buſie in preparing war againſt Philippus, there came Ambaſſadors from Ptolemei, or rather from his Curators, to Rome, who informed, that the Athenians had craved aide of the King, againſt Philippus; But though they were confederates, both of the Kings, and the Romans, yet would he do nothing that way, nor lend ſhipping, or army thither, or any whither elle, for defence or offence of any, without the leave and authority of the people of Rome. That if the Romans would be pleaſed to undertake their quarrel, the King would be well content, to ſit quiet at home: or if it pleaſed the Romans to ſit quiet, He of himſelf ſhould eaſily be able to furniſh the Athenians with power enough to reſpell: the force and violence of Philippus. The Senate decreed, That the King ſhould be thanked for his kindeſſe, and to tell him, that the Romans were purpoſed to defend and maintain their own friends and confederates themſelves: If they wanted any thing neceſſary to this war, they would acquaint the King therewith; and that they knew well enough, that the Kings Forces and Means, as they were very great, fo they were alſo very neceſſary for the defence of his own State. Then they ordered preſents to be ſent to the kings Ambaſſadors, to every of them 5 thouſand pieces of braſſe money. [Liv. ib.]

In the year 54, for it is in the Greek Manuscript at Lambeth, not 52, as in the vulgar edition of the second Periode of Callippus, 547. of Nabonassar, the 16 day of the month Mefor, the 22 of our September, 7 hours after high-noon, there was an Eclipse of the Sun observed at Alexandria, [Cl. Prolog. lib. 4. cap. 11.]

Toward the later end of Autumn, P. Sulpicius Galba, Consul, passed over with an army into Macedonia, against Philip; and thither came to him Ambassadors from Athens, desiring him to deliver them from the siege, which was then laid unto them: whereupon was dispatched away C. Claudius Cento, with a certain number of ships, fraught with soldiers, to the relief of Athens; for Philip himself lay not before it, but was then busied then ever, at the siege of Abydos. [Liv. lib. 31.]

They of Abydus, remembering the oath they had made, fought it out so stiffly, that when the night should have parted the fray between them; the king amazed at their courage, or rather at their rage in fighting, was faine to give off first, and to found a retreat: But then Glaucides, and Theogenus, conferring with some of the Ancients of the Town; who had the hardest part in this tragedy to play, if it came to action when they saw that after the fight, there were but few of their men left, and they [went] with wounds, and blood which they had lost, so soon as it was day, sent their Priests, in their piety artful, to give up the Town to Philip; which when the multitude perceived, they forthwith grew into to depelrate a rage, that they ran to kill every man his own wife and children; and that done, flew every man himself in such manner as liked him best; some one way, some another. The King amazed at this strange fury of theirs, commanded his souldiers to forbear, saying, That he would give the Abydenians three dayes time to die in: in which space they acted more barbarous acts of cruelty upon themselves, than they could have expected from an enraged enemy, nor came any one of them alive into his enemies hand, that was out of bands, and at liberty to kill himself. The King, having seized on their wealth, which they had brought all into one place, with a purpose to destroy it, left a Garrison in the place, and departed. Liv. 16. Polyb. lib. 16. pag. 738. 739.

Coming to Bargylus, he there grew much troubled in his mind, to see the Romans, & Rhodians, and Attalus, and all confederated and preparing for a war against him: & when his army was almost affamished, Zexis the governour of Lydia, and the Cities of Mylaffa, Alabanda, and Miliceia, sent him in some small provisions to relieve them: and he, when they brought him in any thing, contrary to his nature: used all fair and flattering speeches to them: and when they forbore lending, was presently ready to mischief them: and in the end, when by the policie of Philotes, a train was laid to have blown up them of Mylaffa, it miscarried through his own folly, and then went he and wasted the territorie of the Alabandi, his good benefactors, as if they had been his open enemies, giving only for a reason, that his soldiers must not want meat, [Polyp. lib. 10. pag. 738, 739.]

In the 55 year of the second Periode of Calippus, in the 548 year of Nabonassar, on the ninth of the month Machir, about midnight, in the beginning of the 20. of our March, there was a total eclipse of the Moon at Alexandria, [Cl. Proh. l. 4. c. 11.]

In the Summer following, the Romans, with the help of Attalus, and the Rhodians, made war upon Philippus, and his associates in Macedonia, [Livie lib. 31.]

Scopas, the prince of an island, sent from Alexandria by Ptolemei, with a great number of money, took up six thousand Foot, besides Horſe, and ſhipp them away for Egypt.

Now would he have left a man there, able to bear arms, had not one Darius put them in mind, ſome time of the war, which they were ready to engage in, and ſome time, of the ſolitude and nakedneſſe, which the Country would be left in, which caused a great part of the gallants that were going, to put off their arms, and ſtay at home : and this he did, but whether out of a true zeal to his Country, or becauſe Scopas courted, and bribed not him, as he did others, was uncertain. [Id. ib.]

About this time Josephus, the son of Tobias, happening to depart this life; the people of Jerusalem rose in a combustion among themselves, in the quarrel of his sons; while the elder brothers, fought to make war upon their youngest brother Hyrcanus; of whom I spake before : for many of the Jews favoured the elder brothers, and among the rest, Simon the High Priest, for kindreds sake, [Josephus lib. 12. cap. 5.]

In the year 55, of the second Periode of Calippus, in the 548 year of Nabonassar, or the fifth of the month Mefor, at three a clock after midnight, upon the 12 of our Septemb. there was a total eclipse of the Moon at Alexandria. [C. Ptol. lib. 4. c. 11.]

Attalus, before the Autumnal equinox, recovered Orem by surrender, he was present at the feast of Eleusis in Athens; and then having sent home Agesimbrotus and the Rhodians, himself returned into Asia, [Liv. lib. 31.]

3805. After Simon 2. succeeded his son Onias 3. in the High Priesthood of the Jews, Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 45. [a good man, and a gracious, of a venerable aspect, meek in his carriage, and very advised in his language; and one who, from his youth, framed himself to all behaviour tending unto a virtuous life, [2 Maccab. 15. 12.] In the Fasti Siculi (or here Scaligers Greek Eusebian Fragments fail us,) he is said to have late High Priest, 24 years.

3806. Ptolemy, Antiochus, sent a great army under the command of Scopas, into Cœleſyria, who by main force recovered many Cities to him, and among them, the City of Jerusalem; as Josephus reports, [Lib. x. a. p. 3. Antiquit.] adding thereto this testimony out of Polyb. lib. Hist. 16. § 2. ὁ δὲ Πτολεμαῖος στρατὸν ἐπέμπετο. But Scopas, the General of Ptolemy's army, marching into the upper regions, subdued the nation of the Jews, in the winter season: whereof Jerom also, upon the 11 of Daniel [speaking, faith thus: When Antiochus, saith he, held Judea, Scopas the Eſtlian was sent General of Ptolemy's force, and fought valiantly against Antiochus, and took in Judea, and, carrying along with him the chief men of Ptolemy's party, returned into Egypt.

Mean while Antiochus invaded Artalus his kingdom, which at that time was unfurnished of all provisions for defence, because all was employed for the Romaas, in the Macedonian war, [Liv. lib. 32.] complaints thereof made by Artalus, sent their Am-

The Senate of Rome, upon complaint thereof made by Attalus, lent their Ambassadors to Antiochus, to tell him, that the Romans at that time made use of Attalus's forces, by sea and land, against the Macedons, a common enemy to them both; and that the Romans would take it well at his hands, if he would hold his hands from meddling with any part of his kingdom, for that present, and abstain from war against him; that it was fit and requisite, that such Kings that were in league and friendship with the people of Rome, should also live in peace and amitie between themselves; and with the people of Rome: should presently draw off, and ceale from any further war making against Attalus. And Attalus departed away his Ambassadors to the Senate of Rome, to thank them for this so great a benefit received by their means, and offered a Crown of gold of 246 pound weight in the Capitol, [Id. ib.]

At this time, two fleets out of Asia, the one under Attalus the King, consisting of 20 ships, of five tire of oars a piece, the other from Rhodes, of 20 fighting ships, commanded by Agemimbrous, both which joining with the Roman fleet, pursued Philip with all extremity. [Ibid.]

d. That Summer, Antiochus took in all the Cities of Cœloſyria, which Ptolemy there poſſeſſed, as Livie ſaith, [lib. 33.] and we likewiſe find in Chron. Euſeb. that in the ſame Summer, Antiochus, having overthrow'n Scopas in a battle, recovered all the Cities of Syria, and grew friendly and favourably minded to the Jewiſh nation, who he ſettled on both ſides of the river Jordan, (where they

For Antiochus, meeting with Scopas at the heads of the river Jordan, (where the City Paneas was afterward built) there fought with him, and routed him; and where he had recovered the Cities, which Scopas had gotten from him, together with Samaria, the Jews voluntarily submitted to him: and receiving his whole army with his Elephants, into their City, maintained them very plentifully, and readily assisted them, in the siege of the Cælle, whereinto Scopas had put a Garrilion, which floated out against them. [to Josephus, [lib. 12, antiq. cap. 3.]] confirming it further out of their Epistle, which Antiochus himself wrote to Ptolemeus, the Captain of the Garrison there: where he also reports out of Polyb. [lib. 26.]] how after the overthrow of Scopas, Antiochus took in Batanea, Samaria, Abila, and Gadara; and how the Jews who dwelt at Jerusalem, and that famous Temple there, put themselves into his hands, and how Antiochus took and destroyed Gaza, which stood out against him most confidently in the behalf of Ptolemei all which is delivered in the same book of Polyb.

Cællæ. Excerpt. pag. 77. & 86.]

Valis. Excerpt. [pag. 77, & 86.]
Zeno Rhodius, in his Local History, mentioned by Lactantius [Lib. 7.] hath at large described this battle fought at Panias; near the heads of the river Jordan, between Antiochus and Scopas, the chief leaders of which narration of his, with the more exact censure of Polybius thereupon, with other Excerptions of his out of Polybius, the most learned Hen. V. hath given us, [pag. 77, 78, 81.] the issue whereof was, that Antiochus was forced to flight, and pursued him to Sidon, and there blesigned him with a thousand men; and torefore him, Ptolemei then three renowned Captains of his, Eucropus, Menoclerus, and Damoxenus; but could not raise the lieges, till the very hunger yielded, and was with his companies lusted to go all naked of the place, [see Vermeer Daniel, cap. 12.]

So Antiochus by that victory gotten at Panias, recovered all Phœnicia, and Cœlosyria, and the other Cities of the Country indeed of Syria, but belonging in right to the Kings of Egypt, [Justin. l. 31. cap. 1.] and left them to be held afterward by the Kings of Syria, [Polyb. Legat. 72. p. 395.] But himself returned to winter in Antioch, [Liv. l. 43. of Syria,] the day preceding, the 17 day of the month.

In the 551 year of Nabonassar, and the 3 years preceding, the 17 day of the month of Syria, [Polyp. Legat. 7a, p. 365] and the 17 day of the month of Athyr, which is moveable, and from which to the 21, as Plutarch in his book, De Idæ et Osiride, teacheth us, was celebrated the feast of Isis, by the Egyptians, tell upon the 28 of our December, upon which day, as we have shewed in the 17th chapter of our book, Dr. Macdonnum et Afanorum, anno solari, Eudoxus placed the winter Solstice. This when the 28 of our December, which is the 17th day of the month of Athyr, as Plutarch in his Paraepsema therunto annexed, which he published at Colonie, near Athens, (the greater at Colonie, in Eolia) had noted in this time; thence came it to passe, that the Grecians fell into that opinion, which Geminus mentions, [l. 6] of his Astronomical works, to wit, that the feast of Isis was always kept upon the winter Solstice, or thorst day of the year, which error, as there also sheweth, was formerly observed in Erastotelenes, in his Commentary De Ostitaride.

In this winter season, Philip^{us} came to a parlie with the Roman Consul, Tit^{us} Quinctius Flamin^{ius}, to treat of a peace, and upon what conditions, among which Flamin^{ius} propounded this for one, That Philip^{us} should restore unto Ptolem^{ee} K. of Egypt, all the cities which he had taken since the death of Ptol^{emee} Philopator, his father, [Pol^yb. 17. pag. 432. L. iv. lib. 32.]

b. In the same year, between the two Islands of Theramene (at, Thera) and Therafia, and in the midst of the sea, lying between them, there was an Earthquake, by which there flart up a new Island, with hot Springs, or Fountains of hot waters. And in Asia, upon the same day, an Earthquake shook Rhodes, and many other Cities, and overturned sundry houses in them, and some other Cities it swallowed up whole; whereupon their Priests and Soothsayers foretold, that the then rising Roman Empire, would swallow up and devour the kingdoms, both of Macedon, and Asia, [Justin, lib. 30. cap. 4.]

c. In the beginning of the Spring, Flaminius, sending for Attalus to come to him to Elatia, went with him in company to Thebes, there to draw the Bœotians into a society and league with the Romans: where when Attalus made an Oration to them, to that effect, with more vehemency and stretching of his voice than his age would bear, being now grown old, whether by a vertigo taking him in his head, or by a rheum falling upon his throat, he grew suddenly speechless, and fell all along, and then being taken with a dead palsy in all one side of his body, lay sick thereof at Thebes. And Quintus, when he saw that there was no fear of present death, but only a weakness of body, which required time for his recovery, left him there, and returned to Elatia, from whence he came, [Liv. in the beginning of 39 book, printed at Rome out of the Manuscript of Bamberg, and at Paris an. 1616. with Plutarch in the life of Quintus, Flamin.]

At the same time also, Antiochus, sending his two sons, Arduus and Mithridates, before him by land, and willing them to stay for him at Sardes, set sail with an hundred tall fighting ships, and other smaller vessels, purposing by the way to try what he could do, with the Cities of Caria and Cilicia, which were of Ptolemeis possession, and withal, to assist Philippos by sea and land, what he might: and having taken in first Zephyrium, and Soli, and Aphrodisias, and (then doubling the Cape of Anemurium, a Foreland of Cilicia,) Selinus, and other Towns, Cities, and Castles, all along that Coast; which either for fear or favour, rendered themselves without resistance, at last came to Coraceum, which contrary to all expectation, shut gates against him, [Livie, lib. 33.]

While Antiochus lay at the siege of Coraceum, Ambassadors came to him from the Rhodians, to tell him, that if he kept not himself on the other side of Nephelis, a Foreland of Cilicia, they would oppose him, nor for any grudge they bare unto his person, but to keep him from joining with Philippos, and that he might not impeach the Romans, who had now undertaken to procure and maintain the liberty of Greece; which when he heard, he tempered his choler, and told them only, that he would send his Ambassadors to Rhodes, to treat about that matter, and with instructions to renew the leagues formerly made between them and him, and his forefathers, and to bid them not to fear his coming to them, for that it should bring no damage to them or any of their friends: for that he was resolved not to infringe his amity with the Romans in any sort, appeared well enough, both by his late Embassie sent unto them, and their honourable decrees and answers made thereupon to him, [Id. ibid.]

The Rhodians challenged to themselves Peræa, which is a Region lying in the Continent of Asia, over against their Isle of Rhodes, and had been always in their use and possession of their ancestors, but was now invaded and possessed by Philippos; and were at this time upon the recovery of it out of his hand. Paulistatus was their General, and he had routed the Macedons which kept it, with Dinocrates their Captain: And had they then marched straight forward to Stratonicea, they might have gotten that also, for the asking: but so far as they returned after the battle to their Camp, Dinocrates with those which remained of his army, gat into it, and so fortified it, that the Rhodians coming afterward to besiege it, could do no good there; which story is more at large described and set forth by [Livie, lib. 33.]

Attalus was carried sick from Thebes to his City Pergamus by sea, and there died, [Id. ibid. Polyb. pag. 820. Plut. in Quin. Flamin.] He lived 72 years, and was King 44. [Liv. ibid. Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 102. and in Suidas, in the word Attalus:] though Strabo says, he reigned only 43 years, [lib. 12. pag. 624.] He left behind him, a wife and four children, [Liv. ibid.] His wives name was Apollonis of the City Cyzicum: his children by her, were Eumenes, Attalus, Philæteus, and Athenæus; of which, Eumenes, the eldest of the four, succeeded him in the kingdom, [Strabo, ut. sup. and Plut. in his book περί βασιλέων: (i. e.) of brotherly loves.] where he telleth us, that the two younger brothers, though all of brave and lusty spirits, yet lived in that awful respect of him, that they were as to many penitencers and watch men about him, for the preservation of his Crown and Dignity, [Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 169. and Suidas, in the word Attalus.] Whereupon it was, that their mother would often say, that she was a happy woman, not in regard of her wealth, nor for that she was a Queen; but because she saw her 3 younger sons, to be as to many watchmen and keepers, about the eldest:

eldest: and that whereas they ever went with their words about them, yet he lived in the midst of them, without the least dread or fear of them, [Plut. ut. sup.] and of Apollonis, or Apollonias, their mother; and the filial duty and respect, which they a bare unto her: you may read more in Polybius, [in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 113, 114.] and in Suidas, in the word Apollonias.

d. Philippos, being overthrown, Horfe and Foot in the battle fought at Cynoccephalus, in the Country of Theffalia, of which victory we find mention made, [1 Maccab. 8.] Flaminius gave him yet peace, upon conditions; much the rather for that he understood that Antiochus was already marched out of Syria with an army, to come for Europe; and thereupon he made a truce with him for four months; that in them he might send to Rome, and submit all to the will and pleasure of the Senate there, [Polyb. in Legat. 6. pag. 792. Livie lib. 33. editio. Roman. & Paris.]

The Rhodians, hearing of the defeat of Antiochus, cast not off the care they had of defending the liberty of such Cities as were confederate with Ptolemei, and which were in present danger of being invaded by Antiochus: but to some of them they sent aide, to others advertisement, and advice, &c. were the means of safety from his attempts, to the Cauniens, Myndians, Halicarnassians, and Samians, [Liv. lib. 33.] and yet all would not serve; but Antiochus, in spite of them, surpris'd Coraceum, Coricos, Andriæ, Limyra, Patara, Xanthus, which belonged to Ptolemei, and last of all, the City of Ephesus it self, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11.]

Antiochus, spending his winter at Ephesus, endeavour'd to reduce all Asia into the ancient and uniform frame and body of an Empire. And he saw well, that the rest of the Cities, would easily be brought unto it: but finding that Smyrna in Eolia, and Lamplacus in Hellepont, purposed to stand out, he both advis'd them to do like the rest; and also used some threats too, in case they would not, fearing least the rest should follow their example, in opposing his designe. And when it would no better beget some companies from Ephesus to besiege Smyrna, and others from Abydos: to do the like to Lamplacus, [Liv. lib. 33.] Whereupon they both, and such other Cities, as thought fit to joyn with them, sent their Commissioners to Flaminius, to crave his favour and aide against him, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 87.]

When Cl. Marcellus was Consul, immediately upon his entering into his office, came Ambassadors to Rome, to treat of a league to be made with Philip; and thereupon was passed a decree of the Senate to this effect, That the Grecians every where, as well in Europe as in Asia, should be free, and live after their own laws; That such of them as were under Philippos his dominion, or had any Garrison of his in them, should before the celebration of the next Isthmian games, deliver them up into the hands of the Romans: That from such as were in Asia, as Eromius, Pedagia, Barygia, Iassus, Abydos, Thafus, Myrrina, Perimbus, he should draw away his Garrisons, and leave them free. That he should not renew his war with Eumenes; (for Valerius Antias observeth, that a special heed was taken of him) Attalus his son, the new King. And as concerning the enfranchising of the Cyani, that T. Quin. Flaminius should write his letters to Prusias, that the will and pleasure of the Senate was, &c. And to see these things duly put in execution, the Senate sent ten choice Commissioners into Greece, [Polyb. Legat. 7. pag. 793. & Legat. 9. pag. 792. Livie, lib. 33.]

b. When the Isthmian games were ended, at which the general liberty of Greece was proclaimed, by the public Crier; then did Tl. Flaminius, and the ten Commissioners which came from Rome, give audience to Hegelianactes and Lytiæ, which came Ambassadors from Antiochus to Flaminius: and they were bid tell Antiochus, that he must not meddle with any free City in Asia, much less make war upon them; and that he must presently get him out of such places as he now held, which were formerly belonging either to Ptolemei, or Philippos, and to command him from them, not to set foot in Europe himself, nor to send any of his forces thither: and added, that some of themselves would shortly make a journey to Antiochus, [Polyb. Legat. 9. pag. 798, 799. Liv. lib. 33.]

When the assembly was dismissed, the ten Commissioners parted the work, they came about, among them; and every man went to see his proper quarter to be set at liberty, according to the decree; and of them P. Lentulus went by sea to Barygia in Asia, and willed that City to be from thence forward free, (i. e.) to live according to their own laws. L. Sertorius, at Hephæstia and Thalus, and the Cities of Thracia, and where ever he came, did the like. P. Vilius, and Lu. Terentius, undertook the journey to Antiochus, and Cn. Cornelius, to King Philippos, [Polyb. Legat. 9. pag. 799. Liv. lib. 33. Plut. in Flamin.]

c. At the first of the spring, Antiochus went by sea from Ephesus, and came to Hellepont; and passing over his land army from Abydos, and joining them with his sea forces, landed in Cheroneffe, and there took in such Cities as for fear gave up unto him: from thence he went to Lynmachia, which being utterly destroyed, a little before, by the the Thracians, he began to rebuild and to make it the seat of his son Seleucus his kingdom in those parts, [Liv. lib. 33. Appia, in Syria, pag. 86, 87.]

And when all went on roundly with him, and as heart could with L. Cornelius, who was sent by the Senate of Rome to make an atonement between him and Ptolemei, came to Selymbria, P. Lentulus from Bargylia, and L. Terentius, and P. Villius from Thafus, being three of the Commissioners, and from thence went to Lyfymachia; and thither also P. Cornelius came from Selymbria, and a few days after Antiochus came thither likewise out of Thracia, and there they met; Hegestianax also and Lyfias, who had formerly been sent Ambassadors from him to Flamininius, happened to be there at the same time. Where in the conference, P. Cornelius said, That he thought it reason, that Antiochus should restore unto Ptolemei, all such Cities and places of Ptolemei's Dominions, as he had lately taken from him; and should further, draw off his Garrisons from all such places as were belonging to Philippus, because the Romans had now overcome him: and warned him withal, not to meddle with any free State; whereunto the King answered, that he wondered first, by what right the Romans quarrelled with him, about the Cities in Asia any more, then he questioned them of what was by them done in Italy: and then, that he was content the Cities in Asia, should enjoy their liberty, but should thank him, and not the Romans for it. And as for Ptolemei, they two were good friends already, and that he was further, at this instant, about to joyn in affinity with him, [Polyb. pag. 800, 769, and 770. Liv. lib. 3. Appia, in Syria, pag. 87, 88.]

And when P. Cornelius went on, and told him, that reason would, that the Ambassadors of Lamplacus and Smyrna should be called, and suffered to speak for themselves; called they were. Then appeared Parmenion and Pythodorus, for the City of Lamplacus, and one Ceramus for Smyrna: who speaking boldly and freely in their own cause, Antiochus stormed, to see, that he was there called to yield an account of what he had done in Asia, before the Romans, as if they were his Judges: and bad Parmenion, hold his peace, saying, that the controversies by him then moved, were to be debated before the Rhodian Judges, and not the Roman: and so that conference brake up, nothing done, [Polyb. lib. 17. pag. 770.]

Polycrates, who was Governour of Cyprus, and had withal, the gathering of the Kings revenue there, having given up his charge to his successor, Ptolemeus of Megalopolis, returned to Alexandria, and delivered up to the King Epiphanes a great mass of monies: for which he was very welcome thither, and much applauded by all there, [Id. pag. 773.]

Preciently after, the Etolians began to mutiny, under their Captain Scopas: who having a numerous company of souldiers under him, and had opportunity enough, the King being but a child, to do what he would, while he stood dawdling, was taken short in his undertakings; for when Aristomenes perceived, that his friends repaired to him in his own house, and there used to sit in council together; he sent a company of the Guard, and called him before the Kings Council: But Scopas, upon this surprisal, grew so wild, and void of sense, that he neither went on with what he intended, as he might have done, nor yet would obey the summons of the King, as he should have done: Aristomenes therefore finding what case he was in, sent a company of souldiers, and beset the house round, and caused him to be brought before them, by Ptolemei the son of one Eumenes, [Id. pag. 771.]

Being brought before the Council, and there charged, first by the King, then by Polycrates and Aristomenes, he was self-foes found guilty, and condemned, not only by the Kings Council, but also, by all the Ambassadors of foreign Nations, which were there present. For Aristomenes, intending to accuse him, had purposely brought thither, not only sundry other Noble personages of the Greeks, but even the very Etolian Ambassadors themselves, who were at that time sent thither to entreat a peace, between the King and them: among whom was one Dorymachus, the son of Nicostratus. Upon the hearing therefore, Scopas with his consorts, were all cast in prison: and the night following, Aristomenes caused both him, and all that were of his kindred, to be poisoned: but as for Dicaearchus, which was a most impious wretch, he caused him to be racked to death. For this was that Dicaearchus, who when he was Admiral of Philippus his Navy, in harassing the Cycladian Isles, erected two altars in a certain Port there; the one to Impiety, the other to Iniquity, and sacrificed to them both as unto two gods. For the rest of the Etolians, as many of them as had a mind to return, the King gave them free leave to be gone, and to take with them, whatever theirs was, [Ibid. pag. 772.]

When this business of the Etolians was settled, and all quiet, then the whole Court fell to their solemn Revels, which they used to have when any one is first saluted King, which they call, Anacaterion: not that the King was then ripe for Government; but because they thought, that if it were once blown abroad that the King was come

now to rule in his own person, things would go better, and grow more quiet in the kingdom than erst they had done; and therefore made all provision they could to perform this solemnity for the honour of the kingdom, [Id. pag. 773.]

While that debate held at Lyfymachia, between Antiochus and the Commissioners from Rome, there grew a report, called, as it seemeth, from what had betided Scopas at Alexandria, but without any certain author, that Ptolemei was dead: and so that conference came to no issue; for neither party would be known to have had any tidings of it: and L. Cornelius, whose proper errand was to treat with both the Kings, desired some time to have speech with Ptolemei: his drift being to come at all hands into Egypt, before any thing could there be resolved on, for the new settling of things there, after the kings supposed death. And Antiochus made no doubt, but that if the king were indeed dead, Egypt would be his: wherefore, having sent away the Commissioners, and leaving his son Seleucus with his land Forces, to go on with the new building of Lyfymachia, he with his whole Fleet sailed to Ephesus, and from thence dispatching away Ambassadors to Flaminius to desire him to persist in the league and amity made between them, took shipping again, and, keeping along by the coast of Asia, came into Lycia, and at Patara, understood for certain, that Ptolemei was living: and thereupon gave off his journey intended for Egypt, [Liv. lib. 33. Appia, in Syria, pag. 88.]

Antiochus, halting away toward Cyprus, which he hoped certainly to get, when he had doubled the Cape of the Chelidonian Foreland, upon a mutiny raised among his Mariners, was fain to stay a while in Pamphylia, at the mouth of the River Eurymedon: and from thence failing to a place called the Heads of the river Sarus, a foul tempest beset him, which was like to have drowned him and all his Fleet: many of his ships were driven on shoar, many swallowed up in the sea, so that no foul escaped of them. A multitude of men perished in that tempest, not only of the Mariners, and common souldiers, but also of his Nobles, and Principal men belonging to him: yet having saved what could be gotten out of the wreck, seeing he was in no case to go on for Cyprus, he failed to Seleucia in Syria, and there fell to rig up his Navy again; and prepared for the marriages of his children, Antiochus and Laodice, whom he had joyned in Matrimony: and then, putting to sea again, because now the Winter grew on, he failed to Antioch, [Id. ibid.]

The Decemviri, or ten Commissioners, returning to Rome, informed the Senate there concerning Antiochus, and his return into Syria, [Liv. 33.] Hannibal enemies at Carthage, informed the Senate of Rome, that he sent messagers, and letters to Antiochus, and daily received the like from him again: which, though false, yet was taken for true, by those who ever lived in fear of him. Whereupon they sent Ambassadors to the Council at Carthage, complaining to them, that Hannibal held correspondence with Antiochus, and advising them by one means or another, to rid him out of the way, [Id. lib. Justin, lib. 31. cap. 122.]

Flaminius his answer to Antiochus his Ambassadors, when they moved for a league, was, That he could do nothing now the ten Commissioners were gone; and that they should do well to go after them, and make their addresses to the Senate at Rome, [Liv. lib. 34.]

Hannibal hereupon, stealing away from Carthage, came safe to Tyrrus, and was there received by the founders of Carthage, as in a second country of his own; and having rested himself there a few days, failed to Antioch: but finding that Antiochus was removed from thence, he there spake with his son, who was celebrating a solemn Festival in Daphne: and having been courteously entertained and caressed a while by him, took ship again, and followed Antiochus, and overtook him at Ephesus, beating his brains, whether he should or should not, engage himself in a war against the Romans. But Hannibal coming to him, set him a gog, and now on he would: nor thought he now so much of the war it self, as of what great matters he should acquire, by conquering the Romans, [Liv. in the end of his 33 book, Justin, lib. 31. cap. 1, 2, and Emil. Prob. in Hannib.]

And here it was, that when one Phormio, a Philosopher of the Peripatetic sect, had disputed a long time in his school, concerning the duty and office of a Commander, or General of an army, and of the Art Military, and ordering of a battle, and all very wisely in his presence: Hannibal could not hold, but cried out, and said, That he had heard many a doting fool in his days, but a verier dotard than this Phormio was, he never heard, [Cicer. de Oratore, lib. 2.]

T. Quinctius Flaminius, joyning with Eumenes and the Rhodians, fought very successfully against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, [Liv. lib. 34.]

When M. Porcius (Cato) was Consul, the City of Smyrna began, and built a Temple to the City of Rome, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 4.] and by their example, the Alabandenses, not only built another Temple to her, but also instituted certain anniversary anniversary plaies and games, in honour of her, as of a proper Goddesse. [Livie. lib. 43.]

3810.		Eratosthenes of Cyrene, the son of Aglaus, whom a man may well call, not onely a Grammarian, though that were his chief profession, but also a Poet, and a Philosopher, and a Geometrician, for he excelled in all alike, this year died. [Lucia, in Asiacrobus ,] after whom, in the keeping of the library at Alexandria, succeeded Apollonius Alexandrinus, a scholar of Callimachus, and he which wrote the Argonautica, who becaue he lived many years at Rhodes, was therefore furrnamed Rhodius, [Stridas in Apollonius.]	4520.	194.
		Antiochus perceiving the great affection which the Jews bare unto him, conferred great favours on them again, and by his letters highly commended them therefore. [Eusebi. Chron.] These letters of his are extant in Josephus, [lib. 14. Antiq. cap. 3.] in one of which, written to Ptolemaus his Governour there, are mentioned many donations of his, and immunities granted both to the City, and also the Temple at Jerusalem, and in another to Zeuxis; he commanded two thousand of the families of the Jews, which lived in the provinces of Babylonia, and Mesopotamia, to be transplanted into the parts of Phrygia and Lydia, to keep them in order there, who were otherwise disposed to innovation.
3811.		Antiochus, preparing now to make a war in Greece, and there to begin his war against the Romans, imparted his purpose unto Hannibal; who told him, there was no conquering of the Romans, but in Italy it self: and to effect this, he desired onely to have 100 of his fighting ships, with 10 thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, to be put into his hand: that with his fleet he would first saile into Afric, that he doubted not, but to stir up the Carthaginians themselves, to a fresh rebellion against them; but if that failed, yet he would land them in some part or other of Italy, and there begin the war a new against them. And when he had perswaded the King to hearken to this motion, he went not presently in person into Afric, (as Emil. Probus, in the life of Hannibal imagineth) but having lighted upon one Aristo, a Tyrian born, at Ephesus, sent him in fallow of a marchant to trade at Carthage, and there to prepare their minds, for a revolt from the Romans. Upon this Aristo Hannibals enemies at Carthage laid hold; and whiles they spent many dayes in consultation what to do with him, and whether to lead him to Rome, in justification of their own innocency, he got a shipboard, and came back to Hannibal again. Whereupon they presently dispatch away Ambassadors to the Consuls and Senate at Rome, to let them know what had passed. [Livie, lib. 34. Justin, lib. 32. cap. 3, 4. Appia, in Syriac, page 89, 90.]	4511.	193.
		Mean while Antiochus sent Lysias, Hegesibastres and Menippus his Ambassadors to Rome, to feel the pulse of the Senate there, for though their pretence was to sollicite for a league and friendship between him and them: yet were they willed to intimate to the Senate, that the King wondered, why they should bid him to get him out of the Cities of Eolia, and Ionia, and to relate his tributes due unto him from other places, and not to meddle with matters in Asia, and Countries of his ancient inheritance in Thracia; for that these were not commands to be laid upon friends of theirs, as he was, but enemies, when they were conquered. But they were told, that they should go and attend Flaminius, and the ten Commissioners formerly sent into Greece, for an answer; And when they came, the Commissioners pressed, that Antiochus should either forbear Europe, or suffer the Romans, to maintain what they had already in Asia, and acquire more there if they could. But the Ambassadors told them plainly again, that they neither could nor would make any bargaines, whereby the Kings rights and dominions might any wayes be impaired, to that matter brake off, and the Ambassadors sent away, [Livie, lib. 34. Appia, in Syriac, page 89.]
		Scantly were the Ambassadors gone, when news came from Carthage, that Antiochus was busie in his preparations for a war against the Romans, and that Hannibal was designed for his General therein: which put them into a fear withall, lest a fresh war should be raised again from Carthage, [Livie, lib. 34.]
3812.		Antiochus, having given his daughter in marriage to Ptolemei at Rhapia, in Phoenicia, or rather in Palestine, returned to Antioch, [Livie, lib. 35.] for, being now resolved to make war against the Romans, he thought fit to legue himself by marriages and affinities, with as many Kings and Princes thereabouts, as possibly he could; and therefore he sent his daughter Cleopatra, furrnamed Syria, into Egypt to Ptolemei: giving him, for a dowrie with her, all Cœlœsytia, which he had formerly wrest from him, thereby to pacify the young man, and to keep him from joyning with the Romans in this war, [Appia, in Syriac, page 88.] Jerom upon Daniel, [cap. 11.] saith, that Antiochus, purposing to get Egypt it self into his dominion, espoused his daughter Cleopatra, in the seventh year of the young mans reign, by one Eucles of Rhodes, and that in the 13 year of the same, according to Eusebius Chronicle, which he follows, or according to our

	our computation, in the 12 thereof, sent her to him; and gave him for a Dowry all Cœlœsytia and Judea, and yet could not get Egypt neither; because Ptolemei and his Council perceived his drift, and stood the more cautiously on their guard, and Cleopatra her self the Queen, stood more affected to her husbands party, than to her fathers. And Josephus, [12 Antiq. cap. 3.] writeth that Antiochus, giving his daughter Cleopatra to wife unto Ptolemei, gave him also for her Dowry Cœlœsytia, all Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria to boot; and that equally dividing the tribute due out of them all, between them, the chief men in every of the said countries gathered it forth, and paid it in unto them.
	Another daughter of his, called Antiochis, he proffered in marriage unto Ariaratthes, the King of Cappadocia, and sent her to him: and a third unto Eumenes, the King of Pergamus. But Eumenes, seeing him set upon a war against the Romans, and that he was the cause of seeking his assistance, related the offer. And when his two brothers, Attalus and Philoteles, wondered that he should refuse such an offer made him by to great a neighbouring King as Antiochus was, he told them what, and how great a war was now at hand: wherein, said he, if the Romans get the better, as he verily believed they would, he was then ture to hold his own by them: or if Antiochus happened to overcome them, then his fortune would be, either to be turned out of all by an over-powerful neighbouring Prince, or be but forced to live under him: concerning which we may see Eumenes his own Oration, [in Polyb. Legat. 25. and Livie. lib. 37.]
	Antiochus, having passed the Taurus, marched thorough Cilicia, and in the very end of Winter came to Ephesus. [Livie, lib. 35.]
	And from thence, in the first of the Spring, sending back his son Antiochus into Syria, to look to matters there, and in the remote parts of his Dominions Eastward, whiles he was busied in the West, he with all his land Forces, went to invade the Pilsdians, which inhabit about the parts of Selgia, [Livie, lib. 35.]
	At that time there came to Elæa, Ambassadors sent from Rome to Antiochus, who, under colour of an Embassie, were to pierce out, and inform themselves, of what preparations he had made, and by often conversing with Hannibal, might either abate his rancor toward them, or if not that, yet by their familiarity with him, might perhaps make Antiochus jealous of him: these Ambassadors were, P. Sulpitius, and P. Villius, who among others, had met with Antiochus at Lyfimachia, [Livie, lib. 34. and 35. Justin, lib. 32. cap. 4. Fronti. Strateg. lib. 1. cap. 8. Appia, in Syriac, page 90, 91.]
	The Ambassadors went up from Elæa to Pergamus, where Eumenes his Palace was; because their instructions were, first to confer with Eumenes, before they went to Antiochus: and Eumenes did what possibly he could, by advice or persuasion, to stir them up to a war against Antiochus: Sulpitius staid behind at Pergamus sick; but P. Villius, hearing that Antiochus was busie in war against Pilsidia, went to Ephesus; and during those few dayes of abode which he there made, was careful to converse with Hannibal as frequently as he might, both to found what was in him, and withal to mitigate his rancor toward the Romans, by assuring him, that they intended him no further harme, [Livie, lib. 35.]
	Claudius Quadrigarius, following herein the Greek History of Acilius, saith, that P. Scipio Africanus was in this Embassie, and that he it was that had such speech with Hannibal at Ephesus: mentioning one discourse of theirs in particular, which was, That when Africanus asked him, whom he thought to have been the greatest Captain in the World? Hannibal answered him, Alexander the Great: and whom the second? he answered Pyrrhus; and whom the third? My self, said Hannibal: at which word, Scipio burst out into a great laughter, and said, what would you have done, if you had overcome me? I would then saith Hannibal, have counted my self before Pyrrhus and Alexander both, and all others that ever were: and that this perplexed and intricate answer of his, was but a trick of a Punick wit, and that Scipio was taken therewith, as with a pretty kind of flattery; as if both himself had been thereby made a non-parcell above all, and withal, that he had vanquished and overcome, a better man than Alexander, [Livie, lib. 35.]
	Villius went forward from Ephesus to Apamea, and there Antiochus hearing of the coming of the Roman Ambassadors, met them: where they fell upon the same points almost, which were treated of, between Flaminius and the other Commissioners on the one side, and his Ambassadors on the other at Rome. But the news which came of the death of his son Antiochus, who was but lately before sent into Syria, put off that parlee: and Villius, that he might not be seen there up and down in an unreasonable time, and when the King and Court were all in mourning, retired to Pergamus; the King also giving off all preparations for the war which he had begun, went to Ephesus, [Livie, lib. 35.]

And now the Roman Embassadors being sent for to come to Ephesus, had their conference with Minio, a principal Counsellor and Favourite of the Kings; Minio in his discourse blamed the Romans, that under a pretence of setting Greece at liberty, they intended an open war against Antiochus, whereas themselves held for many Nations and famous Countries in their subjection, and made them tributary to Rome, which formerly lived free, and according to their own laws: and when Salpitrus, (for he was now recovered of his sickness) answered for the Romans, and called the Ambassadors of other States there present to witness (as they had been before prompted, and lessened by Eumenes) on the Romans behalf, things between them, fell from a conference to a plain brawle, [Id. ibid.]

Antiochus, having heard the Embassie of the Rhodians, told them all, that as well they, as they of Byzantium and Cyzicum, and other Grecians dwelling in Asia, if he and the Romans came to an agreement, and joyned in a league together, should be free; but as for the Eolians and Ionians, it should not be so with them; for that they had ever lived under the subjection of the Kings of Asia: therefore the Roman Ambassadors, when they could get no reason from the King (for indeed that was the least part of the errand they came in, but only to be as to many spies of his actions) returned to Rome, [Appia, in Syriac, pag. 92.]

After this, came the Eolian Ambassadors to the King, who offered to make him Commander of all the Forces which they could make, and persuaded him by all means to put over into Greece, which said they, is ready to receive you; and not to stay till his armies came down to him out of the remote and inner parts of Asia: which put Antiochus upon such a pin, that he resolved themselves to be going into Greece, [Id. ibid. pag. 92, 93. with Polyb. lib. 3. pag. 159. and Justin, lib. 30. cap. 4. & lib. 32. cap. 1.]

But before he took shipping, he went up to Ilium, and there sacrificed to Minerva; and then returning to his Fleet, he set forward with 40 sail of fighting ships, and 60 open boats, and 200 ships of burden, full freighted with all kind of provisions, followed in the rear of them. His whole army consisted of 10 thousand Foot, and 500 Horse, with six Elephants, scanty enough to have possessed Greece, if none had been there, to have held up a Buckler against him, much fitter to endure the brunt and burden of a war against the Roman Nation, [Id. ibid. lib. 35.]

Eumenes presently sent his brother Attalus away to Rome, to let them know that Antiochus had put over the Hellespont with his army: and that the Eolians were ready to rise in arms, immediately upon his landing; Thanks were given by the Senate, both to Eumenes then absent, and also to Attalus there present; and he had lodgings provided for him at the publick charge, and presents sent unto him, [Id. ibid.]

About the middle of Winter, Antiochus, falling into consultation at Demetrius, how to carry on the war; Hannibal gave right good and sound advice, if it had been followed; as it was not save only in this, that Polyxenidas was sent to bring away the rest of the fleet and army out of Asia, [Id. lib. 36. Justin, lib. 31. cap. 5. & Appia, pag. 93, 94.]

Antiochus, falling in love with a young Dame of Chalcis, the daughter of Cleopetrus, where he hosted, being himself upward of fifty, laid aside all care of the war, which he had then in hand; and set his mind wholly upon wedding the wench; and called her by the name of Eubrea: and spent all the Winter after, in banqueting and revels; and as he did, so did all his army likewise, and spent all that season, in luxury and pleasures, [Polyb. lib. 20. in Athenæus, lib. 10. cap. 12. Diodor. Sic. and Dio. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 296. and 609. Liv. lib. 36. Appia, pag. 96, 98.]

M. Acilius Glabrio, being Consul, upon the 5 day before the Nones, (i.e.) upon the third day of May (which that year, as we may gather out of the Eclipse which was in the year following, fell upon our January) went in his rich coat-armour, out of Rome against Antiochus, [Id. lib. 36.]

About the same time, came Ambassadors to Rome from two Kings, Philippus of Macedonia, and Ptolemei of Egypt: both offering their aid against Antiochus, with money and corn: and from Ptolemei were brought in ready money, a thousand pounds in gold, and 20 thousand pounds in silver: but nothing was received, thanks only was given them, for their good will. And when both of them offered to come in person with their armies into Eolia: the Senate answered, That they would not trouble Ptolemei; as for Philippus, that the Senate and people of Rome, would take it kindly at his hands, if he would assist M. Acilius their Consul, in what he might, [Id. ibid.]

Antiochus, having had the word of it at Thermopyla, in a battle against M. Acilius the Consul, and Cato a Colonel in that army (which battle is described by Livie, lib. 36, by Plutarch, in Cato, Major, by Appia, in Syriac, and Fron, lib. 2, Stratag.) and forced to flee back into Asia, came to Ephesus, with his new wife, [Liv. Justin, Appia, and Polyb. in Athenæus lib. 10. cap. 12.] In Tullies book De Senect. Cato is brought in, speaking of himself, and saying, That he fought at Thermopyla, under M. Acilius Glabrio, in the fourth year after himself had been Consul; and both Plutarch in his Life, and Livie [lib. 36.] affirm, that he was sent by the Consul Acilius to Rome, with the news of that victory. Now what Antisthenes the Historian reports to have followed, and been acted by Daplagus the Syrian, and Publius a Roman Captain, after this fight at Thermopyla; is to be learned out of Phlegon of Tralles, in his book De Mirabilibus, [cap. 3.]

Antiochus, being at Ephesus, lay there careless and void of all fear from the Romans, as one supposing that sure they would never offer to put over into Asia. But when Hannibal had routed him up from that vain and idle imagination, he presently sent for his forces out of the in-land Countries, to come down in all haste to the sea side, and rig'd up his navy, making Polyxenidas, a bandito of Rhodes, his Ammiral thereof, and presently put over again into Cheroneus, and fortified that; putting Garrisons into Seltus and Abydus, where he supposed the Romans would endeavour to pass over into Asia, [Liv. lib. 36. & Appia, pag. 99.]

C. Livius Salinator, who was sent to succeed Attalus in the charge of the navy, and Eumenes, sailing into Asia, met with Polyxenidas Antiochus's Ammiral by the way, and put him to flight, sunk ten of his ships, took 30 more, and lost but one of theirs; and that was of Carthage too: but they pursued Polyxenidas as far as Ephesus: and then sent back the Rhodian fleet, consisting of 25 ships, and which came after the fight was done, and Eumenes like with his ships, and came to Canas, a Town of Lycia, and there, because the winter came on, drew their ships on land; and fortified the place where they lay, with works for their defense, [Liv. lib. 36, Appia, pag. 99, 100.]

When this battle at sea was fought at Coricus, (for there it was fought) Antiochus was gone to Magnesia, near the mountain of Sipylus, to gather his land forces together: and there hearing of his overthrow at sea, let himself to prepare a new navy, that he might not seem to be beaten out of the sea: and therefore he dispatched away Hannibal into Syria, there to get ships from the Phoenicians, and commanded Polyxenidas with all speed to rig up his ships that were bruised in the fight, and to build new ones, to make up his fleet again, and himself the mean while took up his winter quarter, in the parts of Phrygia, and sent for aides from all parts, even out of Gallogracia it self, [Liv. lib. 36. & 37. Appia, pag. 100.] for what with fear, what with money, he had drawn them also to joyn in arms with him, and the rather for that he thought the greatness of their stature and courage, would be a terror to the Romans, [Appia, pag. 89.]

Ambassadors now came to Rome, from Ptolemei and Cleopatra, to congratulate them for their expulsion of Antiochus out of Europe; and persuading them to pass into Asia: for said they, the fear of the Roman name is already fallen, not only upon all Asia, but even upon Syria also; and shewing, that they were ready to do, what ever the Romans would command them. Thanks were returned to the King and Queen for their good wills, and presents to the Ambassadors, to every of them four thousand pieces of brasse money, [Liv. lib. 37.]

Antiochus left his son Seleucus with the army in Eolia, to keep the sea coast all along in order, for the Romans on the one side and Eumenes on the other were tampering with them every where, and Seleucus spent all that winter, partly in lousouring his friends, partly in plundering those, whom he could not draw to his bent, [Id. ibid.]

About the depth of winter, Eumenes, with a company of two thousand Foot, and 100 Horse, came to Canas, where the Roman fleet wintered: there he told them, that if they would, they might get a great spoil out of the Country lying about Thyatira, and never left till he had persuaded Livius the Ammiral, to let him have five thousand men; with which he went, and in a short time brought them back again laden with an excessive great booty, [Id. ibid.]

In this interim, a sedition was raised in Phocæa, for there were some which fought to draw the common people to side it with Antiochus, for that the wintering of the Roman navy there, lay very heavy upon them; in regard they were charged to furnish them with 500 sea gowns and as many coats; corn also grew very scant among them, inasmuch, that both the ships and Garrison were faine to remove from thence, and quarter elsewhere. Then was the faction, which stood for Antiochus, quit of that fear: but the Aldermen, and chief of the City stood firm for the Romans; as the chief of the faction for Antiochus, were more prevalent with the commons, [Id. ibid.]

The magistrates therefore of Phocæa, fearing the inclination of the multitude, wildly sent their Agents to Seleucus, to pray him not to approach near their City, for that they were resolved to sit still, and to see what the issue of that whole war would be. But he being informed that the multitude was wholly for his father; and that they were in want of commands to them no answer, but marched straight toward them with his army, [Polyb. Legat. 18.]

At Rome, when both the new Consuls, Lu. Scipio, and Ca. Lælius Nepos, were ambitious, to go into Greece, P. Scipio, in the behalf of his brother Lælius, said, That if their pleasure were to send his brother thither, he himself would go as his Lieutenant, with him, That word of his carried it, for who so fit, laid they to go against Hannibal, as Africanus, who had already vanquished him? [Cic. Philip. 11. Liv. lib. 37. Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 5. Justin lib. 31. cap. 7.]

In those days, when Lu. Scipio was upon his way against Antiochus, and whilst the anniversary games, in honour of Apollo, were celebrating, upon the fifth of the Ides, (i. e.) upon the ninth day of June, in a very clear day, it grew suddenly dark, by the coming of the body of the Moon under the sun, [Liv. lib. 37.] And verily, that not long after, to wit, upon the 14 of March, after the Julian Calendar, there fell a horrible eclipse of the sun at Rome, appears by the Astronomical account: to which if 95, Idus Quintiles, (i. e.) the ninth of our July did then answer, it will then follow, that the Calends, or first of January, the year following, must needs fall in with the 29 day of our August, so great a confusion was there of the Roman Calendar, in those days.

About the vernal equinox, Paulistatus with 36 ships of Rhodians, Livius with 30 of the Romans, and Eumenes with seven of his own, went to Hellepont; Livius first flood in, for the port which was called, Portus Achaorum, and from thence went up to lium, and having there sacrificed to Minerva, and then gave a favourable audience to the Ambassadors, of certain neighbouring Cities, as Eleus, Dardanus and Rhetæus, all which came and voluntarily rendered themselves unto him; and then again leaving 10 ships in the road, over against Abydus, went with the rest to the other side, and there besieged Scythos, and having taken that in upon surrender, he provided himself to return to Asia side, there to besiege Abydus, [Liv. lib. 37. Appian. pag. 101.]

Whiles these things thus passed at Hellepont, Polyxenidas, the Ammiral of King Antiochus, bare Paulistatus the Ammiral of Rhods in hand, that he would betray all, or the greatest part of, Antiochus his fleet into his hand, and he, giving too easy credence to the others words, thereupon went to Samos, where, not keeping to due a watch as he should have done, he lost his life, and with it 29 saile of ships, which he had under his command; for there escaped of all that fleet of his, five onely ships of Rhodes, and twout the Isle of Coos, [Id. lib.]

At the same time also Seleucus recovered Phocæa, having a gate of the City set open to him, by which he got in with his army. While these things were acting in Eolia, Abydus, having endured the siege some few days by the valour of the Kings Garrison that kept it, at length all grew weary of the business, and the chief magistrates of the City, with the good leave of the Captain of the Garrison, sent to Livius to treat of conditions for the surrender of the place unto him. But when in that very nick of time news came of the loss of the Rhodian navy, Livius would no longer stay to take in Abydus, and to keep Hellepont, but presently with all his fleet, set sail for Phocæa; but finding that to be held by a strong Garrison of the Kings, and that Seleucus was not far off with his army, he fell a waisting the sea coast, and having taken what spoile he could light upon thereabouts, especially of men, and staying onely till Eumenes could overtake him with his fleet, he purposed to go for Samos; and thither at last, forely weather-beaten, he came, and there joyined his fleet with the Rhodians, consisting now of twenty saile, under the command of Eudæmus their Ammiral, [Livius.]

Livius, having increased his fleet by this accession of the Rhodians, sailed forthwith to Ephesus, and there ranged his ships in order of battle before the very mouth of the port. But when one day at anchor in the very haven of the enemy, and the other landed their men; and when they had ranged there far and near, and gotten an exceeding great spoil; and were returning with it to their ships, Andronicus a Macedon, (Appians calls him Nicander) Captain of the Garrison in Ephesus, sallied out upon them, and forced them to their ships, leaving a great part of their booty behind them, and returned forthwith to Samos, and thither came also L. Emilius Regillus the Prætor, who was sent to succed Livius in the charge of the navy; and as he was coming thither from the Isle of Chios, Livius sent two fair ships of Rhodes, of four tire of oares a piece, and and Eumenes himself in person, with two more of five tire of oares a piece, came to meet him, [Id. and Appian. pag. 102.]

Having late at Samos a while in Council, concerning the ordering of busines at sea, Emilius, to terrifie the enemy at his first coming, went with all his fleet to the very mouth of the port of Ephesus, and Livius went to Patara in Lycia, Emilius was driven off from Ephesus, by a storm that rose upon him; and so, nothing done, returned to Samos. The Cities which Livius passed by, Miletus, Myndus, Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and Cos, shewed themselves most ready to receive all his commands: but coming into Lycia, he was ill welcomed there, both by a tempest at sea, and by the enemy at land, and therefore returned into Greece again, that having there spoken first with the two Scipios, who were then at that time in the parts of Thedaly, he might then take his journey into Italy, [Liv.]

At Samos there came letters to Emilius the Prætor, and Eumenes, from the Scipios, by which they understood, both of the Truce that was taken with the Eriolians, and of their own marching by land towards Hellepont, and the Eriolians signified as much to Antiochus, and to his son Seleucus, [Polyb. Legat. 19.]

Eumenes, sent his Agents into Achaia to make an allocation with them; which the commons in a general assembly ratified; and sent him a company of tall young men to assist him, [Id. Legat. 20.]

L. Emilius, with all his fleet, passing by Miletus, and the other Cities of that coast, landed in the Bay of Bargillia, and went to Iassus, that City was held by a Garrison of Antiochus his men, and then, sending to the Magistrates and other chief men of the place, to persuade them; and being answered, that they would do nothing; he drew up to the walls, to besiege it: but the banditoes of Iassos, which were among the Rhodians, prevailed so far with them, and the rather by Eumenes his mediation, that they drew off, and left the siege, [Liv.]

Those of Heracleia in Pontus, sent Ambassadors to Emilius, and from him received a very kind and favourable answer in writing, purporting, that the Senate of Rome would be their good friend; and that neither their counsel nor care should be wanting, when ever they should have occasion to use them. [Memnon Excerpt. cap. 28.]

Whiles Eumenes was away, busie in making war with the Romans and Rhodians, against the sea Towns of Lycia, Seleucus with his army, brake in upon his lands at home; and first came in hostile manner to Elæa; and, being able to do no good upon the City, wasted all the Country about it: and from thence marched with all his power to Pergamus it self, the Capital City of this kingdom. Antalus, Eumenes his brother, drew out, and pitched his Camp before the City walls, and often skirmished with the enemy; but finding himself too weak that way, drew in again, and kept himself close within the walls; and so the siege began, [Idem.]

About the same time, Antiochus himself going from Apamea, encamped first at Sardes, and then not far off from his son Seleucus, near the head of the River Cæstus, drawing with him a huge army, made up of fundry nations. In which the greatest fear was of a squadron of Gallogrecians, consisting of 4000 souldiers, and these, with some few others with them, he sent to ravage and waste all the Country about Pergamus, from one end to t'other, [Idem.]

Which when Eumenes at Samos heard of, being called away to look to his affairs at home, he took ship, and with all his men came to Elæa, and from thence coming to Pergamus, before the enemy heard of his arrival, he there failed out often, and made some small skirmishes with the enemy; but within some few days after, both the Roman, and the Rhodian fleet came from Samos to Elæa, to help him, [Idem.]

When Antiochus heard that there were so many fleets come together into the same port, and withall, that the Consul with his army was all ready in Macedonia, and provision making at Hellepont for his transportation into Asia, he thought fit to try for a peace with the Romans, Eumenes, and the Rhodians all at once; wherefore he removed his Camp, and came to Elæa, and there, having taken a little hill over against the City, he there left all his foot, and with his horse (which were upward of six thousand) went down into a plain field close to the walls of the City, and then sent some Commissioners into it, to treat of a peace; whereupon L. Emilius sent for Eumenes from Pergamus to come thither to him; and advised with him, as also with Eudæmus and Pamphilidas the Commanders of the Rhodian fleet, what was best to be done. And the Rhodians were not against a peace, but Eumenes said, that it was not for their honour to treat of a peace; and however they could not put an end to it at that time; and to that purpose Emilius sent Antiochus word, to wit, that before the coming of the Consul, there could no peace be made; upon which answer he presently fell a waisting of the Country try all about Eliza: and then, leaving Seleucus to continue the siege before Pergamus, he marched away full of fury with the rest of his army, and never staid, till he came into that rich Country, which was called Thebes campus, (i. e.) the plain of Thebes, and there he made all manner of havock, and thoroughly enriched all his army for the present, [Polyb. Legat. 21. Liv. lib. 37.]

At the same time, Diophanes of Megalopolis, came to Elea, sent from the Acheans to Eumenes, with a supply of 1000 foot, and 100 horse, [Liv. lib. with Polyb. Legat. 20.] all old beaten soldiers, and their Captain, one that was trained up under Philopon, the most renowned Commander of all the Grecians, living in his time, [Liv. lib. Appian. pag. 102. with Polyb. Legat. 20. pag. 810. and in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 110.]

So soon as they were landed, Attalus sent some to shew them the way, and brought them to Pergamus, These Acheans, upon their first arrival, made continual Sallics out upon Seleucus, to draw off, and be gone out of all that Country, [Liv. lib. and Appian. pag. 102. 103.] yet he hovered still about that coast, and annoyed his foe; and was a help to his friend in those parts, [Liv. lib.]

While Antiochus marched in hostile manner to Adramyctum, Emilius and Eumenes came about by sea; to the rescue of it. Whereupon he tofore to set upon the town, but fell a spoiling of the Country about it, and took Perza, a colony of the Myrtenians, so did he Cottos, and Corylenus and Aphrodyas, and Crene, at the first assault, and then returned by Thyatira to Sardes, [Liv.]

The Roman fleet, with the Rhodians and Eumenes went first to Mytilene, and from thence returned to Eliza, whence they came: and from thence sailing to Phocaea, they came to an anchor at Bacchius an Island, joyning hard upon the City of Phocaea, and then spoiling their temples, and monument which they had spared before, came to the City itself: but when a company of three thousand Foot, sent from Antiochus, had gotten in before their coming, they forbear the siege of it, and returned again to the Isle, where they were before, having only first ravaged the Country thereabout, and from thence the Roman fleet returned to Eliza, and Eumenes, and the Rhodians to Samos, [Id.]

About midsummer, the Rhodian fleet, consisting of 32 ships of fourtire oares, and of four others, of three tire, fought with Antiochus his navy, which was brought out of Syria, by Hannibal, wherein were 37 ships, of an extraordinary size, at a place called Sida, a promontory of Pamphylia: in which the Rhodians put Hannibal to flight, but could not follow the chase upon him by reason their mariners were weak and sickly, for the most part; nevertheless, to hinder him from joyning with the old fleet, they sent Charicles with twenty ships to Patara, and the port Megistus, whither also a little after they sent Pamphyliadas, with four ships more, [Id.] and lo Hannibal was blockt up in Pamphylia. [Appian. pag. 104. see Emil. Prob. in Hannibals.]

Antiochus coming to Sardes, sent Ambassadors with letters besides, to Prusias King of Bithynia, surnamed Cyneget, (i. e.) the Hunter: whereby he dealt earnestly with him to joyn with himself against the Romans. This staggered Prusias for the present; but then came other letters to him from the two brothers, Lu. and Pub. Scipio; these put him out of fear of any great harm from the Romans. Especially, when presently after there followed an Embassy sent unto him from Rome, the fore-man whereof was no meaner a person then C. Livius, who was lately the Commander of their fleet, for having once spoken with them, he put on a full resolution for the Roman party, and to break off wholly with Antiochus, [Polyb. Legat. 22. pag. 811, 812. Liv. lib. 37. Appian. pag. 101.]

Antiochus, seeing no further hope of Prusias, presently removed from Sardes to Ephesus, there to take a view of his fleet, which had been long time in providing: for seeing no other way left him to hinder the Romans from passing their land army into Asia, but by making himself absolute master at sea, he resolved to try what he could do that way, and to hazard a fight there. [Polyb. and Livie, lib.]

Wherefore he went forthwith to see whether he could take Notium, which was a Town of the Colophonians, not far from Ephesus, where he then lay, that whilst the Romans came to relieve a confederate town of theirs, by land, he might give his Ammiral Polyxenidas, an opportunity to work some feat at sea. Polyxenidas had at that time under his command 89 or 90 good ships, which Emilius and the Rhodians met with, at a place called Myonetus. Emilius had 58 ships, and the Rodians 22, saith Livie: or as Appianus, 25. In which Polyxenidas was worsted, and having a good wind in pouf, fled speedily back to Ephesus, having lost 42 of his ships (not 29 only, as Appianus hath it) of which 13 came quick into the enemies hand, with all the men in them: of the Romans there were two only bilged, and some few other bruised; but of the Rhodians, Polyxenidas took one, and carried that away with him to Ephesus: That this fight was made in December, (as the year went then at Rome) appeareth by Macrobius, [lib. 1. Saturnaliu.] where he saith, that 11 Calend. January, 88c. upon the 21 of December, was a feast dedicated to their Lares (i. e. their household gods) in which L. Enilius Regillus, Pretor, in the war against Antiochus, vowed a Temple to be built in Campo Martio, which vow, [Liv. lib. 40.] tells us, was by him performed 11 year: after, where is also a Copy, (but most falsely written) of a Table, containing the manner of this victory, hung up by him upon the doors, not only of his new Temple, but also of that of Jupiters, in the Capitol.

Antiochus, troubled at the news of this overthrow, was so ill advised, as to draw off the Garrison which he had put into Lyfimachia, forthwith, for fear, least they should fall into the Romans hands: and withal raising his siege from before Colophos, retired to Sardes, and from thence dispatched away letters to Ariarathes his son in law, in Cappadocia, to bring him aides from thence; and every where else, that he could to get him in men, [Liv.] Mean while he lay idle at Sardes, trifling away the time there, which might have been better spent in giving order for his affairs elsewhere, [Polyb. Legat. 23.]

Emilius, after this victory gotten at sea, sailed straight to Ephesus, and there cast his ships into the form of a battalion, before the very mouth of the Port: and having thereby wrung out of Antiochus an open confession, that he had lost the mastery of the sea, he sailed to Chios, and having there new righted up such ships of his as had been any ways bruised in the fight, he put over from thence to Phocaea, which not long before, was revolted from the Romans: he staid at first, to have taken it by assault; but afterward it was surrendered to him: yet do what he could, he could not have it from the plunder of the soldiers: but the City it self, and their lands, and their laws, he restored entire unto them; and so, because the Winter came on, and that place had two Ports, he chose it for his Navy to winter in, for that year, [Livie.]

About the same time Lyfimachia, which was full fraught and furnished with all manner of provisions, as if it had been to bid the Romans welcom, opened their gates to the two Scipios: and from thence they set forward again, and thorough the Chersonese came to Hellespont, where they found all things ready prepared by Eumenes for their transportation. So they passed over, as into a friends Country, some here, some there, no man appearing to hinder their landing, and without any trouble at all, [Id.]

Antiochus at his wits end, and not knowing what to do, yet sent Heraclides of Byzantium to treat with the Romans about a peace, with instructions both general to the Council of War there, and in particular to P. Scipio Africanus; But when answer was made him by the Council, that he must presently defray all the charge of the war thitherto, and give up all Asia on this side Taurus into the power of the Romans, he imagining there could no worse befall him, in case he should happen to be quite overthrown, cast away any further thoughts of peace, and prepared all things necessary to try his fortune in a field, [Polyb. Legat. 23. Diodor. Sic. Legat. 6. 7. published by Fulvii Ursinus. Liv. lib. 37. cap. 7. Appian. pag. 105.]

L. Scipio the Consul, removing from his standing, came to Hellespont, at Dardanus and Rhetaus, where all the people of both places came out of their gates with joy, to welcome them: from thence he himself went up into the City and Castles, and sacrificed which lay under the walls there, and the City of that place. Then was there great glee, there to Minervas President and Protectrix of that place. Then was there great glee, and mutual congratulations between the men of Ilium and the Romans; whilst they recounted how Eumenes and the Captains that went heretofore with him, were their Country men, and went from thence; and the Romans no whit less proud, that they were defended of them; and were in all respects as glad to shake hands as parents and children used to be, when after long absence they happen to meet together, [Livie and Justin. lib. 31. cap. 8.] where by the way, Demetrius Scepius saith of himself, That he being then but a boy, happened to come into Ilium at that time, as a traveller, and that he there saw their houses lie so natty, that they had not so much as roof-tiles to cover them withal, [Sirabo. lib. 3. pag. 594.]

Scipio, removing from thence, after six dayes march, came to the head of the River Caicus; where Eumenes came to him with his Forces, and here making provision of food to carry with them for many dayes, their purpose was to have set upon Antiochus, and dispatched the business before Winter came: on upon them, [Id.]

P. Scipio Africanus, falling sick there, was carried to Elan, leaving for his Substitute in his Lieutenant-ships, Cn. Domitius. But Antiochus making his rendezvous in a champion near unto Thyatira, not far from the enemy, sent home young P. Scipio, whom he had casually intercepted, to his father, ransom-free: which was not only an ease to his troubled mind, but even part of a cure to his diseased body, [See Polib. Legat.]

Legat. 23. Liv. lib. 37. Justin. lib. 31. cap. 7. Appia pag. 105, 106. Aurel. Vill. de Vir. Illust. pag. 609.]

The Senate, and people of Heraclea in Pontus, sent an Embassy to the Scipios, desiring that they would ratify and confirm that league, which Emilius had formerly made with them; which was granted. They also prayed that Antiochus might be taken into the favour and friendship of the people of Rome; and drawing up a general decree of the people at Heraclea, sent it to Antiochus, advising him thereby to give up all further thoughts of war against the Romans, [Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 28.]

Florus, [Hist. Roman. lib. 2. cap. 8.] tells us, That Antiochus fortified his army with Elephants of a huge bigness, all clad and glittering with gold, and silver, and Scarlet, and ivory of their own kind. And in [1 Machab. cap. 8. v. 6.] we read, that he had 120 Elephants; and indeed, that he had 102 when he fought with Ptolemy, and 150 afterwards, we have shewed before [in An. Mun. 3787. and 3799. out of Polyb.] but we have Livie for our author, That in this fight, he had only 54 Elephants: where he also tells us, That he had there 70 thousand Foot, and upward of 12 thousand Horse; though Appianus tells us of 70 thousand that he had in all. But Florus, most hyperbolically, He had, (saith he) 300 thousand Foot, and as many Horse, and iron Chariots in the field that day. But Appianus affirmeth, that the Romans had only 30 thousand Foot; of which number it self, there were left, two thousand Macedons, Thracians, and others in the Camp for the defence thereof, as Livie saith.

This battle was fought near to Magnesia, seated at the foot of the Hill Sipylus. Hannibal was not in, being lockt up in Pamphylia with his Fleet, which he brought out of Syria: nor P. Scipio Africanus, who at that time lay sick, in the City of Elaea. The day wherein the fight was, was misty; which caused that Antiochus, in so great an army, could not see both wings of his army at once, and the wet thereof marred the strings of the bowes and thongs which they threw their Darts withal. Nevertheless they forced the right wing of the Roman army to run, and flee they did to the Camp: but when Emilius, who was left to keep it, saw them coming, he sent out his men to meet them, and they with their naked swords threatened to kill them there-right, un-til they returned into the fight: Whereupon, they finding themselves thus hemmed in, with their fellows before, and the enemies behind, Emilius also offering himself and two thousand of his men to go with them, faced about: and running desperately into the throng of the enemy, made there a vast slaughter of them, and were the beginning of the victory that ensued; of Antiochus his party, 'tis said, there fell that day, 50 thousand Foot, and 4 thousand Horse, [Liv. Europ.] Livie saies, there were taken of them, 1400. Justin, 11 thousand. Of the Elephants, some few were killed, 15 taken with their masters. Some few of the Romans were wounded; but there were not slain above 300 Foot, and 24 Horse, and of Eumenes his company, 25.

Antiochus, getting away with some few in his company, increased his number as he went, with others who fell in to him, and so with a reasonable shew of an army, came to Sardes, about midnight following; and hearing that his son Seleucus, and sundry of his Nobles were fled from thence to Celene, near which there was a new City built, called Apamea. He before day took horse again, with his wife and daughter, and came thither to him; leaving the keeping of Sardes to Zeno, and the government of the province of Lydia, to Timon. And the next day again, went from thence (leaving some of his Captains there, to gather up such pieces of the wreck as they could light upon) and came into Syria, [Liv. lib. 37. Appia pag. 110. and Zonaras, out of Idem.]

Polyxenidas, Antiochus his Ammiral, hearing of this success at land, left Ephesus, and coming as far as Patara in Lycia, there, for fear of the Rhodian Fleet, which lay not far off at Megiste, went on shoar, and with some few in his company, passed by land into Syria, [Liv. lib. 37.]

After this victory, came Ambassadors huddling in from all parts to Scipio; from Thyatira, and Megesia: first then from Sardes, Tralles, Magnesia upon the Mæanders, and Ephesus, all rendering themselves into his hands: after which, all the Cities of Asia did the like; submitting themselves wholly to his mercy, and sovereignty of the people of Rome, [Id. lib. 37.]

The Consul then went to Sardes, and thither came to him his brother P. Scipio from Elaea, so soon as he was able to travel. About the same time also Mufenus, sent as a Herald from Antiochus, by the mediation of P. Scipio, made suite, and obtained leave for him to send Ambassadors to the Consul, to treat of a total peace. And shortly after, came from him Ambassadors, Zeuxis the Governour of Lydia, and Antipater his brothers son: who having first treated with Eumenes, who by reason of former quarrels between them, they thought would be most averse from a peace with their Master, and finding him more pliable, than either they or their Master thought they should have done, they then made their address to P. Scipio, and by him were brought brought to the presence of the Consul himself; and he at their first calling together a full Council, gave them audience, and upon a hearing, offered the King the same conditions, which he sent him from Hellepont, before the fight at Magnesia. P. Scipio openly professing, that the Romans falshood was, Neither to be quailed, in case they were overcome in a battle, nor to grow insolent upon a victory gotten: the conclusion therefore was, That Antiochus must leave Europe, and part with all Asia, on this side the Taurus; and that for the charges and cost of the war, he must pay 15 thousand talents; of Eubæa, 500 presents, and 2500, when the Senate and people of Rome, had ratified and confirmed the peace then made, and 1000 talents more to be stilled, and paid in twelve years after by equal portions, besides 400 talents to Eumenes for his damages, and the surplusage of corn which was owing to his father: also that he must give up into the Consul's hand, Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Etolian, and some others, who had been the first incendiaries of this war: and lastly, 20 hostages for performance of these conditions. And when Antipater and Zeuxis, had accepted of these conditions; it was agreed on all hands, to send away presently Ambassadors to Rome for a confirmation of all, and so they brake up, [Polyb. Legat. 24. Diod. Sic. Legat. 9. Liv. lib. 37. Justin. lib. 31. cap. 8. Appia, pag. 111, 112.]

After this, the Consul brake up his army, and sent them away to their winter quarters, to Magnesia, and to Tralles, and Ephesus. [Polyb. & Liv. lib. 37.]

The Consul himself went to Ephesus, and shortly after thither came to him a part of the 500 talents from Antiochus, which he was ordered to pay down present, and the hostages which he was to give, [Id. lib. 37.] among which, one was Antiochus, the Kings youngest son, as Appia, [pag. 112, 113.] saies, though Zonaras out of Dion tells us, that Manlius Vulso, who succeeded Scipio, was the first that demanded him in particular for a hostage.

M. Aurelius Cotta was sent by the Consul to Rome, with the Kings Ambassadors, to was Eumenes likewise; and with them went the Ambassadors of Rhodes, of Smyrna, and almost of all the Cities and States, on this side the Taurus. [Id. lib. 37.]

Manius Acilius Glabrio, made his entry into Rome, in triumph over Antiochus and the Celians, [Liv. lib. 37.]

Cn. Manlius Vulso, went Consul into Asia, and was appointed to take the army which L. Scipio had, with four thousand Foot more, and 200 Horse out of Rome, and of the Latins eight thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse: and at one and the same time almost, Manlius the Consul landed in Asia, and Q. Fabius Laber, came as Praetor to his charge of the fleet, [Liv. lib. 37.] Now the new Consul arrived at Ephesus, in the beginning of the Spring, and received the army given up to him by L. Scipio; and having taken a view of it, he made an Harangue to them, inciting them thereby to prepare themselves for a war against the Galls, or Gallogracians, [Liv. lib. 37.] But Fabius with the fleet, set sail for Crete, to set at liberty such Romans, and others of the Italian Nations as were there detained in slavery. And returning thence to Ephesus, sent three ships from thence into Thracia, and commanded Antiochus his garrisons to be withdrawn from Enus and Maronea, and then to be restored to their pristine liberty, [Id. lib. 37. in fine.]

About the beginning of Summer it was, that Eumenes with the Ambassadors came to Rome, of which Cotta made a relation, first in the Senate house, and afterward to the people in General, of what had been done in Asia: and then Eumenes being bid to speak, by the Senate, opened to them, both what he had done in their service, and what his suit unto them was; but all very sparingly, and with great moderation: yet the Rhodians opposed him, as well on their own behalf, as for the liberty of the Grecian Cities and States there. But both parties heard, the Senate decreed, That all the Regions, on this side the Taurus, which belonged to Antiochus, should be assigned and given to Eumenes; excepting only Lycia and Caria, as far as to the River of Mæanders, which they ordered should thereupon be allotted to the Rhodians: and the rest of the Cities in Asia, which had been Stipendiary to Antiochus, should hereafter be made tributary likewise to Eumenes; but such as had been tributary to Antiochus, should be free, and pay no tribute at all, [Polyb. Legat. 25. & 36. Diod. Sic. Legat. 10. Liv. lib. 37. & 38. Appia, in Syriac. pag. 116.]

Antipater and Zeuxis, the Ambassadors of Antiochus, having had audience in the Senate, obtained a confirmation of peace for Antiochus upon such conditions as Scipio had given him in Asia, and when a while after, the people also had ratified the same, then was there a solemn league, with sacrifice, made with Antipater, chief of the Embassy for Antiochus in the Capitol, in further confirmation of that agreement, [Polyb. Legat. 25. Liv. lib. 37.] and this league was cut in brass, and solemnly hung up, and dedicated in the Capitol, as other leagues were wont to be, and a Copy thereof sent to Manlius Vulso, the Consul, who succeeded Scipio in Asia. [Appia, pag. 113.]

We read moreover [1 Maccab. 8. 7.] that among other things, in this treaty, it was agreed, That as well Antiochus himself, as his successors, should pay a great tribute to the Romans, and give hostages for security thereof, and a part of his kingdom, as was said before, and whereas, by this agreement, Antiochus was to pay (as I also mentioned before) 12 thousand talents, in 12 years, by equal portions, that is still to be understood of Euboic talents, not of Attic, (as Livie seems to have misunderstood Polybius) yet of the purest Attic silver; every of which was to weigh 80 pounds Roman: and 540 thousand bushels of corn, and 20 hostages, as before; with this, That they should be changed every 3 years. But in the rent which was made of his great kingdom, he had yet left entire unto him, not only Comagena, Syria and Judea, as in Excerpt. Memnon. but also all the upper provinces beyond Euphrates, as Babylonia, Assyria, Susiana, and the rest, and in the lower Asia, Cilicia, though he was forbidden to come with his shipping into the strait of Cilicia, to the westward of the river Calycadnus, and the foreland of Sarpedon, to make any war there. [Polib. Legat. 27, and 35. Liv. lib. 37. and 38. Appia. pag. 112, 113.]

The Senate, having heard the Ambassadors of Smyrna, and other States of Asia, according to the ancient manner, sent ten Commissioners to settle all matters in Asia, and to compose all differences between state and state there. [Polib. Legat. 25. Diodor. Sic. Legat. 10. Liv. lib. 37.]

Now at what time the peace between the Romans and Antiochus was in agitation at Rome, Cn. Manlius in Asia, did what he could to put all into a new combustion and confusion there, and to have gotten Antiochus into his clutches, if he had come in his way: but he perceiving the Consuls drit, though often solicited to come to a parlee with him, kept himself a loof, and would not come in his fight: and the Consul desirous to get him, came with his army to the parting of the waters, upon the top almost of the Taurus. But not able to pick any quarrel against him, or his, he fell upon the Gallogrecians under a pretence, That they had formerly assisted Antiochus in his war, and that they were of such a haggard kind, and so fierce of conditions, that it was to no purpose to have sent Antiochus going beyond the Taurus, unless their backs were broken, as well as his. And because Eumenes was then out of the Country at Rome, therefore he sent for Attalus his brother from Pergamus, to come unto him, being now removed from Ephesus to Magnesia, and upon this summons, Attalus came to him, attended with a thousand Foot, and some 200 Horse, and they both proceeding on to the river Harpalus. Athenus, another brother of Eumenes, and Attalus, came to him, accompanied with Leufus of Crete, and Corragus, a Macedonian born, who between them, brought him a thousand more, of several nations, and 300 Horse. [Livie lib. 38.]

Hither came to him Ambassadors from the state of Alabanda, at whose suit, a certain Castle, which had lately revolted from them, and was again forcibly recovered by them, was restored and confirmed to them. And the Consul, going still right forward, came to Antiochia, upon the Meander, and thither came also Seleucus the son of Antiochus, (as he might lawfully do by the articles with Scipio) to furnish himself with corn for his army, and there the inhabitants of Taba, a City of Cilicia, bordering upon Pisidia, having idly fallen upon the army of the Romans, and paid for their pains 25 talents, and ten thousand bushels of wheat, were by him taken to mercy; and the third day after they came to the back of the river Chaus, and removing from thence, came before the City Eriza, and took it at the first assault. [Liv. lib. 38.]

Moagetes the Tyrant, who had under him three Cities, Cybara, Syleum, and Alynine, al. Alnida, a cruel man, and subtle withal, could hardly be brought to purchase his peace, at the price of 130 talents, and 10 thousand bushels of wheat. [lib. lib. Polib. Legat. 30.]

When the Consul had passed the River Colobatus, Ambassadors came to him from Iliada, praying him to come and help them; for that the men of Termessa, a City in Pisidia, joyning with the inhabitants of Philomelia, had wasted their Country, plundered their City, and now besieged their Castle and all, whither all their Citizens, with their wives and children were fled to save themselves. He taking this occasion by the hair, marched towards Pamphylia, raised the siege from before Iliada, and pardoned them of Termessa, upon the payment of 50 talents of silver; so did he them of Aspendus, and of the other Cities of Pamphilia. [Polib. Legat. 32. Livie ut sup.]

Then, returning from Pamphylia, to his war intended against Gallogrecia, or Galatia; he took the City Cormalia, and therein a great booty, and to left it: and as he proceeded on his way by the fens of that Country, Ambassadors came to him from the City of Lysinoe, and submitted to him: and having received them to mercy, he came into the plain of Salagessa, in Pisidia; out of which he drove away a rich prey of cattle: but when Ambassadors came to him, and presented him with a Crown of of gold of 50 talents weight, with 20 thousand bushels of barley, and as many of wheat, he made peace with them for the time to come, [Polib. Legat. 32. Liv. ut sup.]

And going a gain from thence to the heads of the River Orymya, he encamped at a place called the Aporis-town: and thither came to him the next day Seleucus from Apamea; and the Consul having sent away his souldiers that were sick, or otherwise unserviceable to Apamea, and being furnished with guides, of the way by Seleucus, came that day into a Country called the Metropolitan Country, and the next day to Dynias in Phrygia, and from thence again to Synnada; and by the way found the Cities every where abandoned by the inhabitants for fear of his coming: and his army grew so laden with the spoils which they had taken, that they were unneath able to march above five mile a day, and after that rate, came to Bendoris, the old, and the third day after into the Country of Galatia. [Liv.]

Here he kept a standing Camp for certain days, and in that time sent his Ambassadors Epifognarus, who alone of all the Kings of that Nation, had both kept in still with Eumenes, and would never be brought to lend any aid to Antiochus against the Romans: and Epifognarus thereupon went to the rest of the Kings of that Nation and dealt what he could with them to submit to the Romans, upon fair and reasonable terms. [Id. cum Polib. Legat. 33.] Now there were at that time, three Kings of these Galls, called still by their old names, of Tolitobogians, Tectolagians, and Trochimians; and their names were, Ortiagon, Combolomarus, and Gaultus. [Liv.] Of which three Ortiagon, a man of great repute for his bounty, prudence, and martial Valour, was thought at that time so ambitious of engrossing the whole sovereignty of that Nation into his own hands, [Polib. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 114. and Suidas in Ortiagon.]

Mean while, Ambassadors came to the Consul as he lay encamped in a certain village called Tylcon, from Oroanda, desiring his friendship, which at length they bought at the rate of 200 talents, ready money. [Liv.]

While the Romans lay before a Castle of the Galatians, called Cuballus, the enemies Horse came in fight, and in a tumultuous manner, fell upon some of the Roman army and slew them: but the Consul having put them off, and slain some of them in their flight, came on with his army, without staying any where by the way, to the River Sangarius, or Sagaris, which is a River in Galatia, running thorough Phrygia into the Pontic Sea. [Liv.]

And there, making a bridge, because it was no where fordable, and having passed the River, certain Galli, or Eunuchs, of Cybele the mother of the gods, sent by Attis and Battacus, her Priests, from Pessinunte, met him with their ornaments and other tinkers about them, and prophesying in a fanatic way, told him, That the mother of the gods sent them, to offer the Romans the victory and sovereignty of that Country. And when the Consul had answered, That he accepted of the offer, he presently pitched his Camp in the same place. [Liv. and Polib. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 209.]

The next day he came to Gordium, a Town forsaken by the inhabitants; but left full of all manner of provisions; and while he was there, news was brought him from Epifognarus, that he had spoken with the Kings of the Galls, but could bring them to no reason; and that they with their wives and children, and their chief wealth, were all drawing to the Mount Olympus, purposing there to defend themselves, trusting in their arms, and situation of the place. [Liv. and Polib. Legat. 33.] But they of Oroanda, came shortly after with more particular intelligence, that the Tolitobogians had already taken the Mount of Olympus: That the Tectolagians, had taken another Hill, called Magana; and that the Trochimians, leaving their wives and children with the Tectolagians, were gone to join their Forces with the Tolitobogians. [Livie.]

The Camp of these Galls, that were in the Mount of Olympus, was forced and taken by the Consul and Attalus. Claudius Quadrigarius saith, that they fought twice in the Mount of Olympus, and that there were slain, to the number of 40 thousand men. But Valerius Anrius, who useth commonly to over-raise the number of them, speaketh only of 10 thousand slain; nor is there any doubt, but the number of them, which were taken, made up the full number of 40 thousand, considering they had drawn with them to that place, all sorts of people, young and old, of either sex, more like a Colony to inhabit by themselves, than an army to fight with an enemy. The Consul, having burnt all their arms in one fire, caused all the spoils of them to be brought in to him; and either sold all that was to be sold, or equally divided it in specie among his souldiers. [Liv.]

Yet remained there still an entire war with the Tectolagians: The Consul therefore marching towards them, came to a place called Ancyra, a great City in those parts: from whence, not above 10 miles, the enemy was encamped. There Chio-maris Ortyagons wife, was taken prisoner; and when a certain Centurion had ravished her, her, she found her opportunity, and cut off his head, and sent it to her husband, (who had gotten home from Olympus) for a token; [Liv. Florus, lib. 2, cap. 11. and Victor, De Vir. Illust. cap. 55.] This story is more fully related by Polybius, who saith, that he spake with Chionomaris her self at Sardes: adding, That he wondered at the wisdom of the woman, [Plutarch, De Clav. Mulier.] (i. e.) of famous women.

At Ancyra, while he lay there in Camp, there came to the Consul, certain Ambassadors from the Teutolagians, desiring him to remove his camp further off from thence, before their Kings came to a treatie with him about a peace: but indeed they, under pretence of a parley, laid an ambushment to have surprised a party of the Romans, and being far the more in number, slew many of them, and had done more, had not some, who were abroad a foraging, hearing the cry, come in to their rescue, [Polyb. Legat. 34. Livie, lib. 38.]

The Roman, enraged herewith, the next day marched, and with the whole body of their army, came where they were, and having spent two days, in viewing and considering the situation of the hill, where they lay, upon the third, the Consul drew out his army, divided into three brigades. The main strength of the enemy lay in the Teutolagians, and Trochmians, who made between them, 50 thousand Foot, and the horse-men, because they could make no use of their horses, in that craggy ground, joyned on Foot with the rest, to the number of 10 thousand, and the Cappadocians sent from Ariarathes, and others from Morzes, in the left wing, made four thousand more. But when the battle was joyned, the Gauls went to ground, and after a vast slaughter made of them, the rest fled, and killed every man for himself, where he could; yet in the chace, the Romans slew eight thousand more of them, the rest escaped over the river Halys.

On the morrow, the consul took a view, as well of the prisoners, as of the spoile that was taken; where he might see the men gnawing the chains they were tyed in, with their teeth, and offering themselves to be throated each by other. And the prey so great, as a most greedy and rapacious nation, which had had the spoile of all Asia on this side the Taurus for so many years, could be imagined to have raked together. Afterward the Gauls that escaped, coming together, naked and wounded, and having lost all they had; agreed among themselves, to send, and sue to the Romans for a peace. The Consul willed them to follow him to Ephesus; for (mid-autumn being now past) he was desirous to get him gone out of that cold air, occasioned principally by the vicinity of that snowie mountain Taurus, and to draw near the sea side, and there to quarter his army for that winter, [Liv. ibid. with Appian, in Syriac, pag. 115. & Flor. lib. 7, cap. 11.]

At Rome, the first of February, (which as the year there then went, was the 27 of our Septemb.) L. Emilius Regillus triumphed over Antiochus for the victory which he got of him by sea, [Liv. lib. 37.]

About the time when the ten Commissioners, appointed to go for Asia, in company of those Ambassadors, and others which came out of Asia, set out from Rome upon their journey, and came to Brundisium, L. and P. Scipio happened, coming out of Asia, to land in Italy: and a few days after entered Rome triumphantly. [Polyb. Legat. 25.] L. Scipio rode in triumph over Antiochus, upon the last of February, being then Leap year, about the 16 of our November, almost a year after his Consulship was expired, and that he might not come behind his brother Africanus in any point, was by all men furnished Afriaticus, [Liv. lib. 37.]

C. Manlius Vullo, after the time of his Consulship was out, continued in Asia, as Pro-consul there, a year longer. [Id. ib. lib. 38.]

In the fourth year of the 147 Olympiade, came Ambassadors to Manlius, then Pro-consul, wintering at Ephesus, from all Cities, States and Countries, dwelling thoroughout Asia, on this side the Taurus, to congratulate his victory over the Gauls; and presenting him with Crowns of gold: all which he entertained with so much respect and favour, that he sent them away, more glad and joyfull than they came. There came to him all the Ambassadors of the Gauls, as he had appointed them, to know upon what conditions they might have their peace; to whom he answered, That he would hear them about that matter, when Eumenes came, and not before. Ambassador also came from Ariarathes King of Capadocia, to beg his pardon, and to redeem his offence with money, in that he had assisted Antiochus, his father in law, in his war: He was fined at 600 talents of silver, though Livie and Appian say but 200. Muzens also came to him sent from Antiochus; to whom Manlius answered, That he would give him a meeting upon the borders of Pamphilia, and there receive the 2500 talents, and the wheat, which he was to pay, according to the agreement by him made with L. Scipio, [Polyb. Legat. 35. Liv. lib. 38.]

At the first of the spring, having taken a view of his army, and Attalus along with him, he set out from Ephesus, and upon the eighth day after, came to Apamea; where having layed three days, in three days more, he came with his army into Pamphilia, to the place which he had appointed for his meeting with Antiochus: where he layed 3 dayes, and there distributed among his army the wheats which Antiochus sent in: and the monies, he consigned to one of the Colonels, to be conveyed to Apamea: from thence he went to Perga; which was the onely place in all that Country, which was kept with a Garrison. And when he drew near unto it, the Captain of the Garrison came out to meet him, desiring his patience for 40 dayes, leave one, to advertise Antiochus, and to receive his answer, what to do, agent the surrender of the place unto him: which was granted, and upon the day, the Garrison left the place, [Id. ibid.]

About the same time, which was in the begining of Summer (season, the ten Commissioners with Eumenes arrived at Ephesus; where staying two dayes onely, to settle their stomachs coming off the sea, they left forward and came to Apamea: The Pro-consul hearing of their coming, sent his brother L. Manlius with 4 thousand soldiers to Oroanda, to demand the money, in arreare, of them: and himself, willing the Ambassadors of Antiochus to follow him, returned with his army to Apamea, and finding Eumenes there with the ten Commissioners, fell presently into consultation of what was to be done. First of all therefore it was agreed on all hands, to ratifie and confirm the peace and league formerly made with Antiochus: for observance whereof, according as it was drawn up and prescribed by the Senate (the forme whereof we find punctually delivered by Polybius and Livie.) Manlius the Pro-consul in the presence of the Kings Ambassadors took a solemn oath, there; and that done, he dispatched away presently Q. Minucius Thermus a Colonel, and his own brother, L. Manlius, (who was then by chance returned from Oroanda, with the monies which he was sent for) to take the like oath of Antiochus, and to ratifie all the conditions thereof, [Id. ibid. with Appian, pag. 113.]

The Pro-consul then wrote his letters, to Q. Fabius Labeo, who commanded the Navy to come away forthwith to Patara, and there first fire on all the Kingships that there were, or otherwise destroy them, [Polyb. and Liv. ut sup.]

Labeo, setting out from Ephesus, came to Patara, and there first fire on, or otherwise destroyed 50 ships of the Kings, as he was commanded: and in the same journey of his, recovered Telmessus, where all were at their wits ends, upon the sudden coming of the Roman Fleet. And then, setting sail out of Lycia; and sending word to Ephesus, for such as were left there to follow him, came thorough the middlest of the Islands lying in his way, into Greece: and staying some few dayes at Athens, till his ships came to him from Ephesus, sailed thence with his whole Fleet into Italy, [Livie.]

The Pro-consul, having among other things, which he was, by the Articles, to have from Antiochus, received the Elephants (which were at Apamea, as Polybius saith) and bestowed them all upon Eumenes; And then let himself to hear the differences (as in that confusion of things it could not be, but many mult arise) between the several Cities and States. And Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, for Eumenes his sake, to whom he had then newly betrothed his daughter, had half his sine striken off, [Id.]

At Apamea also, the Pro-consul, and the ten Commissioners, having given audience to all that came, appointed certain indifferent places, by consent of all parties, where the differences between City and City, concerning either their bounds, or money-matters, or the like, should be heard, and ended. The Colophonians which dwelt in Notium, the inhabitants of Cyma, and Mylasa, were for ever acquitted from payment of any tribute, by the Pro-consul and Commissioners: and to them of Clazomenae, over and above their exemption from payment of tribute, they gave also a certain Island called Drymussa, which lay over against their City. And to the Milesians, they restored a place called Saer Ager: (i. e.) The holy Country, which for fear of enemies, they had relinquished. As for them of Chios, Smyrna, and Erythra, in regard of their extraordinary zeal and forwardness in their service, they both gave unto them, all such lands and regions, as they particularly desired to have, and had them also in singular recommendation above the rest. They of Phocæa had their laws and liberties restored them to the full, with all the territory which they possessed before the war began, [Polyb. Legat. 36. Liv. lib. 38.]

To those of Ilium, they gave the Cities and Territories of Rhæzus, and Gergithus, not so much for any great service which they had done them, as in regard of the blood which was anciently between them, [Liv. ibid.]

And whereas before, there were but some certain few places, belonging to Pergamus, and the jurisdiction thereof, to wit, onely to the sea side, near Elais, and Alamyttium, mytium, as Strabo teach us, [lib. 13. pag. 627.] they now gave unto Eumenes, Lyfymachia and the Cheroneofe of Thracia in Europe side; and in Asia, all Lycotania, Mytilus, Phrygia the greater and the lefse, and all the Countries of Lydia and Ionia, I have only the Towns, which were free, when the battle was fought with Antiochus: and namely, they bestowed on him Thralles, and Ephesus, and Telmessus in Lydia, and whereas he was anciently possified of Mytia, and King Prusias had taken it from him by force, that they cauled to be restored to him: and for Pamphylia, which Eumenes his Ambassadors laid, lay on this side the Taurus, and the Ambassadors of Antiochus, that it lay beyond it, they referred that difference wholly to the pleasure and iudgement of the Senate it self. [Polyb. Legat. 36. Liv. lib. 37. 38.]

The two Rhodian Ambassadors Theatetus and Philophon, deified that they might have Lycia and Caria, according to a former ordered decree of the Senate in that behalf made. Hipparchus and Saryrus, the Ambassadors from Ilium, became suitors to the Commissioners, desiring them most earnestly, and by the blood that was between them, to pardon the Lycians. The Commissioners endeavoured to satisfy both parties, as much as in them lay : for they laid no burthen at all upon the Lycians, in favour to them of Ilium, and yet assigned the whole nation of the Lycians, to the Rhodians ; to gratify them in some sort as they desired : gave only the Cities of Telmessus, and forts belonging thereto, and the Country belonging to Protemeus of Telmessus : Caria also, all beyond the Meander, was given to the Rhodians; all faveur of Telmessus : Caria also, all beyond the Meander, was given to the Rhodians, all favours those places, which were free the day before the battle at Magnesia against Antiochus.

But the Lycians protested openly, That they would run any risque, rather than be in subjection to the Rhodians; alleading for themselves, That they were assigned by the Commissioners, not as subjects, but only as friends and associates to them.

When the Commissioners, according to the articles, among other things demanded Hannibal to be delivered up into their hands by Antiochus, he presently, upon notice thereof from the King, fled from thence, and went to Gortyna in Crete [Justin lib. 32. cap. 4. and Emili. Prob. in Hannib.]. Yet the report goes, That upon the overthrow of Antiochus by the Romans, Hannibal fled first to Artaxias in Armenia; and gave him much other good counsel: but among the rest, to build the Capital City in Armenia, which was from him called Artaxata, et. Artaxiatada, [Plin. in Lucullo, Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 528.] for Artaxias, and Thariades, et. Zariades, two Captains in Antiochus his army, by his permission formerly bare the rule, as Sovereigns over all Armenia, the one over the great, the other over the lesser: but after his overthrow, they joined with the Romans, and from them obtained, each the rule of a King in his own dominions. [Strabo Ibid. pag. 531. 532.] And it is most likely, that at the time, when they made friends with the Romans, Hannibal got him away thence also, and fled into Crete.

Antiochus, having thus lost all Asia, said, That he was very much beholding to the Romans, for easing him of so much trouble, by confining him within a more reasonable compasse of his dominions. [Cic. pro Dejotaro. Valer. Maxim. lib. 4. cap. 1.]

3817. ^{cap. 1.} Cn. Manlius, and the ten Commissioners, having now settled all things, went with the whole army towards Hellepont, purposing to order matters in Galatia, as they went, [Polyb. Legat. 36, cap. 1.]

And calling those things to come in to them; they gave them such conditions of their peace as they thought fit; the sum whereof was, That they should keep peace with Eumenes, and warned them to give off that lawd custom of theirs, in raging up and down with their arms about them, and to keep themselves within their own confines, [Liv. Ibid.] to wit, within that part of Phrygia, and Paphlagonia, and Mysia, where it borders upon the mount Olympus, and Cappadocia, which being heretofore possessed by them, went now by the name of Galatia, [Zonar. de Dioc.] We also read [1 Maccab. 8. 2.] that there was a tribute imposed on them, and so the Romans having chastised the Galatians for their insolencie used towards them, acquired to themselves the whole, and entire sovereignty of Asia on this side the Taurus, and made that the bound of the Empire Eastward for that present, and freed the inhabitants there from that terroure which they were formerly in from those fierce and barbarous Galls. [Polyb. lib. 3. pag. 159. with Manlius his Oration, in Livie lib. 38.]

Manlius gathered all the ships which he could get in all that coast, and Eumenes with his ships came also to him; and in them passed himself with all his army into Europe,

[Liv. lib. 38.]

Antiochus, marching with his army into his upper provinces (or as Jerom upon Daniel cap. 11. ipca keth, passing thorough the furthermost Cities of his domions) proclaimed his son Seleucus Philopator to be his successor, as we find, [2 Maccab. 9. 23.]

When

When Antiochus, whether feeling himself over-loaden, with the heavy tribute laid on him by the Romans, or whether it proceeded from a fit of avarice that took him, whereby he thought he might under colour thereof, fall to committing sacrilege upon his gods, and hearing that the Temple of Jupiter Belus in Elemais, abounded with Silver and Gold, and other precious Jewels, of offerings there made, he purposed to seize it all into his hands; coming therefore into Elemais, and pretending that the inhabitants of that place, had raised a war against him, with the power of his army, he entered into the Temple by night, and took thence an infinite mass of wealth; which coming to the peoples eares, the peasants of the Country came in, and set upon his army, and slew both him and them; [Diad. Sic. in Excerpt. Valesp. pag. 292, 298. Sirabob. lib. 16, pag. 744. Jnsf. lib. 32, cap. 2.] Jerom upon [Dan. chap. 1.] saies that he was slain in a fight against the inhabitants of Elemais: but [Arcl. Vitor. de Vir. Illust. lib. 1, cap. 1.] tells us, that he was slain, by his own pot-companions; some of whom, in a drunkenness, he had beaten, and mistreated at a Feast: but slain he was, and thart, as Znuaras rightly avetheth out of Dion in the year when Cal. Flaminius and Emilius Lepidus were Consuls of Rome.

After his death Seleucus, surnamed Philopator, or as Josephus, [lib. 2. cap. 4.] Soter (which was indeed the surname of his son Demetrius) succeeded him in his kingdom, and reigned 12 years; a man of a lazy humour, nor of any great power, by reason of his fathers great luste left furnished from the Romans, [1. Apud Syrian. cap. 131.] with Porphy, Euseb, and Severus, Sulpitius. In this very entrance to the kingdom, he had a son, called Demetrius, whose surname was Soter, was, as Polybius [Liber. 1. c. 7.] was 23 years old, when his Uncle Antiochus Epiphanes died. And of this Seleucus, is meant that which is said, in the beginning [of the third chapter of the third book of Maccab.] When the Holy City lived in all peace, and the Law therein excellently well executed, by reason of the piety of Onias the High Priest, and for that he was an utter enemy to all ungodliness; it came to pass that even King Seleucus himself honoured the Place, and adorned the Temple with many rich offerings: Inomachus, that Seleucus himself, King of Asia, furnished at his own costs, for the publick ministry of the Sacrifices.

When Philopemen was Prætor: (i. e.) Chief Magistrate of the Achæan, Demetrius of Athens, came as an Ambassador of Ptolemais from Alexandria, to renew his league with the Achæans; and they being very glad thereof, sent their Ambassadors in like manner to him: to wit, Lycortas, father to Polybius the Historian, and Theodoridas, and Rhodeteios of Sicione, both to take their oath to the King, and also to receive his oath to them. [Polyb. Legat. 37.]

Cn. Manlius Vulso, contrary to the wishes of the ten Commissioners, triumphed in Rome over the Gauls in Asia, upon the fifth day of March, [Liv. lib. 38. & 39.] Concerning whose doings in Asia, Hannibal, having now nothing else to do, wrote a book in Greek: which language he had learnt, from one Sosius a Lacedæmonian, and dedicated it to the Rhodians, [Emil. Prob. in Hannibale.] Which Sosius was born at Rhium, and wrote the gets of Hannibal in 7 Volume; as [Diodor. Sic. lib. 26. Eclog. affirmeth.]

When Aristoxenus was Praetor, or Chief Magistrate in Achaia, the Ambassadors which were sent from thence to King Ptolemy, returned home, whilst the general Assembly of that Nation were met, and sitting at Megalopolis: before whom Lycoridas declared, That according to their commission they had taken their oath to the King, and he accordingly received his oath to them: adding further, that they had brought a present from the King to the Commonalty of Achaia: to wit, armes all of brass, to furnish 6000 Targateers, and 200 talents of brass, ready coined, [Polyb. Libet. 41.]

To that meeting Eumenes also sent his Ambassadors, to renew the league with them which had formerly been between them and his father; promising moreover, to bestow on them, 120 talents, to the end, that putting them out to life, the income thereof might serve to defray the charges of such as were to come from time to time, to their embellish; which largesse of his to offerred, though their mouths were ated to great a summe, yet with one voice, they all reified, and would none of it; [Id. ibid. Diodor. Sic. Legat. 13.]

319. Diador, Sc. Legat. 3.] Eumenes his Ambassadors came to Rome, to treat there concerning the possession of two Cities of Thracia, Emus, and Maronea, which they said belonged to him, as appurtenant to the Chersonese of Thracia, which the Romans had given him; and withal, to complain of Philippus, King of Macedon, for that he had seized on them by force, and put Garrisons in them, and had drawn from thence certain inhabitants thence, and planted them in Macedonia. For the hearing of which difference between them, the Senate joyned Q. Cecilius Metellus and M. Bæbius, and Tib. Sempronius in Commission, and sent them; and they coming to Thessalonica, heard both parties areue the case before them; Polys. Legat. 40. 42. Liv. lib. 39. When

When they returned to Rome, and the Ambassadors on either side, pleaded there nothing but what they had already said before the Commissioners at Thessalonica: the Senate decreed a second commission, whereof the chief man was Ap. Claudius, with instructions, to put out all Garrisons from Enus and Marathonæ, and to assolate all the sea coast of Thracia from the power and jurisdiction of Philippos and his Macedons, [Polyb. Legat. 42, 44, and Liv. lib. 49.]

At the same time also, Arcus and Alcibiades, the two Prime men of Sparta, came to Rome, and in the Senate made a heavy complaint against the Achæans; whereupon the Senate thought fit to refer that cause also to the same Commissioners, [Polyb. Legat. 42, Paulan. in Achæis, pag. 214.]

Lycortas of Megalopolis, Polybius his father, the Prætor of Achæia, called an assembly of the Nation: wherein Arcus and Alcibiades, who went to complain of them at Rome, were condemned to die for it, [Liv. lib. 39, Paulan. ut. sup.]

A while after, the Roman Ambassadors came into Achæia, and the common Council or Assembly of Achæia met before them, at Clitore in Arcadia, [Liv. ibid, Polyb. Legat. 43.] but their coming in no sort pleased the Achæans, when they saw Arcus and Alcibiades (whom they in a late assembly had condemned to death) in their company; Lycortas like a Magistrate, pleaded and maintained the cause of the Achæans very boldly: But the Commissioners, not regarding much what he said, declared openly and with joynt consent, that Arcus and Alcibiades were honest men, and had done the Achæans no wrong at all, and prevailed so far, as to have the sentence given against them to be reversed, [Liv. and Paulan. ut. sup.]

When Hannibal had lived a long time very quietly at Gortyna in Creer, and fell there into the envy of many by reason of his great wealth, he filled certain great chests with lead, and deposited them in the Temple of Diana, there as a treasure for a dead life: and thereupon the people, having such a pledge as that of him, looked the less after him: but he in the mean time stole away to Prusias, surnamed, as I said before, the Hunter, King of Bythinia, having first molten his gold and infused it into certain hollow Statues of brass, which he carried away with him, [Justin. lib. 32, cap. 4, and Emil. Prob. in Hannibale.]

There fell a little after a war in hand, between Prusias and Eumenes, King of Pergamus: which Prusias began, breaking the league that was between them, merely in confidence of Hannibal, whom he had there to manage his war for him, [Justin. ibid.] The war therefore grew hot between them, both by land and sea: but Eumenes by the assistance of the Romans, over-powered him in both: and whereas Prusias was but poor, and weak of himself, Hannibal procured him the assistance of some other Kings and States, and those of very warlike Nation; [Emil. Prob.] and among them, the aid of Philippos King of Macedon, who sent him Philoctes his General, with a considerable army to help him, [Polyb. Legat. 46.]

In the 149 Olymp. when M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Fabius Labeo, first entered into their Consulship, came to Rome an Embassy from Eumenes, carried by Athenæus his youngest brother, who brought with him a Crown of Gold of 15000 talents price, to complain of Philippos; both for that he had not withdrawn his Garrisons out of Thracia, as also for that he sent aid to Prusias, King of Bythinia, who had willfully broken his league, and made war upon his brother Eumenes, [Polyb. Legat. 46, Livie, lib. 39.] and among other Ambassadors, from Lacedæmon, came Arcus and Alcibiades to the Senate, [Polyb. ibid.]

When Prusias had received an overthrow from Eumenes by land, and seeking to try his fortune by sea, was too weak for Eumenes: there also Hannibal advised him to try whether he could do by policy and fraud, what by plain force he was not able to effect. He put therefore a multitude of all sorts of serpents into earthen vessels, and in the middle of the night, to be hurled aboard the enemies ships; giving order to the soldiers and sea-men, to set all upon the ship wherein Eumenes himself was, and defend themselves from the rest as well as they could; by this device of the serpents, and that they might the more certainly know, in what ship Eumenes himself was, he sent before-hand a letter to him by a Herald, purporting nothing but a meer flout to Eumenes, and full of abuses to his person. When as therefore Prusias his men, came to it, they fought neither against great nor small, but only against the ship which Eumenes was in: whereupon he was fain to seek his safety by flight; but had perished therein, had he not thrust in upon the next shoar, where he had placed before-hand, for a relief upon all occasions, a company of his own. As for Eumenes his other ships, when they pressed hard upon the enemy, they let fire their earthen pitchers full of Snakes, which falling on the decks, brake, and out flew the Serpents among them; and this at first seemed a ridiculous thing unto them: but when they could find no where in the ship for Serpents, and found themselves no less annoyed with their stings than with the arrows of their enemy, they gave off the fight, and fled to their sea-camp which was upon upon the shoare, [Justin. lib. 32, cap. 4, Emil. Prob. in Hannibale.]

Thus Hannibal, by this trick, got the better of Eumenes, in that fight; nor then onely, but also in sundry other encounters and by one stratagem or another, he ever put Eumenes to the worst. And once, when he advised Prusias to fight, and he durst not, because the entrails of the beasts, said he, forbid me: Woe, said Hannibal, will you rely more upon a little piece of flesh in a calf, than upon the judgement of an old experienced Captain in the field, [Cic. De Divinas, lib. 2, Plut. in his Treatise, De Exilio, Valer. Max. lib. 3, cap. 7.]

Now when news of these doings came to Rome, Ambassadors were out of hand dispatched away by the Senate, to make a peace between the two Kings, and to demand Hannibal out of Prusias his hands, [Polyb. Legat. 47.] tells us, That Tit. Qu. Flaminius was at that time sent Ambassador, both to Prusias, and also to Seleucus King of Syria, and Livie, [lib. 36, out of Galerius Anian.] shews, That Lu. Scipio Asiaticus, and P. Scipio Nasica, were joyned in Commission with him to Prusias.

Agelipolis, who in his nonage, was King of Sparta, being sent with others to Rome, from such as were then banished out of Lacedæmon, by the way fell into the hands of Pirates, and was by them slain, [Polyb. Legat. 49.] This Agelipolis was the son of Cleomenes the King of Sparta, who was slain in Alexandria, as before, An Mon. 3784. and was solemnly taken in for their King, by the Ephori there, but was turned out again, by those usurping Tyrants which succeeded in that state, Lycurgus, Machanidas and Nabis, as Polybius, [lib. 4, pag. 304.] teacheth us. But now, that this lawful King was dead, Arcus of whom I speak before out of Polybius, Livie, and Paulanias, being a most earnest and violent defender of his Countries liberty against the Achæans, their power being now abated by the Romans, seemeth to have acquired to himself the title of a King among them, for Josephus, [1. 2, Antiq. c. 4, and Joseph. in Chron.] both testifies, that Arcus the King of Lacedæmon, sent an Embassy, and wrote his letters to Onias 3, son of Onias, the High Priest at Jerusalem, which letters are extant in Josephus, [cap. 5, 2b, & cap. 12, lib. 2, Machab. 1.] a book exactly translated out of the Hebrew, (for that book was originally written in Hebrew, as Jerom shews) and retaineth every where the brevity and Hebraismes of it, in which letters, mention is made of the blood and kindred that was between the Jews and Lacedæmonians, which seemeth to have been taken out of the Mythological or fabulous writings of the Greeks; such as was that of Claudius Iolas, to Stephanus Byzantinus in the word Judas, that the name of the Jews came from one Judeus Sportones, a companion or fellow soldier of Bacchus in his wars; though Paulanias in his Corinthiacs, [pag. 58.] assures us, That the names of Sportones, was altogether unknown to the Spartans: for Lacedæmonians of his time.

Eumenes began now to make war with Prusias King of Bythinia and Ortyagon, one of the Kings of the Galls. [Prolog. Froj. lib. 32, with Polyb. lib. 3, lib. 159.]

The death of Hannibal, I conceive, fell in with the Consulship of L. Emilius Paulus, and Cn. Baebus Pamphilus, for to Polybius, and Valerius Max. write; and not in the year before: as Atticus, and Livie, who follow him there, would have it, nor yet in the year next following, as Sulpicius, and in Emil. Prob. in Hannibale. Now the manner of his death, as we find it in Livie, [lib. 39.] in Justin. lib. 32, cap. 4. in Plut. in the Life of T. Q. Flaminius in Dion. quoted by Zonaras, in Emil. Prob. in Hannibale, and in Apollonius in his Syriacis, [pag. 97.] was in this manner.

Hannibal kept himself close in one place, which was a little Castle, given him by Prusias; to which he had made seven doors; some of which were blind, to the end, That if any came to beset the house, they should not see any guard there, because they appeared none to be doors. When therefore he heard, that the Kings soldiers were in the porch, to break in upon him, he went to get out at one of those blind back-doors: but when he found that, contrary to his expectation, beset also with men to take him: and the house beset quite round every where, he took his poison, which he carried ever about him, for that purpose, and so dyed at the age of 70 years old of whose death it is said, That there was this stroke long before utter'd.

*Actions upon which the Author dwells (i. e.)
The end of Lybia Hannibals Corps shall cover.*

Which word Lybia, or Lybyssa, he ever understood of Lybia in Afric: whereas it was indeed a little Village in Bythinia, near the sea side, called also by the same name, of which Pliny, [lib. 5, cap. 22.] speaking, saith: There was in those parts, a little Town called Lybyssa, where's now nothing worth the seeing, but Hannibals tomb only.

Pharnaces King of Pontus fell suddenly upon the City of Synope and took it; which from thence forward continued in the possession of him and his successors. [Strabo lib. 12. pag. 545, 546.]

In the second year of the 145 Olymp. came Ambassadors to Rome from the two Kings, Eumenes and Pharnaces, who were then in war one against the other, as also from the Rhodians, complaining of the wrong done to them of Synope, by Pharnaces. Whereupon Marius and others in commission with him, were sent Ambassadors to take knowledge of the case of Synope; and to compose all differences between the two Kings. [Polyb. Legat. 52, 53. and Livie lib. 40.]

Hircanus (the son of Jolephus, and nephew to Tobias) was sent to Seleucus, to gather up his tributes, on the other side of the river Jordan Eastward: where he built a fair and most fortified Castle, all of white marble, which he called by the name of Tyros, to wit, in the confines of Arabia, and Judea on the other side Jordan, not far from the land of Helbon, and was governor of all that Region, during the last seven years of Seleucus his reign; living all that time in war with the Arabians, and making great slaughters of them, besides many prisoners taken, and made slaves by him. [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 45.]

Marcus and his fellow Commissioners, who were sent to see how the squares went between Eumenes and Pharnaces, returned; and made their report in the Senate, of what they found; setting out Eumenes his fair dealing, and temperate carriage in all things, blazoning the avarice and high price carriage of Pharnaces to the full. [Polyb. Legat. 53.] for indeed he was the most violent and invidious King that ever was before him. [Id. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 130.]

382.

When Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, joining in with Eumenes of Pergamus, made war upon Pharnaces King of Pontus, all three at once, sent their Ambassadors to Rome, and the Senate having heard them all, answered, That they would send Commissioners once more into those parts, with power to hear and determine all matters between them. [Id. lib. cum. lib. 3. pag. 159. Livie lib. 40.]

Pharnaces, coming thus to dance attendance upon the Romans, burst out again, and sent Leocrinus in the midst of winter, with an army of ten thousand men, to harass and ravage all the Country of Galatia. [Polyb. Legat. 55.]

And himself in person, the spring following, mustered all his forces, as if he would have fallen upon Cappadocia. [Id. ib.]

Eumenes fearing to see him thus transgress all bounds of law and honesty as he did, together with his brother Attalus, newly then returned from Rome, marched into Galatia, against Leocrinus, but him they found not there: and when Carisognatus (or rather Epistognatus, as Fulvius Ursinus thinks it should be) and Gazotiorius sent their Ambassadors to desire them to forbear doing them any harm, for that they were ready to do what ever they were commanded, but were rejected by him, as men who had formerly falsified and broken their faith and word unto him, and so they went on against Pharnaces. [Id.]

At the end of five dayes march, Eumenes with his brother came from Calpito, a City of Bythnia, to the river Halys; and the sixth day after to Amisus, a city in Cappadocia: where when Ariarathes the King of that Country, had joyed his army with theirs, they all came into the plaine of Amisus, where they had scantily pitched Camp, when news came, that Commissioners were come from Rome, to make a peace between them: whereupon Eumenes presently sent away his brother Attalus to well-come them into those parts, and he in the mean time doubled his army, and put them all into the best equi page he could. [Id.]

The Commissioners at their first arrival, exhorted both parties to a peace. Eumenes and Ariarathes, answered, With all their hearts; and what ever else they should be pleased to command; and when the Commissioners prayed, That during the treaty, they would draw out their forces from the enemies Country, Eumenes readily assented thereto, and the next morning gave order to send back his forces into Galatia. [Id.]

The Commissioners then treating with Pharnaces, could by no means prevail with him, to come to any conference where Eumenes should be present, and much a do they had at last to persuade him to send his Ambassadors to some place by the sea side, with full power there to treat, and to stand to such order as they should think fit to set down between them; and when his Ambassadors came to the place appointed, and the conference was now began, Eumenes was ready to yield to any conditions: but the Ambassadors of Pharnaces shewed themselves in such a fashion as the Commissioners easily perceived, that Pharnaces himself had no mind to come to any agreement. [Id.]

So the conference brake off, and no peace concluded between them, and when the Commissioners were gone from Pergamus, and Pharnaces his Ambassadors sent away, the war went on as before, between them two: and Eumenes fell to prepare all things necessary necessary for it on his part; nevertheless, at the earnest instance of the Rhodians who desired his aid against the Lycians, he let Pharnaces alone for that time, and went to help them. [Id.]

Leocrinus, the General of Pharnaces his Forces, having laid hard siege to Pius (or rather Teios) a Town in Pontus, forced the Garrison which was there, consisting all of mercenary soldiers, to deliver up the Town to him, upon condition, that they themselves, should be conveyed to what place they should name for themselves, in safety: but having afterward received an expresse from Pharnaces to put them all to the sword, because they had formerly offended him, he pursued them upon the way, and killed them every man. [Diodor. Sic. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 302.]

Seleucus, having gotten together a reasonable army, and going to the aid of Pharnaces, was ready to pass the Taurus: nevertheless, calling to mind that in so doing, he should break the articles accorded between his father and the Romans, upon better advice, he brake off that journey, and returned home again. [Id. ibid.]

Yet afterward Pharnaces fell to an agreement with Attalus, and the rest, and they entered into a solemn league between them. Eumenes at that time had been sick at Pergamus, but was now recovered: and having ratified all that Attalus had done therein, upon his return, sent both him and the rest of his brothers all to Rome, where every man, who knew what service they had done in the wars in Asia, had them heartily welcome; but the Senate, in special, caused lodgings to be provided for them, and large allowance to be made them at the publick charge. And Attalus coming into the Senate-house, complained of the wrong that Pharnaces had done them; and desired them to chastise him according to the measure of his offence: to whom they made a gracious answer, promising to send Commissioners, who should make a final accord between them. [Polyb. Legat. 56. Diodor. Legat. 14.]

Ptolemæus Epiphane, desirous to make a more strict association with the Achæans, sent his Ambassadors to them, promising them ten ships, each of 50 oars a piece ready furnished to the full. The Achæans, considering that the offer was too good to be refused, as amounting to the value of almost 10 talents, accepted thereof very willingly: And sent him their Ambassadors, Lycortas with his son Polybius, (to wit, the Hilotrian) though younger at that time, than by their law and Ambassador should be: and with them, Aratus, the son of Aratus the Sicyonian, with instructions both to thank the King for the armes and monies, which he had formerly lent them by Lycortas; and also to receive from him, the ten ships now promised, and to bring them, into Peloponneso. But this Embassy: never went further than Achæia it self, by reason, that news came of the death of Ptolemæi. [Id. Legat. 57.]

For when Ptolemæi laid a trap to take Seleucus in, and withal set on foot an army to go against him, and one of his Captains asked him, where he would get money to go through with what he took in hand, his answer was, That his friends were his treasure: which saying of his, flying abroad, and coming to his Friends and Captains eares, and they conceiving that his meaning was, to furnish himself by stripping them of their means, agreed among themselves and poisoned him. [Jerom upon Daniel, chap. 11.] This Ptolemæi Epiphane, in Priscian the Grammarian, is said by Caro, to have been a most excellent and bountiful King; and the truth is, that for a long time, he carried himself very nobly and well; but afterward when by the perfwasion of some claw-backs of the Court, he had caused Aristomenes, whom he had formerly honoured as a father, to take a drench of hemlocks, whereof he died, he grew to a further height of blood and cruelty, and ruled his people more like a Tyrant than a King; whereby he fell into such hatred and detestation among them, that they were ready to depose him. [Diodor. Sic. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 294, 297.]

At his death, he left two sons, both under age: the eldest was called, Philometor, the younger, Philcon. [Josephus, lib. 12. cap. 8.] Ptolemæus Philometor (whom Epiphanius mis calleth Philopator) reigned after his father 35 years: as [Clau. Ptolemæus, in Can. Reg. Clementi Alexandrino, Enchiridion.] and others tell us: of which we, to make the times even, abate 3 months only.

Pharnaces, finding himself over-laid by this unexpected and violent coming on of the enemy, sent his Ambassadors to Eumenes and Ariarathes, and sued for peace: so this war between Eumenes and Ariarathes on the one side, and Pharnaces and Mithridates, Lord of Armenia, on the other, was taken up, and ended upon these conditions; to wit, That Pharnaces should no more set foot in Galatia; and should brake off all former agreements and leagues made with the Galatians. That he should likewise get him going out of all Paphlagonia: and such of the Inhabitants thereof as he had carried from thence, he should send home again, with their armes. That he should restore to Ariarathes, all the places which he had taken from him, with such hostages as he had received of him. That he should restore all the prisoners which he had taken, ransom-free; and deliver up those which had left their King, and fled over to him.

4534. 180.

4535. 179.

That he should restore to Morzias and Ariarathes the 900 talents, which he had taken from them and 300 more to Eumenes, for his charges in the war: and that Michri-dates the Lord of Armenia, should pay 300 talents, for making war upon Ariarathes, contrary to the league which he had made with Eumenes. In this league, were com-menia, and one Acusilochus: and of those in Europe, Gatalus of Sarmatia, and of free States, those of Heraclea, Melembrya, Cherfonesus, and Cyzicum: for performance whereof, so soon as the hostages sent by Pharnaces were come, the armies brake up, and dispersed themselves, every man to his own home, [Polyb. Legat. 59.]

Teius, a Town in Pontus, which Prusias by the Articles was to restore to Eumenes, Eumenes freely gave back to him again, and had many thanks given him by Prusias for it, [Id. ibid.]

After the death of Philippus, King of Macedonia, his son Peres, or Perseus, succeeded him, in the year when Q. Fulvius, and L. Manlius, were Consuls at Rome: and he reigned 11 years, [Liv. lib. 45.] or rather 10 years, 11 months, as Porphyrie more exactly counteth it, [Scal. in Græc. Euseb. pag. 329.]

Here begins the third Periode, of Calippus

The Lycians sent their Ambassadors to Rome, to complain of the cruelty of the Rhodians, to whom they were assigned, and made subject by L. Cornelius Scipio, saying, that the slavery which they endured under Antiochus, in comparison of this, was an excellent kind of liberty and freedom; and that there was no difference now left between them, and the very slaves they bought in the Market for their money. The Senate moved with this piteous complaint, gave them their letters to carry to the Rhodians; whereby they put the Rhodians in mind, that they indeed put the Ly-
3827. cians into their subjection, and protection withal; yet so, as they ceased not to be free States still, and of the sovereignty of the people of Rome, [Liv. lib. 41.]

Prusias married the sister of Perseus, and Perseus the daughter of Seleucus, called Laodice; and the Rhodians with their Fleet, received and conveyed her into Macedon to her husband, [Liv. lib. 42. Polyb. Legat. 60. Appian. Legat. 25.]

When the Rhodians persisted, and now made an open war upon the poor Lycians, they of Xanthus fled by their Embassies for help to the Achæans, and to the people of Rome; foreman in which Embassie, was one Nicotratrus, [Polyb. Legat. 60.]

The Lycians were already troden under foot by the Rhodians, before their Ambassadors could get audience of the Senate of Rome; which was not till Tiberius and Claudius the Consuls of that year, were gone out against the Istrians and Agrians: but when they were admitted, they so displayed and laid open before them, the cruelty and oppression of the Rhodians against the poor Lycians, that they prevailed so far with the Senate, as that they sent Ambassadors to Rhodes, to let them know, that having perused the Acts, and Records, which the ten Commissioners drew up, in Asia, they found by the tenor thereof, That the Lycians were by the Romans consigned to the Rhodians, not for a gift to do with them what they would, but to use them as friends and associates. This message was not so well liked of by the common sort in Rome, who were grown offended with the Rhodians for their officiousness, in bringing home Perseus his wife unto him, and could have been well content, to have seen them and the Lycians to try it out by the teeth, that the Rhodians might have some occasion to spend their treasure and provisions, with which they so much abounded, [Id. ibid.]

3828. When the Roman Commissioners came to Rhodes, the inhabitants there, began to grow into an uproar, saying, Since all things were now well settled in Lycia, What meant they to give occasion of new trouble there? For indeed the Lycians, hearing what declaration the Senate had made in their behalf, began presently to rise again, protesting openly that they would endure any thing, to recover their just rights and liberty again. But the Rhodians, conceiving that the Senate had been misinformed, and abused by some false suggestions of the Lycians, dispatch away Lycophron their Ambassador to Rome: and the Senate having heard his errand, gave him no present answer, [Id. Legat. 61, 62.]

One Simon, a man of the Tribe of Benjamin, Chief President or Keeper of the Temple, falling into a contention with Onias 3. the High Priest there; when he could not get his will on him, gat himself to Apollonius the Governour of Cæloxyria and Phenicia: and informed him, that there was a vast masse of money in the treasury of the Temple, which the Priests made no use of; and therefore would do very well in the Kings cofers: which when Apollonius had acquainted his Master Seleucus with, he presently sent away his L. Treasurer Heliodorus to Jerusalem, to fetch him that money from thence: But when he came, Onias the High Priest told him, That true it was, there were some monies in the Temple; but they were the monies of Widows and Orphans, there deposited only as in a place of safety; part of which, were the proper goods goods of Hyrcanus, the Nephew of Tobias, (of whom we spake sup. An. Mus. 3812.) a most honourable person; and that all that there was, amounted not to above 400 talents of Silver, and 200 of Gold, and that such was the Holiness of the place, and of the thing it self, that no man might or ought to lay hand upon it: But when Heliodorus made no reckoning either of Onias his words, or the tumult of the people, lamenting such a profanation of their Temple, he was struck down by the Angels of God in the very place, and carried to his lodging half dead by his own servants that were about him. But being anon after restored to his health, by the intercession and prayers to God made by Onias the High Priest, he returned to Seleucus that sent him; magnifying the Holiness of the Temple, and the Power of God that dwelt therein. This story is recorded in [2 Maccab. chap. 3.] and by Josephus in his book, ἡ ἱστορία τοῦ ἱεροῦ: who yet instead of Heliodorus, here names Apollonius: (and so do the Fassi Siculi too) and shews that this fell out a little before the death of Seleucus: whereas by the articles between Antiochus and the Romans, Antiochus was to change his hostages, and send new ones, instead of the old, every 3 years end; now, in the stead of Antiochus Epiphaneus, the younger son of the former Antiochus who was then a hostage at Rome, [1 Maccab. chap. 1. v. 11.] was sent Demetrius the son of Seleucus, now reigning, [Appian. in Syriac. pag. 116.]

Simon the Benjamite, that Trayor of his Country, and discolor of the monies deposited in the Temple, accused Onias the High Priest, a man who had so well deserved of the City and Country of the Jews; as if he had forced Heliodorus, and contrived all the mischief against him, and the King: and when matters proceeded to far, that many murders were acted by Simon and his party in the City, and Apollonius waxed mad withal, and backt him in what he did; Onias took a journey to Seleucus, [2 Maccab. chap. 4. v. 1. 6.] but the abbreviator of Jason of Cyrenia, seems to say, That Seleucus was dead before he came: though Eusebius in his Chron. saith, That he found him alive, and got this Simon to be banished by the King.

And to have I brought down this our Chronicle of Asia and Egypt, to the beginning of Antiochus Epiphaneus, and the History of the Maccabees; The continuation whereof to the utter destruction of Jerusalem, under the Emperor Vespasian, together with the Annals of the New Testament, and a brief of the History of the Church during that time, to the beginning of the fourth Age or Century after Christ, I purpose, if God send life and health, to make hereafter.

Glory be to God on High.

THE Epistle to the Reader.

READER,

On have here the other Part of my Annals, which you will find more full in the History of Rhodes, and the Isles between Asia and Europe. For although formerly, for the alleviating of the Work, I resolv'd to refer them to Græcia: Yet considering, that in the division of the Eastern Empire, the Province of the Isles is attributed to the Asian Diocese; I also thought good afterwards to place them with Asia. Those things which I produce concerning Præsages, Spectralls, and Oracles, you have upon the Authority of the Authours who relate them: leaving the judgement of such things to those Learned Men, who make it their businesse to treat of them. In the citing of Cornelius Tacitus, I have observed the Edition of Berengerus, and Freinhemius, as it is distinguished into Chapters. Of those things which in the disposition of Evangelick and Apostolick History, shall not seem sufficiently satisfactory, I shall (if God Almighty afford me life and strength to finish that Work) give you an account in my Sacred Chronology.

THE

OF

The Asiatic and Egyptian Affaires, carried on from the beginning of the times of the M^ACCHABEE^S, untill the Destruction of the Jewish Common-wealth under Vespasian.

3829.

Hen Antiochus, son of Antiochus the Great, returning from Rome (where he was hostage) came unto Athens; his brother Seleucus, by the treachery of Heliodorus was taken out of the way. Howbeit, Eumenes and Attalus expelled Heliodorus, who aimed at the kingdom of Syria, placing Antiochus in the possession thereof, that by this good turn, they might oblige him to be their friend: for now by reason of some petty injury, even they began to grow jealous of the Romans. [Appian, in Syriae, pag. 116, 117.]

4539. 175.

Demetrius, son of Seleucus, to whom the kingdom did of right belong, having then entered into the tenth year of his age, remained at that time hostage at Rome. But Apollonius, who was brought up with him, upon the death of Seleucus, whole great favourite he was, departed from Court to Miletum, [Polyb. Legat. 114.] But the Syrians filed their new King Antiochus, Epiphanes, or Illustrious, because upon strangers usurpation of the kingdom, he appeared bravely to his people, in vindication of his ancestors title, [Appian, in Syriae, pag. 177.] who notwithstanding, by reason of his mad conversation, Polybius thought might more justly be called Epimanes, or the Frankick, [apud Athenaeum lib. 2. cap. 2. lib. 5. cap. 4. & lib. 10. cap. 12.]

For having obtained the kingdom of Syria, he entered into a new, and to other Kings, unusual course of life: first going out of his Royall Palace privately, his servants knowing nothing of it, he unadvisedly wandered about the City, taking but one or two associates with him. Moreover he accounted it an honour to converse and drink with the common people, and with aliens and strangers of the meanest condition. And if perchance, he heard of any young men that had a merry meeting, he presently with his pipe and musick, came to the revels: Insomuch, That most of the company being startled at the strangeness of the thing, upon his coming thither, betook themselves to their heels, or else out of fear sat still and spake not a word. Lastly, laying aside his royall garment, and being clad with a coat, such as he saw used by the Candidates at Rome, he saluted and took hold of every ordinary fellow that he met with, and sometimes sued for a place of the Edilis; sometimes for the Tribune-ship of the people. At last having, by the suffrages of the people, obtained the place of a magistrate, fixing, according to the Roman custom, his ivory chair, he gave judgement, and took cognizance of the law suits, and controversies of the Citizens with that industry ftry, and diligence that every one of the fager fort doubted what he meant : Some interpreted it to be indifference, fome imprudence, others madneffe. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesq. p 305, 306.] Athenues alio relate the fame things (in the fore-cited fifth book, and 4 chap. and tenth book, and 12. chap.out of the 26 book of Polybius his fifth book, and 14 chap. and tenth book) into his 41 book, as one may fee in that fragment, which Livie alio translated into his 41 book, as one may fee in that fragment, which Charles Sigonius fallily interpreted of Pericles.

men five .327. and dyed in the 149 year of the kingdom

That Antiochus began his reign the 137, and dyed in the 149 year of the kingdom of the Greeks (or of the Macedonians, from Seleucus.) The writer of the first book of the Maccabees teacheth us [chap. i. 10. & 6. 16.] Whence also Johannes Malca Antiochenus, in his Chronicle affirmeth unto him 12 years, which are termed by Porphyry, Eusebius, Jerome, Sulpitius Severus and others, to be 11 only: for the reconciling of whom we must say, that at the end of the 137 year Antiochus began, and at the beginning of the 149 year (from the spring season, as this author useth to reckon) he ended his reign, (viz.) eleven years, and some months over and above.

That Antiochus was not at the first acknowledged King by those that favoured a Ptolemaic Philometor: but that some while after he obtained the title under the guard of clemency, Jerom affirms in his commentary upon the 11 chapter of Daniel; but entering into society with Eumenes, he powerfully ruled over Syria and the neighbouring nations: the government of Babylon being committed to Timarchus, but the custody of the treasury to Heracleas his brother, two brethren linked one to another by filthy commerce, Applan, in Syriac, pag. 117.

Hircanus, the son of Josph, and Grandchild of Tobias, seeing Antiochus very prevalent, and fearing, lest being reduced under his power, he should suffer for what he had attempted against the Arabians, laid violent hands upon himself: howbeit Antiochus seized upon his whole estate. [Josephus, lib. 12, cap. 5.]

[illegible]

383c. The seventh year of Philometor, of Nabonassar, the 574, the 27 of Phamenoth, according to the Egyptians, (on the beginning of the first of May, (according to the Julian reckoning) two hours after mid-night, there was an eclipse of the Moon observed at Alexandria. [Prot. lib. 6, cap. 5.] themselves with mutual fury, there was a truce

Between the Grecians tearing themselves with mutual fury, there was a truce made for six months; but afterwards a more grievous war built out : howbeit, by the coming of Q. Minutius the Legate, who with ten ships was sent from the Romans to compel their strifes, they came into hopes of peace. [Livie, lib. 41.]

The Lycians also, about the same time, Eumenes inciting them, revolting from the Rhodians, were infested with a war by them. Certain Castles, and the field Scituared in the utmost bounds of the opposite continent of the Rhodians, were annoyed by the garrisons of Eumenes. [Polyb. Legat. 61. & 67. Liv. lib. 41. and 42.]

Certain apostate Jews, agreeing with Onias the false high priest, having procured power from King Antiochus of living according to the ordinances of the Gentiles, erected a place of exercise under the very Tower of Sion, forced the chief young men to submit to the laws of the school, by wearing an hat, and by thus reduced their fore-skin,

skin, becoming uncircumcised; that they might not even when they were naked be unlike the Greeks; and such was the height of Greek fashions and increase of heathenish manners, that the Priests had no courage to serve any more at the Altar, but despoiling the Temple, and neglecting the Sacrifices, halfted to be partakers of the unlawful allowance which in the place of exercise after the game of Discus, was exhibited, 1 Maccab. i. 11, 15. & 2 Maccab. 4. 12, 15. compared with Josephus l.b. 12. chap. 6.

chap. 5, 6.] When the game that was used every fifth year was celebrated at Tyrus, King Antiochus being present at it; impious Jalon sent special Messengers thither from Jerusalem, such as were free Denizens of the City of Antioch, to carry three hundred, or (as it is much more truly in the Manuscript book of the Earle of Arundels Library) three thousand and three hundred drachmes of Silver to the sacrifice of Hercules: which notwithstanding the bearers proposed to be laid out upon the building of Gallies! [2 Maccab. 4. 18, 19, 20.]

cab. 4. 18, 19, 20.]

381. The Embassadors sent from King Antiochus, came to Rome : the chief whereof Apollonius (whom the Ambassadors of the Roman, which were in Syria, reported to bein chief esteem with the King, and most friendly to the Roman people) being brought into the Senate, besides the stipend due from the King (the late payment whereof he did excale upon divers and just reasons) delivered alby way of gifts, vessels of Gold, to the value of five hundred pound weight : He added, That the King requesteth that the society, and friendship which was with his father, should be renewed with himself : and that the Roman people should lay such injunctions upon him, as were to be imposed on a faithful and confederate King : That he should in no wise be wanting in any service : That the merits of the Senate were so great towards him whilst he was at Rome, and such the civility of the youth : that he was enraptured by all Orders of persons, as a King, not as an hostage. The Embassadors received a kind answer, and A. Atilius, Major of the City, was enjoyned to renew with Antiochus, that league which was with his father. The Treasurers of the City received the stipend, the Censers, the Golden Vessels : and it was committed to their charge to dispose of them in such Temples as should be thought fitting. To the Embassador was sent a reward of an hundred thousand pieces of coin : his house was given him freely, and his charges ordered to be defrayed, during his continuance in Italy, [Livy, lib. 42.]

Unto Antiochus was born a son, Antiochus Eupator; whom himself dying, left nine years of age, [Appian, Syriac. pag. 117. & 131.]

Cleopatra, the beloved mother of Ptolemy-III Philometor the daughter of Antiochus the Great, and the sister of Antiochus Epiphanes, being dead, to whom her father had given for her Dowry, Cœlœryia (or at least a great part of it) Eulais the Eunuch, brother-father of Philometor, and Lomus governing Egypt, re-demanded Cœlœryia from Antiochus Epiphanes, as fraudulently seized upon: which afforded a ground of war between the Uncle and the Youth, as Porphyrie relates out of the Alexandrian Histories of Callinicus Sutorius, [in Hieron, on the 11 chap. of Daniel.] For the right of Cœlœryia, re-demanded Cœlœryia, it was alleged, that Antiochus the Great, Philometor in re-demanded Cœlœryia, it was alleged, that Antiochus the Great, father of Epiphanes, against justice and right, first took away Cœlœryia from Ptolemy Epiphanes, father of Philometor, when he was in his non-age; and afterwards restored the same unto him with his daughter Cleopatra, upon the account of her portion, Antiochus Epiphanes on the contrary asserting, that from the time when his father overcame the father of Philometor, at Parium, Cœlœryia was ever subject to the Kings of Syria, and fitly denying, that it was given by his father unto Cleopatra the mother of Philometor for her Dowry. [Polyb. Legat. 72. & 82.]

At that time Philometor began first to sit in his Throne, and the solemnity of his Coronation was performed, [i.e. Polib. 27, 1.] and then the prudence of Ptolemaeus (who then was Governor of Cyprus, the Island, at what time the King was a child, and had delivered nothing of the Kings monies unto the Stewards; when the King had attained unto his youthful estate, sent a vast collection of monies unto Alexandria: the King and all the Courtiers thereupon very highly commending his former parcimony: [Polib. book 27, in the Collections of Valdeius, p. 126.]

Antiochus, having lent into Egypt Apollonius, son of Menestheus, to the solemnization of the Coronation of Philometor the King, perceiving him not to be well affected to his affairs, took care to be fortified against him; whereupon, coming to Joppa, he took his journey to Hierusalem: where, being honourably received by Jason and the City, he was brought in with Torch-light, and with great shoutings; and from thence he went into Phœnicia with his host, (2 Maccab. 4. 21. 22.)

from thence he went into Phœnicia with his host, [2 Maccab. 4. 31. 22.]
Jafon three years after that he had bought the High-Priest-hood from Antiochus, sent Menelaus brother of Simon the Benjamite a traytor, that he might bring unto the King the promised money, and advise him of necessary affairs: but making use of the opportunity opportunity of his Embassy to his own advantage, by the same devices wherewith Jason circumvented Onias his brother, he also circumvented Jason; and promising unto the King 300 talents of silver above all that was to be performed by Jason, conveyed the High-Priest-hood unto himself, [2 Maccab. 4. 23; 24. 25. Sever. Sulpic. Histon. Sacr. lib. 2.] That this Menelaus was first named Onias, and was brother unto Onias the third, and to Jason himself, and the youngest son of Simon, the second, the High Priest, Josephus affirmeth, [Antiquit. lib. 12. cap. 6. cum lib. 15. cap. 3.]

Menelaus, having gotten the Principality by the Kings Mandate, expelled Jason into the Country of the Ammonites; but took no care to pay any of the monies which he had promised to the King, [2 Maccab. 4. 25, 26, 27.]

Cius Popilius Lenas, and Publius Aelius Ligur, being Consuls, Valerius Antias writes, that Attalus brother of Eumenes came to Rome, to lay crimes to the charge of Perseus King of the Macedonians, &c. to discover his provisions for war. The Annals of the most, and such unto whom thou would give the better credit, affirma Eumenes to have come in person himself. Eumenes therefore, as soon as he came to Rome, being entertained with the highest honour, and brought into the Senate; said, That the reason of his coming to Rome, besides the desire of seeing the gods and men, by whose benefit he is in such a fortune, above which he durst not with any higher, was, that he might openly advise the Senate to oppose the proceedings of Perseus, [Liv. lib. 42. Appian. Legat. 25. a Fulv. Ursino, edit.] And there was to great secrecy herein of all men, that before the war was finished and Perseus taken prisoner, it could not be known, what either he spoke, or the fathers answered, [Liv. lib. 42. Maximus, lib. 2. cap. 2.]

Some certain dayes afterward, Stryrus a principal person among the Ambassadors of the Rhodians, inveighing more liberally in presence of the Senate against Eumenes, because he had stirred up the nation of the Lycians against the Rhodians, and was more vexatious unto Asia than Antiochus, made a plausible, and to the people of Asia, (for even so far the esteem of Perseus had reached) an acceptable Oration: which notwithstanding procured from amongst the Romans greater respect unto Eumenes; so that all honours were conferred upon, and most ample rewards given unto him, with a Chariot of state, and an Ivory staff, [Liv. in sup. Diodor. Sicul. 9. Legat. 16. a Fulv. Ursino, edit.]

Eumenes, returning from Rome into his Realm, and going up from Cirra to the Delphic Temple, that he might sacrifice to Apollo, lies in wait, suborned by Perseus, tumbled down two vast stones, with one whereof the head of the King was smitten, with the other his shoulder benumbed; many stones being heaped on him after he fell from a steep place downward. His friends, the next day, being come to himself, brought him to the ship: from whence they pass to Corinth, from Corinth, their ships being conveyed over the neck of the Isthmus, to Aegina; where his cure was so private, none being admitted, that the report of his death was carried into Asia, and Rome, [Liv. lib. 42. Appian. Legat. 25.]

Attalus, crediting more halfly than befemed brotherly concord, that Eumenes was dead, did not onely confer with the Governour of the Castle of Pergamus as the unquestionable heir of the Crown, but the Diadem also being assumed, and espousing to himself Stratonice his brothers wife (daughter of Ariarathes King of the Cappadocians) rushed too hotly into her embraces: but not long afterwards, hearing that his brother lived, and was coming to Pergamus, laying his Diadem aside, he with the Guard, according to custom, went to meet him, bearing an halbert; whom Eumenes both friendly embraced, and also honourably, and cheerfully saluted the Queen; whispering nevertheless into his brothers ear, Μὴ σκεπτεῖς ὅτι μὲν πάλαι τέθνηκεν ἰδὼς.

Until thou seest that I am dead,
Approach not rashly to my bed.

Neither thorough his whole life did he do or speak any thing that might have a few of dislike: but entreated him with the same friendship as before, [Liv. lib. 42. *Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 306. Plutarch in Appian. lib. 42. *οὐκ ἐκείνη.]

Eumenes, the late wickedness of Perseus, besides the ancient hatred, inviting him thereto, prepared a war with his utmost strength. Ambassadors came from Rome, congratulating unto him his escape from so great a danger, [Liv. lib. 42.]

After that, Ariarathes King of the Cappadocians had born unto him of his wife Antiochis, daughter to Antiochus the Great, two daughters, and one son (first named Mithridates, and then Ariarathes) of the two sons which his wife (supposing that she should have been barren) had before suborned unto him, he sent Ariarathes the elder with with a competent estate to Rome, the young man called Olophernes, or Otophernes, into Ionia; least they should contend with his Jenuine son about the kingdom, [Diodor. Sicul. lib. 31. in Photii. Bibliothec. cod. 244.] This year therefore he sent Ariarathes his son to be educated at Rome; that from a child he might be accustomed to the manners and men of Rome: requesting, that they would permit him to be, not under the custody of holts, after the manner of private persons, but under the charge of publick care and tuition. That Embassy of the Kings was very acceptable unto the Senate; and they decreed that Cicius Scintius the Major, should appoint a furnished house where the Kings son and his Retinue might inhabit, [Liv. lib. 42.]

The Romans sent Ambassadors to their confederate Kings, Eumenes, Antiochus, Ariarathes, Mafaniffa, and Ptolemei King of Egypt; and others also into Greece, Thessaly, Epirus, Acamania, and the Islands: that they would unite themselves in war against Perseus, [Appian. Legat. 25.] T. Claudius Nero, and M. Decimus, were sent to make trial of Asia, and the Islands, and commanded also to go into Crete and Rhodes, to renew amity also, and likewise to discover whether the minds of their confederates had been courted by King Perseus, [Liv. lib. 42.]

The Legates that had been sent unto the confederate Kings, returning out of Asia, declared how that they had conferred with Eumenes in Asia, Antiochus in Syria, Ptolemei in Alexandria, That all of them had been solicited by the Embassies of Perseus; but had eminently continued constant in their fidelity, and had promised to perform whatever the people of Rome should command them. That they had also been with the confederate Cities: that the rest continued faithful enough, onely that they found the Rhodians wavering and seasoned with the devices of Perseus. The Rhodian Ambassadors came to acquit themselves of those reports, which they knew openly bruited concerning their City; and it was thought fitting, that when the new Councils entered upon their Magistracy, Senate should be called for them, [Liv. lib. 42.]

P. Licinius, and C. Cassius, being Consuls, all the Kings and Cities which were in Asia and Europe, set their thoughts on the care of the Macedonian and Roman war: both an ancient hatred did exasperate Eumenes, and also a new anger, because by the wickedness of Perseus, he was almost, like a Sacrifice, slain at Delphos. Prusias King of Bithynia, resolved to abstain from armes, and expect the event: for he thought it not equal to bear armes for the Romans against his wives brothers, and if Perseus should be Conqueror, pardon might easily be procured by his sister. Ariarathes King of the Cappadocians, besides that he promised assistance to the Romans upon his own account, from the time that he became united unto Eumenes by affinity, associated himself into all Councils both of war and peace. Antiochus sorely had an eye upon the kingdom of Egypt, desiring both the youth of the King, and the sloath of his Tutors; and by debating about Crete, he thought that he should find ground for a war, and manage it, without any impediment, whilst the Romans were employed about the Macedonian war: howbeit, he largely promised all Kings, both by his own Legates to the Senate, and to their Ambassadors himself. Ptolemei by reason of his youth, was even then at the disposing of others: his Governours did both prepare war against Antiochus, whereby they might defend Crete, Syria, and also made liberal promise for the Macedonian war, [Liv. lib. 42.] And thus Ptolemei King of Egypt, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, Eumenes of Asia, and Mafaniffa of Numidia, were assistants unto the Romans, [Oros. lib. 4. cap. 20.]

Three Ambassadors, A. Posthumus Albinus, C. Decius, and A. Licinius Nerva, were sent from the Romans to the Grecians: who afforded unto them the assistance of Archers, [Liv. lib. 42.]

Three other Ambassadors, T. Claudius Tiberius, P. Posthumus, and M. Junius were dispatched unto the Islands, and the Cities of Asia. These going about, did exhort their confederates to undertake against Perseus, the war for the Romans; and by how much every City was better stored with wealth, by so much they did their business there the more diligently, because the smaller would follow the greater. The Rhodians were esteemed of greatest reckoning for all paynes, because they were able not onely to countenance the war, but to assist it, 40 ships being provided by the authority of Hegesilocho, who was at that time in the chief magistracy, called by them Prytanis. This man even before, as soon as the war to be waged by the Romans with Perseus was known, did with many reasons exhort his Citizens, that they should joyntly their hopes with the Romans, That they would want the same provision of shipping which lately they had seen in the war of Antiochus, and formerly in that of Philip. That the Rhodians would be amazed in the providing a Fleet, at that time when it should be to be sent, unless they began with their Navy-confederates; That therefore they were to acquit themselves more indifferently; That by the truth of things they might confute the accusations alleged by Eumenes. Hereby being incited, they shewed unto the Ambassadors of Rome, upon their coming, a Fleet of 40 sail of ships, built and rigged, rigg'd, that it might appear that exhortation was not expected: and this Embassy was of great influence to engage the mindes of the Cities of Asia, [Idem, ibid. Polyb. Legat. 64.]

Perseus, after conference had with the Romans, compriz'd all reason of his cause in the form of one Epistle, and what was alledged on either side: so contrived, that he might seem to have the better in the debate: and unto other Cities he sent letters copied out, by Carriers; but unto Rhodes, he commanded Autenor and Philip to go Ambassadors: who being come thither, deliver the letters to the Magistrates; and then after a few dayes come into the Senate, request of the Rhodians, that for the present they should not move any thing, but, as from a watch-tower, behold what was done; but if the Romans should undertake against the laws of the league to provoke Perseus and the Macedonians, that they should endeavour to bring them to terms of agreement; for that that should be done, was the common interest of all; and especially befoolful for the Rhodians; for by how much they should be more intent than others, upon the fair dispensation of law and liberty (as such who were not the conservators and assertors of their own liberty only, but of the rest of the Grecians) by so much ought they more diligently to observe and provide, to their uttermost endeavours, for themselves against them, whose mind and counsels were contrarily inclined. When the Ambassadors had spoken these things, and more to the same effect, though their speech gave content unto all; yet because their minds were prepossessed with the benevolence of the Romans, and the authority of the better side did prevail; in other points they yielded themselves courteous toward the Ambassadors: but in place of an answer, they requested Perseus, not to demand any thing of that nature whereby they might be thought to do any thing against the will of the Romans: which answer Autenor accepted not, but making use of the rest of the civility and courtesie of the Rhodians, he returned unto Macedonia. [Polyb. Legat. 65. Livie lib. 42.]

Cains Lucretius the Roman Pretor, whilst the navy staid about Cephalenia, treated by letters with the Romans, requesting the ships to be sent to him; and he delivered that epistle to Socrates the anointer of the wrestlers to be conveyed. This came to Rhodes at the same time, when Strutocles was president of the Council, or Prytanis, for the later half year. When a debate was had of that matters it seemed meet unto Agathagerus, and Rhodophon and Astymedes, and many more, That the Rhodians should without any tergiversation or evasion should send the ships and that they should even from the beginning of the war join themselves with the Romans. But Dino and Polycratius, who did not approve of those things, which had before been decreed in favour of the Romans, cavell'd that that Epistle was not sent from the Romans, but from Eumenes the enemy of the Rhodians; who was wholly bent upon this, that he might induce them into a war, and engage the people in unnecessary charges and troubles: for it was brought by one obscure person, an anyoner of wrestlers unto Rhodes: whereas the Romans use with great care to pick out men of the choicest rank, for such an employment. When Strutocles, the chief officer, or Prytanis, had buckled himself against these men, and had spoken largely against Perseus; but on the contrary liberally commended the Romans: he prevailed with the Rhodians, that a decree of sending the ships should be established: wherefore six Gallies being immediately built, they sent five under the conduct of Timagoras to Chalcis; one to Tenedo, under the government of the other Timagoras. This man could not take Diophanes himself, whom he found at Tenedos, being sent from Perseus to Tenedos, but he took the ship with all her furniture. [Polyb. Legat. 67.]

The Romans, having heard the Embassies that came from Asia, the state of the Rhodians, and the rest of the Cities being understood, induc'd a Senate for the Ambassadors of Perseus. [Id. Legat. 68.] At that time therefore, Solon and Hippas endeavoured to discourse of all affairs, and to deprecate the anger of the fathers. But yet the crime of the treachery contrived against Eumenes was defended with especial industry: howbeit, (for the matter was evident) without any probability at all. When they had finished their speech, the Senate, who had before decreed the wardenounced unto them, that both themselves, and whosoever else had happily then come from the nation of the Macedonians to Rome, should immediately depart out of the walls of the Roman City, and within thirty dayes out of Italy. [Id. ibid. Diodor. Sicul. Legat. 17. Liv. lib. 42.]

When notice was given unto Eumenes, that he should with his uttermost strength assist the war against Perseus (as we read in Justin, lib. 33. cap. 1.) he came to Chalcis in Bœotia, by sea, with Attalus and Athenicus his brethren; his brother Philæteus, being left at Pergamus for the safeguard of the kingdom: from thence with Attalus and four thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, he came into Thessalia, unto Licinius the Consul. Athenicus was left at Chalcis with two thousand Foot: which Marius Lucius, coming thither with an army of sea soldiers, consisting of then thousand, took along with him to the siege of Haliartus. [Liv. lib. 42.]

About the same time almost, there came to Chaics, ships from their other confederates, two Punick Gallies, of five orders of oars, and two from Heracles out of Pontus of three orders of oars, four from Chalcedon, and as many from Samos; and moreover five Rhodian Gallies, of four orders of oars, [Id. ib.] But these C. Leucetrius, the Pretor Brother of Marcus, upon his approach, there being no sea-war re-dell ver'd unto the confederates. [Id. ib. cum Polyb. Legat. 67. 68.] But the Pretor himself, together with his brother assailing Haliartus, when he had taken it by surrender, it veld it the foundation, and without any opposition took Thebes. [Liv. ut. sup.]

Whilst these affairs were transacted in Bœotia, Licinius the Consul, Eumenes and Attalus in Thessalia, encountered with Perseus, the first conflict between them was ended without knowledge who had the better therein: about 38 men were slain of Eumenes his side, amongst whom fell Cassignatus Captain of the Galis; but in the second dispute Perseus got the victory. [Id. ib.] Who notwithstanding, being conqueror, upon his request to Licinius for peace, could not procure it. [Id. ib. Polyb. Legat. 69. Appian. Legat. 26.]

Perseus the conqueror, sent Antenor to Rhodes for the redemption of the Captives that failed with Diophanes: in which business, there was a long dispute made by them, which governed the Common-wealth, what ought to be done, for it seemed meet unto Philophon and Theæretus, that the Rhodians should by no means engage themselves in the affairs of Perseus; but Dino, and Polyaratius liked it; and at last they came to an agreement with Perseus, touching the redemption of the captives. [Polyb. Legat. 70.]

Antiochus, seeing now clearly the Alexandrians preparing themselves to a war for Cœle Syria, sent Melæger Ambassador to Rome; who by his command might declare it to the Senate, and alleging their confederacy might say, that against all right he was invaded by Ptolemei. [Id. Legat. 71.]

When now the war was begun by Antiochus and Ptolemei, upon the account of Cœle Syria; the Ambassadors of both Kings came to Rome: of Antiochus, Melæger, Soliphanes, and Heracles; of Ptolemei, Timotheus and Damon. Melæger came, that he might declare unto the Senate, that Ptolemei did first provoke Antiochus against all justice; and that he would justify him out of the possession of that Country, whereof he was Lord; but Timotheus, to renew friendship; howbeit, especially to observe Melæger his transactions with the Romans. When therefore he had renewed friendship, and received answers agreeable to his demands, he returned to Alexandria, But unto Melæger the Senate answered, That they would employ Quintus Marcius, to write unto Ptolemei about those matters, as he should see expedient for the interest of the people of Rome, and his own trust. [Id. Legat. 72. Diodorus. Sicul. Legat. 18.]

Antiochus, engaging in a fight, between Peleusium, and the mountain Casius, with Ptolemei Commanders, overcame them; but sparing the King a youth, and pretending friendship, he went up to Memphis; and there, according to custom, entering upon the kingdom, and saying, That he would be careful of the affairs of the land, with a small company of people, he brought all Egypt into subjection unto himself, [Porphyrin, ex Callinica historia, apud Hieronym. in Daniel, cap. 11.] at what time also Ptolemei Macedo, son of Dorymenes, to whom Philometor had committed the government of Cyprus, seemeth to have gone over to Antiochus side, and delivered unto him the Islands, as we read in the [2^d Maccab. 10. 12.] whereupon the care of Cyprus being committed unto Crates, [2^d Maccab. 4. 29.] he made Ptolemei Governour of Cœle Syria and Phenicia, [1st 8. 8.] and admitted him into the number of his principal friends. [1st Maccab. 3. 38.]

Jubileus 26.

Perseus, being put to flight by Lycinius the consul, Eumenes, Attalus and Misagene Duke of the Numidians, when he came to Pella, sent his army into their winter quarters. The Consul, returning to Larissa, having from thence sent home Eumenes and Attalus, dispos'd Misagene with his Numidians; and the rest of his army in their winter quarters through Thessaly. [Liv. lib. 42.]

When Sostratus Governour of the Castle of Jerusalem, to whom the exaction of such things as were collected, as customs out of mens estates, belonged, did request and demand the money, promised unto Antiochus by Menelaus, both of them were summoned by the King to Antioch: and Menelaus left Deputy in the administration of the High Priest-hood, Lyfimachus his brother; but Sostratus in his place; Crates, who was Governour of the Cypriotes, [2^d Maccab. 4. 27, 28, 29.]

In

In Cilicia, they of Tarsus and Mallos, moving sedition because Antiochus had given the Revenue of their Cities to Antiochis his Concubine: The King in all haste came to appeale it; leaving at Antioch Andronicus for his Deputy, [2 Maccab. 4. 30. 31.]

Menelaus, taking the opportunity of the Kings absence, (by the assistance of Lyfimachus, his Deputy) stole certain vessels of Gold out of the Temple at Jerusalem: whereof some he gave to Andronicus, and some he sold into Tyrus, and the Cities round about: which Onias 3, the Legal High Priest well knowing, he impeached him for sacrilege, and withdrew himself into a sanctuary at Daphne, that lieth by Antioch, [Ibid. 32. 33.] for there was in the middle of the wood a sanctuary, and a place dedicated to Apollo, [Strabo lib. 16. pag. 750.] which most ample Church of Daphneus Apollon, that wrathful and raging King Antiochus erected, [Ammia. Marcellin. lib. 22.]

Andronicus, at the suite of Menelaus, having cunningly drawn forth Onias out of the sanctuary, against his faith pledged and sworn unto him, perfidiously put him to death, [2 Maccab. 4. 34.]

King Antiochus, being returned out of Cilicia into Antioch, the Jews which were in the City, and many of other Nations, made complaint unto him of the unworthy murder of the most holy old man; who being afflicted at it, and testifying his grief by shedding of tears, he commanded Andronicus, being disrobed of his purple, to be lead about the City, and to be slain in the same place where himself had slain Onias, [Ib. 35. 38.]

Now when many Sacrileges had been committed at Jerusalem by Lyfimachus, with the consent of Menelaus: the multitude gathered themselves together against Lyfimachus, many golden vessels being carried away: in resistance of whom, he drew forth about three thousand armed men, appointing one Tyrannus for their Leader, a person far gone in years, and no less in fury; but of the Rout, some caught stones, some great clubs, some hiling their hands with the dust that lay before them, cast them altogether upon Lyfimachus and his soldiers: in that tumult many were wounded, some fell to the ground, the rest put to flight; but the Church-robber himself Lyfimachus, was slain near the Treasury, [Ib. 39. 42.]

When Antiochus the King came to Tyre, three men being sent from the Senate at Jerusalem against Menelaus, as a pertaker of the sacrileges and wickednesses of Lyfimachus, framed an accusation before him. Howbeit Menelaus being convicted, upon large summes of monies promised to Ptolemei, son of Dorymenes for the pacification of the King, thorough his assistance prevailed, not only that himself being acquitted, should continue in the High-Priest-hood, but also, that those three innocent persons, who pleaded for the City, and people, and holy vessels, should be condemned to die: Whole condition the Tyrans themselves commiserating, took care that they should be magnificently interred, [Ib. 44. 50.]

About that time, Antiochus prepared his second expedition into Egypt: and it fell out at Jerusalem, that for 40 dayes space together, strange apparitions of armed Horsemen, and of Foot-Companies, encountering one another, were seen in the aire, prefiges of ensuing evils, [2 Maccab. 5. 1. 4.]

Antiochus, coveting to joyn the kingdom of Egypt to his own, entered it with a numerous company, with Chariots, with Elephants with Horsemen, and a great Navy, and made war against Ptolemei King of Egypt: who turning himself from his preference, fled away, and many fell down wounded to death. Afterwards the seized upon the fenced Cities in the land, and Antiochus took the spoiles of Egypt, [2 Maccab. 5. 16. 19.]

The false rumor of Antiochus his death being spread abroad, Jason taking with him no less than a thousand men, made a sudden assault upon the City of Jerusalem: the City being surprized, Menelaus fled into the Castle; but Jason made laughter of his own Citizen; nor considering, that succell against his own alliances was the greatest infelicity. Nevertheles he could not recover the Principality; but fleeing away with shame, he returned back into the Country of the Ammonites: where being accused before Aretus, the King of the Arabians, and not daring to make his appearance there, he was forced to flee from one City to another; being hated of all men as a forsaker of the laws, and a publick enemy of his own Country, [2 Maccab. 5. 3. 8.]

Antiochus hearing in Egypt, that upon the spreading of the rumor of his death, the people of Jerusalem were exceeding joyful, and suspecting by the sedition stirred up by Jason, that Judea would revolt, was much enraged in mind, [2 Maccab. 5. 10. Joseph. in libello de Maccabais.] And returning after that he had imitted Egypt in the 43 year of the Greeks, or Seleucus, he went up against Israel, and Jerusalem, with a great multitude, [1 Maccab. 1. 21. 22.]

Josephus in his 12 book of Antiquities, seventh Chapter, writeth, That in the 143 year year of the Seleucians he took the City: but αὐτοῦ, without strike; the men of his own faction opening the Gates unto him: but in the [2 of Maccab. 7.] the City is said to have been ῥηματισθεῖς, that is, taken by force of armes: and Josephus himself, in his first book, first Chap. of the wars of the Jews, doth not only say ῥηματισθεῖς, but also ῥηματισθεῖς; that he took the City by force; but also addeth, καὶ ὁ πόλις ὅτι ἡ ἀποκρίσις ἵσχυρος: that he was engaged with the remembrance of those things which he had endured in the siege. Moreover, that they of Jerusalem, whilst Antiochus besieged the City, made a rally out in arme; and were slain in the dispute; as the same Josephus affirmeth, in the sixth book of the same Works, [pag. 929.]

The City then being taken, and the soldiers commanded to put all that they met to the sword, they cruelly ranged against all sorts, of whatsoever Sex or Age: so that in the space of three dayes, there were 80 thousand men missing: whereof 40 thousand were slain, and as many others sold, [2 Maccab. 5. 11. 14.]

Antiochus, not contented herewith, presumed also to go into the Temple, having Menelaus that Traytor to the Laws and his own Country, for his guide; and with wicked hands, to seize upon the holy vessels, and whatsoever else was dedicated by other Kings to the glory and honour of the place, [Ib. 15. 16.] as the golden altar, the candlesticks of light, with all the vessels thereof; the table of the shew-bread, and the pouring vessels and the vials, and the censers of gold, and the vail, and the crowns, and the golden ornaments that were fastned to the Temple doors: he pulled o the gold from every thing that was covered with gold, and likewise took the silver, and lovely vessel, and all the hidden treasures which he found, [2 Maccab. 23. 24.]

Polybius Megapolitanus, Strabo Cappadox, Nicolaus Damaicenus, Timagenes Cactor Chronographus; and Apollodorus, have written, that Antiochus being indigent of monies, brak his league, and assailed the Jews his confederates and friends, and spoiled the Temple that was full of gold and silver, and found nothing there worthy of decision, [Joseph. contr. Apion. lib. 2.] For paying a great stipend to the Romans, he was almost necessarily compelled himself with great expenses to gather monies by pillaging, and to omit no opportunity of spoiling, [Sever. Sulpic. Sac. Hist. lib. 2.] (Such notwithstanding as are enemies of the Jews) affirm, that many other things were here done by him in hatred of the Nation, and contempt of Religion; in the 34 book of Diodorus his Bibliotheca, and from thence in Photii. Bibliotheca (cod. 244.) thus related, *Antiochus Epiphanes, having overcome the Jews, entered into the holy Oracle of God, whither the Priests only might lawfully have access: there he found a stone Statue of a man, with a long beard, holding a book in his hand, and sitting upon an Altar: which he thought to have been Moses, who built Jerusalem, and founded the Nation, and established those laws that are hateful unto all Nations. But he desiring to take away the odium of the Nations, endeavored to abrogate the laws. Therefore he sacrificed a great Sow to the Statue of the Founder (Moses) and the Altar of God, that stood in the open aire, and poured blood upon them: and setting the flesh, commanded the holy bookes that contained their laws, to be marred and obliterated with the broth: but the immortal paper, as they term it, which always burned in the Temple, he commanded to be put out: and compelled (Menelaus) the Chief Priest, and other Jews, to eat swines flesh. Howbeit we oppose unto all the Calumnies of adversaries, that evident testimony of Strabo the Cappadocian, in the 16 book of his Geographic, where he commendeth the Jews, as just and religious persons. [Γεωγραφικὴ ἱστορίᾳ βιβλίον δεκάτοισι, pag. 761.]*

But that Antiochus, upon the taking of the City, did sacrifice (swine upon the Altar, and with the pottage made of their flesh, did sprinkle the Temple, even Josephus witnesseth, [lib. 13. cap. 16.]

Antiochus carrying 1800 talents out of the Temple, speedily repaired to Antioch; leaving Governours to afflict the Nation; at Jerusalem, Philip, by birth a Phrygian, by manners a Barbarian: at Garzium in Samaria; Andronicus. Besides whom, Menelaus more proudly than all the rest, insulted over the Citizens; carrying a most malicious mind against the Jews, [2 Maccab. 5. 21. 23.]

The Embassadors of Asia, were heard in a Senate at Rome: the Milesians remembering that they had done nothing, promised that they were in a readinesse to perform whatsoever the Senate should command them in furthering the war against Persus. The Alabandenses remembered that they had erected the Temple of the City of Rome, and instituted anniversary Games unto that Godesse: that they brought a golden Crown of 50 pound weight, as a gift unto Jupiter, which they might place in the Capitol, and 300 shields for Horsemen, which they would deliver to whom they would command them. The same also the Lampaceni, bringing a Crown of 80 pound weight, requested: declaring, how that they departed from Persus, after the Roman army came into Macedonia, whereto they were under the jurisdiction of Persus; and before of Philip: in requital whereof, and for that they had yielded all things to the Roman Commanders, they requested, this only, that they might be received into the friendship of the Roman people; and if a peace

Would be concluded with Perseus, that they might be excepted from being reduced into the power of the King. There was a civil answer returned unto the rest of the Legates. Quintus Mœnius the Pretor, was commanded to enroll the Lampræciæ after the form of associates. Rewards were given to them all, amounting to the value of two thousand pieces of coin unto each. The Alabandenses were commanded to carry back the shields unto A. Hostilius the Consul, into Macedonia. [Liv. lib. 43.]

When it was appointed by the common consent of the Achæans, that all the honours of Eumenes which were misbecoming, and repugnant unto the laws, should be taken away; Sotigenes, and Diopithes, Rhodians, who about that time decided the suites of Law, being upon private caules, offended with Eumenes, destroyed all his honours in the City of Peloponnesus. [Polyb. Legat. 74.]

Whilst A. Hostilius the Proconul with his forces, had his winter quarters in Thessalie, Attalus (who wintered at that time at Elatia) being certainly informed that his brother Eumenes took it most grievously, that by a publick Decree, they had taken away his most splendid honours; after communication of the business unto Archon, the Pretor of the Achæi, he sent Embassadors to the common Council of the Nation, who might negotiate with them touching the restoring of the honours unto the King again. Where, upon the perswasion of Polybius (the Historian) a Decree was made; wherein the Magistrates were commanded to renew all things that pertained unto the honour of Eumenes: unless there were somewhat amongst them, that did not well suite with the common interest of the Achæans, or else were repugnant unto the Laws. Thus therefore Attalus at that time rectified those miscarriages which were rashly committed at Peloponnesus in the business of his brother Eumenes his honour. [Id. ib. & in Excerpt. Valer. pag. 130, 131.]

4545. 169.

At the beginning of the Spring, Q. Marcus Philippus, the Consul, was sent against Perseus. [Liv. lib. 44. init.]

A Decree was published by the Achæans, touching the dispatch of auxiliaries, to their power, unto Marcus the Consul, which was brought unto him by Polybius. There was sent also Theocritus an Ambassador, from them unto Attalus, who might bring unto him that Decree, wherein the honours of Eumenes were restored unto him. At the same time when the news was brought unto the Achæans that the Anacleteria had been celebrated in honour of Ptolemei the King, as it is customary for the Kings of Egypt, when they come to the Legal age of their reign, effecting it their duty to give intimations of their joy for what was done; they determined to send Embassadors, for the renewing of that friendship which was between the Nation of the Achæans, and the Kings of Egypt: Whereupon, immediately Alcibiades and Partidas were chosen. [Id. Legat. 78.]

About that time there was a wicked prank, and most abhorring from the institutions of the Greeks committed in the Island of Crete: for there being between the Cydoniates and Apolloniates, not only society, but the common right of friendship, and when all the Laws and Rights of society which are esteemed Sacred amongst men, were common to them both; and when the Tables of that league ratified on each side by oath, being fastened unto the Image of Jupiter Idæus, were visibly to be looked upon: the Cydoniates notwithstanding, in the time of peace, being received by the Apolloniates as friends, trampling upon the Sacred bond of the league, surprized their City; and having put all the men to the sword, and spoiled their goods, they divided amongst themselves their wives, and children, and all their land. [Polyb. & Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. a Valer. lib. 78. pag. 133. & 310.]

The Cydoniates, being afraid of the Gortynians (by whom formerly their City was in great danger of being taken, when Niochorates endeavoured to surprize it) sent Embassadors unto Eumenes, requiring upon the score of their league, assistance from him. The King chose Leon Captain, whom he dispatched speedily thither with a Band of 300 soldiers. When those forces came, the Cydoniates delivered the keys of the gates unto Leon, and committed the whole City to his charge. [Id. Legat. 79.]

When by the instigation of Eulaus the Eunuch, there was a new war undertaken by Ptolemei for the recovery of Cœleſyria; Antiochus taking his third Expedition into Egypt, reduced it into his power. [Polyb. Legat. 80, 81, 82.] for the Egyptians being discontented, and driven away, when he could have put them all to the sword, riding about on horseback, he forbade them to be slain, and gave command, that they should be taken alive: for which humanity chiefly, he gained both Pledgments, and a little while afterward all Egypt. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. a Valer. pag. 320.]

Whilst the contrary factions at Rhodes increased daily more and more, after that they had heard that at Rome it was decreed by the Senate, That from thenceforth those things were to be performed, nor which their own Magistrates, but the Senate should command; by the perswasion of Philophon, and Thecretus, at the beginning of

of the summer, Hegesilochus, son of Hegesias, and Nicagoras son of Nicander, were sent Ambassadors to Rome; But unto the Consul, Q. Marcus Philippus, and unto C. Marcus Figulus the Admiral of the fleet Agelipolis, Arifton, and Pancrates; all these were commanded to renew amity with the Roman people, and to answer unto the accusations wherewith some endeavoured to lead the City. But Hegesilochus was moreover enjoined to request liberty of carrying forth corn. Agelipolis overtook Q. Marcus encamping at Heraclea in Macedonia. To whom when he had delivered his commands, the Consul did not only say that he gave no credit unto such that were detractors of the Rhodians, but also exhorted the Ambassadors not to endure any of those that should dare to tattle any thing of the Romans, and abundantly performed many offices of humanity unto them: he wore also of the same affairs unto the Roman people. But when Agelipolis was wonderfully taken with the courtesy of the Consul, Marcus taking him aside unto private conference, said, That he admired that the Rhodians did not endeavour to reconcile the Kings that fought for Cœleſyria, for it was chiefly conducive unto themselves, Afterwards Agelipolis went unto Caius, the Admiral of the fleet, and being kindly entertained by him, yea, and far more sweetly than he was by Marcus the Consul, he in a short time returned unto Rhodes: where, after that he had given an account of his Ambassage, when as both the Roman Commanders seemed to contend equally in declaring their courtesy, and humanity with words, and signifying their favour in their answer, all the Rhodians began to be lifted up in their minds, and to be swollen with vain hope; but not all in the same manner: for the more solid party were exceeding joyfully, for the benignity of the Romans: but such as affected novelty, and were ill disposed unto the present state, they concluded in their thoughts, That this wonderful great and excessive civility of the Romans, was a sign, That they were terrified with the imminent danger, and that affairs did not succeed according unto their mind. But after that it had fallen out, moreover, That Agelipolis had bolted out amongst some, That he was privately commanded by Marcus, to make a proposition in the Senate of the Rhodians; of compounding an agreement between the Kings: then assuredly Dino made no question but the affairs of the Romans were in a most evil condition: therefore there were even Ambassadors sent to Alexandria, to conclude the war that was commenced between Antiochus, and Ptolemei. [Polyb. Legat. 80.]

Towards the end of the Summer, Hegesilochus and other Ambassadors of the Rhodians coming to Rome, were entertained with all kind of humanity, and courtesy. But it was most manifestly known, that the Rhodians were divided with civil dissensions: Whilst Agathagetus, Philophon, Rhodophon, and Thecretus, placed all their hopes in the Romans; on the contrary, Dino, and Polyaratus in Perseus, and the Macedons: from whence it came frequently to pass, that the matters that came to be debated, being disputed appositely on either side, & with different judgements, such as had a mind to disparage the City, took from thence an occasion. However, the Senators pretended that no such matters were known unto them; who notwithstanding well understood all the matters that were transacted by them; however, they granted license unto the matter for the exportation of an hundred thousand bullocks of bread-corn out of Sicilie. [Id. Legat. 64, 73. & 80.]

After that Egypt was possessed by Antiochus, upon the debates of Comanus, and Cincas with King Ptolemei, touching the main matters, it seemed expedient to conclude, That there should a Council be enrolled out of the most principal Captains, by whose sentence all things from thence forward should be dispatched. Unto that Council it seemed behoofull in the first place, That such foreigners of the Greeks, who should happily be found there, should go Ambassadors to Antiochus, to negotiate with him, concerning a peace. [Id. Legat. 81.]

There were then at that place two Ambassadors sent from the nation of the Achæi: one for the renewing of friendship with the King, which was committed unto Alcibiades, son to Xenophon of Aegæ, and Pajadas: another concerning the contention of the Antagonists: there was sent also from the Athenians an Ambassage, touching a certain donation, the principal person wherein was Demaratus. Moreover there were two sacred Embassadors from the same men; one touching the feast of Minerva, called Panathenæa, the chief wherof was Callias the Pancratiast, or conqueror at the games, the other touching mysteries, which was discharged by Cleostratus, who upon that argument spake an oration unto the King; there were present from Miletum Eudemus and Icticius, from Clazomenæ, Apollonides, and Apollonius. [Id.]

Together with these, Ptolemei the King sent his own Ambassadors, Tlepolemus, and Ptolemei the Rhetorician: who laying against stream, came unto Antiochus, he receiving them courteously invited them the first day unto a sumptuous feast; & the next day gave them the liberty of a personal conference, and commanded them to publish their commissions: in the first place therefore, spake the Ambassadors of the Achæans unto him, afterwards Demaratus that was sent by the Athenians, and next to him Eudemus of Mileum. Howbeit, all affirmed that the war was commenced through the default of Eulaisus the Eunuch; after that alledging the kindred and age of Ptolemy, they deprecated the rage of the Kings. Antiochus having given consent unto their speeches, and discoursed himself more fully to the same purpose, he began to make mention of his rights, endeavouring with great earnestness to prove that the possession of Cœlœsyrta appertained unto the Kings of Syria; and denying those things to be true, which the Ambassadors from Alexandria alledged, concerning Cœlœsyrta, given for a Dowry with Cleopatra, mother of Philometor then reigning. To which purpose, when he had largely discoursed, and had proved his cause not to himself only, but to all that were present, he for that season went to Naucratis by shipping, and having at that place also benignly bespoken, and entreated the Citizens, and given amongst the Greeks who remained there, pieces of gold, amounting to sixteen shillings eight pence to each man, he took his journey to Alexandria. He promised to give his answer to the Ambassadors, after that Aristides and Theris should be returned; for he desired that the Greeks should be privy to, and witnesses of, all his actions, [Ibid. Legat. 82.]

Philometor, being educated by Eulaisus the Eunuch, in delights, and effeminate impudency, contracted such sloth, that, being withdrawn from all danger, and by great distance divided from the enemy, he parted with a most large and wealthy kingdom, without striking a stroke. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Palesia. pag. 310. 313.]

The Crown being taken from Philometor, after that he had reigned 11 years, by Antiochus, the Alexandrians committed the way of affairs unto Euergetes his younger brother. [Porphy. in Grec. Ensebeum. Scelig. pag. 54. & 225.] whom they themselves notwithstanding afterwards called Cæseres, or the Malefactor. [Athena. lib. 4. cap. 24. & lib. 12. cap. 27.] Howbeit, from the complacency of his bulk, and the extension of his paunch, he obtained the surname of Phylcon, or the Gor-belly, which joined together with his name, is read after this sort in his coins, ΠΤΟΛΕΜΑΙΟΥ ΕΥΣΚΟΝΟΣ ΕΥΕΡΓΕΤΟΥ.

This Ptolemy, by Epiphanius in his small book of weights and measures, for his love of learning, is termed Ptolemaus Philologus, for he was both one of Aristarchus his scholars, and he wrote historical observations, which are frequently cited by Atheusius. [Athena. lib. 2. cap. 33.] For unto this second Euergetes do belong those things which we produced out of Athenæus, and Galen concerning the first, in the year of the World 3761, from whence, seeing that at that time Eumenes son of Attalus reigned in Asia; whom Strabo affirmeth to have furnished Pergamus with libraries. [Ibid. 13. pag. 614.] I suppose those things to be referred unto this Ptolemy, which are read in Vitruvius his Preamble of his seventh Book. The Attalian King, being induced therunto by the wonderful delights of Philologie, when they had erected for the common delight a famous library at Pergamus; then also Ptolemy, being invited with infinite zeal and eagerness of desire, did not with less industry endeavour to procure the like at Alexandria, and in Plinius, lib. 13. cap. 11. Through the emulation of the Kings, Ptolemy and Eumenes, about libraries, Pappus writeth, That at Pergamus, parchments were found out, Ptolemy suppressing the Egyptian paper.

Ptolemy Philometor, being driven out of his kingdom, he fled unto his younger brother Ptolemy Euergetes, to Alexandria; [Iustin. lib. 34. cap. 2.] whom the Alexandrians, delivering from the power of Antiochus, made him with his brother partner of the kingdom, numbring with the 12 of the one, the fourth year of the other his reign. [Porphy. ut sup.] although a while after they cast out Philometor, and banished him. [Polyb. Legat. 84. & 89.]

Antiochus, willingly catching at that occasion, undertook the government of the banished Prince, and made use of the specious pretence of bringing him home again in the defence of his Egyptian war, in receiving Embassages into all the Cities of Asia, and Greece, and in the dispatch of letters. [Livie lib. 44. and 45.]

Antiochus, through the handsome colour of bringing back Ptolemy the elder into his kingdom, managing his war with his younger brother, who at that time possessed Alexandria, got the better of him at sea fight at Pelusium: and going over the Nile with his army, on a bridge suddenly erected, besieged Alexandria itself: Whereupon that same Ptolemy the younger, and Cleopatra his sister, dispatched Ambassadors to Rome, who might implore the Senate to send assistance unto the kingdom, and such Princes as were friends unto the Empire: for such were the obligations of the people of Rome unto Antiochus, and to great their authorities with all Kings and nations; That if they should but send Ambassadors to declare that it pleased not the Senate, That a war should be made with their confederate Princes, he would forthwith depart depart from the walls of Alexandria, and withdraw his army into Syria. [Id. lib. 44.]

The wall of Alexandria having been assaulted to no purpose, Antiochus departed from thence. [Id. lib. 45.] Meleager, Sostrarchus, and Heraclides, being notwithstanding, first sent Ambassadors to Rome: who of 150 talents committed to their charge were to bestow fifty upon a Crown, to be delivered to the Romans, and to divide the rest of the sum to certain Cities of Greece. [Polyb. Legat. 83.]

About those dayes the Ambassadors of the Rhodians, of whom Pucio was the chief that were sent to settle a peace, arriving at Alexandria, presently afterward went into the Camp unto the King: These being admitted unto conference with the King, commemorating the conjunction of each kingdom with the other, and the mutual respects of alliance between both the Kings, and what advantages would redound unto each of them upon the concluding of a peace, entered upon a long discourse. But the King interrupting the Ambassador in his speech, said, That there was no need of any longer discourse; for the kingdom appertained unto the Elder Ptolemy; and he had long since made a peace with him, and was his friend; and if the Alexandrians would recal him out of banishment, he was contented. [Id. 84.]

Antiochus, leaving Ptolemy the Elder at Memphis, whose kingdom he pretended was fought for by his Forces, and delivering unto him the rest of Egypt, after that he had left a strong Garrison at Pelusium, withdrew his army into Syria; for when he had promised unto himself this issue of the civil war between the brethren, the Conqueror being wearied in the dispute, would not be equal unto himself: he thought it behoof to keep unto himself the key of Egypt, that he might again at pleasure bring in his army, and assault the brother that had conquered. [Liv. lib. 45.]

King Eumenes, coming from Elæa with 20 covered ships, in the coasts of the Calandranes met with Marcus Figulus, the Pretor, Admiral of the Roman Fleet, and five covered ships sent from Prusias the King there, with the Pretor: at the same time, both by sea and land, he in vain assaulted the City Callandrea; Toron also, and Demetrias being attempted with no better success: There was a report that by Cydas the Cretian, and Antimachus Governour of Demetrias, conditions of reconciliation were negotiated between Eumenes and Perseus. For that Cydas, who was one of Eumenes his intimate friends, was formerly observed to discourse at Amphipolis with Chimiras, a certain Country-man of his own, and now at Demetrias with Menecrates, a certain Captain of Perseus, and again with Antimachus: under the very walls of the City. Eumenes certainly departing from Demetrias, sailed unto Q. Marcus the Consul, and having gratulated his prosperous entrance into Macedonia, departed into his own kingdom to Pergamus. Marcus Figulus the Pretor, part of the Fleet being sent to winter at Scythium, went with the rest of the Ships unto Oream in Boeotia. [Id. lib. 44.]

Reports are very various touching King Eumenes: Valerius Antias saith, That neither the Pretor was assisted with a Fleet by him after that he had often sent for him by letters: neither that he departed with favour from the Consul into Asia; (being incensed, that it was not permitted unto him to march in the same Camp) That it could not be obtained of him to leave behind, so much as those French-horsemen, which he had brought with him. That Attalus his brother, both remained with the Consul, and that his fidelity was sincere in an equal temper, and his endeavours notable in the whole war. [Ibid.] And indeed Velleius Paterculus writeth, that King Eumenes was of an indifferent mind in that war, and answered not the beginnings of his brother, nor his own accustomed fashion. [Historia. lib. 1. cap. 9.]

At Rome, the Ambassadors of Pampylus brought unto the Senate a golden Crown made of 20 thousand Philippæans; and upon their request, liberty was granted unto them to repose their gift in the Chappel of Jupiter, and to sacrifice in the Capitol; moreover as to their desire of renewing friendship, they had a gracious answer, and a gift of two thousand pieces of coin sent unto each of them. [Liv. lib. 44.]

At that time, the Ambassadors from King Prusias, for making up a peace with King Perseus, received an audience: Prusias protesting both that at that time he stood for the Romans, and that he should stand for them during the war: Nevertheless, seeing that Ambassadors had come to him from Perseus touching the conclusion of the war, and he had promised them to be an interceder with the Senate, he desired, if they could be persuaded to end their displeasure, that himself might be used by them in the making up of the reconciliements. [Id. ib.]

The Embassie of the Rhodians was more arrogant, concerning the same business; for the countesses which they had done for the Roman people, being proudly related, and almost the greater part of the victory procured over Antiochus, being arrogated to themselves; they added, That when there was peace between the Macedonians and the Romans, then was amity begun between themselves and King Perseus; the which,

which, they had broken off against their wills, not upon any provocation of his against themselves, but because it pleased the Romans to draw them into the society of the war: That now the third year, they felt many inconveniences of that war: That upon the blocking up of the sea, their Island was pressed with poverty, their revenues that came by sea, and their vituals being lost: when they could no longer endure this, That they had sent other Embassadors unto Macedonia unto Perseus, who might declare unto him, That the Rhodians were contented that he should make up a peace with the Romans, and that themselves were sent to signify to much to Rome, That the Rhodians should consider, what ought to be done against him, in whom the fault should be found of not concluding the war. Claudius Quadrigrarius saith, That there was no answer given unto these persons: only there was recited a decree of the Senate, wherein the Roman people denounced, That the Carians and Lycians were free, and that letters should immediately be dispatched unto both nations, that they might understand so much. Which thing being heard, That the principal person of the Embassadors, whose high language the Senate a little before had scarce received, fell down astonished: Others say, that it was answered, That the Roman people even in the beginning of the war, had been assured by no vain authors, That the Rhodians had entertained secret debates with Perseus the King against their Common-wealth: and if it had been doubtful formerly, yet the Legates words a little before, had made it certain: and that fraud for the most part, though it be more wary at the beginning, discovereth it self, that they would consider what was to be done by them; what the Rhodians were about to consider, themselves knew, That assuredly the people of Rome, when Perseus should be overcome, (which they hoped would shortly be) would take care to make condign requital according to the merits of each City in that war: howbeit, a reward of two thousand pieces of coyn was sent unto each of the Embassadors, which they accepted not. [Id. Ibid.]

But Dion giveth this account of the business. King Perseus requested peace from the Romans, and had obtained the same, except the Rhodians, fearing lest the Romans should have wanted an adversary, had joyntly their Embassadors with the Embassadors of Perseus, for by them (the Legates of the Rhodians) nothing that was moderate, and such as became those to speak a peace for Perseus, as given it unto him, they both proudly spake other things, and also at last threatened, That they would, with the rest, assault them by war, by whose fault the peace should not be made. Whereby it came to passe, that, whereas they were not unsuspected by the Romans before, they rendered themselves more hatefull, and hindered Perseus from obtaining a peace, [Dion. Legat. 19. al. 20.]

About the beginning of the Consulship of L. Emilius Paulus, and C. Licinius, the Alexandrian Embassadors from Ptolemei and Cleopatra, Princeesse, were called into the Senate: being clad with white apparel, and having both long beards and hair, when they had entered into the Senate with Olive-branches, they prostrated themselves: and making lamentation, they entreated the Senate, That they would give their assistance unto a kingdom, and Princeesse that were in amity with them. [Liv. lib. 44.]

When the Senate had understood by them, That Antiochus, having seized upon the rest of Egypt, did still remain there, that he might be master of Alexandria also; supposing that the greatnesse of this King did somewhat concern them, they decreed an Embassage, both for the making of a peace, and also for the viewing in general, what the face of affairs was in that place. [Polyb. Legat. 90.]

Immediately therefore, the fathers sent C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, and C. Hostilius, Embassadors, to conclude the war between the Kings, they were commanded to go first to Antiochus, then to Ptolemei, and declare, if they abstained not from war, which of them should be the cause thereof, they should not esteem him for a friend or a confederate. [Liv. lib. 44.]

These with the Embassadors from Alexandria, having taken their journey within three dayes, there came Embassadors from Macedonia on the last of the Quinquartia, that is, of the feast of Minerva's birth day: who amongst other things, related, That Eumenes and his fleet, as ships brought with a tempest, without any cause, both came and departed, neither did the mind of that King seem sufficiently constant, and as they said all things doubtfull, of Eumenes, that they declared the extraordinary constant fidelity of Attalus. [Id. ib.]

The time when the Embassadors, sent into Egypt, departed from Rome in an ancient Diary of this year (which Pighius hath inserted into the second Tome of his Annals in the 585 year of the City) is found thus exprest, The third day before the Nones of April, C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, C. Hostilius are sent Ambassadors to the Kings of Syria and Egypt, for the saking up the war between them: the Embassadors early in the morning with a troop of their Clients and kindred, sacrificed in the Temple of Castor, unto the household gods of P. R. they offered a Bull, and so concluded their sacrifice. Howbeit, the third day, before the Nones of April, as the year at Rome then stood, answered unto the twenty third of our January, according to the Julian account: as we gather from the Eclipse of the Moon, which fell out five moneths afterward.

After that Antiochus with his army had returned into Syria, Ptolemei Philometor, prudently considering the danger that hung over his head, by reason of him, left not off sending to Alexandria, unto Cleopatra his sister first, and then to Evergetes his brother, and his friends, until he had confirmed a peace with them; his sister extraordinarily assisting him, not onely by advice, but also by entreaties. A peace therefore being made with common consent, returning from Memphis, and being received into Alexandria, he reigned together with his brother, not so much as the multitude opposing themselves: which in the war, not onely by the siege, but also after it was raised from their walls, had been brought low through the want of all things, because no supply had been brought to them out of Egypt. [Liv. lib. 45. cum Polyb. Legat. 89.]

Whereas it was meet that Antiochus should have rejoiced hereupon, if he had brought his army into Egypt for his restorations sake, he was so offended, that he more eagerly and maliciously prepared war against them both, than formerly he had against the one of them: and thereupon presently sent his fleet unto Cyprus, which in a fight overthrew the Egyptian ships there, and the Captains of Ptolemei, [Liv. lib. 45. Polyb. Legat. 92.]

Both Ptolemei's brethren, having at that time the Crown and Kingly power, forasmuch as they were destitute of all kind of aid, sent Eumenes, and Dionysiodorus, Embassadors, unto the nation of the Achaeans, to request 1000 horse men, and 200 horsemen, and that Lycortas might be Captain of all the auxiliary forces, and his son Polybius of the horse men, they wrote also to Theodorus the Sicyonian, to hire a thousand mercenary souldiers. [Polyb. Legat. 89. & 91.]

Perseus King of the Macedonians, and Genius King of the Scythians, being united in league together, by giving pledges on either side, decreed, That Embassadors should be sent to Rhodes, hoping that the City, in whose only power the glory of shipping then was, might by the authority of two Kings be incited unto the war against the Romans. The Embassadors were sent unto Thesalonica, &c. commanded to be in a readiness to take ship: at that place was Metrodorus, who came lately from Rhodes, and affirmed that by the authority of Dion, and Polyaratus, principal men of the City, the Rhodians were prepared for war; for as amongst the Coans, Hippocritus and Diomedon brethren, so amongst the Romans, Dino and Polyaratus have been bold to speak for the Macedonians and accuse the Romans, and publicly advise a conjunction with Perseus. This Metrodorus was made the chief person of this confederate Embassage with the Scythians. [Polyb. Legat. 85. & in Excerptis Valisii, pag. 137. Livie lib. 44.]

Perseus, having sent Teremastus the Cretian Embassador to Antiochus, advised him not to let slip the present opportunity, nor to think that the pride and insolent injuries of the Romans pertained unto him alone, but rather that he should be assisted to run the same hazard of fortune himself also within a short time, except he now afforded his assistance unto him, in the chief place by composing the dissention, and sending a peace, or at least, if that might not be by contributing his help. [Polyb. Legat. 85. Liv. lib. 44.]

At the same time also, Perseus sent Cryphorides (for so the Collections of Polybius name him, whom the printed Copies of Livie call Epipontes) Embassador unto Eumenes, who had formerly discharged two Embassies unto the same person. [Id. Ibid.] surely by the proffer of money he solicited Eumenes, That he should either take his part, or reconcile him unto the people of Rome, or assist neither side; hoping that he should obtain one of these things, or at least by that solicitation procure (which indeed he attained) that Eumenes should become suspected unto the Romans. But Eumenes despised the friendship of Perseus, &c. for the making of a peace demanded 100 talents, and to remain neutral to both, 1000. Perseus promised to give the sum required for the procurement of a peace, but not before hand; howbeit, he would depose it in the Temple at Samothrace, until the peace were concluded. [Appian. Macedon. in Excerpt. Valisii, p. 562.] But such that Island was within his own jurisdiction, Eumenes saw that it signified no more than if the money had been at Pella, and insisted hereupon, That he should bring part of the money for the present. Which not obtaining, Cryphon, their secret debates being unknown, returned home: that the negotiation had been concerning the redemption of captives, both themselves sailed abroad and Eumenes, for the avoiding of suspicion, informed the Consul to the same purpose. [Livie, lib. 44.]

44. The Rhodians disagreeing between themselves, and that party prevailing in their assemblies which was inclined to Perseus, it seemed good that Embassadors should be sent to compose the war between Perseus and the Romans: the chief presidents thereof, the Rhetorick Councils immediately dispatched Embassadors unto Rome, Agellipolis and Cleombrotus, but to the Consul and Perseus, Damon, Nicotroast, Agelliosus, and Telephus; they sent also Embassadors unto Crete, to renew friendship with all the Cretians; and to advise them to have an eye to the condition of thetimes, and the imminent danger, and that agreeing with the people of Rhodes, they should esteem the same as foe and friend, which they should do: there were sent also Embassadors to each City, who might entreat with them touching the same affairs. [Ptolemy, lxxxvi.]

The Embassadors of the Ptolemies, the Kings, whilst it was yet Winter, coming into Peloponnesus, after that in an Assembly of the Achaens celebrated at Corinth they had renewed their ancient friendship, which they signified by many arguments one towards another; and had premeditated in their view the afflicted condition of the Kings, requesting aide: the multitude were in a readinesse to give their assistance, not with a part of their Forces, but if need should require, with all their strength. Howbeit, Callicrates, and D'ophane; and Hyp'ebatus, opposed this judgement: against whom, Lycortas and Polybius discouaging, exhorted the Achaens that being mindful of their engagements and courtesies received, but especially of their oath, they should keep the laws of Confederacy. But when the multitude had again joyntly agreed that assistance should be given; Callicrates frustrated that debate, terrifying the Magistrates, because the laws gave no liberty in such like assemblies, to deliberate of auxiliaries. [Polyb. Legat. 89.]

A little while afterwards, a Council being called in the City of the Sicynians; in the which, not only the Magistrates were present, but all that were above 30 years of age; after many debates had passed, a carryer was brought by Callicrates immediately after his arrival directly into the Theatre, bringing forged letters from Q. Marcus the Proconsul; wherein he was signified to exhort the Achaëans, that complying with the desire of the Romans, they would endeavour to reconcile the Kings together: and thereupon Embassadors were sent from the Achaëans, Archon of Egia, Arcellus and Aristio Megapolitans, to make a peace between Ptolemeis, the Kings, and Antiochus: at which King Polybius being incensed with indignation, withdrew himself from the care, and administration of affairs: and the Embassadors from Alexandria having lost the hope of assistance, returned home, [Id. ibid. & Legat. 91.]

Pericles, having his winter quarters at Bile, drew his forces into Ionia, whereby he might intercept the bread-corn that was conveyed from thence unto the Romans, [as Appian, us. sup. pag. 565.] Antenor and Callippus the Admirals of the Navy, with 40 small boates and five larger vessels called Prizes [from the license of the ships named, which they do resemble] he sent unto Tenedos: that being from thence dispersed by the Cyclades, Islands, they might secure the ships that came with bread-corn into Macedonia: the ships being brought to Callisarea, after that they had first arrived at the havens which lie under the Mountain Athos, and from thence with a calme sea, at Tenedos; sent away the Rodians open vessels, and Eudemus their President without violation, nay even civilly entreated. But being afterwards informed that so burdenships of their friends were shut in by the beaked ships of Eumenes under the conduct of Damius, at the very mouth of the haven at Mount Athos, having dispersed their enemies, they brought them forth and sent them with the conduct of ten small vessels into Macedonia, [Livy, lib. 44.]

to Macedonia; [Liv. lib. 44.] returned unto the Fleet lying at Sigeum : which from thence failed to Subota (an Island lying between Elaea, and Athos) howbeit the next day after that they came thither, 35 ships which they call Hippagogi, or vessels for the conveyance of horses, Ferry-boats coming from Elaea with French Horsemen, and horses (sent from Eumenes to Attalus) were bound for Phanes, a Promontory of the Chians, from whence they might put over into Macedonia. Antenor, having looted from Subota, between the Promontory of Erythra, and that of Chios where the sea is most fraight, suddenly light upon these : and when there was no hope of resisting, part of them which were near unto the shoar of the Continent swum into Erythra : part, hoysing up sail, threw their ships upon Chios, and leaving their horses behind them, posted a main unto the City. But when the small vessels had disburthened their armed men nearer unto the City, and at a more convenient place of landing, the Macedonians having gotten the Frenchmen into their power, slew some of them as they fled in the way, and others being intercepted before the gate. There were slain of the Gauls well nigh 800 (or 700 as Gruters edition hath it) and 200 taken alive. The horses were partly (the ships being broken) confumed in the sea.

fea, and partly houghd by the Macedonians on the flour. Antenor commanded the fame ten vessels which he had sent before, to convoy 20 of the fleetest^{est} hories with the captives unto Theſſalonica, and as soon as they poſſibly could, to return to the Fleet; he would expect them at Phazæ. The Navy lay almost three dayes before the City, from thence they went unto Phazæ; and being carryed over in the 10 vessels (returned before they were expected) they passed thorough the Ægean Sea unto Delos;

[Id. ibid.]

While these things were doing, the Roman Embassadors, C. Popilius, C. Decimus, and C. Hostilius, having come from Chalcis, after that they had arrived at Deolos with three Gallies of five ranks of oars; found there 40 ships of the Macedonians; and five Gallies of King Eumenes with five ranks of oars. The sanctuary of the Temple, and the Island, gave security unto all persons. The Romans therefore and the Macedonians being mingled together, and the sea-confederates of Eumenes, the religion of that place making a Truce, were conversant in the Temple; (Id. ibid.)

Ananor, Perseus his Admiral, when there was intimation from the watch-towers, that ships of carriage were discovered at sea; pursuing himself with part of the shipping, the other part being disposed about the Cyclades, either sunk or spoiled all the ships, except such as were bound for Macedonia. Popilius, or the Navy of Eumenes, succoured as many as they could; and being conveyed by night in two or three vessels for the most part, deceived the Macedonians. [Id. ibid.]

About that time, the Embassadors of Gentius, King of the Scavonians, Parmenio and Morcus, and together with these, Metrodorus (Embassador) of Perleus, came to Rhodes: whole authority was encreased, not only by the approach of the Frigots which passed up and down by the Cyclades, and the Ægean Sea, and by the multitude of the Horsemen which were slain; but also by the very conjunction of Perleus and Gentius, and the rumor of the Galatians, Horle and Foot, coming with a great number. These things indeed gave courage unto Dinon and Polyartas, who were for Perleus his interest; but, on the contrary, dejected Thæteus. It was decreed therefore by the Rhodians, to give a friendly answer unto both the Kings; and to signify unto them: That they had resolved by the interposition of their authority, to put a period to the war; and consequently to admonish them, to be inclinable to a peace. Moreover the Embassadors of Gentius were entertained with much civility in their publick place of Assembly. [Id. ibid. Polyb. Legat.]

At the beginning of the Springs, Achaioch: with his army, marching for Egypt, came into Colofroy: about Rhinocolura: unto the Embassadors of Ptoleme, the legator rendering thanks unto him, for that by his means he had received his paternal kingdom, and requesting, That he would maintain his own right, and rather speak what he would have done, than changing from a confederate to an enemy, proceed by violence, and armes: he gave this answer: That he would upon no other terms revoke his fleet, and reduce his army, unlesse he would surrender unto him all Cyprus, and Pelusium, and the field that was adjacent unto that mouth of the Nile, called Pelusiack: and he fixed a day within which he might receive an answer, [Livie, lib. 45.]

Antiochus dispatched Apollonius Overfeer for the Collection of his Tribute (called by Josephus ἀπολλωνίου) in the 12 book of his Antiquities, cap. 7, ὑπερφερον in the 2 of the Maccab, 5, 24,) with an army of 22 thousand into the Cities of Judea; two compact years after that he had spoiled the Temple at Jerusalem, commanding them to put to death all the young men that were come to years of maturity and in full strength, but to sell the women and younger forts; [1 Maccab, 13, 30. 2 Maccab, 5, 24.]

3. 244] After that Apollonius was come to Hierusalem: without any shew of hostility, he restrained himself until the Sabbath Day, on which he destroyed all that came out to discharge religious duties, and, marching with his Forces about the City, he put to death a great multitude: and taking the spoils of the City, he let it on fire, and pulled down the houses, and the walls round about: They led away also captive the women and children, and seized on the cattle, [1 Maccab. 1. 33, 34. 2 Maccab. 5. 25, 26.] Josephus, [in the 12 book of his Antiquities and the seventh chap.] ascribing unto Antiochus himself, those things that were done by his ministers, affirmeth him: After the sacking of the whole City, partly to have slain the inhabitants, and partly to have led them away captive, together with their children and wives, to the number of ten thousand.

Judas Maccabæus alſo, departing with nine others, ſpent his time in the mountains after the manner of wild beaſts together with his companions, who continued to feed on herbs, leaſt they ſhould be partakers of the pollution, [2 Maccab. 5, 27.] or of the prohibited meates, or of the idolatry, or of the contamination alſo, and the deſolation of the Sanctuary which infeſted thereupon; [1 Maccab. 1, 39, 41.] which was three years and fix months before the reſtitution and purification thereof, made afterwards by the same Judas Maccabæus, [1 Maccab. 4. 43, 54.] For which space of time Josephus intimates the City of Jerusalem to have been oppressed by Antiochus in the Preface of his books concerning the Jewish war, and the service of the daily sacrifice to have ceased in the first book, and first chap. and the Sanctuary to have been desolate in the sixth book of the same Work (pag. 229.) the same author sheweth; who declareth also that last point, touching the time of the desolation of the Sanctuary, as Hippolytus affirmeth, [Caten. Græc. in Daniel, chap. 8.]

Afterwards they built in the City of David, or Sion, a great wall, fenced with strong Towers, which was unto them in the place of a Citadel: and a Garrison of wicked persons being placed therein, they repelled there the Spoils of Jerusalem: and so much as there were plots there contrived against such as frequented the Temple, and innocent blood was shed and the Sanctuary defiled; the inhabitants of Jerusalem fled and the City became an habitation of strangers, and strange to her own Natives, her children forsaking her, [1 Maccab. 1. 35, 40.]

The Embassadors of the Rhodians came into the Camp of the Romans, with the same instructions, touching peace, which at Rome highly incensed the fathers, they were heard with much more discontent by the Council of war: Howbeit, when some of them would have had them violently forced out of the Camp, that it might appear would give them answer after fifteen days: in the mean time, that it might appear at what rate the authority of the Rhodians interceding for peace was esteemed, they began to debate of the means how to manage the war, [Liv. lib. 44.]

The day before Perseus was overcome, C. Sulpicius Gallus tribune of the soldiers of the second Legion by the permission of L. Emilius Paulus the Consul, calling the soldiers together, declared unto them, that the ensuing night, lest any should be astonished at the strangeness thereof, the Moon should suffer an eclipse from two of the clock in the night, until four; which being a thing that by the course of nature comes to pass at set times, it might be known before, he said, and likewise foretold; and therefore ought not to be lookt upon as a prodigy, [Id. lib. 44.] which a while afterward, as Pliny writeth, he taught in a treatise compiled thereupon, [lib. 2. cap. 12.] where he reporteth this man to be the first of the Roman nation, who published unto the world, the reason of the Sun and Moon's Eclipses, of whom Cato in Cicero's books of old age, thus speaketh: We did behold Scipio, Gallus, the intimate acquaintance of your father (Emilius Paulus) even to massacre himself unto death in his endeavour of measuring almost the Heavens and the Earth: how often did the morning surprise him, when he began to delineate any thing at night? and how oft did the night come upon him, when he began in the morning? how was he delighted when he foretold unto us the Eclipse of the Sun and Moon, a great while before they came to pass?

The night which did precede the day before the Nones of September, when the Moon was eclipsed at the appointed hour, it seemed unto the Roman soldiers to be almost a divine thing: but it affected the Macedonians as a bad Omen portending the fall of their kingdom, and the mischief of their nation, [Liv. lib. 44. cum Justin. lib. 33. cap. 1. Valer. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 11. Jul. Frontin. Strategemata, lib. 1. cap. 12.] The Astronomical account sheweth, That the total darknesse of the Moon, fell out upon the 21 day of June, according to the Julian account, the eighth hour after noon, this year, in Macedonia: when the soldiers would have given their bodies unto sleep, and rest in the night, as Plutarch hath it in his Paulus Emilius. Whence it is inferred, That the Ides of March, on this year, whereon Paulus entered upon his second Consulship, fell out upon the fourth day of January, according to the Julian reckoning.

The day following, Perseus being overthrown, [1 Maccabees 8. 5.] the kingdom of the Macedonians determined: when from Caranus it had stood for the space of 626 years. Howbeit, the reliques of the Macedonian Empire, while the Roman was rising, did yet survive in the Seleucus's of Syria, and the Ptolemei's of Egypt.

The third day after the fight, Perseus, with about five hundred Cretians, came by flight unto Amphipolis in Thracia; but, being not admitted by the Amphipolitans, when their money, both gold and silver, was brought unto the ships which abode in Strymon; he also himself came unto the river. Unto the Cretians, that were drawn the hope of money, out of his peculiar treasury, he delivered Cups, and goblets, with other gold and silver vessels, amounting to the value of 50 talents, which, being placed on the bank, he left to be caught up by them, from this scrambling, whilst they tumultuously went a ship-board, they sank one of the vessels, laden with a multitude of people, in the very mouth of the river. On that day he came unto Galipus, or Alepus, on the morrow unto the Island Samothrace, with two thousand talents; and humbly betook himself unto the Temple of Castor and Pollux, [Liv. lib. 44. cum Plutarcho, in Paulo Emilius.]

When

When the fame of the Roman victory had come into Asia, Antenor, who with a Fleet of Frigots waited at the Phæaz, sailed from thence into Cassandria, [Liv. lib. 45.]

C. Popilius, who lay at Delos for a safeguard unto the ships that were bound for Macedonia; after that he had heard of the success in Macedonia, and the removal of the enemies: Frigots out of their Station, he also himself, having diminished the Attick ships, proceeded to sail for Egypt, that he might discharge the Embassy: which he had undertaken: to the end that he might first meet with Antiochus, before he came to the walls of Alexandria. After that the Embassadors had passed Asia, and were come into Loryma, which is an Haven above 30 miles distant from Rhodes, directly opposite against the City, the principal persons of the Rhodians (for even thither also had the rumour of the victory been brought) met them, entreating them to put in at Rhodes; for they said, That it concerned the honour, and safety of the City, that they should undertake all things which had before been transacted and were then in agitation at Rhodes; and declare at Rome, what was known to themselves, not what was bruited by fame: though they refused a great while, yet at length they forced them to suffer a short interruption of their voyage for the safety of a confederate City: and after they were arrived at Rhodes, the same persons by their entreaties drew them into their public Assembly, [Id. lib. 45.]

The coming of the Legates rather increased than diminished the fear of the Citizens; for Popilius repeated all things, which all and every of them had spoken, or done in a hostile manner, during the time of the war; and being a man of a stout disposition, he aggravated the grievousness of the things that had been spoken with a stern countenance and criminating voice; so that, whereas there was no ground of his private displeasure against the City, they might grieve by the bitterness of one single Roman Senator, how the whole Senate stood affected toward them. The speech of C. Decimius more mild, who in most of the things alleged by Popilius, said, That the fault was not the peoples, but such sticking men that stirred them up: that those kind of persons, setting their tongue to sale, had framed decrees full of Court-flattery, and had dispatched such Embassages, whereof the Rhodians were no less ashamed, than penitent for: all which, had the people power in their own hands, would fall upon the heads of the guilty. He was heard with great approbation, no less because he charged the fault upon the authors, than that he extenuated the crime of the people. When therefore the principal persons replied unto the Romans, their speech was in no wise acceptable, who endeavoured to purge the crimes objected by Popilius; as theirs, who agreed with Popilius in exposing the authors unto punishment for the execution of the crime: and thereupon those Rhodians, who before carried such high minds, as if they had conquered, as well Philip, as Antiochus, and were Superior in strength to the Romans themselves, were brought into such terror, that even in the presence of the Embassadors, there was a Decree suddenly made, That whosoever should be convicted to have spoken or done any thing in the behalf of Perseus, against the Romans, should be condemned to death. Some upon the approach of the Romans withdrew themselves out of the City, others laid violent hands upon themselves: the Embassadors staying not above five days at Rhodes, went unto Alexandria. Neither were the judgements grounded upon the Decree made before them, less slowly put in execution; which resolution in performing that business, the Clemency of Decimius did procure, [Id. lib. 45. cum Dione, Legat. 20. al. 2.]

After that the news of Perseus's flight had been brought unto Rome, it seemed good unto the Senate that the Rhodian Embassadors, who came to make up a peace with Perseus, should be called before their Assembly: the Embassadors, of whom Angelipolis was the chief, having entered into the Senate, said, That they were sent to make an end of the war, which would be grievous and inconvenient unto all Greece, costly and hurtful unto the Romans themselves. Now, seeing it was concluded, in such sort as the Rhodians always desired; they did congratulate it unto them. When Angelipolis had briefly spoken these words, he departed out of the Assembly. The Senate, making use of that occasion, seeing that they purposed to disgrace openly the Rhodians, and make them an example, made this reply. That the Rhodians dispatched that Embassy, neither in regard of the advantages of Greece, nor of the expectations of the Roman people, but in the behalf of Perseus; for if their care had been such as was pretended, Embassadors would then have been sent, when Perseus having drawn his army into Thessaly, for the space of two years, partly besieged, and partly, by denouncing war, terrified the Cities of Greece. At that time there was no mention of peace made by the Rhodians: but after that they had heard, that the Woodes were got over, and that the Romans had passed into Macedonia, and that Perseus was closely environed, the Rhodians sent their Embassy; to no other end, but that they might deliver Perseus out of his imminent danger: wherefore the fathers judgement was,

Iii 2

That

That they ought not to bestow the accustomed rewards, or any beneficence nor a courteous answer unto the Embassadors, [Polyb. Legat. 88. Liv. lib. 45.]

Those, who being sent from Rhodes by Dinon to Perseus as an internuncio, had often failed into Macedonia; affairs now being turned, fled for fear into Cnidus. And when the Cnidians had secured him in safe custody, upon the vindication of the Rhodians, he was returned into Rhodes again; where, upon examination, having confessed all, he fully consented unto all the notes of the letters which had been intercepted, and to the Epistles sent to and again, both from Dinon, and also from Perseus: where-with Dinon being convinced (for an example to others,) he was executed, [Polyb. in Excerpt. Ovalef. pag. 137. 138.]

Cn. Octavius, who together with Paulus Æmilius, managed the Macedonian war, upon the arrival of his Fleet at Samothrace, being touched with the reverence of Caesar and Pollux, left Perseus unassailed, but yet he debarr'd him from the sea, and secured him from escaping, [Plutarch in P. Æmilio.] And whilst he endeavoured to draw him to a surrender, sometimes by threatenings, sometimes by hopes; a business whether accidental or contrived by deliberation, assisted him therein. L. Attilius an illustrious young man, when he saw the people of Samothrace assembled together, by the permission of the Magistrate, complained that the supposed sanctity of the Island was violated by the presence of Euander the Cretian: who having almost compassed the death of King Eumenes at Delphos, did now together with Perseus, defend himself by the refuge of the Temple. Hereupon Theonides, who was the chief Magistrate amongst them (whom they call King) seeing himself, and the whole Island in the power of the Romans, demanded of Perseus, that Euander should be given up unto trial: which when Perseus disliked, because he saw that the crime being discovered, would be devolved upon himself, he procured that Euander should be slain: and corrupted Theonides with money, to declare unto the people, that Euander had made away himself with his own hands. Howbeit by so wicked a prank against his only friend that remained, and had been known to him in so many enterprises, he alienated the affections of all that were with him; and when every one for his own security betook himself to the Romans, he was forced to betink himself how to make his escape, [Liv. lib. 45.]

Wherefore Perseus secretly dealt with Oroandes the Cretian, to whom the coast of Thrace was well known, because he had used traffick in that Country, that receiving him into a Frigate (which did ride at the Promontory Demetrias) he should convey him to Cotys the King of the Thracians. About the time of Sun-set there was as much money brought to the Frigate, as could be secretly conveyed: which being received, Oroandes, making use of a Cretian feat, as soon as it was dark, loosing from thoar, bent thorough the Main unto Crete: afterwards about midnight wretched Perseus let down himself, his children, and his wife, not acquainted with travels and wandering, out of a straight window by a wall; and when the ship was not found in the Haven, after that he had awhile walked on the thoar, at length fearing the light, now approaching, he betook himself to a darke corner in the side of the Temple, [Liv. & Plutarch, ut supra.]

After that, by the command of Octavius the Prætor, it was published, by the Cryer, That the royal Youth (the children of Princes that were chosen to attend upon the King) and other Macedonians, who were of Samothrace, if they would come over to the Romans, should preserve their safety, liberty, and all that they had, which was either about them, or which they had left behind in Macedonia; they all came over, and gave up their names to C. Posthumus the Tribune of the souldiers. Ion also the Theſſalonian surrendered up the young children of the King, which had been committed to his trust, unto Octavius; neither was any of the children left with the King, except Philipppus the eldest. Thereupon he surrendered himself and his son to Octavius: fondly accusing fortune, and the gods, in whose Temple he was, because they afforded their supplicant no assistance. He was commanded to be put aboard in the Prætorian ship, where also the money that remained was carried; and forthwith the Fleet went back unto Amphipolis. [ibid.]

Antiochus, coming to possess Pelusium, when he had passed over the River Leufines (which place is four miles distant from Alexandria) met with the Roman Embassadors: whom when upon their approach, he had saluted, and reached forth his right hand unto Popilius, he delivered unto him the Tables which he held in his hands, concluding that Decree of the Senate, whereby he was commanded immediately to conclude the war against Ptolemy; and enjoyed him, that before he did any thing else, he should read it. When he had read over the Tables, and said, That he would consult with his friends, what he ought to do; Popilius with a vine-twig which he had in his hand, encircled the King, and commanded him before he went out of the ring, which he had described, to return his answer to the Tables. The King being astonished with that that, unusual and imperious action, after that he had demurred a while, saith, I will do what the Romans command. Whereupon at length Popilius reached forth his right hand unto the King, as to a confederate and friend. Thereupon, the space of a few dayes; and those prefixedly numbered, being granted, Antiochus full fore against his mind, and not without fighting, however, yet withdrew his forces into Syria (for instead of Ægyptus, in Polybius we suppose Ægyptus ought to be substituted out of Livie) esteeming it expedient to give place unto the times for the present. [Polyb. Legat. 92. & Liv. lib. 45. cum Cicero in Philippica 88. Velleio Patreulo lib. 1. cap. 10. Valerio Maximo, lib. 6. cap. 4. Justin. lib. 34. cap. 3. Appiano in Syriac. pag. 131. Plutarcho in Apophthegmat. cap. 32. &c.]

The Samaritans, seeing the Jews most miserably oppressed by Antiochus, professed themselves to be by descent Sidonians, and thereupon obtained letters from Antiochus to Apollonius his President, and Nicanor the Kings Steward, that they should not be involved jointly into the common condition of the Jews; and that the Garizinite Temple, as yet not honoured with the title of any god should from thenceforth be called by the name Idoli Martis, or of the Grecian Jupiter: there is extant touching this business a supplicatory Epistle of the Samaritans in Josephus his 12 book of Antiquities, the seventh Chapter, with the answer of Antiochus, dated year the 46, (but I know not from what Epocha the account is drawn) the 18 day of the month Hecatombion.

After that Antiochus had departed out of Egypt, the Roman Embassadors by their authority confirmed the union between the two brethren, who were scarce yet well agreed, [Liv. lib. 45.] C. Popilius requested as a boon from the King, the enlargement of Menalcidus, the Lacedemonian, who had actively made much of the pressing and necessary times of the Kings to the encreasing of his own private estate; but he commanded them to send Polyaratus, who had been a chief favourer of Perseus his party at Rhodes, to Rome: and Menalcidus was indeed dismissed; but there was a demur made concerning Polyaratus: for Ptolemy reverencing as well Polyaratus as his Country, did by no means determine to send him to Rome, but rather unto Rhodes; which Polyaratus himself also requested. Being embarked therefore in a small vessel, and delivered to the custody of one of his friends, named Demetrius, he designed him unto Rhodes, writing letters also unto the Rhodians touching his transportation. Howbeit Polyaratus arriving at Phaselides, I know not upon what thoughts, taking with him hearts for the throwing of the Altar, and priestly ornaments, fled unto the common tutelary God of the City. [Polyb. Legat. 92. & 95. & in Excerptis Velleij. pag. 138.]

Popilius, having settled affairs at Alexandria, sailed unto Cyprus, and from thence dismissed the fleet and army of Antiochus into Syria, which had lately vanquished in that place, the Egyptians. [Polyb. Legat. 92. Liv. lib. 45.]

The Kings of Egypt being delivered from the war against Antiochus, before all things dispatched Numenius, one of their friends, Embassador unto Rome; to return thanks for the favours which they had received from them. [Polyb. Legat. 95.]

When the Phaselites had sent unto Rhodes, requesting them to receive and carry along with them Polyaratus; the Rhodians did indeed send a ship, but forbade Epichares the Master of the ship, to admit him aboard the vessel, because the Alexandrians were enjoyned to set the man ashore at Rhodes: the ship therefore being brought unto Phaselides. When Epichares refused to receive Polyaratus into his vessel, and on the other side Demetrius, unto whose custody he was recommended by the King, commanded the man to get up and be gone; and the inhabitants of Phaselides more-ordered urged it, fearing least it might render them obnoxious to the Romans. Polyaratus being afflicted with the sadness of his care, went aboard Demetrius his ship again. Howbeit, having gotten an opportunity at his landing, he fled directly with speed unto Caunus: and in like manner complaining of his sad condition, implored the assistance of the Caunians: he privily sent unto the Cibyrates, requesting that he might be received into their City, and some might be sent unto him, who might safely conduct him; for he was known unto the Cibyrates, because the children of Pancrates the Tyrant had been educated with him: and when the Cibyrates had consented and yielded unto his requests, Polyaratus was brought unto Cibra. [Id. in Excerpt. Velleij. pag. 138. 141.]

Popilius and the Embassie which was sent unto Antiochus, returning unto Rome, made report of the controversies taken up and compassed between the Kings, and of the army withdrawn out of Egypt into Syria; afterwards the Embassadors of the Kings themselves came, the Legates of Antiochus declared, That the peace which was approved by the Senate, seemed more approved unto the King than any victory; and, That he obeyed the commands of the Roman Embassadors no otherwise, than if they

they had been the injunction of the Gods : they congratulated afterwards unto them the conquest over Perſeus ; to which, if any thing had been commanded unto him, the King to his utmoſt endeavours would have been aſſiſtant. The Legates of Ptolemy, joyntly in the name of the King, and Cleopatra returned thanks. That they were more indebted unto the Senate, and the Roman people, than their parents, than unto the immortal gods, by whom they had been delivered from a loſt miſerable ſiege, received their paternal kingdom, almoſt loſt; the Senate replied, That it was acceptably and duly done, in that he had obeyed the Embaſſadors, and that it was acceptably unto the Senate, and the Roman people, and unto the Perſes of Egypt, Ptolemy and Cleopatra, (they ſaid) if any benefit and advantage beſell them by their means, that the Senate did much rejoice at it, and ſhould endeavour, That they might eſpecially be the chiefſt ſafeguard of their kingdom to conſiſt in the fidelity of the Roman people. C. Papius the Pretor was commanded, That he ſhould take care, that the Romans ſhould be ſent unto the Embaſſadors, according to appointment and cuſtom.

There was a joynt Embassage came both from Eumenes, and from Attalus, and from Athenæus, brethren to Rome, to congratulate the overthrow of Perſeus. [Id.]

3837. Ibid. King Antiochus by a publick edict, commanded all nations that were subject unto him, to observe the same way of divine worship, and, laying aside their peculiar customs, to profess the same religion with the Greeks; the punishment of death being proposed unto such as should be disobedient; and he appointed over-keepers over every people and nation, who should compell them herunto. [1 Maccab. 1, 43, 52, 33.]

52, 33.] Of these he sent an ancient man of Athens into Judea and Samaria, that he might force the Jews to depart from the observation of the divine law; and defile the Temple at Jerusalem; imposing thereupon the name of Jupiter Olympius, Jupiter Capitolinus, as upon the Temple at Garizim, Διὸς ἑνὸς, Jupiter Hospitable, or the Protector of strangers: for upon better considerations, he seems to have thought that a more suitable name, than Evolus Grecian, unto the condition of the Samaritans; because they were peregrines and strangers in the land of the Jews. [3 Maccab. 4, 12, 13.]

4, 13, 21.] The King sent also proclamations by Embassadors to Jerusalem, and the Cities of Judah, that they should follow the rites of the Gentiles, take away the sacrificers out of the Temple, prohibit the sabbaths and festival days, pollute the sanctuary, and the Ministers thereof, erect Altars and Groves, and Temples of Idols, that they should sacrifice Swine, and other unclean beasts, that they should offer their children to remain uncircumcised, and defile themselves with every impure thing, to the end, That they might forget the law, and change all the Ordinances of their God; [Macab. cab. 4, 1, 46, 5, 1] and that it might wholly be a crime to professe the Jew's religion. [2 Macab. cab. 4, 5, 1]
